In the case of the Panama Railroad, the property was operated as a private corporation in the year 1904, and the percentage of operating expenses to earnings was 62 per cent. In 1905, the first year it was operated by the Government, the operating expenses jumped to 77½ per cent and the next year to 79½ per cent. In 1907 they were 74½ per cent; in 1910 they were 71.4 per cent; in 1911, 70.8 per cent. They have averaged, under Government operation, about 75 per cent of the gross earnings, against 62 per cent when under private operation, and this notwithstanding the fact that the earnings have greatly increased on account of the building of the canal. That is, they have increased 84 per cent since the Government took over the railroad, while the operating expenses have increased 105 per cent.

Mr. BURTON. I will suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that it is impossible to derive any inference from those figures without carefully analyzing them. It is true, on the bald statement, that the percentage of operating expenditures to earnings was much greater under Government operation than under private enterprise; but is not that a mere matter of bookkeeping? The main part of the work of that railway was hauling away dirt from the Culebra Cut and other places where excavating was done. If the price charged for hauling away that dirt was high, that would mean one percentage of operating expenses to income, while if the price was low, it would mean an entirely different percentage. Thus it is really, after all, a matter of bookkeeping.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I desire to state to the Senator that the Panama Railroad Co. did not do the excavating work.

Mr. BURTON. Oh, no; but they hauled away the dirt.

Mr. BRISTOW. No; that was done by the Canal Commission. The Isthmian Canal Commission did that. The Panama Railroad Co. operated the steamship line, operated the railroad line across the Isthmus, hauled the freight of the Government to the various stations along the route, and also operated the commissary department; and the canal company bought from the railroad company the supplies that fed the men that worked on the canal. The railroad company also operated the hotels.

Mr. BURTON. The railroad company operated the hotels?

Mr. BRISTOW. The railroad company constructed and operated the hotels. Its operations were kept entirely separate; and when the Isthmian Canal Commission employed the railroad company to do anything it paid the railroad the same as it would have paid any other corporation. The actual work of excavation, however, was not done by the railroad company.

Mr. BURTON. Oh, no; of course not; but how about hauling away that dirt?

Mr. BRISTOW. The hauling away was done by engines and cars owned by the commission itself.

Mr. BURTON. Did not the railroad charge for hauling away that dirt?

Mr. BRISTOW. The railroad company was not employed to do the excavating.

Mr. BURTON. Oh, no.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Did they not use the railroad tracks?

Mr. BRISTOW. No; they put in their own tracks.

Mr. BURTON. Part of the way.

Mr. BRISTOW. There might have been some part of this excavation done by the railroad; but the great mass of the excavation was done by means of tracks which the Isthmian Canal Commission itself laid, independent of the railroad.

Mr. BURTON. That is, separate and additional tracks on the main line?

Mr. BRISTOW. Not on the line, but in the canal. Of course the Senator will remember that the canal was excavated from the channel of the canal, while the railroad ran around the canal, and did not run in it at all.

Mr. BURTON. Yes; I have seen that. I visited the canal, and saw that the larger part of the work done by the railroad, or in connection with it, was in hauling that dirt. Did they make any charge for hauling that dirt? That is the question.

Mr. BRISTOW. The hauling of the dirt was very largely done by the Isthmian Canal Commission. If any of it was done by the railroad, it was only incidental. The hauling of the dirt was done by the Isthmian Canal Commission, with equipment which it owned, independently of the Panama Railroad.

Mr. BURTON. In special cars?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. WEEKS. I think the Senator will find that in some places the cars of the canal commission did pass over the track of the railroad in going to the point where they dumped the dirt; but that was all the connection the railroad had with the excavation, which was entirely under the direction of the canal commission; and the work was done with equipment furnished by the commission, over tracks laid by the commission. I prefaced what I stated in inserting those figures with the statement that one must know every condition surrounding an operation before coming to a definite conclusion, and yet that is the trend of the result in all Government operations. It does not differ from the results obtained in every other country where a Government operation has been undertaken.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further to me, in regard to the figures which the Senator from Massachusetts has put in the RECORD, I do not question their accuracy. I think the result they show is easily accounted for. The Panama Railroad Co., after it became the property of the United States, did increase operating expenses by paying its employees better wages. It also very materially reduced the rates that had been charged, and therefore reduced the percentage of income as against the percentage of expenditure of the corporation.

Mr. BURTON. One question in this connection. If you include the investment of the railroad company, has it not been run at a loss?

Mr. BRISTOW. I think not. I think it has been run at a fine profit.

Mr. BURTON. One thing is certain. They have had a great abundance of business. There is no trouble on that score.

Mr. BRISTOW. Of course you can not compare the Panama Railroad Co. and its line of steamships with any other enterprise on the earth, because the United States Government gave it an enormous amount of business, and it was retained and operated because of the influence it would have upon the rates which the Government would have to pay for that business. We shipped hundreds of thousands of tons of cement to the Isthmus, and the tonnage of freight was very great. The Panama Railroad Co. was a competitor for that business. Occasionally, however, a private corporation would underbid it and it would lose the business.

Mr. BURTON. In what way does the Senator mean that it was a competitor?

Mr. BRISTOW. It competed for the business with every other company.

Mr. BURTON. For what business?

Mr. BRISTOW. The Government's business.

Mr. BURTON. What branch of the Government's business?

Mr. BRISTOW. Freight and passengers.

Mr. BURTON. The Senator means the steamship line, not the railroad company?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes. The railroad had no competitor, of course. It could not have. I refer to the steamship line. Take the steel that was used in the locks; I do not remember exactly, but I know that the Panama Railroad Co. had to bid for the traffic against competitors, foreign and domestic. Sometimes it would underbid, and again it would overbid and lose the business.

Mr. BURTON. We passed a statute, did we not, leaving the field of transportation by boat to the Canal Zone open to foreign vessels as well as domestic vessels?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask for information largely, although I have an impression about the matter. I speak now of the Panama Railroad as a railroad, not reckoning the steamship operation. It is true, is it not, that the movement of all the Government material across or over any part of the Isthmus was upon the railroad, and it is true, is it not, that the charge for that service by a system of bookkeeping was credited to the Panama Railroad? That is true, is it not? My recollection is that the charge credited to the Panama Railroad for that service was a very large charge as compared with the rate for similar service in the United States. I was rather surprised when I visited Panama to learn something about the rates that were credited to the Panama Railroad for the transportation on the Isthmus itself. I think if it were inquired into it would be found that that rate gave to the Panama Railroad Co. a larger credit than it should have had, considering the service that it rendered.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I do not doubt that the rates in many instances were higher than the rates would be on certain great lines in the United States, but I think the conditions were entirely different, so that you could not make a satisfactory comparison. First, the line is only 47 miles long, and then there are difficulties of operation at the terminal facilities; there was the necessity for short hauls, and the nature of the service was such that there could not be any comparison made that would be, in my opinion, equivalent to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Under and through the construction of the canal it was very easy to make the Panama Railroad Co. a profitable corporation. All that the Government had to do was to give it credit for the service that it rendered upon the Isthmus in a sufficient amount to make the company a profitable enterprise.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. I do not object to colloquies between Senators and the Senator from Ohio, but I make the point of order that the Senator from Ohio can not retire from the active control of the debate and leave it to a colloquy between two other Senators.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will be compelled to sustain that point of order if it is insisted upon.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. I yield. I think it is only fair after this inquiry that I should yield to the Senator from Kansas to answer the inquiries which have been propounded to me by the Senator from Iowa and have been repeated to the Senator from Kansas. I think there is no question but what that is in order.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to say——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has doubt about that.

Mr. FLETCHER. I make the point of order that the Senator from Kansas is not in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The uniform ruling has been that a Senator may speak twice on any one day. The Chair has heretofore ruled, and he has been sustained by the Senate in the proposition, that it is not yielding the floor to permit a Senator to make an inquiry, but it is yielding the floor for the Senator on the floor to permit somebody else to talk on the subject. The Chair does not believe that it is conducive to the orderly practice of the Senate to permit a Senator to ask a Senator on the floor a question about which he does not know anything and then have him call on somebody else to answer it. The Chair thinks that is simply evading the rule of the Senate.

Mr. BURTON. Well, Mr. President, it has certainly been the custom of the Senate to secure all the information possible on a subject under discussion. The course of procedure outlined by the Chair is certainly in entire conformity with our usual practice. However, I will not insist on that point.

Mr. BRISTOW. Do I understand the Chair to hold that the Senator from Ohio can not yield to me to answer a question which has been propounded?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My position is that if the Senator from Ohio yields to the Senator from Kansas to make the explanation the Senator from Ohio loses the floor. I am very much interested in the speech of the Senator from Ohio; I am watching it closely; and I object to interruptions in that way.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. I yield to the Senator from Kansas to ask a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KERN in the chair). The Senator from Ohio yields to the Senator from Kansas for a question.

Mr. BRISTOW. I would like to answer a statement made by the Senator from Iowa in his interrogatory of the Senator from Ohio, because I do not believe that the Senator's statement was fully explanatory of the question that has been asked. If I can do so under the rules without depriving the Senator from Ohio of the floor, I would be glad to proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield for that purpose or for a question?

Mr. BURTON. For either, provided it does not deprive me of the floor. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas that it would be entirely in accordance with the rules of the Senate to present his answer in the form of a question to me.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the present occupant of the chair understands the ruling of the Vice President—and it is a little embarrassing to the present occupant of the chair, who has just been called to it—the Senator from Ohio can yield only for the purpose of having a question asked or hearing a question. The Chair does not understand that he can yield for any other purpose without losing the floor.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I do not understand the rule——

Mr. BURTON. Is this a parliamentary inquiry? Otherwise, I wish to proceed.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to address myself to the Chair.

Mr. BURTON. Is it a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. NELSON. No; I want to address myself to the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BURTON. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota for a question or a point of order.

Mr. NELSON. The question that occurs to me is this: I understand an objection was made by——

Mr. BURTON. One minute. I do not wish, of course, to yield my right to the floor.

Mr. NELSON. When a point of order is made——

Mr. BURTON. If a point of order is made——

Mr. NELSON. If one Senator has a right to make a point of order, certainly another Senator has a right to reply to that point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order has been disposed of, and it is not debatable.

Mr. NELSON. The last point of order was not disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will hold that it was disposed of. The decision of the Chair was not appealed from, and the Senator from Ohio had proceeded after the point of order was disposed of. The Chair will hold that the Senator from Ohio can yield the floor only for the purpose of a question, unless he yields it altogether.

Mr. BURTON. Then has anyone any question to ask me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio will proceed in order.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I think it is now clear to the Senate that the transaction pertaining to the ownership of the Panama Steamship Co. is altogether different from the one proposed here. In the first place, the circumstances of the acquisition differentiate it. The French New Panama Canal Co. owned the franchise and had made very considerable excavations; it also owned a fleet of dredges and material for continuing the work of constructing the canal. In that connection they owned the Panama Railway, or rather a majority of the stock. When the purchase was made for $40,000,000 it vested title in the United States and brought with it the ownership of the Panama Steamship Co.

Another very vital difference is this: The Government was engaged in a colossal engineering enterprise, the construction of the Panama Canal. For the construction of that canal it was necessary to have ready means for the moving of the dirt away from the points of excavation. It was also necessary to have an enormous amount of material brought from the United States or other localities in the form of cement, structural material, and otherwise.

It was desirable that the company bringing the freight should be immediately under the control of the canal commission or officials of the United States. President Roosevelt had, as stated by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], three courses before him: One to dispose of this railway, which would have subjected the canal commission and the builders of the canal to very considerable embarrassment; another, not to part with the ownership, but to lease it, which would have had a somewhat similar effect; the third, to retain it. I think he decided wisely in adopting the third course. But it is perfectly evident that both the railway and steamship line were mere adjuncts or incidents to this great governmental work. It is true that as an incident freight was carried across the Isthmus by the railway, and freight was carried in the boats; but that does not change the general nature of the transaction.

Now, what are you seeking here? Without any incidental justification it is proposed that the Government go into a business that from time immemorial has been conducted by private parties. There is no comparison between the two enterprises. They are as far apart as night and morning.

I want to suggest to the Senators that it will be difficult, without very accurate analysis, to derive any conclusions from the operations of the Panama Railroad as to the desirability of Government ownership. It was too largely used merely as an instrument of service in the construction of the canal to be any criterion.

If, as it was suggested by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], there was a high charge for moving that dirt, that is one thing. If there was a low charge, that is another. In the one case the percentage of operating expenses, if it was large, as indicated under Government ownership, carries with it some inference that the enterprise was carelessly or wastefully managed. If the price charged for hauling the dirt was low, it carries an entirely different inference from that first suggested.

There is an interesting field for study in the operation of this railroad and this steamship line. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] thinks it was managed successfully, and that its defects, such as there were, arose from the influence of politics. If politics could be interjected into this service, into the construction of a canal, and that, too, by the Government, and where everything else was merely incidental, how would it be possible to avoid the interjection of politics into a Government owned or operated steamship line?

At Panama the railroad was engaged merely in transporting material to be used by the Government in the construction of the canal. If politics could there juggle rates and exert a baneful influence, how much greater would be its opportunity for injury in such an enterprise as is contemplated by this measure now before us.

Mr. President, they would be coming here from every State and district in the Nation to juggle figures and obtain favors. Such influences would be exerted to determine the rates on cargoes, say, from a port on the Gulf of Mexico to some European market. These men, with merchandise to ship, would say, "I know Senator Blank very well" or "I am acquainted with Representative So-and-So, and I will write him and see that a certain rate is fixed." We all know that this interjection of political considerations is the bane of enterprises conducted by any government.

Mr. McCrosky, one of the most ardent advocates of socialism and Government ownership, says that the reason why they can not rely upon Government ownership in Great Britain is that they lack proper administrative bodies to conduct the business. Mr. President, I do not believe the time will come when we in this country will possess the proper administrative bodies to settle these questions impartially.

If there is any one thing with which a man in public life is impressed, it is the fact that the influence of an interested, though selfish, few is far more effective than that of the great multitude who are inert and apparently indifferent. I can not look with any complacency upon the idea of either a Government line of ships or a Government-owned railroad. Their management will be so allied to our political life, so certain to fall under the control of a more or less competent bureaucracy, that I do not believe the best interests of the people could possibly be subserved by such an organization.

Probably other Senators who have considered this matter more carefully than I will discuss the question of Government ownership and its relation to this bill.

I repeat, though, that public ownership does not alarm me as it does many. When there is or should be a monopoly, as, for example, in the case of a public lighting plant, a public gas plant, or possibly even a street railway, or when some consideration of public health or morals is involved, as in the inspection of articles of food, I do not fear public ownership. But when you come to apply it generally to this enormous country, with its varied interests and its colossal enterprises, you face a very different situation.

A new municipality might well adopt public ownership in some of its activities; public ownership might serve well within a small area, as in the case of some of the countries of Europe; it may work well in other countries like Germany, with a trained bureaucracy, though in that country public ownership was adopted not because of economic considerations but for reasons of military exigency. The same is true of Russia. There they had first public ownership, then private ownership, and then they returned to public ownership again. Does anybody contend that this was because the Government of Russia, absolute as it is, thought that public management was better? Far from that. They regarded the railways as an agency for carrying troops in time of war. Both in their construction and operation the railroads were deemed such important agencies for both offensive and defensive military movements that the Government insisted upon retaining absolute control of them.

To return now to another phase of the discussion, suppose the Government contemplates running this proposed line of boats for profit. Does anyone here believe for a moment that the cost will not be greater under Government operation than under private management? I do not think anyone will assert that it will not be greater. You would start then with your corporation under that disadvantage. I wonder whether that feature of the bill will not be eliminated. I wonder whether an attempt will be made to conduct the business in this indirect way or whether it will be done directly, with larger expenses and at greater cost, so that if it is run for profit the charges to the shipper must be greater than those of private concerns.

It may be said that the private owner would ask an unreasonable profit or that the Government, despite the greater cost of operation, would make the rates lower. Now, it is an economic law of universal application that where free competition exists in any field, when considerations of risk and the attractiveness of the business are taken into consideration, profits seek a certain level. If the business of carrying goods by sea is more profitable than that of building of houses and renting them, or if it is more profitable than the manufacture of steel, a larger amount of capital will go into the shipping business and more boats will be constructed. When there is an unusually profitable line of enterprise, capital tends to enter it in excessive amounts.

The existence of monopoly may prevent the application of this principle. But if there is any one business which capital is free to enter and in which men of various nations may engage, it is that of shipping. I do not place much stress on the testimony and the reports relative to conference agreements that boats of different lines shall sail at stated intervals from the same ports and on the same routes, because manifestly that is absolutely essential for the profitable conduct of the business, and, instead of promoting excessive profit, it promotes reasonable rates and gives the shipping public opportunities to send their goods to their destination at favorable times and under favorable circumstances. There is really nothing in that argument. If there should be profit in any other line of business, it is just as likely the argument would be advanced here that the Government must enter that field.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BURTON. I am glad to yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Ohio where the Government will get the first $5,100,000, which is the 51 per cent? I have been examining the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, and I find that the Government is about $16,000,000 short on the receipts over the expenditures.

Mr. BURTON. Oh, a little thing like that did not influence those who were framing this bill. I really do not myself see where it is to come from.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield further?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. I want to follow that up by stating in the form of a question——

Mr. BURTON. I am willing to yield for a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield for any other purpose than for a question?

Mr. BURTON. I yield for a question only, as I desire to keep within the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will keep within the ruling of the Chair by making an inquiry as a seeker for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has put the matter in the usual form. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BURTON. I yield for a question. I am very anxious, Mr. President, to observe the rules as they have been enunciated.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will use my utmost endeavors to do so. I have noticed in the bill—I have to make this preliminary statement in order to render my question intelligible—that it uses the language:

> Such corporation may begin business as soon as 51 per cent of such stock has been subscribed and paid for by the United States.

I inquire whether, in view of that language, the bill does not seem to contemplate that there will be some difficulty in the Government making the payment and that the credit would not be extended, because this payment is required to be made in cash?

I desire to follow that up with a further inquiry. In the event the Government could not lay its hands upon the ready money, so to speak, what is the Senator's interpretation of the paragraph of the President's message on page 7, which was delivered on December 8, 1914, referring to the shipping bill, which is as follows:

> It should take action to make it certain that transportation at reasonable rates will be promptly provided, even where the carriage is not at first profitable; and then, when the carriage has become sufficiently profitable to attract and engage private capital and engage it in abundance, the Government ought to withdraw.

Having that in mind, the Government having paid the original $5,100,000 in cash, which it is required to pay previous to the corporation beginning business, after the operations shall have been put upon something like a paying basis—not that dividends might be paid, because the 49 per cent that might possibly represent private ownership would scorn the thought of sordid profits where a great public benefit is to be conferred—but after the business is put upon a self-sustaining basis, simply paying expenses, if immediately upon reaching that desired point the United States is to withdraw from the business, I wish to inquire what the Government would do in withdrawing? Would it place its interests, the 51 per cent, either of the initial $10,000,000 or of the $30,000,000, which is contemplated to be advanced by the sale of bonds under the Panama Canal act, making a potential $40,000,000, of which the Government would hold 51 per cent—having reached that desired point of self-sustaining operation would the Government in disposing of its holdings put up the stock at public auction, or would it sell through the shipping board its stock? If so, who would the probable purchasers of that stock be? Would they be a favored coterie of those holding the 49 per cent, or some shipping company that might survive governmental competition in this form, or what? Finally would it not wind up with the entire ownership of the public interest in the hands of the representatives of the 49 per cent? If that be so, has not the Government contributed its 51 per cent of the potential $40,000,000?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the Senator from Illinois is simply presenting a series of questions argumentatively and is not really propounding a question for information to the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield further to the Senator from Illinois for a question?

Mr. BURTON. I am frank to say that the questions already propounded by the Senator from Illinois are somewhat complex, and there is a considerable number of them. I would prefer that they be given one at a time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was going on the idea, Mr. President, if I may be allowed to explain to the Senator from Georgia, as he is familiar with court practice, that when the opinion of an expert is required——

Mr. BURTON. Oh, I do not claim to be an expert.

Mr. SHERMAN. Sometimes it is necessary to ask a very long question. I have seen them last half a day when doctors of different sciences were testifying on the stand.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I insist that the Senator from Illinois is out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio, as the Chair understands, declines to yield further to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. BURTON. I should prefer that questions be asked separately.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will comply with the ruling of the Chair and will wait until the Senator from Ohio answers the first question I have asked before requesting the privilege of asking another.

Mr. BURTON. What was the first question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Where the Government would get the $5,100,000 required to initiate the enterprise?

Mr. BURTON. I suppose they would take that $5,100,000 out of the Treasury. But there is a provision in the bill that I would like to have the advocates of the measure explain in that connection. It is said that as soon as the $5,100,000 is subscribed——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BURTON. I will ask the Senator to allow me to get through with this. It is said that as soon as the $5,100,000 is subscribed the Government may begin business. How will you do it? I ask the lawyers who are favoring this measure to tell me. This $5,100,000 would have to be subscribed by the United States Government before this corporation could take one single step. Also before this corporation could begin doing business it would have to have its organization and directors; the United States Government can not be a director; there must be persons to act as directors. A part of the additional $4,900,000, at least, would have to be subscribed by individuals before you could perfect your organization.

The Senator from Illinois has made a valuable suggestion in what he has said. He read from a document—Senators know the source from which it came—to the effect that when this business becomes profitable then private capital in abundance will go into it, but everybody tells us here that we are going to carry freight at a loss. Suppose the Government of the United States embarks on this business, and for a year or six months or any other time conducts the business at a loss, will that bring out capital in abundance to take the place of the public capital? That shows the kind of calculation or motive that is behind this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRYAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly; for a question.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to inquire if the Senator can distinguish any difference between the proposition contained in the President's message and a subsidy in effect?

Mr. BURTON. In form only; in its far-reaching effect it is altogether worse than any proposition for a subsidy that has ever come in here. In the first place, it will cost a great deal more; and, in the next place, it will inure to the benefit of certain commodities or localities. That is absolutely certain.

You can not establish a Government line which can carry only a part of the traffic without favoring certain parts of the country and certain classes of products. Just think what would happen before an election with the pressure brought from different portions of the United States, with the demand made insistently: "We know you, Mr. Commissioner. We have been your friends in the past. Our products are rotting in our ports, and we want a Government ship sent there. We want it sent there quickly, and we want our crops carried to a foreign port at a low price."

I do not wish to subject any bureaucrat of the United States Government to that temptation. It may be they would resist, but I am afraid not. On the other hand, if you leave this to private enterprise it will work itself out in a thoroughly normal manner.

Whatever course you pursue, this enterprise is sure to encounter obstacles at almost every step. As I have pointed out, if it were run on a no-profit basis, the owner of a single share of $100 could go into the courts and say: "This corporation is not being properly managed. It is not being managed to create a legitimate profit. My property interests are being disregarded," and there would be trouble.

Should the Government acquire all the stock, which is certainly not contemplated by the terms of this bill, it would amount to direct and complete Government ownership. Should the Government seek to run it on the profit basis, then and in that case the charges would be higher than they would be if private enterprise had control of the business.

In all that I am saying, Mr. President and Senators, I do not wish to be understood as opposing the operation by the Government of Army transports or naval auxiliaries. There is no denying that there is an emergency now created by war. If those hulls are capable of carrying any freight at this time, let that be done; but that can be done without any such measure as this. It would be the natural outgrowth of a plan such as that suggested by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] in a bill which he introduced, and which, as I understand, has passed both Houses.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, would it interrupt the Senator if I asked him a question?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BURTON. I yield for a question.

Mr. LODGE. I want to ask the Senator this question. He referred to a clause in this bill. Do I understand him to be speaking to the bill or to the substitute?

Mr. BURTON. I have not examined the substitute with the care with which I examined the original bill. What is the clause to which the Senator refers?

Mr. LODGE. It was not so much in reference to the clause. It was the clause to which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] referred.

Mr. BURTON. The 51 per cent clause?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. BURTON. That is certainly in both bills. I certainly am not in error in that.

Mr. LODGE. But of course the pending motion is to substitute.

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. And, under our rules, where the motion is to strike out and insert there are two subjects presented, because we are at liberty to amend the substitute for perfecting purposes or to amend the bill for perfecting purposes. Therefore, we have two subjects before the Senate instead of one under our rules. As we are living in an era of rigid and—if I may say so—sometimes novel parliamentary procedure, I thought it was well that we should be careful to define precisely what we are talking about.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, the Senator is unquestionably right in regard to the exceptional parliamentary situation. As a matter of fact, my examination has been given to the original bill. I should like, however, as a parliamentary inquiry, to ask this question: May I not speak to either proposition?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator may not know it, but he is discussing the substitute, because that is now pending.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if I may, I should like to be heard for a moment on that point of order.

If this were not a motion to strike out and insert, undoubtedly the only question before the Senate would be the amendment; but this is a motion to strike out and insert, and under our rules it is open to amend both the substitute and the original bill, so that there may be four amendments pending at the same time. That presents two subjects, Mr. President. I think it has always been our practice—and certainly it is clear from that rule—that the two subjects being presented, a Senator who is trying to perfect the substitute or sustaining the substitute addresses his remarks to the substitute. Those who prefer the part that it is proposed to strike out, who prefer the original bill, address themselves to the original bill. I think that has been the invariable practice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no motion pending except the motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the question now before the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. But that presents two subjects instead of one. There being one amendment pending, if we could not further amend the original bill then I would agree with the Chair, of course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Of course that could be done.

Mr. LODGE. That is the only question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. But the Senator must bear in mind that there is no amendment offered to the original text.

Mr. LODGE. Not yet; but when the motion is to strike out and insert the rules provide that in the case of that one motion, and that alone, there are two subjects before the Senate and not one, as is the universal rule in other cases. In other words, this motion takes it out from the rule which the Presiding Officer has correctly stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. When an amendment is offered to the text proposed to be stricken out, then the question which the Senator from Massachusetts raises will be before the Senate; but at present there is but one question pending, and that is the motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; that is quite true. There is but one question before the Senate; but, owing to the peculiarity of the motion, there are two subjects.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. In connection with the point of order, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. NELSON. I am not asking a question. It is in reference to the question of order that I am addressing the Chair.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. The Senator from Minnesota can certainly state his point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no question of order before the Senate now. The Chair will perhaps pass upon that question of order when it properly comes before the Senate.

Mr. NELSON. What I wanted to say, Mr. President, was that, while the committee has reported a substitute, it has not yet been offered.

Mr. BURTON. I do not know that I can yield to the Senator from Minnesota for a statement. He knows that I would be glad to yield to him if it did not perhaps interfere with the parliamentary procedure.

It may be conceded, Mr. President, on the question of rates, that the present schedule is high; but I especially deprecate the exaggerated figures that have appeared in the public press and, I am compelled to state, have also been given out by some officials of the Government. It has been stated that in some cases rates are ten times as high as they were formerly. If such advances have occurred, they are sporadic and readily explained. I desire to state again the situation at present existing, the like of which was never known before, which has caused an increase of rates. When this condition, growing out of the war, is carefully examined, I ask Senators to show what there is that is abnormal or unusual in an enormous—I use the word "enormous" advisedly—increase in rates.

In addition to the ordinary insurance risk which is carried by shipping companies there is a war risk, varying from three-eighths of 1 per cent per voyage up to—in some instances, I think—as high as 8 per cent. Bear in mind that that is not for the year, as a man insures his house, but for one voyage. On the routes where the higher rates of insurance are charged, that in itself is enough to justify the doubling or trebling of freight rates. Indeed, the insurance rate for one voyage would be sufficient to wipe out all profits under normal circumstances. A shipowner is confronted with that condition—that if the return on his investment in normal times is 5 or 6 or 7 per cent a year, he will have to pay a larger amount in insurance on a single voyage—since he not only insures his ship but also his cargo—than would be sufficient for a reasonable profit from the 1st of January until the 31st of December. Moreover, $750,000 is the total amount that will be carried as a war risk on both ship and cargo.

Then there is the great number of ships interned or detained within the ports of countries which do not control the seas at the present time. That includes Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Turkey, and to a partial degree it includes Russia, whose boats can not sail without danger of capture, or at least almost certain destruction from mines, except from the ports of Archangel and Vladivostok. To this must be added, under the head of mercantile marine withdrawn from the service, boats in neutral waters which do not dare venture to sea because of the danger of capture. I have a list of German and Austro-Hungarian ships in the harbors of the United States which I will either present or ask to have inserted at a later time. Their number is very large. Under this general head there is also a third class of boats, which sail on established lines belonging to countries having an alleged mastery of the sea—that is, the allies—which are likely to be captured by cruisers or privateers of the enemy. This includes British and French ships, which are unable to sail with the regularity of the days before the beginning of the war. For instance, a boat of the Lamport & Holt Line, plying between New York and Rio de Janeiro—the Van Dyck—has been captured by a German cruiser, and English boats on the Pacific coast have also been captured. Indeed, quite a formidable number of British and French ships have been captured by German warships.

There are those three classes of that subject—boats actually interned in home ports, boats interned in foreign ports belonging to Germany, Austria-Hungary, and so forth, and boats belonging to the allies—exposed to danger of capture or destruction. Then we must add to that an element which is very important on certain routes, and that is the scattering of mines near ports.

The constant dread of the mariner is a hidden obstacle. If there is any one cause of accidents which have brought destruction and death, it is a rock hidden below the surface, upon which the boat strikes and goes to destruction. But far worse than any rock is a hidden mine in the sea. In the first place, mines are located in the most unexpected localities. In the next place their enormous explosive power brings quick destruction. Boats sink almost instantly upon striking them. This danger is especially applicable to shipments to ports on the North Sea and in a measure around the Baltic Sea. These mines are even in evidence elsewhere and have caused the destruction not only of boats of the merchant marine but of battleships as well.

Now, there is a fourth reason, which I suggested at the beginning of my remarks this morning and which many familiar with the subject regard as the most serious of all, and that is the detention of boats in the harbors of the countries of Europe and elsewhere by reason of congestion. Instead of making accurate calculations a boat may enter a foreign port with no assurance at the time when it can either unload or take on a new cargo. The delay amounts frequently to weeks and even months. I do not need to enlarge further upon this point. The boats of the country in which the port is located are there for shelter; there are many boats at the docks being used for governmental purposes and having the first rights; but, worse than that, there is an unprecedented scarcity of men available for loading, unloading, and making repairs.

To all these must be added another feature, the requisition of so considerable a share of the merchant marine, especially of England, by the Government for its own uses.

I am not sure that these five reasons exhaust the whole subject. Of course, there is also the derangement in exchanges, which at the beginning of the war threatened to become the most serious feature of the whole situation, and that factor is still of the utmost importance in relation to our shipments to South America. I ask those who are complaining of these high rates to consider these questions.

Would a Government-owned marine make rates any lower unless the boats were run at a great loss? There is no sanctity about a Government vessel or one owned by a corporation formed by the Government when it approaches a mine. Indeed, the pilots who would be employed for this purpose, who would be enlisted by the Government probably from other lines and subjected to new discipline, presumably more lax than that to which they had been accustomed, would be more likely to meet with disasters of this nature than the pilots on private vessels.

In line with what I have been saying, it appears that rates to South America, to South Africa, to Hongkong, and to other localities have risen not more than 25 per cent above those which prevailed before the war commenced, and the same is true of charters to New Zealand and to Australia. Let us take a rational view of this situation. Is there, after all, anything abnormal or unusual in regard to it, and especially is there any talismanic influence in a Government-owned line which would cure in the least that situation?

I wish now to pass to another branch of this inquiry. I am painfully conscious of having treated the subject without thoroughly exhausting it, but I trust whatever deficiency I may have shown will be supplied by those who will follow me in the debate. I have sought to show that there would be no advantage whether these boats were operated on a profit basis or without the expectation of profit.

Before passing from this subject I may say that if the Congress of the United States desires to frame certain regulations for control over rates and agreements—though I believe any rate control is impracticable—it is certainly in line with legislation which we have adopted to give supervision over these conferences and agreements.

In this connection I desire to ask if it is the intention of the Government to enter into conference agreements with private lines. Such seems to have been the policy in the past. We hear attacks, fulminations indeed, against these so-called gentlemen's agreements, and, indeed, other agreements, but let us see what the Government of the United States has done regarding this.

I call attention in the first instance to the hearings before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals of the United States Senate, taken in April of last year. Much of that testimony bears on this subject. Dr. Huebner, the expert chosen by the United States to make an investigation, is testifying. Senator THOMAS, of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, asked this question:

Senator THOMAS. Suppose that the Government of the United States should construct a line of vessels for commercial purposes through the canal and should operate it for the public benefit. Do you not think that that would result in benefit to the consumer?

Dr. HUEBNER. Why, of course, if a Government line deliberately cuts rates, and has the Treasury of the United States behind it, it can do things that no doubt will lead to a reduction in freight rates. As to whether the consumer will get the reduction, or the middleman get it, is another question.

Senator THOMAS. From what you say, I assume it may be your opinion at least that the opening of the canal, whether it is operated free or whether tolls are charged, will make no difference in regard to the reduction of cost to the consumer? In other words, there is to be no competition on the ocean because it admits of universal competition? There will be no competition on land because there combination is comparatively easy? Is there any way to break that except that the Government itself shall build a line of ships to go into the freight business?

Dr. HUEBNER. Of course the Government line is in the freight business, and the Government line is a party to various conferences at the present time.

Senator BRISTOW. Do you say that the Panama Steamship Line has gone into these conferences to fix rates according to those?

Dr. HUEBNER. The Government line's tariff has been accepted——

Senator BRISTOW. When was that done? Let us have the details of it.

Senator THOMAS. I should like to have the time stated when that arrangement was made.

Dr. HUEBNER. I can furnish that later.

Senator THOMAS. About what year?

Dr. HUEBNER. I will not venture a guess.

Senator THOMAS. I was told it was done between 1909 and 1911, some time.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your best impression about the time?

Dr. HUEBNER. It would be a mere guess, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. We want that for what it is worth. What is your guess, if that is the best it is?

Dr. HUEBNER. I should say somewhere around 1908 and 1909.

Senator BRISTOW. Do you not know, as a matter of fact, that the general manager of the Panama Railroad Steamship Co. Line refused to go into the conference and refused to make his rates in harmony with the agreements?

Dr. HUEBNER. A conference, Senator BRISTOW, is not necessarily outlined on paper. Most of the conference arrangements are nothing more than gentlemen's agreements. For instance, in the trade to the west coast of South America, via the United Fruit Co., the Hamburg-American Line, the Royal Mail Steam Packet Co., and the Government line, the four lines are acting in absolute harmony. They adopt the same freight tariff. All of the lines have sent us their tariffs, and while the title-page is different, the rest, I think, has come from the same press. The same is true with reference to the traffic to the Pacific coast in connection with the California-Atlantic Line and the Pacific Mail Line. These lines, supported by the Government line, charged the same rates; and the American-Hawaiian Line, which goes via the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, refused to join with the Government, although there is a great deal of testimony to show that the matter was talked over, and that the Government was anxious in a way to get the American-Hawaiian Line to make some arrangement as to what its rates would be as compared with the rates of the California-Atlantic Line and the Pacific Mail Line.

Senator BRISTOW. Do I understand that the Government tried to get the Hawaiian Steamship Line to go into this agreement, and it refused?

Dr. HUEBNER. It refused to do anything definitely.

Senator BRANDEGEE. What did it do about its rates?

Dr. HUEBNER. I will give you the summary as I have it in the report.

Senator THOMAS. While you are looking for that, can you state the name of the manager of this Government line?

Dr. HUEBNER. No, sir; but I can furnish that very easily.

Senator BRISTOW. Mr E A. Drake, of New York, is the business manager?

Dr. HUEBNER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Doctor, did not the House committee, as a result in part of your investigation and report, recommend that the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission be extended to water transportation?

Dr. HUEBNER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. If that becomes a law, and the Interstate Commerce Commission regulates the rates on the Panama Canal, will not the Interstate Commerce Commission be influenced in the rates it will fix by the fact as to whether the shipper pays $1.20 a ton to the Government or not?

Dr. HUEBNER. I am inclined to think that in case we have governmental regulation, and if the Government will wait until the steamship companies have fixed their schedules of rates—voluminous schedules of 60 or 70 typewritten pages—fixing the rates on the basis of what the traffic will bear and then say, "Gentlemen, we have your rates, but remember you are exempt from tolls, and we insist that you mark down every rate proportionately," I believe, then, you will accomplish something for the shippers, but it will be done by force.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think that the Interstate Commerce Commission performs its duty in that intelligent manner you have just described?

Dr. HUEBNER. I had no intention to reflect on anyone.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, I do not know that you intended really to give us your view as to the efficiency or lack of efficiency of the Interstate Commerce Commission, but if the Interstate Commerce Commission were as inefficient as one might imply from your reference to it, I would vote for its abolition.

Senator THOMAS. I want to say that I do not understand the inference was made by tois witness as the chairman does.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand the witness to indicate that all these shipping companies might be permitted in their own way and to suit their own purpose to agree upon certain schedules, and not until then would the Interstate Commerce Commission interpose, and even then the only recommendation to be made by the Interstate Commerce Commission would be to reduce their rates $1.20 per ton.

Senator THOMAS. I understood the witness to be stating a supposititious situation. Possibly my understanding was incorrect.

Dr. HUEBNER. Of course, at the present time we have no regulation.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Dr. HUEBNER. There is absolutely no control over port-to-port traffic. Regulation of water transportation also must differ in some respects from regulation of land transportation. There are peculiar factors that require a difference to be kept in mind, and the recommendations of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries have in mind the regulation of the tariffs of a boat line after they have been promulgated. It is utterly impossible to require a steamship line to serve 30 days' notice before it can change a rate. You must allow a steamship line to make its rate, and then to require that rate to be changed if it is unreasonable We would, for instance, greatly damage our foreign trade if we required foreign steamship lines to serve 30 days' notice before they could alter a rate.

Mr. President, I read this for the light it throws on two phases of this subject. First, the feasibility of control by the Interstate Commerce Commission or any official rate-fixing body, and, secondly, the participation of the Government of the United States in these gentlemen's agreements or conferences.

This was the testimony of Dr. Huebner in relation to the Panama Canal and routes shipping in that locality. I read from the second volume of the hearings on the investigation of shipping combinations under House resolution 587, page 873:

Mr. HARDY. It seems also that all the parties interested talked the matter over about the rates.

Mr. SCHWERIN. A European conference has controlled these coffee rates and has handled them for 20 years, and has made them for 20 years, absolutely.

Mr. HARDY. And then they came in to talk with you about it?

Mr. SCHWERIN. We sent a representative to London; the Panama Railroad sent a man to London. The Government sent Gen. Edwards. He went over as the representative of the Panama Railroad Co. to this London conference, as a party to the London agreement.

The CHAIRMAN. Who are the parties to that London conference?

Mr. SCHWERIN. The Royal Mail, the Hamburg-American Packet Co., the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., the Panama Railroad Co. Steamship Line—

Which is a Government-owned and Government-controlled line—

those are the principal carriers. I do not remember the names of the others, and the Tehuantepec Railroad.

The CHAIRMAN. And the Panama Railroad?

Mr. SCHWERIN. The Panama Railroad and the Panama Steamship Co.

Mr. POST. And the United States Government?

Mr. SCHWERIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The United Fruit Co.?

Mr. SCHWERIN. The United Fruit Co.

The CHAIRMAN. In that conference the rates were fixed?

Mr. SCHWERIN. The rates to Europe were fixed.

The CHAIRMAN. And the rates to New York?

Mr. SCHWERIN. The rates to New York were practically adjusted, based upon the European rates.

The CHAIRMAN. But they were not fixed to San Francisco?

Mr. SCHWERIN. No; we declined to be governed in our San Francisco rates by the European conference.

The CHAIRMAN. On this question we have information from the consul at Salvador, Central America, to this effect:

"The Pacific Mail Steamship Co., the Kosmos Line, and the steamers of the Salvador Railway Co. are cocarriers with the West Indian and Atlantic combine, mentioned on page 9 of the report of the Royal Commission on Shipping Rings (ed. 4669), 1909, issued by the British Government, and consequently grant rebates, but this is done only under certain circumstances on coffee exportations. There are no other kinds of rebates or special privileges granted. Every year the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. and the Kosmos Line form an agreement for the purpose of fixing rates and tariffs, particularly on coffee exportations, and these rates and tariffs are conformed to by the steamers of the Salvador Railway Co. It may be seen that competition is destroyed by agreement by the first two companies mentioned, which operate steamers between Salvadorian and American ports, and that competition could exist, but does not, between these two companies and the companies last named, which is engaged in the foreign carrying trade of the United States between Salvadorian ports and Salina Cruz, Mexico, because it chooses to conform to the fixed rates and tariffs."

A little later, toward the bottom of page 874, in the testimony of Mr. Schwerin:

The Tehuantepec Railroad is a member of that conference, and the Salvadorian Railroad is the west coast connection of the Tehuantepec Railroad as we are of the Panama Railroad. The Kosmos Line handles this coffee via the Straits of Magellan, and has always been looked upon as a differential route; for instance, if the coffee rate was made 80 shillings, the Kosmos Line would demand that their rate would be, say, 60 shillings, or 20 shillings less than the conference rate, on account of their longer haul. In that conference in London the Tehuantepec Railroad represents the Salvadorian Steamship Co., so if the Tehuantepec Railroad agrees to these rates to Europe, naturally the rates quoted by the Salvadorian Steamship Co. would be exactly the same rate as the representative of the Panama Railroad Co. would agree to in London, and which would be our rate via Panama, we serving Panama, the Salvadorian Railroad serving Tehuantepec. Those rates would be exactly the same, though the Salvadorian hauled the coffee north and we hauled the coffee south. The United States is a party to that, and the United States fixes our rate. They go over to London, and have gone over to London every year.

A little later, on page 875:

Mr. HARDY. The Government, then, of the United States is not a party to any agreement fixing rates to the United States, but is a party fixing rates to Europe?

Mr. SCHWERIN. The Government is a party to the agreement fixing the rates to the United States, so far as business may originate on the west coast of Central America and be destined to New York City, carried over the Panama Railroad and the Panama Steamship Line.

Mr. HARDY. The Government now enters into agreement with these various companies as to rates from South American ports to New York?

Mr. SCHWERIN. Yes; and with us to New York.

Mr HARDY. And with you to New York?

Mr. SCHWERIN. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. So that your rates are agreed on except to San Francisco?

Mr. SCHWERIN. Yes.

Mr. President, I concede the possibility of oppressive tactics and high rates as the result of these conferences, and no doubt the effort to prevent monopoly might be aided by subjecting these agreements to official supervision.

However, agreements of some kind are absolutely necessary in order to conduct the business for the advantage of the public and to prevent destructive competition among carriers by water. Destructive competition would not only affect the carriers, but it also would affect the shippers as well. It is very easy to see the reason for that. A steamship line provides for sailings according to the traffic. There are, of course, numerous daily, weekly, fortnightly, and monthly lines. On nearly all the great routes of the world there is a plurality of lines available for the carrying of the freight.

Suppose there is a certain quantity of freight to be carried, which may be represented by the figure 100, per month, and each boat carries or has a capacity to carry 10 of those units, and there are available 10 ships. What is the sensible thing to do? Manifestly, to have them leave at intervals of three days. Suppose they are managed on a competitive basis, that fierce competition which so many persons worship and think is the essential condition of fair prices and the better accommodation of the public, what would the 10 boats do? Instead of sailing at intervals of 3 days so that in 30 days each one of the 10 sails, making an interval very convenient for the transaction of business, each boat would wait at its wharf until it could snatch enough of the traffic to make up a full cargo. Instead of regularity of sailings and full cargoes for all the boats there would be irregular departures, and some boats would have sufficient loads and others would depart leaving cargo on the dock. In the long run the public would have to pay for this uneconomic conduct of business.

The authors of this report and the advocates of this bill, in the utmost good faith, inveigh against these conference agreements; but tell us, pray, how can you manage this in any other way and meet the demands of the public? If the Government goes into the business, is it going to run a line that will be altogether outside of these arrangements? If so, disaster will confront it at the very start. Not only does this necessity for some concert of action exist on boat lines between the same ports, but it is even more required in providing for the various ports of the world with which there is no established line service.

Suppose, again, there are 10 ships which are available for the South American trade; will they all run between New York and Rio de Janeiro? That being the case, Rio de Janeiro will be over supplied and other important ports, such as Montevideo and Buenos Aires will have no shipping at all. Take another feature of the situation. There are certain minor ports, on the way where there is enough trade offered to make profitable an occasional call, but boats would be run at a very serious loss if all of them regularly stopped at each of these ports. So owners of the lines come together and make an agreement that one line will stop its boat at one port and another line will stop its boat at another port. There is no other way in which this business can be managed, and managed to meet the demands of the shipping traffic, and conduct the business economically.

So, instead of raising this outcry against these agreements, it is desirable that we, without any preconceived ideas or theories in regard to competition or no competition, should face the facts. The Government has faced the facts, and has itself entered into consultation with the divers lines. That has been a feature of the management of the Panama Steamship Co. The Government, having itself engaged in these conferences, ought not those who favor this bill to revise their arguments as stated in the report in which they placed this sweeping condemnation of all arrangements of this kind?

I find the language I have referred to on this subject in volume 4 of the report of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, a document to which I have already referred The report is the result of an investigation of shipping combinations, made under House resolution 587. I think I am not making an extravagant statement when I say that at least a very large majority of the members of that committee entered upon this investigation with the belief that these conferences were altogether wrong and should be abolished root and branch. The recommendations, beginning on page 415, are as follows:

The facts contained in the foregoing report show that it is the almost universal practice for steamship lines engaging in the American foreign trade to operate, both on the inbound and outbound voyages, under the terms of written agreements, conference arrangements, or gentlemen's understandings, which have for their principal purpose the regulation of competition through either (1) the fixing or regulation of rates; (2) the apportionment of traffic by allotting the ports of sailing, restricting the number of sailings, or limiting the volume of freight which certain lines may carry; (3) the pooling of earnings from all or a portion of the traffic; or (4) meeting the competition of nonconference lines. Eighty such agreements or understandings, involving practically all the regular steamship lines operating on nearly every American foreign-trade route, are described in the foregoing report. (For a full classification of these agreements see pp. 281 to 295 of the report.) The report also presents the economic advantages and disadvantages of steamship agreements and conference arrangements as presented to the committee by steamship-line representatives and the exporting and importing interests of the United States. (For a full classification of the advantages and disadvantages see pp. 295 to 307 of the foregoing report.)

In formulating its recommendations it became apparent to the committee, in view of all the facts presented, that only two courses of action were open for adoption. Either the agreements and understandings, now so universally used, may be prohibited with a view to attempting the restoration of unrestricted competition, or the same may be recognized along lines which would eliminate existing disadvantages and abuses. It is claimed that the adoption of the first course—the prohibition of cooperative arrangements between practically all the lines in nearly all the divisions of our foreign trade—would not only involve a wholesale disturbance of existing conditions in the shipping business but would deprive American exporters and importers of the advantages claimed as resulting from agreements and conferences, if honestly and fairly conducted, such as greater regularity and frequency of service, stability and uniformity of rates, economy in the cost of service, better distribution of sailings, maintenance of American and European rates to foreign markets on a parity, and equal treatment of shippers through the elimination of secret arrangements and underhanded methods of discrimination. (A classification of the advantages claimed as resulting from the aforementioned factors is presented on pp. 295 to 303 of the foregoing report.)

These advantages, the committee believes, can be secured only by permitting the several lines in any given trade to cooperate through some form of rate and pooling arrangement under Government supervision and control. It is the view of the committee that open competition can not be assured for any length of time by ordering existing agreements terminated. The entire history of steamship agreements shows that in ocean commerce there is no happy medium between war and peace when several lines engage in the same trade. Most of the numerous agreements and conference arrangements discussed in the foregoing report were the outcome of rate wars and represent a truce between the contending lines. To terminate existing agreements would necessarily bring about one of two results—the lines would either engage in rate wars which would mean the elimination of the weak and the survival of the strong, or, to avoid a costly struggle, they would consolidate through common ownership. Neither result can be prevented by legislation, and either would mean a monopoly fully as effective, and it is believed more so, than can exist by virtue of an agreement.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask the Senator from Ohio from what page of the report he is reading?

Mr. BURTON. I am reading from page 416, of volume 4, near the bottom of the page. The report continues——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio permit me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I came into the Chamber in the midst of the statement which the Senator from Ohio is now reading. I should like to inquire what report it is from which the Senator is reading?

Mr. BURTON. It is the report of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House of Representatives on the investigation of shipping combinations. This report was made in year 1913–14. Some of the volumes are printed in 1913 and some in 1914.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does it purport to be a unanimous report from the committee?

Mr. BURTON. I think so. At any rate, if there is a minority report, it favors, I think, more liberality in the making of these agreements than does the majority report.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me ask the Senator from Ohio a further question. Do I understand that the report of the committee favors these agreements?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; it regards them as inevitable and favors them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. To that extent it favors them?

Mr. BURTON. Yes. I will restate what I have already said for the benefit of the Senator from Utah, that it is my understanding the committee entered upon the consideration of this subject with an almost unanimous opinion against this class of agreements, but they nevertheless came to the conclusion stated.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me ask the Senator if the agreements spoken of in the report apply to the fixing of rates, dates of sailing, and so on?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; to the whole subject.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is, do I understand that this committee in its report is in favor of allowing agreements to be made between the shipping companies fixing uniform rates which they shall charge?

Mr. BURTON. It favors allowing them to do nearly all the things which they are now doing under governmental supervision by the Interstate Commerce Commission or some such board as that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator mean governmental supervision on the part of the United States over the rates to be fixed?

Mr. BURTON. I take it that would be the case at least on lines which have regular schedules. I think their recommendation in that particular will appear in the course of the reading.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Of course, that would only apply to ships departing from ports in the United States?

Mr. BURTON. That is all it could apply to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It could not affect the rates on imports?

Mr. BURTON. I think not, except on American lines.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the committee take the view that that could be done as well?

Mr. BURTON. That will all appear in the further reading of the report; the report goes into that subject quite fully. It continues:

Moreover, steamship agreements and conferences are not confined to the lines engaging in the foreign trade in the United States. They are as universally used in the foreign trade of other countries as in our own. The merchants of these countries now enjoy the foregoing advantages of cooperative arrangements, and to restore open and cut-throat competition among the lines serving the United States would place American exporters at a disadvantage in many markets as compared with their foreign competitors.

That is an illustration of the extreme complication of this question. If we forbid such agreements and other countries permit them, it will inure to the benefit of foreign merchants and to the disadvantage of our own. The report continues:

Steamship line representatives, as well as the patrons of the lines, were almost a unit in emphasizing to the committee the importance and necessity of the aforementioned advantages of agreements and conferences and in asserting that these advantages can only be effected by permitting the several lines in a given trade to cooperate in the regulation of their rates and the expeditious handling of their business. Very few of the many exporters and importers who communicated with the committee were opposed to agreements and conferences in themselves, provided they are fairly and honestly conducted. Many, however, objected to the secrecy with which agreements and conferences are now conducted, and they stated that while the advantages must be admitted they have no assurance and no means of knowing whether the conditions claimed for agreements and conferences are always fulfilled. A considerable number of complaints were also filed with the committee objecting to excessive rates, discrimination between shippers in rates and cargo space, indifference to the landing of freight in proper condition, the arbitrariness in the settlement of just claims, failure to give due notice to shippers when rates were to be increased, refusal to properly adjust rates as between the various classes of commodities, and the unfairness of certain methods—such as fighting ships, deferred rebates, and threats to refuse shipping accommodations—used by some conference lines to meet the competition of nonconference lines. Unfortunately the truth of many of these complaints could not be ascertained because of the confidential nature of the information furnished. As pointed out in the report (p. 306), it seemed to be the general impression among shippers who filed complaints with the committee that the conference lines "so completely dominate the shippers with whom they deal that these shippers can not afford, for fear of retaliation, to place themselves in a position of active antagonism to the lines by openly giving particulars of their grievances."

It must of course be recognized, Mr. President, that any investigation conducted in that way is exceedingly unsatisfactory. The secret complaints that are sent in can not be verified or disproved, and the conclusions derived from such an investigation are necessarily more or less unsatisfactory.

While admitting their many advantages, the committee is not disposed to recognize steamship agreements and conferences unless the same are brought under some form of effective Government supervision.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, right at that point——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Do I understand the Senator from Ohio to take the position and to state the position of the committee from whose report he is reading to be that if these agreements are permitted they should only be under governmental supervision, and that that supervision would include the regulation and perhaps, to some extent, the fixing of rates?

Mr. BURTON. I would not go so far myself as to advocate the fixing of rates for ocean carriage, unless it be on certain prescribed lines which are in an exceptional position. If you seek to control the rates, for instance, on tramp vessels, difficulties immediately arise. It would be impossible to meet by fixed rulings the conditions which exist in this trade.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Now let me ask the Senator——

Mr. BURTON. Let me conclude this first, if the Senator please. It would be especially impracticable to fix rates with permanency. Let me give the Senator from Utah an illustration: Suppose an effort is made to fix a rate from New York to Cape Town. It is fixed at a certain figure, and the public and the shippers adjust themselves to that rate. A tramp boat comes from Cape Town to New York with a very profitable cargo—indeed, they make the trip because of that profitable rate—and on the return voyage, if they can get a cargo, they can afford to carry it for very much less than the usual rate; it would be a profitable transaction to do so. The freight might be of a class that could be shipped to Cape Town provided it were carried at a certain figure, but it would be unprofitable to send it if the rate were above that figure. Would any rational system dictate that there should be a fixed rate in such a case as that?

Now, take the other side of the case. Suppose, in the expectation that freight from Cape Town to New York is abundant, a boat sails for New York with a cargo. It could afford to carry that freight at a very low rate, but would you say that on the return voyage, the object of the round trip being practically to make that return voyage, the boat must comply with a specified rate? There are so many ramifications in the business that it is not only impracticable to fix the rates as well as to fix them in advance, but to do so would not inure to the benefit of trade or to the benefit of the shippers, either. I think it is very clear that that would be the result.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Ohio is opening up a very interesting phase of the subject; and I want, in connection with what he has been saying, to ask him this question: Does the Senator recognize that in sea traffic charges must either be permitted to adjust themselves by the play of competition, which, theoretically at least, will bring the charges down to a reasonable amount, or that they must be regulated by governmental interposition?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; I think that is the case. In fact, there has been practically no governmental interposition even in domestic traffic. Governmental control has been exercised only when the traffic is part water and part rail. There is no regulation of mere port-to-port traffic. I think the time may come when some form of Government regulation will prove desirable.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If I correctly understand the Senator from Ohio, he leans toward some degree of governmental regulation of shipping rates?

Mr. BURTON. I think there should be at least a reasonable public supervision of conference agreements.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That brings me to the question which I had in mind to ask the Senator from Ohio from the beginning; but, as I understand, under the ruling which we have had I am not permitted to indulge in very much of a statement, I shall ask the Senator, first of all, as preliminary to the question I finally desire to ask him, whether or not he agrees with the statement which was made by Mr. McAdoo recently in a speech delivered before the Commercial Club at Chicago, Ill., on January 9, 1915, that—

Some timid people have argued that if the Government is interested as a stockholder in a shipping company, and a ship of such company should be seized by a belligerent and brought into a prize court, the sovereignty of the Government would be involved. There is no ground whatever for this view. If the Government operated ships outright, just as it operates the vessels of our Navy, an awkward situation of this character might arise; but where a nation is merely a stockholder, or the sole stockholder, in a private corporation, its sovereignty is not and can not be directly involved if the ships of such a corporation become the subjects of litigation in a prize court concerning any issue which does not involve the Government itself. The Government would stand in relation to such a corporation exactly as any individual stockholder does to a corporation in which he is interested. A suit against the corporation does not necessarily involve the shareholders.

In other words, I ask the Senator from Ohio if he agrees with what seems to be the view of the Secretary of the Treasury that, if the Government goes into this business as a stockholder of a corporation, the corporation would then have no different legal standing than any other private corporation engaged in the same business?

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, it seems to me we must go to the essence of things rather than to the form. You can not say that a steamship line organized on such a plan as this is the same as a private corporation; there is a very material difference.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But assuming, for the sake of the argument, that the position of the Secretary of the Treasury with reference to this matter is correct—to which, I understand, the Senator from Ohio does not care to commit himself—then I ask the Senator from Ohio whether, in his judgment, the Government of the United States would not be in a very peculiar situation, to say the least, if it undertook to regulate rates, being itself an owner of a corporation vitally interested in the business?

Mr. BURTON. It certainly would.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And attempting to regulate rates that must govern its competitor, and, in substance and effect, itself?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly, because the United States would be an interested party, whether it owns steamships exclusively or whether it is the predominant stockholder in a company that owns steamships. No judge should sit in his own cause.

To continue reading the report—

To permit such agreements without Government supervision would mean giving the parties thereto unrestricted right of action. Abuses exist, and the numerous complaints received by the committee show that they must be recognized. In nearly all the trade routes to and from the United States the conference lines have virtually a monopoly of the line service.

In reading this report I do not wish it understood that I concur in it in its entirety.

"All monopolies," as pointed out in the foregoing report (p. 304), "are liable to abuse, and in our foreign carrying trade the monopoly obtained by the conference lines has not been subjected to any legal control. While carriers by land are supervised and must conform to statutory requirements in the matter of rates and treatment of shippers, steamship companies, through private arrangements, have secured for themselves monopolistic powers as effective in many instances as though they were statutory. Even granting the advantages claimed for steamship conferences and agreements, all may be withdrawn in the absence of supervisory control without the shippers having any redress or protection. The lines are under no legal obligation to continue these advantages. They exercise their powers as private combinations and are apt to abuse the same unless brought under effective Government control."

The committee believes that the disadvantages and abuses connected with steamship agreements and conferences as now conducted are inherent, and can only be eliminated by effective Government control; and it is such control that the committee recommends as the means of preserving to American exporters and importers the advantages enumerated, and of preventing the abuses complained of.

"The consensus of opinion (see pp. 307 to 308 of the report)," as expressed in the testimony of witnesses and in the numerous communications received by the committee from shippers, "is overwhelmingly in favor of some form of Government regulation of steamship carriers engaged in this country's foreign trade. Nearly all the steamship line representatives who appeared before the committee expressed themselves as not opposed to Government supervision which is reasonable and which is limited to the requirements of full publicity and approval of all agreements or arrangements which steamship lines may have entered into with other steamship lines, with shippers, or with other carriers and transportation agencies. On the other hand, the shippers who appeared as witnesses or otherwise submitted recommendations for proposed legislation were in the great majority of instances favorable to a comprehensive system of Government supervision sufficiently broad to embrace the regulation of rates without actually fixing them, the approval of contracts, agreements, and arrangements, and the general supervision of all conditions of water transportation which vitally affect the interests of shippers. While few of the shippers who communicated with the committee by letter (and the same may be said of witnesses) attempted to specify the details of their recommendations, they are almost a unit in stating that they are convinced of the desirability of having the Interstate Commerce Commission, or a similar commission, exercise a general supervisory power over foreign water carriers and enforce among the conference lines at all times the various contentions which they have claimed for themselves during the hearings before the committee. It is noteworthy that only five of the many communications received by the committee, which were unfavorable to steamship agreements and conferences as now conducted, display an attitude of hostility toward Government regulation. In fact, many of the communications received from shippers make it clear that the writers regard the contentions of the conference line representatives as advantageous to shipper and shipowner if they are honestly and fairly carried out, but state that their experience has been to the effect that once the combination of lines is established it is apt to be used in an arbitrary and unfair way by favoring some large corporation or friend to the detriment of other shippers. Such discriminations and arbitrary treatment, it is believed, can only be eliminated by the establishment of some legally constituted authority which is empowered to hear complaints and to order the discontinuance of abuses."

Relative to such supervisory control by the Government of steamship carriers in the foreign trade of the United States, the committee offers the following recommendations:

I ask especial attention to these recommendations:

(1) That navigation companies, firms, or lines engaged in the foreign trade of the United States be brought under the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission as regards the regulation of rates, the approval of contracts entered into with other water carriers, with shippers, or with American railroads and other transportation agencies, and such other conditions of water transportation as affect the interests of shippers. The committee has had under consideration the recommendation of a separate commission for this purpose, but believes that in view of the close relations existing between rail and water transportation it would be best to intrust the supervisory control to the Interstate Commerce Commission. If found necessary in view of the added duties involved in the extension of the Interstate Commerce Commission's jurisdiction to water transportation in accordance with the recommendations to follow, the committee further recommends that the membership of the commission be enlarged.

(2) That all carriers engaged in the foreign trade of the United States, parties to any agreements, understandings, or conference arrangements hereinafter referred to, be required to file for approval with the Interstate Commerce Commission a copy of all written agreements (or a complete memorandum if the understanding or agreement is oral) entered into (1) with any other steamship companies, firms, or lines engaged directly or indirectly in the American trade, or (2) with American shippers, railroads, or other transportation agencies. All modifications and cancellations of such agreements or understandings as may be made from time to time should also be promptly filed. The commission should be empowered to order canceled any such agreements, or any parts thereof, that it may find to be discriminating or unfair in character or detrimental to the commercial interests of the United States.

(3) That the Interstate Commerce Commission be empowered to investigate fully complaints charging the unreasonableness or unfairness of rates or to institute proceedings on its own initiative and to order such rates changed if convinced that the rate under consideration is unreasonably high or discriminating in character as between shippers or ports or between exporters of the United States and their foreign competitors, and to order restitution to shippers of all sums collected in excess of reasonable rates. This recommendation is also intended to extend to the supervision of freight classifications used by the lines, and the investigation of complaints charging refusal on the part of any carrier to properly adjust the rates between classes of commodities.

The committee realizes that the steamship business differs essentially from that of the railroads (for those differences see pp. 309 to 311 of the report), and that it might prove injurious to both shipowners and American exporters to require the lines to file their rates and not be permitted to lower the same until after a stipulated period of notice to change rates had been given. On the other hand, the committee feels that, in the absence of Government control, steamship combinations may in many instances have it within their power to arbitrarily raise rates to an unreasonable degree, both as regards the general level and in the case of particular commodities; or, if they so desire, to fail in maintaining rates from the United States to foreign markets on a parity with those from other countries. It is not the purpose of this recommendation to prevent steamship lines from promptly lowering their rates to meet competitive conditions and thus to favor American exporters, who, in competing with foreign markets, often find it necessary in order to close their contracts to have quoted an immediate and favorable rate; but the purpose of the law should be to protect the shipper against any unreasonably high rate which the combination lines may have within their power, by virtue of their agreements and conference arrangements, arbitrarily to impose in the absence of Government supervision and control.

(4) That rebating of freight rates to shippers be made illegal and that, with due regard to the proper loading of the vessel and the tonnage available, discrimination between shippers or ports, in the matter of rates and space accommodations, be prohibited. In this connection it is the belief of the committee that water carriers should be required to charge equal rates to all shippers, irrespective of the volume of freight offered for shipment.

(5) That the Interstate Commerce Commission be empowered to investigate fully all complaints (or to undertake such investigation on its own initiative) charging (1) failure on the part of any carrier to give reasonable notice of increase in rates, (2) unfair treatment of shippers in the matter of cargo space and other facilities, (3) the existence of discriminating or unfair contracts with certain shippers, and (4) unfairness in the settlement of claims and indifference to the landing of freight in proper condition. In this connection the commission should be empowered to order the discontinuance of all unfair or discriminating practices which it may find to exist, and to adopt whatever measures it may deem necessary to protect the complainant against retaliation.

(6) That the use of "fighting ships" and deferred rebates be prohibited in both the export and import trade of the United States. Moreover all carriers should be prohibited from retaliating against any shipper by refusing space accommodations when such are available, or by resorting to other unfair methods of discrimination because such shipper has patronized an independent line or has filed a complaint charging unfair treatment, or for any other reason.

(7) That adequate penalties be provided to correct and prevent the abuses hereinabove set forth.

That which follows pertains to the domestic trade, and so is not applicable here.

I do not believe all the recommendations of this committee would prove practicable. I think what they propose involves a minuteness of control over shipping, based on the analogy of control over railroads, which will be found to be impossible without seriously hampering the business. I have read this, as an expression of the views of a committee of the House of Representatives, to show that there is another way than that proposed by this bill of taking care of conference agreements and providing fair rates. I have read it, also, as a contradiction of the sweeping condemnation of conference agreements contained in the reports and speeches in favor of this bill. It may be all very well in theory to oppose them, but it has proved utterly impracticable; and the Government of the United States, through its officials, has sent its representatives to London, and has engaged in conferences with other lines.

Why, Mr. President, I wonder what would happen if this Government went into the business on the scale proposed by this shipping bill? I am afraid it would be working at cross-purposes; that, side by side with the unanswerable, the powerful arraignment of "big business" which we so often hear, much of which is deserved, we should find the Government itself in "big business," doing the same things, following the same paths which have been so frequently denounced in the Hall of the Senate and the Hall of the House of Representatives. Save us, Mr. President, from that day. Let these denunciations go on in full force, colored with eloquence. Let us not have a situation under which it would be possible for some one to rise in his place and say, "Why, your Government is doing just the very things you are denouncing."

I say this because many of us are fond of that type of oratory, and I am not endeavoring to stop its flow. The Government has gone and will have to go into conference agreements, otherwise it would be unable to do business profitably for itself or for the benefit of shippers.

Passing from this inquiry, Mr. President, I now come to another.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BURTON. I shall be glad to yield for a question.

Mr. TOWNSEND. For a question; yes.

Mr. BURTON. Of course, that is understood. The Senator from Michigan may not understand that there seems to be in vogue to-day a certain degree of strictness in the enforcement of the rules, which has not been the recognized custom in the past.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I understand; and my object is to ask a question, which I shall endeavor to make as clear as I can.

As I understand, one of the objects of the advocates of this bill is to enlarge our merchant marine, the President's message stating that we are lacking in ships for carrying abroad the commerce of the country. I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks, considering everything, that if this bill is passed it will increase our merchant marine, having this fact in view: Either the Government will have to go into all of the carrying business or else ships will have to be built sufficient to carry the commerce. In other words, the object is to encourage shipbuilding. Does the Senator believe that the great capital which is necessary in the construction of ships could be obtained from any source for private enterprise if that capital understood that the Government was to enter into competition with the boats after they were constructed, understanding, further, that the whole object of Government ownership of the boats is to reduce the rates, which the President insists are unduly high at the present time? Does the Senator believe, I say, that ships could be built outside of those constructed by the Government, and, therefore, would the merchant marine of this country be enlarged, as indicated by the proponents of the bill?

I ask this question because it seems to me that it really goes to the vitals of the whole project; for, as I understand, the President and those who advocate this measure do not intend that we shall continue permanently in the shipping business, but that we are to get out of it at some time. The question comes up, Who will take the ships that the Government owns if, as the Senator says, and as I believe to be true, they will have to be operated at a loss if operated at all?

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I have already dwelt somewhat upon that subject; but perhaps it can not be too frequently discussed, because it is of the most vital importance.

I feel sure that the threat of this bill has brought a paralysis upon private investment in the building or the purchasing of ships, and that it will continue until the question is decided, and that if the Government does go into the building of ships there will be a cessation of investment by private enterprise in shipping property. The greatest source of discouragement will be the uncertainty. We take it for granted here that rates are going to be lowered. Perhaps they will be; I presume they will be even at the expense of the taxpayer; but suppose they are not. How does any private owner know what the Government is going to do? Suppose capitalists at Savannah thought of putting on a line to carry the cotton of Georgia and the South to Europe. They might estimate the cost and find that it would be profitable. Possibly they would conclude to add the carrying of passengers, so as to give to the city new advantages and new distinction. But along comes this proposition. Here is the Government of the United States proposing to go into the shipping business, and they do not know but that the boats will run right along parallel with the line they are projecting. No man would feel safe either as to the scale of rates or the route such boats would establish.

I can not too often bring to the attention of the Senate what I have already said, that the effect of this proposition has already been felt in the country. Something like 101 boats entered American register soon after the passage of the bill of last August providing more favorable terms. Are any of those boats being taken over now? How many, as compared with the 101, have been given American register in the last two months, since the agitation for this bill began, and especially since it has been known that the administration seems to insist upon it more than upon any other measure before this Congress? When people feel that a reckless competitor may enter the field, with the Treasury of the United States behind it, and engage in a business which heretofore has been left to private enterprise, who is going to invest? Who has invested? That is the practical test. I think, if all the facts were brought out—indeed, I know, Mr. President—that options would have been sought upon shipping that would cost as much as $40,000,000, the amount initially provided in this bill, which would be brought under American register if there were any assurance that this bill would not be passed. That is the situation.

I think that answers the second branch of the Senator's question as to what would result.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. BURTON. I yield for a question.

Mr. DU PONT. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio what, in his opinion, would be the effect on the present situation, assuming that there is a dearth of ships to carry our products abroad, as claimed, if the Government were to guarantee for a term of years a reasonable subsidy to private individuals for carrying the mails?

Mr. BURTON. For carrying the mails alone?

Mr. DU PONT. For carrying the mails, or possibly for other purposes. That would depend largely upon the amount of the subsidy or the particular conditions involved.

Mr. BURTON. The carrying of the mails is one thing and the carrying of freight is another. For carrying the mails good-sized boats of high speed are needed that ply on established lines between certain ports.

The assistance of boats for the carriage of mail means one thing. It means, of course, an improvement in the passenger communication between the two countries. It means an improvement in quickness of communication. It may facilitate the transportation of the higher grades of freight. But that is not the problem which is troubling us just now. The problem is how to supply boats of a carrying capacity of, say, 10,000 tons, of 10 or 12 knots' speed, for the carriage of ordinary freight, which can be operated at far less cost than the faster boats. For instance, with the most improved type of quadruple-expansion engines a boat of this character can be operated on a consumption of 25 tons of coal a day. That amount would hardly kindle the fire under the boilers of the Mauretania. What we want is that class of carriers, not expensively built, which can be operated cheaply.

I do not say that there might not be an improvement in mail communication. I think perhaps the greatest need in that regard is on the Pacific coast. There is fairly good provision already on the Atlantic coast to South America and to other countries. There is pretty good communication from San Francisco, directly or indirectly, to New Zealand, Australia, China, and Japan. So, to come to an answer, I am not ready to concede that a subsidy to mail steamers is required.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me inquire of the Senator if it is conclusive, as the Senator seems to demonstrate, that these lines could not be profitable as an investment, and, if there are already available sufficient ships to carry the available commerce, what interest is to be served primarily by the purchase of these ships, in the opinion of the Senator?

Mr. BURTON. Under present conditions there is perhaps not sufficient shipping to carry the commerce of the country, for the perfectly obvious reasons so often stated. But as to the other part of the Senator's inquiry, as to how they are going to get any additional ships, the only way, so far as I am able to judge, is by taking chances on questions of neutrality.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, again, if there are not a sufficient number of ships to carry the commerce now available, wherein does this bill help that condition? It does not provide for the construction of any additional ships.

Mr. BURTON. I do not see that it does in any particular whatever.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield further to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. In view of the fact that 49 per cent of the stock of the company which owns the ships is to be held by private individuals, and that stock may be in the hands of foreigners as well as Americans, as I understand it, in what way will that avoid the violation of any laws of neutrality that can not now be avoided? Does not the 49 per cent make these ships subject to all the laws of neutrality that will apply to any line in private ownership?

Mr. BURTON. I think it certainly would. They would have the same rules applied plus a very great embarrassment, because it would appear, if one of these ships owned by this corporation carried contraband, that the Government itself was in complicity and a sort of partner. No advantage, but a further disadvantage, arises from the greater possibility of complication.

No question in connection with this whole bill causes me quite so much perplexity as that of the status of a line owned by the Government in relation to questions of neutrality. The framers of the bill, recognizing this situation, have proposed amendment to the effect that they be regarded as private ships. But you can not by writing into the bill a declaration of that kind relieve it of its substantive reality.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield further to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BURTON. For instance, if the Senator will permit me, if a private shipowner carries contraband out of the United States to a port in Europe, he takes his chances. If he is captured, he forfeits his cargo, at least; but the act of a private individual in carrying contraband does not imply an act of hostility on the part of the Government. If, however, the Government of the United States should do anything of that kind, it would be an act of hostility. There is a very wide distinction between the neutral duty of a State and that of a private individual.

Mr. BRISTOW. Now, let me inquire again. Suppose one of those ships is under suspicion by one of the belligerent powers and violates, according to its interpretation, the laws of neutrality, and is taken. What would be the obligations of our Government so far as that ship is concerned?

Mr. BURTON. If we are to accept the declaration that these ships would have the same status as private ships, there is no distinction in the course the Government would pursue. That there would be a practical difference involving the sovereignty of the United States it seems to me nobody can deny.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me inquire again: Suppose one of these ships should be found to have on board contraband material, and that it should be taken into a prize court and be confiscated and sold, that would be the property of the United States; at least 51 per cent of it. What, then, would be the policy of our Government in regard to that transaction?

Mr. BURTON. The cargo, as the Senator from Kansas knows, might be confiscated and not the ship. A condition of irritation at least between our country and the country making the capture would be created which would not be created in case of a mere private ship.

Mr. BRISTOW. Suppose the ship was confiscated and sold, what accounting would be made for the investment the Government has in that property?

Mr. BURTON. That depends on their system of bookkeeping; but the loss would fall on the taxpayer.

Mr. BRISTOW. And if a claim was made for indemnity, that would be made against the foreign Government?

Mr. BURTON. Against the foreign power that condemned it.

Mr. BRISTOW. Suppose that was resisted?

Mr. BURTON. We have, of course, now a treaty with England and France under which any matter of that nature must be referred to a commission of inquiry, and that commission of inquiry must make a finding. The finding of the commission of inquiry is not final on either of the parties, but there must at any rate be delay until it renders its decision. In any event, it would endanger our peaceful international relations.

Mr. BRISTOW As I understand the Senator, there are not now, in his opinion, a sufficient number of ships to handle the commerce?

Mr. BURTON. Not available.

Mr. BRISTOW. May I inquire further if the ships belonging to belligerent powers that have been driven off the seas because of this war were again put into the service, there would be abundant shipping?

Mr. BURTON. There would no doubt be abundant shipping.

Mr. BRISTOW. Does the Senator understand this to be a scheme, then, by which it is sought to evade the laws of neutrality by involving our Government in this controversy between European powers?

Mr. BURTON. I have no exceptional means of judging of the motives of the framers of the bill. That may have been the purpose.

Mr. BRISTOW. Then, if the Senator will permit another inquiry, if it is not for the purpose of evading the laws of war which have driven these merchant ships off the sea and thereby bringing them back into activity, what is the purpose of this legislation?

Mr. BURTON. To be fair to the other side, I suppose they had hoped in some way to lower freight rates.

Mr. BRISTOW. But, if the Senator will pardon me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield further?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator does not answer the question I am getting at. If there are not sufficient ships now available because of the war, this is a means sought to bring into active commerce ships that can not engage in commerce now?

Mr. BURTON. The interned ships, you mean, which have been driven from the sea?

Mr. BRISTOW. Driven from the sea. Is it not the purpose of this bill to bring those ships out and put them into the commerce of the world, a commerce which they can not now engage in? If that can not be done without violating the laws of neutrality, then how is this bill to secure any additional ships?

Mr. BURTON. In no other way. There is no way to secure ships which private owners could not secure; at least I see no other way. If anyone should think of another way, I would be glad to have him state it. Practically every available ship except those interned is engaged in trade now.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if it is not in contemplation that the Government may build ships, but inasmuch as private parties can not build ships in competition with those built in foreign shipyards, as it notoriously costs the Government more to build them than it costs private parties, is there any probability of the Government building them?

Mr. BURTON. That proposal does not seem to me practical; certainly not as a means of meeting an emergency. In the first place, a year would be a short time in which to build any ship that would be suitable for this trade. It is more likely that it would take 18 months. Who knows but that the war will come to an end before that time? Events might occur which would release all the ships that are interned.

Then, again, as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has suggested, if the Government goes into this business of building ships it must do it on an immense scale, because private parties are not going to build contemporaneously with them.

Mr. President, I am speaking earnestly on this subject, and I am afraid I am speaking so long as to weary the Senate, but it is because I have very decided convictions that this measure is wrong. The reason that was given for it in the first instance—empty markets in South America, lack of shipping to South America—has been proven to be based on an absolute misconception of conditions there. There are no empty markets. It is not lack of shipping, it is lack of finance, lack of credit, lack of means for conducting exchanges.

I will now take up another branch of this inquiry, and I may say, I have already spoken on it, and I will refer to it only briefly:

"7. Will boats be required to follow definite routes; that is, will the plan be to establish a line of steamers with regular schedules, or will the steamers be left free to accept charters at will? If so, will they not engage in the world's random trade and not offer any definite assurance of promoting American exports and imports?"

Is the Government going to put on a line of tramp steamers or is it going to put boats on regular lines? How can the Government go into this business unless it goes to all the ports of the United States and makes arrangements for terminal facilities? Everybody knows that that would be practically impossible. If these boats are put on regular lines, say, between New York and Liverpool, what would happen? The chances are that under present conditions they would not have anything to do. They would find that business fully provided for, that ships are available. Possibly the plan would be adopted of putting down the rates and making them unprofitable; but even all the ships that could be purchased with $40,000,000 could not furnish facilities for freight and passengers between the United States and the United Kingdom; and the effect of such a line would be almost nil.

Now, suppose you do not do that. Suppose they ply here and there, wherever a port may be selected. It is unthinkable to me, in the first place, that the Government of the United States is going into the business of managing tramp steamships. But suppose, with watchful eye, this shipping board undertakes to look all over the United States to determine where ships are needed and send them where the trade requires. When you come to the practical management of that undertaking it will not prove easy. Suppose there is a boat at New York and the demand for tonnage is most pressing at Seattle. Will you send your boat from New York around to Seattle? More and more boats tend to run along established lines. I made reference a few days ago to ships which are termed "glorified tramps," which were originally wont to take charters and freight wherever they could obtain them, from one port to another, and go on the next voyage with no certainty, but which finally developed certain routes and approximate to the condition of regular lines.

If it is impractical to operate tramp boats, again I ask along what regular lines will they be operated, for it is perfectly manifest that only a small part of the trade can be cared for. Will the administration favor one part of the country to the exclusion of others? Are you going to leave the Pacific coast alone and provide lines of Government boats from the Gulf to the Atlantic ports? Are you going to pick out Portland or Norfolk or some favored port and send your boats out from that port? Will it not be true that every other port in the country will have reason to complain?

Under normal laws of trade boats will go in accordance with the demand and supply and the problem will settle itself. But with a political board subject to the importunity of communities, of business men and politicians of influence, I can not conceive how such a line could be managed.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. SHERMAN. I inquire if the Senator has any information as to the tonnage from south Atlantic and Gulf ports as compared with north Atlantic and Pacific ports?

Mr. BURTON. I do not believe I could give that. It may be found, however, in the Statistical Abstract. Of course New York in its foreign tonnage, especially in value, is far ahead of any of the others. I should suppose that tonnage shipped out of Norfolk would come next on the Atlantic coast, although I do not know. Philadelphia may be almost up to New York.

Mr. SHERMAN. May I make a further inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield further?

Mr. BURTON. In fact, I have not the figures for foreign tonnage in mind.

Mr. SHERMAN. That could be ascertained very readily by refering to the reports?

Mr. BURTON. Yes. The tonnage is much larger, of course, on the north Atlantic than it is on the south Atlantic or the Gulf. That does not mean, however, that the south Atlantic and the Gulf tonnage is not very important, because it is largely of cotton, a valuable product.

Mr. SHERMAN. May I inquire——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield further?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. In the event of the close of the European war there would be a very great release of export cotton. That would call for considerable carrying capacity outward bound for the Old World. Does the Senator think that a shipper in Philadelphia or New York would be likely to get any of the Government carrying capacity for merchandise as against cotton in this administration?

Mr. BURTON. I really do not know. I presume the loudest complaint has come from cotton shippers. If there is anyone who is gifted enough to manage such a shipping board without complaint, not merely loud but deep, coming up from all over the United States, that man is entitled to admiration. It simply can not be done, and it shows the absurdity of trying to settle by a Government board what the custom of generations has left to the great law of supply and demand. What is the reason why a cotton cargo is so scarce? It is not so much the lack of boats. There is a very general misapprehension on that subject, because at the beginning of the war the German and Austrian demand for cotton was shut off, and the English spinners got together and decided they would not purchase any. That is one reason.

I have a letter here showing that a vessel was waiting down at Galveston for a cargo. She could not get it, and went off elsewhere. This information comes from a shipping agent at Galveston. In this connection I will read from a letter written in the form of questions and answers as follows:

Q. Will you kindly advise me to what extent the exportation of cotton and grain has been interfered with by the war, and whether it has been possible had the demand existed to send out greater quantities of cotton than have gone?

A. The exportation has been materially interfered with by the war, but we believe principally through the disorganization of financial channels in August and September. Infinitely more could have been sent out had the demand existed. We may cite the case of steamers which left here in ballast because no cargo was to be had, although they offered to take cargo at rates lower than current in July before the war broke out. The steamship Barrington Court proceeded in ballast through the Panama Canal to Portland, Oreg., to load a cargo of wheat for Europe.

It was there in Galveston ready to take on wheat or cotton or any other cargo that presented itself, but this disposition of the English buyers not to buy cotton and the closing of the German market prevented her from making the trip. Since then German buyers have been eager to purchase, but there exists a mined water route, a fact to which I have frequently referred; and I do not see how a boat could carry a cargo of cotton to Genoa and then ship it by rail, owing to the expense of the rail shipment.

Mr. KENYON. I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio—I know he dislikes to have his time taken up by questions——

Mr. BURTON. I am glad to yield to a question at any time, either from the Senator from Iowa or from any of my colleagues.

Mr. KENYON. The argument the Senator was making as to localities and the difficulty involved in this matter because of the political aspect seems to me a very powerful argument. I should like to ask his opinion as to substituting for this board, consisting of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster General, and the Secretary of Commerce, some kind of a nonpartisan board to handle the matter, such as the Interstate Commerce Commission. Would that to any extent minimize the dangers which the Senator has pointed out?

Mr. BURTON. I do not think it would at all change the international phase of the question. As to the working conditions of the board, the Senator from Iowa can tell just as well as I. It is that old question between a nonpartisan board or a bipartisan board and a strictly political board made up of officials of the Government, such as Cabinet officers. There are certain advantages both ways.

Mr. KENYON. The Interstate Commerce Commission, at least until recently, has been supposed to be safe from any influences of any character. It has been my thought that there might be a board similar to that, which would be nonpartisan, that could deal with this matter without some of the objections to which the Senator from Ohio has alluded.

Mr. BURTON. So far as the domestic question is concerned, I think it would be less likely to be subject to political influences, because presumably neither they nor anyone who would appoint them is liable to be a candidate for office. They would not then be under supreme obligations for political favors; but it does not seem to me that a change in the board from three Cabinet officers to a nonpartisan commission of four would make any very vital difference in this proposition.

Mr. KENYON. Would it not be better, in the Senator's opinion, than the present plan suggested in section 6?

Mr. BURTON. As between two evils, I would be inclined to prefer the lesser. I do not say that either of these boards would be an evil; I should have the highest esteem for those whom this bill contemplates for appointment and for such other board as might be chosen. But the system is wrong; the bill is vicious, and you can not cure its defects by creating a nonpartisan board to enforce it.

Of course the Senator from Iowa knows that that very same question arose in regard to the Federal Reserve Board. Some desired a majority representation of one party and a minority representation of another party; but, after full consideration, it was decided that it would be best to entirely eliminate the question of politics and appoint men because of their qualifications. That is somewhat different from this, because here these three Cabinet officers, who are proposed——

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. Is it not true that already very serious charges have been made against the Federal Reserve Board on account of politics?

Mr. BURTON. I am not yet ready to believe those charges.

Mr. JONES. I do not ask the Senator to say whether or not he believes them. I simply asked, Have not charges been made, and some of them from quite responsible sources, too?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; I think that is so. Some one has written me saying that that board assessed one of the regional banks $50,000, and they could not see what good the $50,000 had done. I suppose it was to pay the expenses incident to organization.

Now I come to another question which is most vital. From what source is the Government to secure these ships? If by construction, can they be secured soon enough to relieve the so-called emergency? If by purchase, then from whom?

Where will the Government get these ships? If there are any foreign ships that can be obtained without the violation of neutrality, every one of those is available for purchase by private capital, and options have been taken not only on single boats but on whole lines of boats—which have not been accepted because this bill is pending.

Talk about stimulating our merchant marine—stimulating it and making it easier for the farmer. Instead of helping the American flag on the seas, instead of helping the farmer and the exporter, you have put the worst obstacle in the way of them all by proposing a system of ownership which frightens away private enterprise, which promises inefficiency, and to which apply all of the deficiencies of public ownership and public operation. Where are you going to get the ships? If they are available anywhere, private enterprise will take them or their owners will bring them here.

The first day I made some remarks on this subject I sought to show the effect of one very important factor in this situation; that is, the reluctance of steamship owners, even in the face of the promise of higher rates and larger cargoes, to withdraw their ships from established routes, such as the lines to China, to Japan, and to India. Probably there is now a surplus of boats plying on those routes; there are probably more boats going to Cape Town than are needed, and some boats running to South America have not yet decided to withdraw from that trade in order to engage in traffic with Europe; but if conditions there continue private owners will likely transfer their ships to other routes. Suppose, however, you went to one of those private owners and said: "We want to buy your boat; you have a ship that is plying to South Africa, and we wish to buy it," what would he immediately do? The bullish side of the shipping market is now apparent. He would ask an enormous price for it, charging perhaps double what he would have charged six or eight months ago.

There are a certain number of ships in the world. The question is how to get them into operation. Will the Government, with its red tape and its bureaucracy, make these shipping units more effective than can the men who have made it a life work to manage them? The question suggests its answer.

Shipping is not like a business in which the Government has been engaged and which it has controlled for years, as it has the post-office business. Here, in the winking of an eye, it is proposed to enter this field and to place officials who have never engaged in the shipping business in charge of a $40,000,000 corporation created to buy and operate ships. Whoever knew a great enterprise of that kind to succeed when placed in untried hands? When I say this I am not speaking disparagingly of the Secretary of the Treasury or of any of the other Cabinet officers. They simply would be called upon to assume a responsibility which they never ought to be asked to assume. They must enter, without either training or experience of any kind, upon the management of a business, highly specialized, requiring particular skill and experience.

And if they secure the ships, how are they going to operate them more efficiently than those who have made it a life work?

Remove the threat of this bill, either by defeating it here or by its withdrawal, and that energy manifested by the purchase of more than a hundred boats will be again enlisted. The investors who are driven from the field now will enter it a second time. Those men who went to shipyards and asked, "At what price can you build boats?" and who were intending to make contracts, but who have given up the project, will go back to the shipyards and renew their negotiations.

You will never restore the American flag to the seas by any such artificial measure as this. I feel that I can speak with peculiar frankness, because I have always opposed a ship subsidy. Several times there have been close votes on that proposition in the House and in the Senate, and I believe one time a subsidy bill actually passed both Houses, but did not become a law.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. Sometimes such a bill passed the Senate but did not pass the House. I really regret that in speaking of this matter I have touched a sensitive nerve of my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], for whom we all have the highest esteem.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; I was simply going to call the attention of the Senator to the way in which the bill to which the Senator has reference was defeated after it came back from the House with an amendment; but I will not take the time now to do so.

Mr. BURTON. I believe it was near the close of a session. The Senate deliberated for some little time on the subject, and the bill failed. That, I think, is the fact.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. Nor are you going to restore the American flag to the seas by this measure, which is infinitely worse than the other. Under a subsidy plan you at least know who your beneficiaries are. It is a plain, honest, straightforward method of attempting to do something though, I think, in the wrong way. You know who will get the benefit of what your Government is doing. Under this plan of buying boats, fixing charters, sending them to this or that port of the country, and with this or that kind of a product, nobody knows who are the beneficiaries. It is all under the control not of a general law but of a corporation, and about the nearest to a fake corporation of any of which I have known in a long time. Now I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I wanted to ask the Senator from Ohio, in connection with what he has been saying as to the difficulty of securing ships, whether or not he thinks if the Government of the United States, through the instrumentality of the corporation which is to be organized, secures ships to go into the foreign trade, the Government would have any less difficulty than private owners are now having in securing facilities in foreign ports for unloading the ships? In connection with that I should like to ask the Senator another question so that he may answer them both together.

Mr. BURTON. First, let me answer that. On the contrary, the Government would have rather more difficulty, because private owners already have contracts with the harbor boards or the authorities in charge of the ports at Bremen, Hamburg, and other places. I fancy the greatest difficulty in securing wharfage facilities, if such a Government plan should be organized, would be in this country and in France. There would be less trouble in England and least of all in Germany and in Holland; but in this country the difficulty would be very serious.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In that connection I want to ask the Senator, because I think he regards this as one of the vital matters in this debate, whether or not he agrees with the statement which I find in the New York Times of this morning in an editorial, which I would be glad to have the Senator read and incorporate in his remarks? This is the statement to which I desire to call the Senator's attention, and ask him whether or not it agrees with his own views:

> Twenty-one vessels arrived at Liverpool last Thursday, and not one of them was able to get a berth to discharge its cargo. Sir Norman Hill, in an official report of the situation, said:
> "The main cause, beyond question, is the shortage of labor, not only on the quays but in the transport services, by which the quays are cleared."

That is the statement of Sir Norman Hill. The editorial continues:

> It would be idle to add to such congestion by providing more ships.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I think that is decidedly so. It has been pointed out here again and again that one of the principal reasons for increasing freight rates has been the delay in foreign ports and the inability to secure skilled labor for loading and unloading vessels.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I suggest that the Senator read the editorial; it is a very illuminating statement of that question.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio a question right at this point. Does the Senator think that Government-owned ships or ships owned by the proposed corporation, of which the Government would own the larger part of the stock, would be accorded immunity or any special favors that would not be given to private-owned ships and would have permission to go where the private-owned ships now find difficulty in going?

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I stated a little while ago that the question of the status of those ships perplexed me more than almost any other feature. I can not believe that the ships owned by the proposed shipping corporation would be on the same footing in the eyes of foreign powers, belligerent or neutral, as private ships; but it has undoubtedly been the endeavor of the framers of the bill to give them the status of private merchant ships.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Secretary of the Treasury takes a different view of that matter.

Mr. BURTON. What does he say about it?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will hand the extract to the Senator.

Mr. BURTON. Very well; I will read it:

> Some timid people have argued that if the Government is interested as a stockholder in a shipping company, and a ship of such company should be seized by a belligerent and brought into a prize court, the sovereignty of the Government would be involved. There is no ground whatever for this view. If the Government operated ships outright, just as it operates the vessels of our Navy, an awkward situation of this character might arise; but where a nation is merely a stockholder, or the sole stockholder, in a private corporation, its sovereignty is not and can not be directly involved if the ships of such a corporation become the subjects of litigation in a prize court concerning any issue which does not involve the Government itself.

I can not agree with that, although I dislike to differ——

Mr. VARDAMAN. From what is the Senator reading?

Mr. BURTON. From Secretary McAdoo's address. Let us assume that John Smith, an American citizen, buys or owns a boat, that it takes aboard a cargo of contraband and is caught in the English Channel by an English or French ship and taken into a prize court. John Smith is a citizen of the United States. It is a well-recognized principle of international law that no Government is responsible for the acts of its citizens in the matter of trade save in extreme cases, such, for example, as the harboring of vessels, as in the case of the Alabama. A citizen is allowed to carry contraband if he can escape capture, and the Government of the United States is not responsible for letting him sail. But Mr. John Smith is not the Secretary of the Treasury or the Secretary of Commerce or the Postmaster General. He is plain Mr. John Smith. On the other hand, here is a corporation 51 per cent of the stock of which is owned by the United States Government and controlled by three Cabinet officers. Their control extends to the minutest detail, and it is inconceivable that a boat in this time of war could carry cargo unless this shipping board approved of its character. They would vote the Government stock. This corporation, it might well be said in a prize court, is a mere mask, ingeniously put up, but it is a fiction. The Government of the United States owns all this stock except a few shares. The Government of the United States borrowed $30,000,000 to buy these ships. The Government of the United States chose the managers of the line, the cargo, the date of sailing; everything is under the control of the officials of the United States. Is not that rather different from the case of plain Mr. John Smith?

Why, the difference is even greater than that. This enterprise was conceived for a specific purpose—to promote American trade, to restore our mercantile marine. If the Government is going into the business of restoring the American mercantile marine, does it not have a peculiar responsibility for all these boats, not merely by reason of control of the corporation, but by reason of the very purpose of this measure? As I said a few moments ago, the authors of the bill assume that the status would be the same, because it is a corporation; but it would be most embarrassing if one of these boats were caught carrying contraband. It would look as if the Government of the United States, whose carriage of contraband would constitute an act of hostility, was responsible for this action.

I do not wish to witness a boat owned by a corporation of this nature caught red-handed loaded with contraband. It would mean excitement in the country offended, and in our own country as well, that would test the discretion and the earnest efforts of the coolest heads in both countries. It would mean that a corporation, the special creature of the United States, controlled by its officials, had been carrying munitions of war to aid the enemy.

In this connection I noted a newspaper paragraph a few days ago tending to show whether the people think that ships owned, as proposed by this bill, would have the same status as ships owned by a private individual. Some one, perhaps unduly patriotic, proposed that when the ships were acquired they should be convoyed by our warships, so that no nation could overhaul them. That does not look very much as though they were in the same position as private ships. Of course, that may have been a mere random suggestion, but it shows what our people are thinking.

But first of all it is desirable for a proper understanding of this plan to know where the Government is going to secure the ships.

We have studied the utterances of officials of the Government, and they have treated a great variety of subjects, but I do not recall that they have anywhere said anything about the sources from which they are going to secure their ships. Is it not time that we found that out? If there are no sources from which they are to be obtained by purchase, then you must await the slow course of construction. If there are sources from which these ships are purchased, what can you promise the American people that would not be promised by their present owners or by some active and alert American citizen who would take charge of them?

I sincerely hope that we shall soon hear something from somebody about where you are going to buy those ships. Is it in Asia, Africa, or in Europe, in some hidden inlet in the sea—where are the ships that are not now in use that you purpose to buy?

"Oh, but there are a lot of German ships in our harbors," we are told. I have here a list of boats interned in American waters. This list was published in the New York Herald less than a week ago. I have a list based upon this and revised to a later date, but I think this is accurate, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Name of steamer.	Gross tons.	Net tons.	Passengers.	Crew.	Speed.	At—	Owner.
Vaterland	54,282	23,548	2,264	923	24	New York, N. Y.	Hamburg-American Line.
George Washington	25,570	15,379	2,755	525	19	do	North German Lloyd.
Amerika	22,622	13,637	2,567	541	17½	Boston, Mass.	Hamburg-American Line.
Kronprinzessin Cecilie	19,503	6,584	1,576	650	23½	do	North German Lloyd.
Kaiser Wilhelm II	19,361	6,353	1,593	655	23½	New York, N. Y.	Do.
President Lincoln	18,168	11,171	2,751	305	14½	do	Hamburg-American Line.
President Grant	18,072	11,112	3,303	292	14½	do	Do.
Cincinnati	16,339	9,733	2,449	370	15½	Boston, Mass.	Do.
Pennsylvania	13,433	8,527	2,671	222	13½	New York, N. Y.	Do.
Grosser Kurfurst	13,102	7,881	1,965	260	15½	do	North German Lloyd.
Bulgaria	11,440	7,218				Baltimore, Md.	Hamburg-American Line.
Barbarossa	10,984	6,462	1,838	215	14	New York, N. Y.	North German Lloyd.
Prinzess Irene	10,893	6,443	1,930	235	15½	do	Do.
Friederich Der Grosse	10,771	6,585	1,827	215	14½	do	Do.
Hamburg	10,531	6,420	1,382	232	16	do	Hamburg-American Line.
Rhein	10,058	6,398	2,080	155	13	Baltimore, Md.	North German Lloyd.
Neckar[1]	9,835	6,200	1,920	170	14	do	Do.
Konig Wilhelm II	9,410	5,764		172	15½	New York, N. Y.	Hamburg-American Line.
Bohemia	8,414	5,248			13	do	Do.
Martha Washington[1]	8,312	5,379	1,101	250	17	do	Unione Austriaca.
Koln	7,409	4,666	656	105	12½	Boston, Mass.	North German Lloyd.
Dora[1]	7,037	4,536			13	New York, N. Y.	Unione Austriaca.
Rhaetia	6,600	4,141		81	12½	Philadelphia, Pa.	Hamburg-American Line.
Erny[1]	6,515	4,171			13	Boston, Mass.	Unione Austriaca.
Prinz Oskar	6,026	3,777	1,045	104	13	Philadelphia, Pa.	Hamburg-American Line.
Wittekind	5,640	3,607	1,265	90	12	Boston, Mass.	North German Lloyd.
Ockenfels	5,621	3,452		69		do	Hansa.
Armenia	5,464	3,386	978	44		New York, N. Y.	Hamburg-American Line.
Arcadia	5,454	3,412		44		Norfolk, Va.	Do.
Adamsturm	5,000	3,159		66		New York, N. Y.	Hansa.
Pisa	4,967	3,148	1,148	42	12	do	Hamburg-American Line.
Himalaia[1]	4,948	3,152				do	D. Tripovich S. S. Co.
Morowitz[1]	4,795					Galveston, Tex.	Atlantica Sea Navigation Co
Willehad	4,761	3,012	1,071	91	12	Boston, Mass.	North German Lloyd.
Prinz Joachim	4,760	2,981		96	13	New York, N. Y.	Hamburg-American Line.
Serapis	4,756	3,068		43		San Francisco	Kosmos Line.
Prinz August Wilhelm	4,733	2,975		101	13	New York, N. Y.	Hamburg-American Line.
Ida[1]	4,730	3,093			12	do	Unione Austriaca.
Prinz Eitel Friedrich	4,650	2,921		62	12	do	Hamburg-American Line.
Franconia[1]	4,637	3,019				Philadelphia, Pa.	D. Tripovich S. S. Co.
Allemannia	4,630	2,915		82	13	New York, N. Y.	Hamburg-American Line.
Harburg	4,472	2,837				do	Deutsche-Australische.
Saxonia	4,424	2,782		48		Seattle, Wash.	Hamburg-American Line.
Clara[1]	3,932	2,541				New Orleans, La.	Unione Austriaca.
Nassovia	3,902	2,475		44		New York, N. Y.	Hamburg-American Line.
Teresa[1]	3,769	2,381				New Orleans, La.	Unione Austriaca.
Budapest[1]	3,651	2,321				Norfolk, Va.	Atlantica Sea Nav. Co.
Campania[1]	3,551	2,267				Galveston, Tex.	D. Tripovich S. S. Co.
Sibiria	3,535	2,246				Baltimore, Md.	Hamburg-American Line.
Sarnia	3,402	2,168		52		New York, N. Y.	Do.
Georgia	3,143	2,022		51		New Orleans, La.	Do.
Hohenfelde	2,974	1,887		37		Savannah, Ga.	Nissle-and Gunther.
Portonia	2,778	1,744		28		New York, N. Y.	Reed Horn Atk.
Maia	2,555	1,635		20		do	Holm and Molsen.
Clara Mennig	1,685	1,005				do	Otto Zelch.
Anna[1]	1,575	989				New Orleans, La.	Unione Austriaca.
Neptun	197	131				San Francisco, Cal.	Joliet.
Total	483,678	276,065	42,135	7,787

[1]Austrian steamers.

Mr. BURTON. First of all, among these interned ships is the Vaterland, of 54,282 gross tons, interned at New York City. I do not believe the Government would buy that boat. She is one of the two largest vessels in the world. She would cost about $10,000,000. She is suitable only for a route where there is an immense passenger travel and heavy mails. Her value lies in her large passenger capacity and in her speed.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, is it not true that this ship and her sister ship, although running on a thoroughly established route, were losing money rapidly when the war broke out, and is it not also true that they have not made money since they were put into the service?

Mr. BURTON. I believe the Senator is correct, although I do not know positively. Of course, a boat of that type makes a profit for only about four months of the year. When the war commenced the profitable season for trans-Atlantic steamers had not closed. No doubt but for the war she could have returned to Hamburg—or Cuxhaven, which is the port of Hamburg—and made one or two more profitable trips, but during the balance of the year she would have been run at a loss. The Imperator, as I recall it, had been running less than a year when the war broke out.

Mr. WEEKS. Less than six months.

Mr. BURTON. Next is the Amerika, 22,622 tons; the President Lincoln; the President Grant; the Cincinnati. All these are passenger boats. Then there is the Pennsylvania, which is a passenger boat, but also suited for carrying freight; the Bulgaria; the Kaiser Wilhelm II—that is a fast passenger boat—the Hamburg; the Bohemia. Looking over this list, the number of boats that could be utilized for the purpose now desired is comparatively small. I see here on this list the Dacia, for this gives all the harbors—Seattle, Baltimore, Galveston, and so forth. There are, in all, some 40 or 50 boats, with a total capacity of approximately 450,000 tons.

First of all, only a small fraction of the tonnage would be suited for the trade which we need to have developed. Most of them are high-grade passenger boats. In the next place, they are boats interned in our harbors belonging to one of the belligerents. And there is to-day a controversy as to whether one of these boats, which belonged to a German or Austro-Hungarian owner, can sail through to her destination free from seizure.

Mr. President, I do not think it is desirable for the Government of the United States to become involved in that question. Is the shipping board going to buy these boats? Persistent rumors have been circulated over the country that a potent influence for the passage of this bill proceeded from the fact that these boats were tied up in our harbors, and that their owners were extremely anxious to sell them. Is it contemplated that these boats will be bought with your $40,000,000? That is a part of this question.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to ask the Senator if he knows whether there is any truth in the report which is so common that there has been formed in Germany a corporation for the purpose of taking over the boats that are interned in the harbors of our country?

Mr. BURTON. I do not know as to that. I know there has been some talk in this country of forming a corporation, and indeed some progress made toward the formation of a corporation to take over these boats.

Mr. SMOOT. I asked the Senator the question because I understood that a company had been formed, and that the Hamburg-American Line had turned these boats over to this company just as soon as they were interned in our harbors; and I wanted to know if the Senator knew anything definitely with relation to that.

Mr. BURTON. No; I do not. I do not think anyone on this side of the water could answer that question, unless possibly some one having special knowledge because of his position as a diplomat or foreign representative. Suppose it were true, it would certainly be kept a secret from the people of this country. Only those who would be called upon to take part in the management of the corporation would be likely to know anything about it.

Suppose this matter were pending here in this Congress and a proposition was advanced to buy ships and Congress were debating the appropriation bills and we should run across an item of $10,000,000 or $40,000,000 for the purchase of ships. Would not that item be attacked? Would not Senators on both sides of the Chamber rise and ask, "What are those boats? Where are they to come from? How much are you going to pay for them? Because of the war is there not some danger that you will get into trouble by the purchase of them?"

In times of war we have given broad authority to the executive officers for the maintenance of the military strength of the country or for our defense. At one time I voted with a unanimous House of Representatives to set aside $50,000,000 to be used by President McKinley when war with Spain was impending; but where is there another instance in which it has been proposed to spend immediately $40,000,000 and to add to that unlimited authority to spend for the purchase of vessels hundreds of millions more, without Congress knowing anything about what is to be done? Is this a government by representatives of the people or is it a government by bureaucracy?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wanted to ask the Senator what he thought of the practicability of the suggestion made, that possibly through diplomatic negotiations it might be arranged with the English Government that these interned ships could be purchased, with the understanding that the money would not be paid until after the hostilities ceased; and whether he thought possibly the English Government would not object to America enlarging her mercantile marine for the convenience and good of the world generally?

Mr. BURTON. As I understand it, there have already been negotiations on that subject, with the general conclusion that perhaps neither England nor France would object to Americans taking over these boats, provided payment was not made until the close of the war. Perhaps at one stage of the negotiations it was expected that they would not be used for trade with Germany. Of course one reason for that is perfectly obvious. They would go into German ports and restore the old relation that formerly existed and that would exist in case there was no blockade. But suppose that is true. What do you need this bill for? Private owners will very quickly take whatever ships can be used. Indeed, in view of the nature of these boats, I should look with suspicion upon any proposition to take the question of the purchase of those boats away from private parties and give it to public authorities, because the question would immediately be raised, "Why do you want to pay extravagant prices for these great ships, which at this time are absolutely useless?"

Are you willing to face the possibilities of corruption when there is such a tremendous stake as that? It would be far better to leave this matter to contract or bargain between the present owners and private citizens of the United States. When you state the facts fully, it is not fair to leave to an official of the United States the decision as to how much should be paid for vessels; the transaction would be open to criticism. Will you pay for the Vaterland the $8,000,000 or so that she cost? If so, you would be making a very bad bargain.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; for a question.

Mr. KENYON. Where were the ships secured out of this appropriation of $50,000,000 that the Senator speaks of at the time of the Spanish War?

Mr. BURTON. They were bought by the Secretary of War, and an infinite amount of scandal grew out of the transaction.

Mr. KENYON. That was the next question I was going to ask—whether there was any scandal growing out of it.

Mr. BURTON. Of course, I have always felt that perhaps we visited too much blame upon Government officials because of those Army transports, since there was an emergency. A great many people were nervous. We were entering upon a war, and in the midst of war expenses can be justified which would not be justified at other times.

Mr. KENYON. Did the scandal arise by reason of the alleged payment for the boats of more than they were worth?

Mr. BURTON. Exactly. Some extremists went so far as to say that we picked up every old tub that was offered and paid the owners the reproduction price. I mean, not the ordinary reproduction price, but what it would cost to build each boat.

Mr. KENYON. Where did those boats come from? There was no particular trouble, was there, in getting the boats?

Mr. BURTON. Some of them were foreign, and some domestic. The choice, of course, was given to domestic shipping.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator, too, if I am not violating the rule, whether it is not true that there have been some failures of contractors in England since the war commenced, and whether there are not boats that could be purchased there now?

Mr. BURTON. I think there are. I have seen statements in the newspapers that there were boats on the ways over there that could be purchased, which are, if not entirely finished, nearly finished; and, in view of the vexed situation, those who have contracted for the vessels are not able or ready to take them.

Mr. KENYON. I have before me a letter, addressed not to me but to another party, which was shown me on the very question which I raised when discussing it with him, saying that the writer had taken up this matter in England, and found there were a number of other boats, one of which was named the Ohio, which might be acquired.

Mr. BURTON. That ought to be a good boat.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, while the Senator is examining the papers I should like to say in regard to the purchase of boats, about which the Senator from Iowa has just inquired, that the occasion, as the Senator from Iowa states, was very extraordinary. I recall the time very well; and there was such a hue and cry and such a pressure from outside that the War Department felt that they must make immediate purchases, and of course they had to make purchases of such vessels as were fit to carry troops.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, this may be a highly interesting conference, but the Senators on this side of the Chamber are utterly unable to hear the purport of it.

Mr. KENYON. There are very few Senators over there.

Mr. BURTON. I am sure we should all like to hear the Senator from Wyoming on this question which has been raised.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. I yield, though I do not wish to yield the floor.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I have no desire to take the floor from the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to make an inquiry. Does the Senator from Ohio yield the floor to the Senator from Wyoming, or does the Senator from Wyoming——

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I might ask how the Senators have the floor who are now attempting to use it—certainly not by right of inquiry of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SIMMONS. I asked the question in good faith.

Mr. BURTON. I have not yielded the floor. I am perfectly willing to yield to the Senator from Wyoming for a question.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I make the point of order that if the Senator suspends his remarks in order that some other Senator may proceed, he does, as a matter of fact, yield the floor. Of course, if the Senator rises merely for the purpose of interrupting or asking a question, that is a different thing; but if the Senator yields in order that the Senator from Wyoming may proceed to discuss the pending bill or some other bill, then he undoubtedly yields the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. "The letter of the law killeth, but the spirit giveth life." The Senator from Ohio did not yield. The Senator from Wyoming was proceeding, and the Chair did not hear what he was saying, and probably nobody else heard what he was saying, unless it was the Senator from Ohio. The ruling has been uniformly the same—that the Senator occupying the floor can not yield it to another Senator for the purpose of discussing the question at hand, but the Senator from Ohio did not yield.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I was about to ask a question. It is not material, however.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator from Ohio desires to yield in order to permit the Senator from Wyoming to ask a question, it is perfectly in order.

Mr. BURTON. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. WARREN. I was laying the foundation for a question. I am very sorry I did not speak loud enough. It is rather a new complaint to be lodged against me, and I thank the Senators for wishing to hear what I say.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Wyoming will not intimate that I would interfere with his right to ask a question.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not understand that that was the purpose of his interruption.

Mr. WARREN. I was about to ask if the Senator does not believe that any scandal that arose from the vessels used by the War Department as transports in the late War with Spain——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We still can not hear the Senator.

Mr. WARREN (continuing). Arose from the sale of them later on in the condition they were in, and a comparison of the price that was paid with the price that was received for them? Of course, those vessels were bought under great pressure, and were of a character that could be most readily adapted to the purpose, and were sold in the condition of use without repairs, and so forth. I want to ask the Senator whether he assumes that there was any scandal of a nature that hinted at fraud or corruption, or whether it was the circumstances surrounding the transaction that were criticized?

Mr. BURTON. Of course, that was 16 years or more ago. According to my recollection, it was charged that the matter had not been properly handled. Of course, the great disparity between the prices paid for certain boats and the prices realized for them was the feature which brought the question most prominently before the public. Some newspapers made serious charges, alleging that the matter had not been profitably handled, and there were at least suspicions of corrupt influence. But, Mr. President, while I presume that was in a measure incident to the conditions of the time, it goes to show that a Government should hesitate a long time before it goes into the business of buying boats.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is right about that.

Mr. BURTON. I note that the letter handed to me by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] contains some most important material. This letter is dated December 23 and was forwarded to Mr. B. N. Baker, who has been somewhat prominent in this connection. Would the Senator object to my reading it?

Mr. KENYON. I have no objection at all to the Senator reading it. It contains interesting information.

Mr. BURTON. I may want to comment on it in a few words after reading it. [After reading a part of the letter.] That is the trouble about this whole proposition. The first vessel is only about ready for delivery and the sister ship will be ready in about six or eight months. Three were contracted for before the war. The contractors failed and the builders offered them at a slight profit over the contract price. I have not had time to thoroughly examine this letter, but if there is no objection, I should like to have at least a portion of it printed in the RECORD. Then, it can be examined by all Members of the Senate and remain as a contribution to this discussion.

Mr. KENYON. I think there will be no objection to it. I ask unanimous consent to have the Baker correspondence printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURTON. It will throw some light on this discussion. The matter referred to is as follows:

[Copy of cable sent Dec. 23, 1914.]

BERNADINE, Baltimore:

Can offer, if unsold, steamer completing, St. Nazaire, 12,000 ton, 11 knots, Lloyds class 100A1; sister ship ready 6/8 months; 90,000 each. Andreas, built Doxford, 10,300 tons, 10 knots. Returning maiden voyage New York; could deliver February; 85,000. Would five 8,000-ton, 10 knots, single deck, building, interest? Might get them 75,000 each; first about ready; all delivered six months.

FEILD.

BERNARD N. BAKER, Baltimore.

LONDON, December 23, 1914.

B. N. BAKER, Esq.,
Baltimore, Md., U. S. A.

DEAR BERNARD: I confirm cable sent to-night, offering you the three boats, particulars of which I mailed you yesterday.

As stated in my letter yesterday, all available tonnage is in great demand here at present, and up to this evening I have been unable to get anything else to offer. At the same time I shall continue my search.

I included in my cable an inquiry as to whether five 8,000-ton, 10-knot boats would interest you.

I know of five boats of these dimensions which are being built for one company.

The first one is just completing, and they say all five of them will be completed within six months.

The builders inform me that they think they could get the owners to sell them for £75,000 each; and it occurred to me that possibly five sister boats, though they were 2,000 tons below the capacity you want, might be attractive to you, and I await your reply before further considering them.

Unfortunately, I learn that the steamer Andreas has already left New York returning from her maiden voyage. She belongs to a Greek, who is simply willing to sell her for cash at something more than he paid for her. She, of course, is a new steamer, completed in November.

I was very much in hopes you could see her while she was in New York, but the owner has just informed me that she has left New York. She could be delivered on this side, however, in February, or possibly sooner if she has finished discharging.

If you must have 10,000 tonners, she strikes me as being a suitable boat. She was built by Doxford & Sons, of Sunderland.

The two steamers which I offer you, built at St. Nazaire, ought to be attractive to you.

They are not dear at £90,000.

The first one is about ready for delivery, and has been named Ohio.

Her sister ship, they say, will be ready in about six or eight months.

There were three contracted for before the war. The contractor has failed, and the builder is offering them at a slight profit over the contract price.

The builders, Chantiers & Attellers, are reputable people.

I hope in your letter you will give me some definite information as to what the ships are wanted for.

If they are wanted to run from New York to Frisco, I think the Government here could easily be induced to allow them to go under the American flag, while if they are intended for regular tramp business, and possibly to carry cargo to belligerent countries, they might possibly place some difficulties in the way of the builders exporting them to a neutral country. At the same time, I believe this difficulty might be overcome.

The possibility of this difficulty of course would not arise with either the French or the Greek boats.

I believe I can offer you any available boats to be had, and sincerely hope we may be able to do some business.

Of course when it comes to final business, all of these prices might be subject to counter offers.

Owing to the condition of the market, however, owners will not make firm offers until they are satisfied it means business.

Yours, sincerely,

THOMAS L. FEILD.

Mr. BURTON. I shall be inclined to think on a first examination that it shows a certain number of boats in England for which contract has been made by persons hoping to own them, but which were thrown on the market by reason of the failure of the prospective buyers. It is true that one of them is not quite ready for delivery and the other will be ready in six or eight months, which, in a way, prevents using this transaction as an illustration to throw any light on present conditions; but it merely goes to confirm what I repeatedly said in this discussion—that prospective buyers, private individuals, and corporations are holding back because of the pendency of this bill. Why should the Government pursue this kind of a policy? Since August, when the bill was first brought in, it has served as a threat which has restrained the purchase of boats by private persons. Of course I do not think this bill was at first taken very seriously. It was the general opinion throughout the country that it would not be favorably regarded, but it seems to have gathered strength; and here, in the last half of January, we are told that it is more important than any other legislation, more important than rural credits, more important than appropriation bills. Indeed, there is an intimation that if all the rest of the session is necessary to pass it, this must be put on the statute books of the United States. It is not only the method, but it is the bill that I oppose. It is in violation of every business principle. Even if Government ownership is a good thing, this is not a good place to try it; perhaps the very worst where it could be tried.

I think, Mr. President, I can safely say that if vindication is what the opponents of this bill were seeking for they would be entirely willing to have the bill passed. Time vindicates the man whose course is not approved, whose opinions are not accepted if they are right. It is very safe to wait on this measure should it go into operation.

There is an editorial in the New York Times of this morning on this subject. This paper has published several able editorials in relation to this bill. I will read it as a part of my remarks. New York Times, Wednesday, January 20, 1914, page 8, column 2:

"FINISHING" THE SHIPPING BILL.

Washington dispatches say that the Senate committee is putting the "finishing touches" upon the Government shipping bill. That seems superfluous for two reasons: The action of the caucus was almost fatal, and the trade returns published yesterday ought to be quite so. An increase of exports in December, 1914, over the figures of December, 1913, by $13,070,419 indicates no such deficiency of shipping that the Government should intervene to supply it at the cost and risk of the taxpayers.

Mr. President, for the week ending last Saturday the exports from the city and port of New York were still further increased, being $30,000,000, a larger amount than ever before in the history of the port. Why do you need to go into the shipping business under such circumstances as that?

That is true also of the year's total exports, which have been exceeded but twice. The excess of exports over imports by the great sum of $131,863,077 surpasses every previous December, and has been equaled only in a single month in the Nation's history. The fact is that only one considerable class of exports might have been increased by shipment in Government boats. A Government line might have carried contraband in ships acquired from belligerents more freely than privately owned shipping. But that way of making trouble will hardly be proposed as a reason for proceeding with the Government line. Those who have our moral approval of their contentions are in control of the seas and can get all the contraband they need. To supply contraband at a profit to those who on the merits we think ought not to win this war, questions of friendship apart, is not a duty of government.

I can hardly conceive, Mr. President, that any consideration of this nature as a preference between nations should come into the calculations of any Government official. To me that is unthinkable. I do not know that there is more than a mere hypothetical case stated here.

It is especially fatuous to provide Government shipping, or private shipping with Government aid, when the necessity of the case is not so much shipping as facilities for loading and unloading. To the facts on this point as given by carriers' spokesmen on this side of the ocean may now be added incontestable evidence from the other side. Twenty-one vessels arrived at Liverpool last Thursday, and not one of them was able to get a berth to discharge its cargo. Sir Norman Hill, in an official report on the situation, said:

"The main cause, beyond question, is the shortage of labor, not only on the quays but in the transport services, by which the quays are cleared."

It would be idle to add to such congestion by providing more ships. The trouble is not one of trade, but of war. Some ports are closed, throwing more business upon others than they could do in favorable times. Many dock laborers have enlisted and others are earning such high wages that they are independent. Commerce is not running in accustomed lines. Strange boats are on unfamiliar routes and require more attention than liners running on routine. If any Government should intervene, it is not ours. We are shipping full volumes of goods at our own prices, and the freight is paid by the buyers—

I tried to establish that point yesterday, but now I have at least the very potent approval and sanction of this very able newspaper—and the freight is paid by the buyers. They should worry, not we. We should worry only if those who are more eager than wise—

This is an important contribution in this day when persons are reproached as uninformed and ignorant—

They should worry, not we. We should worry only if those who are more eager than wise should thrust us into an experiment which is not only unnecessary in a commercial sense but is obnoxious politically. No Democrat can keep the name and support a subsidy scheme concealing Government ownership and operation. In proportion as the "finishing touches" meet these objections the bill will lose attractiveness to those who now support it because of these defects.

Mr. President, one might think this language is from some antiadministration paper, some stand-pat, reactionary, Republican newspaper, as terms bandied about. This is a paper that supported the President most strenuously in the campaign of 1912, and it seems to support him yet, though recently apparently with some reservations and some apprehensions that it can not continue long in the course which it has thus far pursued.

Here is another editorial from the New York Evening Post of yesterday:

Last night's caucus of Democratic Senators was ominous for the ship-purchase bill. A final decision was not reached, and there is to be another meeting to-night; but so many—

I have no doubt, Mr. President, this does not contain any news to those who took part in the caucus. They knew all about it when they went there. They called it a conference, a term which is very carefully applied to these gatherings when our friends on the other side get together. Indeed, if you ask them if they are going to a caucus, they say, "Oh, no," like some one who has given the wrong password, "it is not the caucus, but the conference." I desire to apologize for the Evening Post, as well as myself, that it called this meeting Monday night a caucus.

Last night's caucus of Democratic Senators was ominous for the ship-purchase bill. A final decision was not reached, and there is to be another meeting to-night; but so many strong objections were made to the bill as it stands, so many important amendments were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and there was such a lack of hearty indorsement of the whole measure, that it seems to be doomed to failure at this session. It certainly will fall if the Republicans put up the stout fight against it which they promise to make. With appropriations struggling for right of way and less than seven weeks of working time left, no bill of this contentious nature can be passed before March 4, if full advantage is taken of the rules of the Senate to prevent it.

This feeling that they are engaged in a hopeless undertaking may have had something to do with the want of enthusiasm shown by the Democratic Senators last night.

Of course, this statement is open to contradiction. It may be said that the caucus or conference was wild with enthusiasm instead of lacking in enthusiasm. So it is perfectly possible to correct this article.

And they may also have been influenced by other things. They may have had before them the figures of the American export trade for December. These show a total higher than ever before reached in that month except once. The full details are not yet at hand. If it be said that the abnormally high prices of wheat must have swollen the money value of the exports, it can be replied that the abnormally low prices of cotton were at least a partial offset. Anyhow, there stand the big figures strongly tending to refute the underlying contention of the Government ship purchasers, that American goods can not be sent abroad because there are not enough ships to carry them. Much to the same purport is the reported interview yesterday between Mr. Morgan and the President. The banker told Mr. Wilson that the sudden leaping up of American exports had so changed the whole foreign-exchange situation that it was no longer necessary to keep the gold pool in existence.

All this necessarily gives the ship-purchase bill the look of a superfluous lagger on the stage. Its original professed intent was to meet an emergency. But that emergency has largely passed away. This is so generally admitted that the ground has been shifted now, and it is argued that the bill gives us a fine chance for making a beginning of an American merchant marine. But the bill must be one thing or the other. If it is absolutely necessary in order to surmount a crisis, the country might condone in it some features which seem ill-considered and full of danger. But if it is a bill of a large and far-sighted kind to restore the American flag to the ocean, then the discussion of it must be on another basis. It can not any longer justify its dubious provisions as emergency measures. The whole thing is up for searching debate. And as soon as that begins it appears, as was abundantly manifest at the Democratic caucus, that the bill is full of holes.

Closely related to this entire question is the matter of the war risks to which our export trade is subject. The delays and uncertainties due to the exercise of the British right of search have been a real grievance. But this, it is plain, is in a fair way to be largely got rid of. The friendly protest by our Government has already had its effect. One of the most marked effects was upon English public opinion. The cable gave us the run of newspaper expressions, which were conciliatory enough. But we had to wait for the mail to get the views of weekly publications of special significance like the London Economist and the Shipping World. The former sharply criticized the British Government for its whole course in the matter of contraband and the right of search. It pointed out the vascillation in regard to the lists of contraband articles published from time to time and argued that this proved a lack of ordinary business ability and even business information in the foreign office. And the Shipping World of January 6 is most considerate as regards the American position. In this it sees "nothing unreasonable," and even goes so far as to favor the view "that the search of an American ship or a ship with an American cargo should be concluded when such a ship is stopped on the high seas and that further delay for the purpose of examination should not be practiced in the way of taking such ship and cargo into a British port for further examination." Of course if the preliminary search showed the presence of contraband goods, then seizure and the delay of being taken into port for further examination would naturally follow. Quoting from the Evening Post in regard to the need of having it clearly established under what risks of detention or seizure our goods are sent abroad, the Shipping World says: "Surely American exporters and shippers are entitled to that."

Both ways, then, the American export trade is getting into better shape. Sufficient tonnage is being found, even if the freight rates are still made high by war risks. And on the diplomatic side it is evident that the British Government will meet our own half way in the matter of contraband and of the right of search. With these, be it noted, the case of the Dacia has nothing to do. The question about that ship is simply the validity of her change of registry.

Mr. President, I have read these two editorials—which are perhaps the first editorials from newspapers that I have ever presented in the Senate—because of their clear statement of the case, because they are entitled to special consideration, both as proceeding from journals which, at least in the past, have supported the administration, and I think they throw very material light on this controversy. In the strongest terms they condemn the shipping bill. If there was an emergency, they say it has passed. They point to the fact that, with one or perhaps two exceptions, December showed larger exports than I believe ever were sent out from this country; and it can further be said that last week showed greater exports from New York than any week in its history.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of what these increased exports consisted? Have they been munitions of war?

Mr. BURTON. I do not think they have been analyzed. Probably there is a considerable amount of munitions of war. Of course, the shipments of wheat have been very large. Wheat exports have been larger, or at least of greater value, during this year than for a long while.

Mr. KENYON. Have most of the boats in which these exports have been carried been English vessels?

Mr. BURTON. I think so, with some exceptions. I really could not state with definiteness how that is. I know that some boats in the coastwise trade have been turned aside to foreign trade.

Mr. KENYON. Has the Senator from Ohio any figures to show what proportion of this increase which we are sending over there has been munitions of war?

Mr. BURTON. I have not, I will say to the Senator; but I regard all those questions as important, and before this discussion is finished I shall try to give information on all of them.

I think I have already touched on this further branch of the question sufficiently. If the Government is to secure these boats by construction, can they be secured soon enough to relieve the so-called emergency? It would require an unsual efficiency to finish any boats suitable for this trade in less than nine months, and the normal time would be a year or more. Even so, does not everyone who is familiar with Government work know just what would hapepn? Government inspection would be asked to oversee the building; the construction would be infinitely slower than in case a private individual made the inspection, because of the difference in Government methods. I have sometimes, when talking with my constituents, most earnestly defended the methods of the United States Government in requiring thorough construction, and apologized for the slowness, for the long time between beginning and completion, for the reason that any property of the Government—any public work, any building—should be substantial in its character and built to stay. We all know that when provision is made for a public building it is a long while before the plans are approved and the construction commenced. Oftentimes after that it is still longer before the building is completed. However, we are face to face with the fact that if promptness is desired Government methods are not the best way of securing it.

The next question is, If the purchase of interned vessels is contemplated, will it not prejudice the quality of our neutrality? If such purchase were at all feasible, could it not be accomplished with less prejudice by private capital than by public capital? On that question, in answer to questions of Senators, I have already dwelt at considerable length. I should very much fear the day, Mr. President, in which a ship owned by such a corporation as the one contemplated should be seized and haled before a prize court on the charge of carrying of contraband.

Now, suppose a ship owned by the Government through this corporation should be seized by France or England and treated as if it were a private ship. Just think of the excitement that would be aroused in this country. On the other hand, if it were a private-owned ship, all the excitement would be stayed. It would be said that one of our citizens had endeavored to get contraband over to Germany, that he had been caught, and that he would have to take his chances. If the position is taken that the Government-owned ships would be freer from search or seizure, I should like to know upon what principle that contention is based. If this Government chooses to go into private business, why should it not take the risks of private business? The point that I want to make and emphasize is this: That while in every aspect of international law a boat owned by a corporation sustained by the Government might be subject to the same rules as a private boat, its status, the interest of the Government in it, would give it a quality peculiarly embarrassing to us.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BURTON. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. Right in that connection I should like to ask the Senator's opinion as to the effect upon belligerent nations of the transporting of munitions of war manufactured in this country by boats owned by the Government to one of the belligerent powers across the water?

Mr. BURTON. Boats owned by our Government?

Mr. KENYON. Yes; under this bill. Would that produce a very happy frame of mind on the other belligerent nations? I notice in the New York World——

Mr. BURTON. Let me see if I understand the Senator. The question is, What would be the status of a boat of the United States, flying the United States flag, carrying munitions of war?

Mr. KENYON. One of the boats provided for under this bill carrying munitions of war, for instance, to England?

Mr. BURTON. Suppose it were caught by a German boat, or even if it were not caught but it were known that such a boat had sailed carrying such a cargo?

Mr. KENYON. What would be the situation?

Mr. BURTON. It would be a hostile act; there is no question about that. An individual living in one country can carry munitions of war to a belligerent, but a Government can not do so without the interpretation being placed upon it that it is an act of hostility.

Mr. KENYON. Is there not a specially great danger, then, in this plan at the present crisis of the world?

Mr. BURTON. I think so.

Mr. KENYON. I notice in the New York World an interesting article——

Mr. BURTON. Of course in that connection I may say that some are arguing that these ships are on an entirely different basis—I dwelt on that some time ago—that they are of the same status as private ships, but I do not see how that can be successfully maintained.

Mr. KENYON. I do not know how the Senator feels about this country manufacturing and transporting to foreign nations engaged in war munitions with which they assist in killing each other and then setting aside Sundays to pray for peace. I notice in an article in the New York World that in the month of November there were $2,425,745 in munitions of war exported from the United States. Now, the point that is troubling my mind a little is this: If we had Government ships and they transported munitions of war, would we not commit a hostile act toward one of the belligerents?

Mr. BURTON. It seems to me so; at any rate, it would create the feeling that we were hostile. Is anybody going to think that setting up a man of straw to do the Government's business makes it other than the business of the Government itself? If you are going to have any Government ownership, let us tackle the problem bravely and buy ships, so that they will not belong to the United States Export & Import Association (Ltd.), but to the United States of America. I do not say that I shall favor any such proposition as that, but that at least would have the virtue both of frankness and of convenience.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, if I may ask a question at that point, does not the Senator from Ohio think that we would be in a less embarrassing position, so far as foreign Governments are concerned, if we had out and out Government ownership than if we occupied this doubtful status, particularly in view of the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury, who will be himself a member of this board, has already stated that when the Government becomes a stockholder in this corporation it lays aside its sovereignty? In other words, does he not think that we would be in a better position if our sovereignty were undoubted?

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, it would clarify the situation and remove these doubtful questions.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Now, I ask the Senator the further question whether or not he is familiar with the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States rendered at quite an early day—I have forgotten the exact time—which, in substance, held that when a State entered into private business, it took substantially the status of the private individual?

Mr. BURTON. A decision to that effect—perhaps an earlier one was also rendered—was announced by the Supreme Court within a comparatively few years in the South Carolina dispensary case.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That was a later case.

Mr. BURTON. The State of South Carolina took to itself the selling of liquor. Along came the Government officials and told them that they must pay the internal-revenue tax. They said: "No; it is the State that is selling this liquor." The question was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Supreme Court said that if a State engages in private business it must be subject to all the taxes and all the responsibilities and liabilities of those engaged in private business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask the Senator this further question: The Senator has already commented upon the difficulties that would arise if some of these ships occupying this doubtful status were carrying contraband articles. Does the Senator doubt that that question is quite likely to arise, in view of the fact that the present Government has already issued an order which holds up the publication of manifests for 30 days, with the apparent object of facilitating the trade in contraband articles?

Mr. BURTON. It would certainly arise, and under circumstances that would threaten the peace of the world. These belligerent countries that control the sea would very properly say, "These two things together constitute an evasion—in the first place, the withholding of the manifest; in the next place, this most peculiar form of incorporation or organization."

In some way I anticipate that the corporation feature will be stricken out of the bill. It is never safe to prophesy as to what amendments will be offered. In the first place, I do not see how we can do business in that way, and, in the next place, it is such a clumsy device for doing something that could be much more readily done in other ways.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; for a question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I want to ask the Senator from Ohio if he does not think there would be more warrant for a foreign Government to consider the operation of ships in the carrying trade under the provisions of this bill, because there is no provision in our Constitution distinctly authorizing the Government to go into it, and the burden upon us to show that it was a governmental function would be all the greater on that account?

Mr. BURTON. In other words, "you are going into something that was not contemplated when your Constitution was framed, and there must be some strange or ulterior purpose in it." When you get a bill so singular as this in so many of its features that point would be in line with its peculiar and very exceptional qualities.

There is this further branch of the question: If such purchase were at all feasible, could it not be accomplished with less prejudice by private than by public capital?

That introduces the whole subject of comparisons of public and private capital. If the Government went into the market to buy, there would immediately be a movement to sell the ships only at the very highest figure. Extravagant prices, no doubt, would be paid, as in 1898. Private parties, through the ordinary course of business negotiations, could succeed much better. If the aim of the measure is to build up an American merchant marine, will not this bill defeat its own purpose by driving private capital out of the business? Will not a larger amount of private capital be kept from investment in ships by this bill than the bill contemplates that the Government shall spend?

Is it not true that private capital has been driven out of the business and that this bill has prevented the investment of further amounts? What do you deduce from the figures of foreign boats already taken over in this country? When was the largest number taken over under the act of last August? Are boats being taken over now? Is that because there are no boats in the market? If there are no boats in the market for private owners to buy, where will the Government secure any? If there are boats in the market which have not been transferred to American register which could be transferred, is it not because private owners do not wish to buy them with this bill pending?

The eleventh question is, Should the seemingly impossible happen and the Government-owned line prove profitable, to whom would it be sold?

Mr. President, that is hardly a reasonable assumption. But the answer to this question will throw light on the whole project. There seems to be an idea with some that this line will be profitable; that the business will be transacted, and will attain such a degree of prosperity that private owners will desire to purchase it.

What will happen then? Will it be sold by public auction? Will it be sold in the ordinary way in which a corporation disposes of its property? Will somebody get a controlling interest in the stock of this corporation? Do you believe it possible, as stated in one of the communications which we have received, that the time is coming when this corporation will be so profitable that private individuals will wish to take the stock or the property away from the Government?

Twelfth. Will the managers of this Government line enter into conferences or agreements with existing lines?

I have already taken up this point. There is abundant evidence to show that in the one line that the Government acquired conferences have been held, and the Government has pursued the same course as would have been pursued by a private owner.

If, instead of acquiring a line to carry out a great work that the Government has under construction, boats should be purchased for the mere sake of carrying freight in competition with other lines, will not the Government again be compelled to enter into conferences? If so, is that in accordance with the antitrust laws? In what kind of a position will it place this Government or its agent if it joins in these gentlemen's agreements or conferences?

Or, take the other side of the question: Suppose you do not go into these conferences. In view of the necessity of regular sailings, supplying all ports with shipping facilities, dividing up the boats among the different routes of the world, how would any Government-owned line succeed unless it entered into these agreements with other shippers?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator speaks of conferences. I am not very well informed on that subject; but would this be along the same line as the European conferences and combinations which have been so severely condemned by one branch of Congress as the result of an investigation?

Mr. BURTON. That is the question I am propounding. The report made within a year or so by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries seems to favor these conferences under proper Government supervision.

Mr. GALLINGER. I knew they had been investigated.

Mr. BURTON. Will boats be acquired for special services, such as carrying fruit, meat, or oil? In the normal development of the business special types of boats have been built for all these purposes. Just as there is subdivision and specialization in the different branches of manufacture, so there are now subdivisions in the types of ships; the United Fruit Co. having a large number of ships for carrying fruits from Central and South America to the United States; the Standard Oil Co. has a large fleet of tank boats to carry oil; and there are also refrigerator boats for carrying meat. If the Government is going to go into the business, then it must have boats for all these different lines of business. If it does not, what will be the situation? Will the boats of these types already in existence have a monopoly of the trade? Or will the different interests subserved by this class of boats be neglected in this general Government scheme?

This all tends to show the difficulties which would arise if the Government entered into a line of business so thoroughly developed.

Will the Government operate the boats through the proposed corporation, or will it charter them to private parties? It has been stated in the press that the proponents of this bill intend to offer an amendment to this bill providing that when the boats are bought by the Government they shall be chartered to private parties. That shows the shifts to which this measure is likely to be subjected. One proposition is that they shall be leased at 4 per cent on their value. Why, Mr. President, there is a deterioration account in every boat which must be taken into consideration in the management of such a business. It is not a question of 4 per cent on the amount invested; it is a question of a reasonable income on the boats and in addition a provision for deterioration. Then there are other complications. Constant replacement is necessary, and it would be impossible, without expert consideration, to determine the amount that would have to be so expended at the end of a year. Indeed, the computation could not be made with accuracy for a year in advance.

Then, still further, it opens the way for playing favorites. It furnishes a precedent for the Government buying other things. I should like to know if the Democratic Party is going to vote for a bill that proposes Government ownership such as this. What a spectacle it will be for the party of Thomas Jefferson!

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I wish to ask the Senator if he has noticed that in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], in addition to the 4 per cent, it is provided that there shall be a charge of 5 per cent per annum for depreciation and full insurance?

Mr. BURTON. Well, of course that is an estimate on depreciation; but let us put ourselves in the place of shipowners. Suppose the Government buys six ships. One is a new steamer, built with the latest equipment; another is a wooden steamer that has been in use for 30 years. What kind of an arrangement would it be to lease both of those boats, the iron or steel steamer that probably will not deteriorate much during the year, at 5 per cent for deterioration, and the other one, that is almost ready to go to the junk heap, at the same figure?

That all shows the futility of the Government attempting to go into business in this sort of a way. I take it that there might be, after the boat has been used, some effort made to determine just what was the diminished value during the year, but it would be difficult if not impossible to arrange that in advance. The fact is that the majority of ship charters are made either for a comparatively short time or under terms as to the repairs that are provided for by the person who takes the use of the boat. I make this statement with some slight hesitancy, because that may not always be the arrangement. I do not believe that in any event a successful attempt could be made to fix a definite percentage of deterioration within a year.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LODGE. I rise to a question of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts will state the point of order.

Mr. LODGE. I make the point of order that there is not a quorum present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield for that purpose?

Mr. BURTON. I yield for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gallinger	Myers	Smith, Ariz.
Brady	Gore	Norris	Smoot
Brandegee	Gronna	O'Gorman	Sterling
Bryan	Hardwick	Oliver	Sutherland
Burton	Hitchcock	Overman	Swanson
Camden	Hollis	Page	Thomas
Catron	Hughes	Perkins	Thornton
Chamberlain	James	Pittman	Tillman
Clapp	Johnson	Poindexter	Townsend
Clark, Wyo.	Kenyon	Robinson	Vardaman
Colt	Kern	Saulsbury	Warren
Culberson	Lippitt	Shafroth	Weeks
Cummins	Lodge	Sheppard	White
du Pont	Martin, Va.	Shively	Williams
Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Simmons

Mr. ROBINSON. I was requested to announce that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] is detained from the Chamber on account of official business.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] and the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] on business of the Senate.

Mr. KERN. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. He is detained on account of sickness.

Mr. CATRON. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. FALL], who is detained by serious sickness in his family.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

During the delivery of Mr. BURTON's speech,

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 20189) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio a question. I desire to ask that the river and harbor bill which has just been received from the House of Representatives be laid before the Senate and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BURTON. Will that change the status of things here in regard to my right to the floor?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think not if it is done by unanimous consent. It is a privileged matter anyway.

Mr. BURTON. I do not wish Senators to feel that I am exceptionally insistent on this question, but I have not finished my remarks.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will not raise the question now.

Mr. BURTON. It has seemed to me that there was possibly a manifestation of some desire to bring my remarks prematurely to an end.

Mr. FLETCHER. I withdraw the request.

Mr. BURTON. I want to say to the Senator from Florida that I am entirely willing to accommodate him in this regard, although I do not wish to take any chances.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WHITE in the chair). The Chair holds that it will not change the status of the Senator from Ohio to have the message from the House of Representatives laid before the Senate.

Mr. BURTON. The Chair, I understand, refers to the message in regard to the river and harbor bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill received from the House of Representatives, the title of which will be read.

H. R. 20189. An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

After the conclusion of Mr. BURTON's speech and the calling of the roll, PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

On January 15, 1915:

S. J. Res. 218. Joint resolution to provide for the detail of an officer of the Army for duty with the Panama-California Exposition, San Diego, Cal.

On January 16, 1915:

S. 6039. An act for the coinage of certain gold and silver coins in commemoration of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition, and for other purposes.

On January 20, 1915:

S. 5168. An act for the relief of the King Theological Hall, and authorizing the conveyance of real estate to the Howard University and other grantees.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHIVELY presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Kokomo, Ind., remonstrating against all military agitation in the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ROBINSON presented petitions of the Board of Trade of Batesville, Ark., praying that an appropriation be made for the construction of seven locks and dams on the upper White River, above Batesville, for the improvement of navigation, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented a petition of the Whatcom County Medical Society, of Washington, praying for the enactment of legislation granting a fair and impartial hearing to Dr. Frederick A. Cook on his polar claims, which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also presented petitions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Endicott, of Charles E. Meyers and sundry other citizens of Davenport, and of Miss Alma Scott and sundry other citizens of Ritzville, all in the State of Washington, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Philippine bill to prohibit the sale of intoxicating drinks and drugs in the Philippine Islands except for medicinal purposes, which were referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. MARTIN of Virginia:

A bill (S. 7333) granting an increase of pension to Sarah Rebecca (Taylor) Jones; and

A bill (S. 7334) granting an increase of pension to Sophie M. Walker; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JAMES:

A bill (S. 7335) granting an increase of pension to Sarah T. Wright (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 7336) granting a pension to Katherine Walker (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHIVELY:

A bill (S. 7337) granting a pension to Joseph Phillips;

A bill (S. 7338) granting a pension to Minnie Kinder;

A bill (S. 7339) granting an increase of pension to William C. Fickas; and

A bill (S. 7340) granting an increase of pension to John J. White; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHIELDS:

A bill (S. 7341) granting a pension to Sue C. Barton; and

A bill (S. 7342) granting an increase of pension to Madison T. Trent; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey:

A bill (S. 7343) granting an increase of pension to John R. Lindaberry (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 7344) granting a pension to Rose Barnes (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HUGHES:

A bill (S. 7345) granting an increase of pension to William Husk;

A bill (S. 7346) granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Foster; and

A bill (S. 7347) granting a pension to Elizabeth McCaveny; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LIPPITT:

A bill (S. 7348) granting an increase of pension to Nelly Cole; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 7349) granting an increase of pension to Lewis A. Huffaker (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. OLIVER:

A bill (S. 7350) granting a pension to Lusetta Weary; to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. JONES submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for the investigation and improvement of cereals and methods of cereal production, etc., from $139,505 to $142,005, so that $2,500 of the same shall be used in connection with the experiment station at Waterville, Wash., intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill (H. R. 20415), which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for the purchase, propagation, testing, and distribution of new and rare seed from $119,920 to $122,420, so that $2,500 thereof shall be used at the experiment station, Waterville, Wash., intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill (H. R. 20415), which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SAULSBURY submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $6,500 for an additional force of five special examiners in the Pension Office for one year at $1,300 each, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill (H. R. 19909), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

THE JUDICIAL CODE.

Mr. WARREN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 15578) to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate as in Committee of the Whole resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 6856) to authorize the United States, acting through a shipping board, to subscribe to the capital stock of a corporation to be organized under the laws of the United States or of a State thereof or of the District of Columbia, to purchase, construct, equip, maintain, and operate merchant vessels in the foreign trade of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, what is the question before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was trying to find out. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered on behalf of the Committee on Commerce by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the amendment be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the United States, acting through the shipping board hereinafter created, may subscribe to the capital stock of any corporation now or hereafter organized under the laws of the United States or of any State thereof or of the District of Columbia which shall have for its object the purchase, construction, equipment, maintenance, and operation of merchant vessels to meet the requirements of the foreign commerce of the United States, or to charter vessels for such purposes, and to make charters or leases of any vessel or vessels owned by such corporation to any other corporation, firm, or individual to be used for such purposes: Provided, That the terms and conditions of such charter parties shall first be approved by the shipping board, the initial capital stock of which corporation shall not be over $10,000,000, of the par value of $100 per share.

SEC. 2. That the United States shall subscribe to 51 per cent of the initial capital stock of such corporation at par and the remainder thereof shall be offered for public subscription at not less than par, and the United States may then further subscribe at par for any amount of such stock not taken by public subscription, but such corporation may begin business as soon as 51 per cent of such stock has been subscribed and paid for by the United States. The shipping board, with the approval of the President, may consent to or may cause an increase of the capital stock from time to time as the interests of the corporation may require, but the United States shall subscribe for 51 per cent of each and every such increase.

SEC. 3. That the United States, through the shipping board and with the approval of the President, is authorized to purchase or construct vessels suitable, in the judgment of the shipping board, for the purposes of such corporation, with a view to transferring them to such corporation, and for this purpose the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the request of the shipping board and the approval of the President, may issue and sell or use for such purchases or construction any of the bonds of the United States now available in the Treasury of the United States under the act of August 5, 1909, the act of February 4, 1910, and the act of March 2, 1911, relating to the issue of bonds for the construction of the Panama Canal, to a total amount not to exceed $30,000,000 for the purpose of purchasing or constructing such vessels: Provided, That the bonds issued and sold or used under the provisions of this section may be made payable at such time after issue as the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, may deem advisable and fix, instead of 50 years after date of issue, as in said act of August 5, 1909, not exceeding 50 years: Provided further, That payments for such purchases or construction from proceeds of sales of bonds, or delivery of bonds in payment thereof, shall be made only as ordered and directed by the shipping board.

SEC. 4. That the shipping board is authorized to transfer the vessels purchased or constructed as herein provided to any such corporation in which the United States has become a stockholder as hereinbefore provided, and such corporation shall issue to the United States in payment thereof its gold bonds bearing interest at not less than 4 per cent per annum, and upon such further terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the shipping board, such bonds to constitute a first and paramount lien upon such vessels thus transferred and upon all the property of such corporation: Provided, That the amount of bonds received by the United States in payment for such vessels shall not be less at the then par value than the total amount expended by the United States in the purchase or construction of such vessels, and the same may be sold by the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion and with the approval of the President, to reimburse the Treasury for expenditures made in the purchase or construction of vessels. Such corporation shall make suitable provision for sinking fund and for the depreciation charges under the rules and regulations to be prescribed by such shipping board; and all vessels acquired under this act, or in which the United States shall otherwise be interested as owner in whole or in part, or upon which the United States shall have or hold any mortgage, pledge, lien, or other security, shall, when and while employed solely as merchant vessels, be in all respects subject to the rules, regulations, and liabilities governing merchant vessels under the principles of international law, in like manner and to the same extent as merchant vessels in private ownership when duly registered under the laws of the United States.

SEC. 5. That vessels purchased or constructed by such shipping board and conveyed to such corporation as herein provided shall be entitled to registry under the laws of the United States and shall be deemed vessels of the United States and entitled to the benefits and privileges appertaining to such vessels, except such vessels shall engage only in trade with foreign countries or with the Philippine Islands, the Hawaiian Islands, and the islands of Guam and Tutuila. Such vessels shall be subject to the navigation laws of the United States except as herein provided.

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster General, and the Secretary of Commerce are hereby constituted a board to be known as the shipping board, with full power, subject to the approval of the President, to vote the stock of the United States in said corporation, either as a body or by one or more of its members duly authorized by a majority, and to do all things necessary, whether specifically enumerated or not, to carry out the purposes of this act and protect the interests of the United States.

SEC. 7. That, with the approval of the Congress, such shipping board may at any time sell the stock of such corporation owned by the United States.

SEC. 8. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to charter, lease, or transfer such naval auxiliaries now belonging to the Naval Establishment of the United States as are suitable for commercial use and which are not required for use in the Navy in time of peace, and vessels belonging to the War Department suitable for commercial uses and not required for military transports in time of peace and to direct or cause to be chartered, leased, or transferred vessels now owned and operated by the Panama Railroad Co., to any corporation now or hereafter organized as in this act provided upon such terms and conditions as the shipping board, with the approval of the President of the United States, shall prescribe. The vessels purchased or constructed by the United States through the shipping board, with the approval of the President of the United States, shall be of a type, as far as the commercial requirements of the foreign trade of the United States may permit, suitable for use as naval auxiliaries in the Naval Establishment of the United States.

SEC. 9. That the President of the United States, upon giving to any such corporation in which the United States shall be a stockholder, through its president, vice president, secretary, or manager, notice in writing for such reasonable length of time as in his judgment the circumstances require and will permit of his intention so to do, may take possession, absolutely of temporarily for use as naval auxiliaries, of any vessel or vessels owned or leased by or otherwise in the possession of said corporation, and said corporation shall be entitled to a reasonable price or rental therefor, to be fixed by the shipping board with the approval of the President: Provided, That if in the judgment of the President an emergency exists requiring such action he may take possession of any such vessel or vessels without notice.

SEC. 10. That the shipping board shall make to Congress, at the beginning of each regular session, a report of expenditures and receipts under this act and of the operations of any corporation in which the United States may have become a stockholder hereunder.

SEC. 11. That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000,000. But the corporation in which the United States shall become a stockholder as herein provided shall pay all necessary expenses of the shipping board in this behalf.

SEC. 12. That the President is hereby authorized and empowered to designate from time to time such ports of the United States as he may for the purposes of this section deem advisable at which the several collectors of the ports so designated shall for such periods of time as the President may prescribe inspect all goods, wares, and merchandise of whatever description offered for shipment from any such port to any foreign port upon any vessel directly or indirectly owned in whole or in part by the United States or in which the United States may have a proprietary interest, when employed solely as a merchant vessel, or upon any vessel whatsoever when duly registered under the laws of the United States. It shall be, and is hereby made, the duty of the collector of the port at each of the ports so designated, and authority is hereby granted to such collector for that purpose, to make such inspection and examination before the same shall be loaded and stored aboard ship of all goods, wares, and merchandise of whatever description offered for shipment from such port to any foreign port upon any vessel defined by this section as may be necessary to inform him as to the exact character and description of the goods, wares, and merchandise so offered for shipment. It shall be unlawful for any person, whether as principal or agent, to load and store aboard ship, or attempt to load and store aboard ship, any goods, wares, or merchandise subject to inspection under this section before the same have been duly inspected and examined as herein required; and it shall be unlawful for the master or other chief officer of any vessel defined in this section to receive and store aboard ship any goods, wares, or merchandise subject to inspection under this section before the same have been duly inspected and examined as herein required. Any person who shall knowingly violate the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction before any court of competent jurisdiction shall be sentenced to pay a fine of not more than $5,000, and shall be committed to prison until such fine and the costs of the prosecution shall be paid; and clearance shall not be granted to any vessel whose owners or chief officers shall knowingly violate the provisions of this section: Provided, That the Secretary of Commerce may upon hearing and for satisfactory reasons permit and direct the clearance of any such vessel, stating his reasons therefor in a written opinion to be filed as a public document in the Department of Commerce.

It shall be, and is hereby made, the duty of the collector of the port from which any such vessel clears to inspect the manifest or cargo invoice of each vessel subject to the provisions of this section to ascertain whether the manifest or cargo invoice sets forth a true exhibit of all goods, wares, and merchandise aboard ship at the time of sailing; and if the collector of the port shall be satisfied that the manifest or cargo invoice does set forth a true exhibit of all goods, wares, and merchandise received aboard ship at the time of sailing, he shall in every such case attach to the manifest or cargo invoice his official certificate under seal, setting forth that he has inspected and examined the goods, wares, and merchandise aboard such ship, and that the manifest or cargo invoice sets forth a true exhibit of the same. No such vessel shall be granted a clearance at any such port until after the certificate, herein required to be issued under his official seal by the collector of the port, has been issued and delivered by him to the chief officer or other proper officer of such vessel.

It shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Navigation, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce, to make and promulgate all needful and proper rules and regulations for administering the provisions of this section; and for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this section the sum of $500,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 13. That this act shall take effect from its passage.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, may I ask if there is any amendment pending to the original bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. To the substitute?

Mr. LODGE. No; not to the substitute, but to the original bill. Is there any perfecting amendment pending?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has some difficulty in answering, because he has to rely entirely upon the Secretary. The Secretary says that all the original amendments were withdrawn.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to offer as a perfecting amendment to the part proposed to be stricken out the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts offers an amendment to the original bill which will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill, insert the following——

Mr. FLETCHER. The substitute itself is a proposed amendment to the bill, and it is in order to offer an amendment to the substitute.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator has had long experience and knows that it is in order to perfect the original text.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There can be no question about it. This is to strike out and insert. Of course, it is always in the power of the Senate to perfect a bill, to move to strike out, before a motion to strike out and insert is submitted. There can be no question about the right to present amendments to the text of the original bill. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That no vessels shall be purchased under this act which are the property, in whole or in part, of or which are in any manner controlled or subsidized by any of the nations now at war, nor shall any vessels be purchased under this act which are the property of any of the subjects or citizens of said belligerent nations.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, there is no difference of opinion among those who have given this subject any consideration as to the desirability of our being represented in the over-seas traffic by ships flying the American flag and manned and officered by Americans. The question which has disturbed this country for 30 or 40 years has been how to bring about that result. When we look back a hundred years and find that we were then carrying in American bottoms 90 per cent of our over-seas traffic, that that had decreased one-half by the period of the Civil War, and that it has not increased at all since that time, we as a people, I think, should feel embarrassed and ashamed of the result of our legislation or of our enterprise.

Naturally we are a seafaring people. In the early days a large portion of the people of this country were engaged in seafaring pursuits. Many of the immigrants who had come to this country had come from those parts of the world which even now are active in everything pertaining to seafaring life, and yet we have not developed, but have constantly, in proportion to our foreign trade, decreased our merchant marine.

We pay for the transportation of the products of American soil more than $200,000,000 a year. That is one of the great items which enter into making up the balance of trade which stands against this country or which may stand in favor of this country at the end of the fiscal year. There has never been a year for a generation during which there would not have been a large balance of trade in favor of the United States if it had not been necessary for us to pay to foreign shipowners and foreign nations this very large amount of money which is required for the transportation of our products.

There seem to me, Mr. President, to be three possible ways of bringing about a rehabilitation of our merchant marine. I am not going to discuss them in detail, but simply to mention them. We might repeal everything pertaining to the navigation laws of this country. That would mean reducing the pay of seamen, reducing the cost of ships, and lessening every safeguard which we have placed about men engaged in seafaring pursuits. I very much doubt if there is any real sentiment in this country in favor of adopting such a course. Indeed, there is a bill now pending in conference which has to do with increasing the safeguards of not only those who are traveling at sea but increasing the insurance of every quality which surrounds those who follow the sea for a livelihood. If we are to adopt that bill, or anything like it, it will be little short of ridiculous for us to consider lowering the standard which we have already set as desirable to surround those who follow the sea.

I have before me an editorial taken from the Boston Herald, resulting from a letter written by a correspondent of that paper, asking what changes would be necessary if we were to lower the standard of seafaring life. An editorial was written by one of the best-posted men concerning nautical pursuits, and I am going to take the time to read it. The letter which was written to the Herald is as follows:

ONE GREAT QUESTION OF THE HOUR.

131 STATE STREET, January 12, 1915.

To the EDITOR OF THE HERALD:

I believe it would interest many of your readers if you would take occasion to inform us just what the burdens are, imposed by legislation, which prevent our having a merchant marine.

This information would be of assistance in forming one's conclusions as to the merits of the President's scheme for Government lines.

E. M. PARKER.

The reply is as follows:

Until August 24, 1912, no foreign-built ship could secure American registry, though owned by American citizens. It was earnestly contended by Mr. Wilson's political associates that the repeal of this provision and the adoption of a free-ship policy would bring a great fleet of foreign-built, American-owned vessels beneath the Stars and Stripes. Up to the outbreak of the European war, on August 1, 1914, it had not brought one. Then the free-ship policy, through an emergency act of August 18, 1914, was further broadened by relieving such foreign-built vessels from the requirement of carrying American officers and complying with our inspection and measurement laws. The war, of course, supplied a powerful motive for seeking the protection of a neutral flag, and since August 18 last no fewer than 111 foreign-built vessels, of an aggregate tonnage of 396,990, have applied for and received American registry for the purpose of engaging in the foreign trade. Nearly all of these ships were either British or German, and nearly all were owned and controlled by American capital before the war began.

President Wilson and his colleagues now urge that this result is altogether inadequate and disappointing; that a great many more foreign-built vessels must be secured to serve our commerce, and that as free ships have failed immediate resort must be had to the expedient of Government purchase, ownership, and operation.

It should be borne in mind that the navigation laws of the United States were revised and liberalized by the act of August 18, 1914, so far as foreign-built vessels are concerned. They do not have to carry American officers or crews—they can be manned throughout by foreigners; they do not have to meet the demands of our rigid inspection laws, and their foreign figures of measurement, on which tonnage dues and port charges are based, are accepted without question by our Government.

I want particularly to call attention in reading this statement—which I think is very accurate and illuminating—to the number of things which we have done in the last two or three years, commencing with the act of August 24, 1912, to relieve the situation, many of which, it was contended by those who had made some examination of the question, would be sufficient to bring about the development and building up of our own merchant marine:

The only legislative disadvantage to which these foreign-built vessels are subjected when they hoist our flag is that they have to provide the American food scale or its equivalent, but this is not of itself a heavy exaction, for there has been a marked advance in recent years in the food-scale requirements of foreign shipping laws.

In other words, under our present policy American merchants can acquire a foreign-built ship with its foreign officers and crew complete, and operate it, so far as laws are concerned, as cheaply as before, except for a little more variety and abundance in provisioning. But let us emphasize the phrase, "so far as laws are concerned"—for it has been found in practice that the British or German or Scandinavian officers on these foreign-built ships coming under American registry have immediately demanded and received the higher wages paid to American officers on ships of American construction. Presumably the entire crews will do, or are doing, the same. This involves, of course, a considerable increase in the cost of ship operation. It is, however, not an increase for which American laws are responsible in any way. There is no American law, as the Herald said the other day, that requires that British or German or Scandinavian immigrants coming into the shops and factories of Massachusetts should receive the same wages as American citizens, but as a matter of fact they usually do receive them.

These increased wages for foreign officers and crews would be demanded and paid on foreign-built ships purchased and owned by the Government, exactly as they are being demanded and paid on foreign-built ships owned by American merchants. Such increased wages and perhaps an increased cost, because of the greater variety and abundance of food, would undoubtedly make the maintenance of Government-owned vessels higher than that of similar vessels of foreign flags and foreign ownership. Moreover, some of these foreign vessels would receive subsidies, bounties, or similar favors from their Governments.

A Government-owned fleet under the American flag will be at precisely the same disadvantage as compared with cheap-wage, perhaps subsidized, foreign ships as a like private-owned fleet under the American flag. Indeed, the disadvantage will unquestionably be greater for a Government-owned fleet, because all human experience shows that the Government can not operate shipping or any business as economically or efficiently as a trained private management.

It has been the Republican plan to offset this disadvantage of the American flag, which is a matter of wages or of wages and foreign subsidies combined, by a frank, duly restricted, and accounted-for subsidy or subvention from the National Treasury. The President's plan would in effect secure the same subsidy in the guise of an appropriation to purchase and maintain a Government-owned fleet, which, according to the President, when securely established in trade is to be disposed of, a few years hence, to private shipowners.

Thus a subsidy or its equivalent is involved in either case. We think that the Republican plan is the better and the cheaper one. It is substantially what other Governments have done, and it is manifestly preferred by responsible men of business, who know whereof they speak.

Now, I want to put into the RECORD, Mr. President, the reasons which have been assigned many times by those who have discussed this question why we can not compete with foreign vessels. The first reason is that we are handicapped in the higher cost of labor, which is frequently 50 per cent higher than in other countries.

The second handicap is the higher cost of material, which is from 20 to 25 per cent higher. That, of course, is overcome by the purchase of foreign-built ships.

The third handicap is the cost of money, which is certainly from 1½ to 2 per cent higher in this country than elsewhere. If we are going into Government ownership and Government development, of course the money borrowed by the Government hereafter is going to cost nearer the commercial rate than has been the case in the past. The only reason why this Government and other Governments have been able to borrow cheaply was because their debt has been comparatively small; but as their debt increases, especially as it will in Europe resulting from the war, it may be depended upon that the European Governments will be paying substantially as high rates for money as are charged the best commercial industries, and if we are going into railroad construction in Alaska, if we are to undertake the running of steamship lines, and if we are going into other pursuits, where we shall have to indulge in large capital outlay, we will gradually see the rate for money borrowed by the Government increasing.

The fourth handicap is the higher cost of wages and salaries, running from 50 to 100 per cent. As I have just pointed out, the men who come over in foreign vessels which have been transferred to American registry, English, Norwegians, Swedes, and others, demand the same wage when they come under our flag which is demanded by our own citizens.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. PAGE. In the discussion last year with reference to the comparative cost of labor on foreign vessels and American vessels, I think Capt. Dollar, who is so largely interested in shipping on the Pacific coast, stated that the cost of American employees as compared with those on the Japanese lines was more than three to one in favor of the Japanese lines. Has the Senator any knowledge in regard to that?

Mr. WEEKS. I think that is substantially a correct statement. Although I have no figures before me, that is my impression.

The fifth handicap is the higher cost of fuel, it being about 25 per cent higher in this country than it averages abroad.

The sixth handicap is the higher cost of repairs—1 per cent higher per annum.

The seventh handicap is in the fixing of freight rates. When once an American freight rate is fixed, an American vessel can not change the rate under 30 days.

It should not be overlooked that the fixing of ocean rates is an entirely different matter from the fixing of rates in any other form of transportation. It is true that on the well-established passenger routes between this country and Europe the rates only vary with the seasons; but in all other cases rates are dependent on the amount of trade or traffic offering at the time. The tramp steamer comes into an Atlantic port with a cargo from some place in Europe. It finds a lack of offerings for transportation in any direction. It hears, possibly, of a demand for cargo-carrying ships in Rio. In order to get to Rio it will take anything that happens to be available at a greatly reduced price, in order to pay the expense of the run to Rio, rather than to go in ballast. At Rio it may find an overstocked market for the shipping offered, so that it will be able to pick up a very high rate. Coming around to the Pacific coast, it may go from one coast and one port to another, sometimes happening in a port at a time when there is great pressure for tonnage, and under such circumstances fixing a very high rate; at other times happening in a port where there is a great oversupply of tonage, under which circumstances the rate materially falls and becomes only nominal, to enable the ship to get to a point where rates may be better or where there may be less tonnage offered. So that the question of ocean rates can not be considered from the standpoint which obtains in the case of other rates.

There is to-day something like forty-six or forty-seven million tons of shipping on the high seas, of which about 7,000,000 tons is engaged in our own coastwise trade. It is well to call attention, I think, to the difference in the way we have treated our over-seas trade and our coastwise trade and the different results which have been obtained from that treatment. Ever since the organization of this Government we have made a monopoly of coastwise shipping. I know the views which some gentlemen have of that monopoly, based on a report which I think has not been carefully analyzed; but, in my judgment, the coastwise shipping of this country is effectively handled by the cargo carriers and the lines which are established, and the business is done at reasonable rates, very nearly always better equalized than are the rates for over-seas traffic. If anyone thinks that this trade is not being conducted under reasonable conditions—in other words, if he thinks it is more profitable than it should be—all he will have to do will be to go to the several owners of lines of steamers and he will find that in many cases under present conditions he can buy the steamers of those lines at very much less than it would cost to reproduce them, with such reductions as should be made on account of depreciation during the life of the steamers.

We have provided in the Panama Canal act that ships owned by railroads can not pass through the canal; and under the provisions of that act the Department of Justice has ordered the New Haven Railroad to sell the steamers which it has owned for many years, connected with the New England Navigation Co. and the Merchants & Miners' Line, which runs from Baltimore to the New England coast. Those steamers and others owned by the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, being for sale as a result of this order of the Department of Justice, can be bought in some cases at one-half what they cost the railroad. There is no bidder for them. The business is not profitable under present conditions. The statement of the Merchants & Miners' Line, which I have not before me, bears out the assertion I have just made as to that line, which has a well-established business which for many years was reasonably profitable, but which under the conditions which have developed in recent years is not now profitable. It owns a considerable number of very excellent ships, and if anybody thinks there is a mint in the coastwise traffic of this country there is an opportunity for him to test his belief by buying ships at very much less than their reproduction value less what should be charged off for depreciation and running them on a line which has been in operation for a great many years.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like to ask the Senator whether those ships are suited for the overseas business?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, generally speaking, I think they are not. I think none of the ships of the New England Navigation Co. are suited for over-seas traffic. While the vessels of the Merchants' & Miners' Line do go outside, and might be possibly, under some conditions, available for this service, they are not, in my judgment, ships well suited for overseas traffic. The result of our protective system, however, has been the development of 7,000,000 tons of coastwise shipping; and the result of our failure to protect our overseas shipping has been the decrease of that shipping from more than 2,000,000—nearly 3,000,000 tons 100 years ago—to less than 1,000,000 tons to-day.

Of course, there is something wrong with this system. There must be some way in which we can do our own carrying at sea. We provided in the act of March, 1891, for a mail subvention; and I want to call the attention of the Senators on the other side, who have resolved any number of times in their conventions against subsidies, to the fact that there is a mail subvention law, which is in effect a subsidy, now in operation, and if it were not in operation there would not be a single American ship on established lines engaged in overseas traffic on the Pacific Ocean, with the Caribbean ports on the northerly side of South America or from the Atlantic coast to Europe. I believe every American ship engaged in that trade on any established line is a beneficiary of the mail subvention act of 1891.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Sentor from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. POMERENE. A moment ago the Senator pointed out the disadvantages at which we were placed growing out of the difference in the cost of construction, of material, of wages, of interest charges on money, and so forth. I take it that in the judgment of the Senator those objections would apply to American shipping whether it was engaged in by the Government or by private enterprise?

Mr. WEEKS. Undoubtedly, except as to the rate of interest on money which it would cost the Government to undertake the business. The Government, of course, could borrow its money cheaper.

Mr. POMERENE. The Government could do that at a less rate, so that the advantage would be with the Government, as far as that is concerned?

Mr. WEEKS. The advantage would be with the Government.

Mr. POMERENE. Is it the Senator's opinion, then, that because of this handicap which American shipping must endure we should leave that field entirely to European capital?

Mr. WEEKS. Not at all. I shall point out during my remarks what I would do, though it is not my purpose to discuss the question of subsidies or matters relating to anything else than the present bill; but while the Government would have a benefit, as compared with the private owner, in the rate of money, it would have a serious handicap from almost any other standpoint, as I think I can show before I finish.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. WEEKS. I do, for a question.

Mr. OLIVER. I will ask the Senator this question: Conceding that the Government would have the advantage of being able to obtain money at a lower rate of interest for the purpose of running ships, would they not have the same advantage if they wanted to go into the manufacture of shoes or into the wholesale grocery business or any other business which heretofore has been left to the domain of private enterprise?

Mr. WEEKS. The Senator is quite right about the inference which may be drawn from his question. The Government will always have an advantage until the time comes, as I have suggested, when the Government indebtedness becomes so large in proportion to the indebtedness of the private borrower that the interest rates which money will cost either the private borrower or the Government will become very nearly equal.

As I have said, we may either remove these handicaps placed against us by our navigation laws, most of which have been removed, and the balance of which I doubt if there is any sentiment in favor of removing—I certainly am not in favor of it—or we may take one of two other courses. One alternative is to provide a mail subvention, as has been done in the act of March, 1891, to which I have referred. Such a measure has very nearly passed Congress two or three times. Once such a bill passed the Senate and came within two or three votes of passing the House of Representatives. In my judgment, if that bill had passed, it would have provided for a large number of ships coming under the provisions of the act, so that quite likely there would not be the demand which exists to-day to do something for our merchant marine under the emergency conditions which exist. Senators on the other side of the aisle must take very largely the responsibility for the condition which exists to-day. While it is true that they have not been in power, yet they have unitedly and unanimously, as far as I know, voted against every attempt to do anything for our shipping during all these years, when it has been perfectly apparent that it was losing, comparatively, year after year. As the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] suggests, they filibustered against legislation of that kind. I think I recall at least one instance since I have been in Congress when a filibuster was carried on for that reason.

The other method to pursue is some such course as is suggested in the pending legislation, which I think is unwise. I think it will be ineffective. I think it will start us on a policy which will mean more harm to this country than almost anything that we can do. It is a dangerous policy, in the first place. We are likely to develop conditions which will embarrass our relations with foreign countries. True, we do not know exactly what the results are going to be from any purchase which we may make. I think I once submitted to the Senate an instance that happened during the Civil War days which has a direct bearing on the possibilities which may come from this bill. An American ship was trading in the Indian Ocean region. The Alabama, commanded by Commodore Semmes, appeared in that vicinity. It was, of course, dangerous for the American ship to be flying the American flag, so she was transferred to British registry. As far as her papers were concerned, it was a bona fide transfer. Her name was changed from the Texas Star to a local name. She was loaded with a British cargo and sailed from the British port of Penang for the British port of Shanghai. On the way she fell in with the Alabama. A boarding officer was sent to the ship. He came back, reporting that the ship's papers were regular in every respect; that as far as her papers indicated she was a British ship, but there was every other indication that the ship was an American ship; that she had the lines of an American ship and the officers and men looked like Americans. Commodore Semmes sent a boat to the ship, took off the officers and the crew, and sank the ship without any more ado. Here was a ship in the British service, as far as her papers indicated, flying the British flag, sailing from one British port to another, and carrying a British cargo, yet she was sunk on the theory, I assume, that there was something about her transfer which was open to suspicion. The English Government never made a protest against that act.

What are we likely to come against under these conditions? Suppose we do buy a ship that is now under a belligerent flag, and a belligerent man-of-war follows Semmes's example, the results would be most serious. I do not know where the ships are that can be purchased to-day which do not belong to a belligerent. I am perfectly frank to say that there are some ships lying in ports of belligerents which might be purchased under the present circumstances, simply because the conditions as to manning those ships have changed on account of the war. For instance, there are some English ships in the ports of Great Britain which are not in use. The reason they are not in use is because they have not the men and the officers to man them. The volunteering for this war by British subjects for service at sea has been very much more general than for service on shore. I do not know why that is; but the fact remains that in one instance, for example, that one of the English railroads, which has a marine department, 60 per cent of the men in the marine department have volunteered for service in the British Navy, while less than 25 per cent in the other departments of the railroad have volunteered for service in the army.

The result is that there are not enough seafaring men left in Great Britain to man the ships which are in actual operation. I am told that the Atlantic liners are not completely manned, and in some cases that they have not more than two-thirds of a crew, because it is impossible to get the men to man them. That has resulted in the inability of the owners of many English ships to keep them in commission; and, undoubtedly, those ships are for sale; but exactly the same condition would obtain relating to them which obtains in the case of German ships which are interned in our own ports.

I should like to ask some one in charge of this bill—the question has been asked by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] several times in my presence—where the ships are that we are going to buy. It must be that some one has some ships in view which it is the intention to purchase if this bill passes, and I wish some one on the other side who is connected with the passage of this bill would tell the Senate and the country what are the ships and to what nation they belong that are to be purchased in case we adopt this legislation. It would make a vital difference in my vote whether we are to purchase the ships belonging to a belligerent or whether we are to purchase ships belonging to a neutral nation. I wish some one would answer that question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], in charge of the bill, is not here at present. He has information on the subject.

Mr. WEEKS. I simply yield for a question. I do not yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator does not ask to have the question answered now.

Mr. WEEKS. I hope during the debate some one on the other side who is responsible for this legislation will take occasion to tell the Senate and the country what ships are in contemplation for purchase under the provisions of this act.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I hope the Senator will keep the question open, to be answered at any time during the debate on this measure.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not wish to be taken from my feet, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. WEEKS. Now, I want to devote a little time to the question of subsidies, because we fail frequently in not taking advantage of the experience of other people. We even fail in our own personal affairs in not taking advantage of the experience of those about us. I recur once more to the question of subsidy to show how generally, not to say universally, the merchant marines of other nations have been built up as the result of the subsidy policies which they have adopted.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. CUMMINS. My question is this: The Senator from Massachusetts recited a few minutes ago a series of handicaps under which our ships labor. Suppose that we had our proportion of the world's ships—that is to say, the same proportion of ships that we have of the world's business—how much annually would be required to be given to our ships in order to overcome the handicaps which were mentioned by the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I can not answer that question in definite terms. The appropriation which is provided in this bill would furnish an amount of shipping which would be almost negligible compared to the total shipping engaged in the commerce of the world. As I have suggested, there are some 47,000,000 tons. The lowest price at which any kind of a reasonably well-built steel or iron ship could be purchased or built would be at least $50 a ton. It is therefore easy enough to figure out how much tonnage could be obtained for $30,000,000, if we were to spend the entire amount which this bill provides shall be invested in shipping. But there are many other things which must be taken into consideration, and which will cost more or less money if we are going to establish ship lines.

One of the most important is providing the lines of steamers with wharf privileges. I do not know, there may be wharves in New York, in the down-town business district, which are available for lease under present conditions, but the last time I made any inquiry about it there was no wharf on the East or the North Rivers which could be engaged near the wholesale district of New York.

One of the benefits which the New Haven Railroad has had in its handling of the traffic between New England and New York is in being able to transfer its freight from rail to steamers and landing the goods down town in New York instead of landing them at the freight yards north of the Harlem River. The profits which the railroad has made in this class of transportation would probably have been more than exhausted in the cost of transferring them from the Harlem River freight yards to the down-town district where they were destined.

This question of wharves is so important that I have heard shipping men say that they believed certain transportation lines might be made valuable and profitable if the lines owned, or controlled by long lease, their wharves at both ends, and that they would not think of investing their money in such a line unless the company did own or control its wharves at both terminals.

I am now going to refer briefly to what other nations have done in the way of paying subsidies:

For the year 1910 Austria and Hungary paid in subsidies for the use of the Suez Canal alone $472,500, and until the year 1907 those countries had paid for East African service an additional bounty varying in amount, but which did not in any one year exceed $300,000.

In 1911 France spent $6,670,000 for bounties for construction and navigation purposes alone and $5,533,000 for mail subvention alone, a total of more than $12,000,000. Of the mail subvention payment $2,220,000 was paid to lines using the Suez Canal, the purpose being to put them on all fours with English lines not having to pay the canal tolls.

Germany paid, in the year 1912, $1,750,000 to the German East African lines and the North German Lloyd for postal service through the Suez Canal. In addition, the German East African lines received an indirect bounty of largely reduced rates furnished by the German railroad companies on goods exported from inland States of Germany to East Africa.

I ought to say that the whole system of the development of the German railroads and German transportation lines has been based on making rates favorable to their steamship lines. More than two-thirds of all the rates on the Prussian railroads, for example, ten-elevenths of which are owned and operated by the Government, are special rates made for the purpose of developing some locality or some business or some other trade than that of the railroad itself. If a coal mine, for instance, is developed in east Prussia, and there is a necessity for that coal in central Germany, the rate is made very materially lower than it would be from some other point in order to develop the mine. If, for example, there is a possibility of that being——

Mr. POMERENE. All of which means in order to show favoritism to that one particular locality as against some other locality in the country.

Mr. WEEKS. That is the result. That is the system.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator would not contend for one minute that the public here in the United States would ever indorse a method of that kind.

Mr. WEEKS. Oh, no; I do not think it would. I do not think we could do it under the political conditions of this country. I think it would be hopeless.

Mr. POMERENE. It is to be hoped so.

Mr. WEEKS. It would be a hopeless thing to undertake. Yet that is the basis of the German system, and I am pointing it out to show that while the direct subsidies made to German steamship lines have not been as great as in some other countries, they have received benefits indirectly from the Government operation of railroads which would be very much greater than the direct subsidy which is paid by other countries.

Mr. STONE. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield for a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business, retaining the floor?

Mr. WEEKS. With the understanding that I retain the floor. I presume the Senator means to-morrow morning after the recess. With that understanding I will yield.

Mr. STONE. As the Senator yields for that purpose, with the right and without prejudice to resume the floor to-morrow morning——

Mr. SMOOT. He would have it anyhow.

Mr. STONE. I think he would have it anyhow.

Mr. SMOOT. After either an adjournment or a recess.

Mr. STONE. It would be the same thing if it was an adjournment or a recess.

Mr. WEEKS. I yield under the circumstances.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to ask unanimous consent to introduce some amendments to the river and harbor bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). Is there objection?

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent to offer amendments and have them printed. Is there objection?

Mr. OLIVER. I object.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the amendments can not be received.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

Mr. OLIVER. If the Senator from Indiana will allow me, I will state that I base my objection upon the idea that such business ought to be transacted in the morning hour.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate take a recess at not later than 7 o'clock until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana moves that at not later than 7 o'clock the Senate shall take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to amend by making it 6.30. It would accommodate certain Senators who have made engagements.

Mr. KERN. The only purpose is to transact some business in executive session.

Mr. GALLINGER. And the recess will be taken when we get through?

Mr. KERN. Yes; after half an hour or so.

Mr. BRISTOW. The nomination of Mr. Hall can not be disposed of within that short time, and if it is the purpose to take that up, of course it would be useless to stay here until 7 o'clock. If the purpose is to transact ordinary business, I do not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will, not later than 7 o'clock, take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

PAN-AMERICAN CONVENTION.

Mr. STONE. Before moving to go into executive session I desire to report a resolution from the Committee on Foreign Relations.

From the Committee on Foreign Relations I submit a report (No. 920), accompanied by a joint resolution authorizing the President of the United States to extend invitations to Central and South American Governments to be represented at a conference looking to the improvement of the financial relations between the United States and these nations. I ask that the report be received, and that for further consideration the joint resolution and the report be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 228) authorizing the President of the United States to extend invitations to Central and South American Governments to be represented at a conference looking to the improvement of the financial relations between the United States and these nations was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri asks that the joint resolution and the report be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. That order will be made, without objection.

Mr. OLIVER. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. STONE subsequently asked that the joint resolution lie on the table, and it was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SHIVELY. I ask unanimous consent to submit a report from the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent to submit a report from the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. OLIVER. Is it a pension bill?

Mr. SHIVELY. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not feel that I can object to a report upon such a bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I am a member of the Committee on Pensions, and as long as objection has been made to the reception of other business I object to this report being received.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, as we are having a filibuster against pensions and everything else, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate (at 6 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m., Wednesday, January 20, 1915) took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, January 21, 1915, at 11 o'clock a. m.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate January 20 (legislative day of January 15), 1915.

COMMISSIONER FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Louis Brownlow, of the District of Columbia, to be a Commissioner for the District of Columbia for a term of three years, vice Frederick L. Siddons, resigned.

UNITED STATES ATTORNEY.

Edwin S. Wertz, of Wooster, Ohio, to be United States attorney for the northern district of Ohio, vice Ulysses G. Denman, resigned, effective March 1, 1915.

PROMOTIONS IN THE REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE.

Second Lieut. Frank Lynn Austin to be first lieutenant in the Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States, to rank as such from September 13, 1914, in place of First Lieut. Leonard Taylor Cutter, retired.

Third Lieut. Wilmer Hake Eberly to be second lieutenant in the Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States, to rank as such from September 13, 1914, in place of Second Lieut. Frank Lynn Austin, promoted.

Third Lieut. Russell Lord Lucas to be second lieutenant in the Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States, to rank as such from September 19, 1914, in place of Second Lieut. Howard Eugene Rideout, promoted.

Second Lieut. Howard Eugene Rideout to be first lieutenant in the Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States, to rank as such from September 19, 1914, in place of First Lieut. William Edwin At Lee, deceased.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate January 20 (legislative day of January 15), 1915.

REGISTER OF THE LAND OFFICE.

Dallas C. Weyand to be register of the land office at Glenwood Springs, Colo.

REAPPOINTMENT IN THE ARMY.

JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT.

Brig. Gen. Enoch H. Crowder to be Judge Advocate General with the rank of brigadier general.

APPOINTMENT IN THE ARMY.

CHAPLAIN.

Rev. Adolf John Schliesser to be chaplain with the rank of first lieutenant.

POSTMASTERS.

ILLINOIS.

Harold M. Oakford, Walnut.

KANSAS.

W. L. D. Hagan, Newton.
John A. Lindahl, Enterprise.

KENTUCKY.

William P. Kirtley, Horse Cave.

MICHIGAN.

John D. Burgess, West Branch.
William Grant Howard, Marion.

NEW JERSEY.

Robert L. De Camp, Westfield.

OHIO.

Frederick M. Bushnell, Mansfield.
Mrs. Mary K. Long, Medina.
James E. Sullivan, Lima.

PENNSYLVANIA.

David V. Hays, Burgettstown.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 20, 1915.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, as the shadows lengthen and we feel the touch of time, we are altogether reassured that Thy providence has shaped and guided our lives and brought us in thought and deed closer to Thee in the broader, truer faith, in the brighter, clearer hope, in the stronger ties of love for Thee and our fellow men. Continue thus, we pray Thee, to lead us "Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ," and all praise be Thine forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, in order to expedite the passage of the Army appropriation bill, which is in his charge, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

S. W. LANGHORNE AND H. S. HOWELL.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk to be read by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 706.

Resolved, That the Senate be requested to furnish the House of Representatives a duplicate copy of the bill (S. 2334) for the relief of S. W. Langhorne and the legal representatives of H. S. Howell, the same having been lost or destroyed since its reference to the Committee on Claims of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, does that provide for a duplicate engrossed copy?

The SPEAKER. If it does not, it ought to. Without objection, the word "engrossed" will be inserted in the resolution before the word "copy."

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD certain facts and figures on the food question, furnished by the Department of Agriculture to Chairman LEVER, of the Committee on Agriculture, in response to a resolution offered by me on January 9.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing certain statements and facts and notes submitted by the Department of Agriculture to Mr. Chairman LEVER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the necessity of an appropriation for the improvement of the Flint River, Ga.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PARK] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the necessity of an appropriation for the improvement of the Flint River, Ga. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Speaker, I rose yesterday to a question of personal privilege. There was some objection yesterday on account of the time it would take up. Now I wish to ask this morning, in order to avoid all questions on personal privilege, unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD, inserting therein the letter of the party which I presented to the Speaker yesterday, my answer to that letter, the resolution upon which that letter was practically based, and that I may discuss in connection therewith the system that is involved in the resolution pending before the House, which I introduced, known as resolution 696, I think, and that I may have now 5 or 10 minutes in which to explain what the line of my discussion will be.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LINDBERGH] asks unanimous consent——

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. Wait until the Speaker states it. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LINDBERGH] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the letter to which he referred yesterday, and his answer to it, and the resolution which he offered, which seems to be the basis of the letter of which he complains, and also that he have now 5 or 10 minutes in which to indicate the line of his extended remarks.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have no objection, Mr. Speaker, to the gentleman's printing, nor have I any objection to his speaking, except at this particular time. There is a gentleman here who has to take the 1 o'clock train for New York, and I would like for him to make a few remarks before 1 o'clock, when we get into Committee of the Whole, and I will have no objection to the gentleman speaking in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I stated the other day—and I might as well state it again—that I do not want to play any favorites, and I do not want to interfere with the personal desires of Members of the House, except where their desires interfere with public business.

Now, when a Member rises to a matter that is personal to him I feel that he is entitled to a reasonable time, if it is a question of personal privilege, or of that nature, and I would not object. The question involved here is not a question of personal privilege; it is a question of disagreement about legislation; and I think at this late time in the session we can not afford to have a discussion by unanimous consent when we have so much important business to attend to. I have told gentlemen on this side of the House that if they made a request of that kind I should have to object to it, and I shall have to object to such requests on the other side of the House. When we go into Committee of the Whole, when we have something before the House, I shall not raise any captious objection; but if we make an exception in one case we will have to make it in another. I hope the gentleman will not press his request to speak at this time.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Since objection has been made, I do not wish to be technical. I will ask if I can not have some time later in the day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from Georgia is in charge of the bill, and I have no doubt that he will grant the gentleman time.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Will the gentleman from Georgia give me some time?

Mr. ADAMSON. I have no objection to the gentleman's taking some time.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to print in the RECORD my remarks as stated.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as stated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent that I may print in the RECORD a letter that I had occasion to write to Henry B. Joy in connection with the same matter referred to by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LINDBERGH].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter that he wrote to Henry B. Joy about the same matter that the gentleman from Minnesota refers to. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE. Reserving the right to object, I would inquire if this is a letter from Mr. Joy to the gentleman from Virginia or a letter from Mr. GLASS to Mr. Joy?

Mr. GLASS. It is a letter I wrote to Mr. Joy in response to a letter which Joy wrote to Mr. Delano, of the Federal Reserve Board, a copy of which was sent to every Member of the House and Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if Mr. Joy's letter will also be printed.

Mr. GLASS. If the gentleman cares to have it printed. I do not ask for it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Would it not be better to have Mr. Joy's letter printed with the others? I do not ask for it.

Mr. GLASS. I think so, and then perhaps my reply would be more intelligible.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. It is suggested that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LINDBERGH] proposes to print Mr. Joy's letter, and there is no necessity of its being printed twice.

Mr. GLASS. I do not care who prints Mr. Joy's letter, but I hope it will be printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LINDBERGH] asked in his request to print the Joy letter. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the river and harbor bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the river and harbor bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the river and harbor bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

TO CREATE THE COAST GUARD.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk called the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce I call up the bill S. 2337, an act to create the coast guard by combining therein the existing Life-Saving Service and Revenue-Cutter Service.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, if it is in order in the operation of the automatic rule I want to ask unanimous consent to agree upon some time for general debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is in order.

Mr. ADAMSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota if we can agree on a time.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I have had no application for time, but I think it would be wise to reserve some time. I would suggest 30 minutes on a side.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does not the gentleman think that under the five-minute rule it would be more satisfactory than to have it in general debate?

Mr. MANN. I want a little time on it, and I shall object to any agreement as to time at present.

The SPEAKER. The House will resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. RAKER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 2337. An act to create the coast guard by combining therein the existing Life-Saving Service and Revenue-Cutter Service.

Mr. ADAMSON. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the bill ought to be read; it is a short bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] is to take the train at 1 o'clock. If the bill is to be read, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to him now and have the bill read later.

Mr. STAFFORD. If that is the case, Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to dispensing with the first reading of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I thank the chairman of the committee and the gentleman from Wisconsin for the courtesy. I desire to express to the House in the very few moments at my disposal my sincere and deep conviction that this is one of the most timely pieces of legislation that we have been or will be called upon to enact at this session of Congress. It contemplates a reorganization in a sense of the Coast-Guard service and the Life-Saving Service, combining them into one department, giving them a legitimate standing and a proper protection in their services. I will not at this time say anything respecting the Coast-Guard service. I appeal now at this time particularly in behalf of the Life-Saving Service. The storms which blow over the deep waters of the sea and the Lakes put constantly in jeopardy the property and lives of the people of the United States. The men who in those times of stress when the storm is on the deep and death is in the air serve their fellow men and their country belong to the Life-Saving Service. I have seen men of this service time out of mind go literally down into the jaws of death that they might save a sailor, that they might save a passenger, that they might aid a vessel in distress. I recall distinctly on one occasion when a boat was wrecked at the western extremity of Lake Superior I saw a life-saving crew rescue 25 men, every one of whom had his life hanging in the balance. After four hours of work in that storm and cold I saw them move to another boat in distress and perform deeds of heroism that put almost into insignificance the heroic deeds now being done on the battle fields in another arena, and yet I found upon inquiry that those men, called upon for this hazardous service were only given employment for a few months in the year and at a very low salary, and that through the remaining months—three or four—they were obliged to find a livelihood any way they could, and many of them had great difficulty in doing so.

It seems to me that this service, important as it is, justifies it should receive a recognition at the hands of our Government; that these men should be given steady employment; that these men should be given opportunity after 30 years' service to retire the same as is given now to members of the Coast Guard Service. What would anybody think, Mr. Chairman, if we had firemen employed on a pay roll of our cities only during certain seasons of the year and let them scatter abroad to earn a livelihood in other ways, trusting when the winter season comes we can reorganize them again; and therein lies the necessity of this legislation. While many of them do come back, a great many of them do not, and therefore it is impossible to keep the organization, the drill, and efficiency up to that high point to which it should be kept when you are continually dissipating the system by which your organization is composed. Now, I recognize it will be replied that in some portions of our country, where they do not have a cold winter season, men are employed in the Life-Saving Service the year around, and that is true, but that does not apply to the Great Lakes, one of the most important of all the maritime parts of the Nation. And so, in behalf of scores of life-saving organizations of the Great Lakes, I ask you to pass this bill. And may I say one thing further before my time expires? While it may be we differ or could differ a little respecting some of the details of the bill, yet it seems to me that the bill has been worked out with the utmost care, and it is the evolution of experience——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does the gentleman desire more time?

Mr. MILLER. One minute.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield another minute or two to the gentleman, if he desires it.

Mr. MILLER. It is the evolution of experience, of the experience of the service, of the experience of the officials, of the experience of the great public-spirited people who are interested in these heroes who are doing this work, and it seems to me we can better afford to pass this bill without substantial amendment than to amend it at all. We know what some of the results are of serious amendments at this time of the session, and I sincerely trust it will be the good judgment of this committee to recommend that this bill, substantially in its present form, shall pass the House, and that the life-saving men who are performing this extremely meritorious service at least will be given the dignity—at least will be given the position in the governmental service to which they are entitled. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman to whom I wish to yield is not in at this time. There are so many gentlemen who desire time to discuss the bill, it has so many friends, I wish to be as liberal as possible, although I do not care to consume much time myself, and in order that I may be able to do that I will ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a statement which has been prepared setting forth the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The statement is as follows:

THE COAST GUARD BILL AT A GLANCE.

EXISTING CONDITIONS SOUGHT TO BE REMEDIED.

"1. Owing to insufficient pay and lack of a retired list practically one-third of the life-saving stations are now either undermanned or manned with inefficient men.

"2. An average of 11 men a year die in the service from disease or exposure incident to the hazardous duties.

"3. In addition an average of 29 men are discharged annually before the expiration of their enlistments on account of physical unfitness developed as incident to exposure and their hazardous duties.

"4. The Revenue-Cutter Service and the Life-Saving Service, both devoted in the main to the saving of life and property from the ravages of the sea, are now operated as distinct organizations, although formerly administered by one executive head.

WHAT THE COAST GUARD BILL CONTEMPLATES.

"1. Great increase in the efficiency of the Life-Saving Service by—

"(a) Combining both services under one executive head.

"(b) Providing a retired list for the men on account of age or after 30 years' service.

"(c) Giving the men of the Life-Saving Service longevity pay for reenlistments.

"(d) Giving the men of the Life-Saving Service clothing allowance and medical attention from the Public Health Service.

"(e) In lieu of a pension list for the dependents of those who lost their lives in the service, a sum of money equivalent to two years' pay is given. This is much more economical for the Government than a pension.

"2. It creates a naval reserve of about 4,100 trained and highly efficient officers and men ready at a moment's notice to operate under the Navy Department whenever the President directs.

"3. The coast guard constitutes a naval reserve without any additional cost to the Government as such, as the saving of life and property at all times is worth much more to the people than its cost of maintenance.

"4. It places on the retired list at three-quarters pay Sumner I. Kimball, now 80 years of age, the man who founded the life-saving system and who has devoted the best years of his life to its upbuilding. A fitting tribute to one the effects of whose humanitarian efforts will last for ages.

WHAT THE COAST GUARD BILL DOES NOT DO.

"1. It does not create nor inaugurate in any manner a civil retired list, as this bill especially provides that the coast guard shall be distinctly a branch of the military forces of the Government.

"2. It does not in any way increase the number of employees of the Government.

"3. It raises no basic salaries. All increases in pay are due to length of service only.

"4. It does not increase the pay or allowances of any commissioned officer of the Revenue-Cutter Service.

WHAT IT WILL COST.

"All the advantages of this bill, both to the Government and to the men, will be brought about at a maximum total increased cost of but $400,000 per annum, which is less than 8 per cent of the present annual cost for the entire maintenance and operation of the two existing services.

ADDITIONAL COST DURING FIRST YEAR UNDER COAST GUARD.

Life-Saving Service:
Retirements for age (77)	$67,095.00
Retirements, 30 years' service (42)	34,545.00
Longevity pay increase, all grades	263,500.00
		$365,140.00
Revenue-Cutter Service:
Retirements for age (10)	9,570.60
Retirements, 30 years' service (7)	10,851.00
Retirements for disability (7)	6,241.32
Longevity increase	7,557.98
		34,220.90
Total		399,360.90

Number to be retired during first year under the coast guard.

LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

Grade.	Number 64 years and over.	Number served 30 years and over.	Retired pay per annum.	Total cost first year.
Superintendents	4	.....	$2,310	$9,240
Keepers	32	20	1,050	54,600
Keepers houses of refuge	1	.....	630	630
No. 1 surfmen	7	7	735	10,290
Other surfmen	33	15	560	26,880
Total	77	42	.....	101,640

REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE.

Grade.	Number 64 years and over.	Number served 30 years and over.	Number now disabled.	Total cost first year.
Commissioned officers	.....	2	.....	$6,000.00
Warrant officers	5	5	6	17,023.32
Enlisted men	5	.....	1	3,639.60
Total	10	7	7	26,662.92

Total, Life-Saving Service 119
Total, Revenue-Cutter Service 24

MEMORANDUM IN REGARD TO COAST GUARD BILL.

THIRTY-YEAR RETIREMENT CLAUSE.

"One of the provisions of the pending bill is that—

"A commissioned officer, warrant officer, or enlisted man who has served 30 years may, upon suitable application, be placed on waiting orders and receive 75 per cent of the pay of his grade or rating.

"Existing law provides this 30-year retiring feature for all military branches of the Government service. It should also apply to the coast guard, which also is to be a military branch of the public service.

"The reason for its enactment for the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps was to retire certain members of the personnel of those arms of the public defense who before reaching the statutory age for retirement, and through no fault of their own, and because of the nature of their duties, do not possess the physical vigor so necessary for the efficient performance of their duties in the supreme moment of war, when success in battle ofttimes depends upon the highest state of mental and physical ability of every unit in the personnel of the Nation's defenders.

"While this reasoning will apply to all members of the coast guard in times of war, it applies with much greater force in times of peace, when 'supreme moments' of physical and mental endurance are likely to be met with at any time in the performance of the day's work of these guardians of life and property.

"After 30 years of service in the coast guard, with its frequent calls for maximum efforts in the most strenuous duties known to mankind, it must follow that some few of its personnel will, because of that service, lose that state of mental and physical alertness and agility which will unfit them for maximum efficiency in the active performance of their duties.

"It must be borne in mind that the 30-year retirement herein proposed is not a question of voluntary withdrawing from the service, as it will be entirely discretionary with the department, and naturally will only be resorted to when it is necessary to maintain the efficiency of the coast guard, without discharging its members because the service they have rendered has caused their physical deterioration.

"Furthermore, this bill provides that officers and men thus retired may be retained in service for the performance of such duties of a less active character as they may be physically able to perform.

REASONS FOR GRANTING TWO YEARS' PAY TO WIDOWS OR DEPENDENTS OF COAST GUARDSMEN WHO DIE IN SERVICE.

"Congress has made no provision for a pension to widows or dependents of the officers and enlisted men in the coast guard. Provision is now made for the application of the pension laws to widows and dependents of the officers and men of both the Army and Navy who die from disease or injury incident to service.

"In addition to this pension, provision is now made to pay to the widow or other dependent of officers and men of the Army and Navy a sum of money equal to six months' full pay of the deceased.

"It is more economical for the Government to provide for the dependents of the coast guardsman in the manner presented in the pending bill than the gratuity and pension system combined, as now exists for the Army and Navy.

"Thus, to quote a finite instance, suppose a surfman getting a salary of $60 per month should be drowned. Under the system proposed in this bill his widow would be paid the sum of $1,440 and all the Government's obligations would be discharged at once. Under the Army and Navy system she would be given the sum of $360 in cash and placed on the pension roll at $12 a month, or $144 per year. The difference between the cash payments under the two systems is $1,080. A payment of pension at the above rate would amount to $1,008 in seven years. All records will show that the average length of time widows draw pensions from the Government after the decease of their husbands is greatly in excess of that period.

VALUE OF THE LIFE-SAVING SERVICE AS A NAVAL AUXILIARY IN WAR.

"During the Spanish-American War Congress found it necessary to pass a special act (reported by Congressman MANN, of Illinois) on June 7, 1898, to keep the life-saving stations upon the Atlantic and Gulf coasts open throughout the months of June and July for the purpose of forming a part of the Coast Signal Service. This was done at the request of the Secretary of the Navy and with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

"The entire resources of the Life-Saving Service on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, including 1,443 men, were at once transferred to the Coast Signal Service, under the direct supervision of Capt. John R. Bartlett, United States Navy.

"That officer, in making his official report to the Navy Department at the close of the war, made the following statements concerning the value of the Life-Saving Service as a military adjunct:

"The necessity of covering the long stretch of coast between these isolated stations was at once apparent, and the value of the Life-Saving Service became self-evident. These crews constantly patrol the beaches from Maine to Texas, and no vessel can approach within sight of the coast and escape their attention.

"The result of my experience leads me to believe that the Coast Signal Service should be an integral part of a naval coast-defense system, as it is most intimately connected with it, and should be in closer relation than that of an allied branch. * * *

"Another valuable result of the experiment has been to demonstrate the great usefulness of the life-saving stations for the purposes of observation and international code signaling. * * *

"In concluding his report he made a number of finite recommendations to the Secretary of the Navy, the first one of which follows:

"That each life-saving station should be made a coast signal station, for the reason that they are all connected with each other by telephone, and their system of the patrol of the beach places almost the entire coast line under constant observation. Moreover, the men in this service are trained to see everything that floats within the range of vision, are trustworthy and well disciplined, and are already excellent signalmen with the international code.

THE COAST GUARD AND NATIONAL DEFENSE.

"While the question of national defense now more than ever before is brought into prominence, it is well to consider the advantages of the coast guard from a strictly military standpoint.

"The added efficiency which will be given to the Life-Saving Service under the terms of this bill will make available in the coast guard, for immediate service in connection with the defense of our seacoasts a corps of approximately 4,100 trained officers and men, all in the best physical condition and all accustomed to life on the seas. The very nature of their emergent duties in peace times will make them quick of action, resourceful, and disciplined, all of which, it must be admitted, are absolutely essential to success in modern sea fighting.

"Aside from the fact that the coast guard will be worth more to the country by its saving of the lives and property of its citizens than it actually costs, its value as a part of any scheme for the national defense can not be overestimated. Simply by a stroke of the pen the President can transfer this highly efficient corps of men, armed, trained, and disciplined, into the regular Naval Establishment at any time, whether in peace or in war. In strictly warlike pursuits it can not be denied that they will be the equal of any similar number of men in the regular Naval Establishment. This asset of military preparedness must therefore not be overlooked when appraising the value of the coast guard to the Government.

CASUALTIES IN THE LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

"Since the organization of the Life-Saving Service up to January 1, 1914, there have been 320 deaths directly incident to the exposure and hazards of duty along the coasts. In the past decade there has been an average of 11.7 deaths each year. The causes of these losses are principally drowning and pulmonary diseases incident to exposure in the lifeboats or from patroling the beaches in severe weather. There have been three deaths due to lightning striking the surfmen while out on patrol on desolate beaches, they being the only objects in the vicinity projecting above the level of the beach.

"The average given is not representative of the actual losses of life incident to exposure, as the men in the Life-Saving Service are enlisted every year, and at each reenlistment they are examined and must be found physically sound or else they are rejected. Hence there are many instances where surfmen have contracted diseases on account of exposure while in the service, have been rejected when applying for reenlistment, and have died subsequently. Such cases have not, of course, been included in the list of deaths.

"By far the most regrettable procedure incident to the existing conditions in the Life-Saving Service is the fact that during the past 10 years it has been found necessary to discharge an average of 29 of the enlisted men of the service before the expiration of their term of enlistment on account of physical disability incurred in line of duty.

"It is on account of such severe conditions as the above that it is impossible to obtain and keep efficient men to man the various stations.

COMPARISON OF THE UNITED STATES LIFE-SAVING SERVICE WITH THE COAST GUARD AND ROYAL NATIONAL LIFEBOAT INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN.

"In Great Britain there is a coast guard maintained by the Government. On June 30, 1913, there were, in addition to the coast guard but connected with it, 399 life-saving companies, numbering in all 4,529 volunteers and 5 brigades, with a total membership of 346. The coast guard and these companies all engage in life-saving operations, not in boats, but with the rocket and breeches-buoy apparatus.

"In addition to the coast guard there is the Royal National Lifeboat Institution of Great Britain. This is purely a volunteer organization authorized to accept donations from the public. All throughout Great Britain, in railroad stations and other public places, will be found miniature metal lifeboats, each with a sign thereon soliciting subscriptions for the life-savers, which gives the institution somewhat of an eleemosynary character.

"As to the relative value of the paid Life-Saving Service of the United States and the volunteer organizations of Great Britain, the following results for the year 1913 will bear evidence:

Description.	Number of stations.	Number of persons rescued.	Number of persons rescued per station.
Royal National Life-Boat Institution of Great Britain	273	574
Coast guard	399	250
Total	672	824	1.33
United States Life-Saving Service	285	4,202	14.78

"From 1874 to 1880 the United States tried to carry on its Life-Saving Service on the volunteer system, giving each man $10 for his services on each occasion when they were required. The results were so unsatisfactory that in 1880 Congress found it necessary to authorize the employment of regular crews.

"The late Admiral Ward, of the British Navy, one-time chief lifeboat inspector of Great Britain, once made the following statements after investigating the United States Life-Saving Service:

"The Lifeboat Service in the United States has an advantage over our own, in that the men being permanently employed during the open seasons are accustomed to act together, and are more frequently afloat, both for practice and on service, than at the greater number of our own lifeboat stations, where the boats are manned by volunteers from the local boatmen, and are only employed on the occasions when their services are required.

"It should also be mentioned that at the life-saving stations (in the United States) bedding and clothing for shipwrecked persons are kept in readiness in case of being required, and also medicine chests, restoratives, and all necessary appliances for restoration of the apparently drowned, exhausted, or frostbitten amongst wrecked persons, whence it will be apparent this invaluable public service fulfills the functions undertaken severally in this country (Great Britain) by the board of trade, the National Lifeboat Institution, and the shipwrecked mariner's and humane societies, and apparently in the most efficient manner.

"The report of the International Life-Saving Congress, held at Toulon, France, in 1890, after reviewing the methods and equipment of the several life-saving institutions in existence, pronounced that of the United States the best and most complete.

"In conclusion, it is very apparent that a volunteer service in this country is wholly impracticable. In Great Britain, with its comparatively dense population along the coasts, it is comparatively easy to summon a volunteer crew to go to wrecks on almost any part of its coast line. In the United States, however, the most dangerous parts of its coast are usually at very remote places, far from human habitation of any kind, so that it would be absolutely impossible to get volunteers for this humane work of rescue.

SERVICE OF THE LIFE-SAVERS ON INTERIOR WATERS.

"The benefits of the coast guard will not be confined to the coasts of the Atlantic, Pacific, Gulf, and Great Lakes.

"At all times when practicable the life-savers have been sent to interior waters whenever great floods have worked havoc with lives and property along the banks of our great rivers. Within only the past 18 months two notable examples of these beneficial effects have arisen.

"The great floods which inundated the Ohio Valley during the months of March and April, 1913, are fresh in the memories of all. The whole country was horror-stricken at the appalling results of the raging waters in portions of West Virginia, Kentucky, Illinois, Missouri, and Tennessee. The calls for help did not go unheeded by the United States Life-Saving Service. Seven crews were immediately dispatched to the scenes of distress, and other crews were held in readiness for immediate response in case the conditions grew worse.

"In spite of almost insurmountable difficulties of transportation the crews arrived at the localities where their services were most badly needed, and immediate steps were taken to relieve suffering humanity. People were taken from housetops to places of safety, food and clothing were distributed to those in need, and in every conceivable way within the limit of their resources assistance was rendered to the stricken people. One of the many notable incidents was the rescuing of all the occupants of an orphan asylum at Fort Wayne, Ind., under most trying circumstances without a single mishap.

"The net result of the efforts of the seven life-saving crews during this particular flood was the rescuing and succoring of 3,509 persons and the saving of property valued at $30,000, which otherwise would have been lost.

FLOODS IN TEXAS.

"In the early part of December, 1913, the overflowing of the Brazos and Colorado Rivers in the south central part of Texas almost entirely inundated several counties. At once three life-saving crews and the revenue-cutter Windom were sent to the flooded districts. Many of the unfortunate inhabitants were in a starving condition and in danger of being drowned. After many hazardous experiences quantities of food and clothing were distributed to the beleaguered people, and many of them were rescued and taken to places of safety. In all, 803 persons were either saved from drowning or given succor.

"Many commendatory letters from prominent citizens and relief committees were received, testifying to the very valuable assistance rendered by these coast life-savers. The Galveston central relief committee, through its chairman, wrote the Secretary of the Treasury that 'their work was performed under the greatest difficulties and, we are very glad, indeed, to add, cheerfully and willingly.'

EQUIPMENT AND RESULTS.

"As at present constituted, the combined Revenue-Cutter and Life-Saving Services, when merged into the coast guard, will embrace the following:

Number of ships:
Seagoing	25
Harbor tugs and launches	19
Total	44
Number of coast guard stations	279
Total authorized personnel, including commissioned officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men	4,093

RESULTS.

"As indicative of the work which will be performed by the coast guard, the following results of the operations of the two services when acting independently during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, may be taken to show the great importance of the proposed coast guard to the public:

Number of persons actually rescued from peril	5,238
Number of vessels to which assistance was rendered	2,147
Number of persons on board vessels assisted	10,983
Derelicts or obstructions to navigation destroyed or removed	31
Value of vessels assisted, including cargoes	$24,386,191
Cost of maintenance and operation for year 1914	4,781,949

"It will thus be seen that for the expenditure of each dollar for the coast guard there can be expected a conservation of not less than $5.09 worth of property of the public from the perils of the sea.

"With the added efficiency which will undoubtedly follow the passage of this act, even greater returns than this can reasonably be expected, and this without taking into consideration the humanitarian feature of the thousands of lives saved every year."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, there are two humane activities of the Government which are conspicuous in their lines of duty. One is the Life-Saving Service, the other the Revenue-Cutter Service. The Life-Saving Service, as authorized by law, saves life and property from the land side, while the Revenue-Cutter Service is devoted to the saving of life and property upon the seas. The purpose of this bill is to unite these two activities or organizations, both of which are under the Treasury Department, into one organization to be known as the coast guard. There are at least two reasons which I might name which not only justifies but emphasizes the necessity of the coordination and organization of these two services into one. In the first place it is proper because their duties are consistent. The Revenue-Cutter Service was organized in 1790, and was the first legally organized arm of defense of the Federal Government. The Life-Saving Service grew out of the Revenue-Cutter Service, as I remember, in 1878, and in the early years of its existence was administered through and as a part of the Revenue-Cutter Service. Afterwards for reasons of efficiency, which seemed then to be proper, the Life-Saving Service became a separate organization. From a volunteer service it became a service with various stations along the Gulf, the Atlantic, the Pacific coast, and the Lakes, with men employed for the manning and the rendering of service at those stations.

From time to time the personnel of the service has been improved, and the number of months each year in which the life-saving stations have rendered active duty have been increased until to-day the Life-Saving Service is recognized all over the United States, is recognized all over the world, as the most efficient organization for the saving of life and property from stress and storm at sea of any civilized country in the world.

There is one more potent reason, Mr. Chairman, why these two services should be united into one. Since my service in this House in 1908 there have been to my knowledge at every session insistent efforts upon the part of the membership of this House to enact some legislation which should provide a retirement fund adequate in cases of disability incurred in line of duty in the Life-Saving Service. It has been universally recognized that so far as casualties and dangers to life and limb are concerned it is the most dangerous of all the activities of the Government, and in that I include for a series of years even the men enlisted in the Army and the Navy. In times of peace the dangers to the men in the Life-Saving Service are infinitely greater than to the men in the Army and the Navy, because during their months of active duty there is not a season which passes when these men, exposed to the elements and the storms, to all the conditions which try men's souls, to all the conditions which affect life and limb, are not exposed to greater dangers than any men in the service of the Federal Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. SMALL. But in spite of the efforts of a reasonable proportion of the membership of this House to enact some law which would make adequate provision for these men, exposed as they are, they have been met with the objection that they were in the civil service of the Government; that up to this time Congress had provided no form of retirement or pension for any except those enlisted in the Army and in the Navy, and that if we should make an exception in favor of the Life-Saving Service, no matter how meritorious the conditions or the reasons might be, it would open the doors, and we would have an avalanche of other bills to include other branches of the civil service within such provisions of law.

This bill, Mr. Chairman, avoids any such objection. In it are distinct provisions by which in time of war the men in the Life-Saving Service are temporarily transferred to the Navy and are put under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Navy. They are subject to the same service and to as great dangers and casualties as are the men in the Army and Navy. Therefore, being on a parity with the men in these two branches of the service, in the Army and the Navy, the objections which have been heretofore urged have been eliminated, and no Member of the House need fear to support this bill because it will open the doors to pensions or retirement fund to any other organization or branch of the Federal service.

As the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] well said, the men in this service from every standpoint are entitled to the generous consideration and care of the Federal Government. Why, in every city of respectable size which maintains a fire department provision has been made for retirement for the men who have become disabled or who have served for a sufficient length of time in that service. On the great railroads of the country a form of pension has been provided for the employees. Yet in this service, distinguished for heroism and devotion to duty, this great and generous Government has made no provision for the life-savers in their disability and old age. We now have the opportunity to do so. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RAKER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 2337) to create the coast guard by combining therein the existing Life-Saving Service and Revenue-Cutter Service, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to see if we can arrive at some arrangement about time for general debate. Have the gentlemen on the other side anything to suggest?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I have had quite a number of applications since the House met. Half a dozen gentlemen have requested time, and I should think it would require about an hour. And the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] states that he desires an hour.

Mr. ADAMSON. I suggest to the gentleman that we make an agreement to limit the time, with the understanding that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] may have his hour any time he chooses under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MANN. I do not want it under the five-minute rule. I want to discuss the bill. Nobody has referred to the bill yet.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I shall be obliged to ask for an hour on account of the requests that have been made to me, in addition to the time requested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The SPEAKER. What has the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] to say?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to abridge debate unnecessarily, but this is a long bill, and will take a long time under the five-minute rule. We are perfectly disposed to be liberal under that rule. I have used 14 minutes. I am willing to allow for that, and I am willing to allow the gentleman from Illinois to have his hour if I can agree with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] as to additional time.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I have received requests which will require very nearly an hour, so that I would rather insist, Mr. Speaker, that an hour be allowed in addition to the time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. ADAMSON. If I remit any further yielding on this side, and be satisfied with the 14 minutes, would not the gentleman be satisfied with less than an hour?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Of course, the gentleman knows that I am anxious to accommodate him and expedite the consideration of the bill; but these requests have been made to me, and I do not feel like neglecting them, and I do not think it will assist the passage of the bill any to do so.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly willing; and I will ask unanimous consent that general debate close in two hours, one hour on a side, counting the 14 minutes I have already used and which are chargeable to me, the other hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS].

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, do I understand an hour will be allotted to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and an hour shall be controlled by myself?

Mr. ADAMSON. I think we ought to confine the general debate to two hours entirely.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to two hours, one hour to be controlled by himself, charging up the 14 minutes he has already used, and the other hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS]. Is there objection?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I must object, under the circumstances.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that general debate close at the end of two hours.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. The gentleman will not make any time by this, I can assure him.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, we have got to the point where it is necessary to expedite legislation. The President of the United States has written me a letter——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I made a point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was trying to submit——

Mr. MANN. No; the gentleman was making a speech. He was not trying to submit anything.

Mr. ADAMSON. I hope the gentleman will withhold his point of order.

Mr. MANN. I am willing to withhold it; but not for a speech.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois makes a good many statements that are out of order, which we are perfectly willing to listen to, in order to expedite business. My purpose was to try to reach an agreement for the expedition of business. If the gentleman does not want to hear my statement we can go along and transact business anyhow.

Mr. MANN. I do not care whether I hear it or not. If the gentleman wants to discuss the bill and tries to prevent me from discussing the bill, I am not willing that he should.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not want to discuss the bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois withdraw his point of order?

Mr. MANN. I withhold it for a moment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of my statement was to try to indicate to the House why it is necessary to act upon this bill speedily. I think it is perfectly proper to have reasonable debate, and I have no objection to having reasonable debate; but we can not take up this bill and dispose of it and at the same time dispose of the public business that is on the Wednesday Calendar before the end of the session unless we intend to do business. If the gentlemen on that side of the House are willing to take one hour and a half and divide it up among themselves, I think we can reach an agreement inasmuch as the gentleman on this side has indicated that he wants only 45 minutes more. I think that is reasonable.

Mr. ADAMSON. I shall be satisfied with 30 minutes if the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Minnesota can get along with an hour and a half between them.

Mr. MANN. I will not be satisfied with less than an hour's time. Of course, the gentlemen have the power to prevent my getting any time. That is their liberty.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, the requests made of me will call for more than 30 minutes; but it is possible, by eliminating anything I might want to say myself on the bill, to get along with 40 minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think I shall be able to give the gentleman from Minnesota 10 minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will consent if I can get 40 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Georgia think of the time that we wasted on the printing bill and the codification bill? I could see no anxiety on that side of the House to hurry through at that time. Now, when we have a real bill before us, does the gentleman think we ought not to have any debate on it?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the reason I assume this position on general debate is that gentlemen do not stay here to listen to long general debate, but they will stay here for debate under the five-minute rule; and it is made effective, and it is listened to by the Members present. I think we can reach a conclusion.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's request?

Mr. ADAMSON. My request is that the gentlemen on the other side have an hour and a half and that I may have 30 minutes, and I will give the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the general debate on this bill be limited to two hours—one hour and a half to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota and 30 minutes to be controlled by himself, with the further agreement that he will yield 10 minutes of his time to the gentleman from Minnesota. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws his point of order, and the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 2337, with the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] in the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 2337) to create the coast guard by combining therein the existing Life-Saving Service and Revenue-Cutter Service, with Mr. RAKER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of Senate bill 2337.

Mr. ADAMSON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I have only 30 minutes and I have used 14, and I ask that the gentleman on the other side use some time.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I would be the last man on this floor to put any blocks in the way of the Life-Saving Service. We are too deeply interested out in my country, on Puget Sound, and at the entrance of the Straits of San Juan de Fuca and on all that coast line of Washington and Alaska and on to the south in the Life-Saving Service for me to object to anything that has the good of that service in view or anything that involves the good of that service. But I want, in the five minutes that has been allotted to me, to call attention to the rather awkward way in which we go about legislating for the saving of life.

We arrange the laws so that the ships can go out from the straits into the ocean and go down and sink everybody on board except those that are saved by these heroic defenders and preservers of human life in the Life-Saving Service, but we relieve the ship from every form of liability, financial or otherwise, to the dependents of those whom they have destroyed. If there is any realm in which injustice prevails in our law, if there is any branch of our enactments that carries the grossest form of inhumanity, it is the laws that we have safeguarding against loss of life on the sea by requiring shipowners to see to it that wrecks do not occur. We even provide that a shipowner can insure his vessel and insure his cargo and pocket the money, and unless the owner himself is privy to the worst kind of negligence on the part of the captain and the master of the vessel no liability whatever maintains.

We did not limit that alone to the ocean. They said that it was for the sake of our merchant marine that we did it, but we extended it to our rivers and bays and lakes; and the other day, when we had up a matter that somewhat indirectly involved this question, this House passed an amendment to a bill which provides for relief not under American laws but we passed an amendment that permitted American men who are wrecked on an English vessel, for instance, the real boon of resorting to the English liability laws to save themselves. That was a good amendment. Why should an English vessel pay American passengers less for injuries than it pays English passengers.

If that law is enacted over in the Senate and is really put on the books, the result will be that if an American citizen wants to go abroad and wants the protection of law for his dependents in case he goes down, he had better take an English vessel, because there is protection there. His children will have some means of recovering if his life is lost. But on an American vessel and in our coastwise shipping he has no such protection as exists, for instance, under English law. That is what promotes wrecks. That is what causes trouble for our Life-Saving Service. That is what makes it necessary for them more often than otherwise to go out into the perils of the deep in dangerous weather, because shipowners have no inducement to make their ships safe.

If they go too fast and run into one another and one of the vessels goes down, they escape, because their ships are insured, and they tell the claimants to go out there in the ocean and get the ship. She is at the bottom, and all they are liable for is the value of the ship and fares at the destination of the trip, and the end of the trip is in the bottom of the sea. They tell the claimants to go and take the "trimmings," what is left of the wreckage. That is not square; that is not honest; that is not the right way to handle a problem of this kind. Yet Congress has enacted the law; Uncle Sam stands for it. It is not the right procedure; and while it is all right for us to encourage men to assume these risks in going to save the lives of those who are wrecked, I think the better and more honorable way and the more American way would be to begin at the other end and require the ships to be safe, and require some kind of liability on the part of those who own ships, those who make the money out of ships. It is to me an astounding proposition that we have to resort to foreign laws to protect ourselves and our people. English juries made the Titanic owners pay up long ago to the claimants. Lucky the passenger if he was an Englishman or brought suit under English law. They had juries; they had laws. But the unfortunate who loves the Star and Stripes is told to go out in the ocean and find the ship. "Take the whole thing, we don't want it," say the owners in America. In England they pay for their negligence. In England they have juries; in America they have no jury; and they have an unconscionable law and a trial before a judge in admiralty.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] one hour.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have not carefully examined the provisions of this bill during the last few days, but I did at the time it was reported and practically before that.

The Life-Saving Service is one of the great services of the Government. The Revenue-Cutter Service is one of the great services of the Government. I do not think any other nation possesses a revenue marine service which equals our Revenue-Cutter Service as now established. I do not believe that any other nation has a life-saving service equal to our Life-Saving Service as now established. There are intimate relations between the Revenue-Cutter Service and the Life-Saving Service, and have been from the start.

The officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service do certain work in connection with the Life-Saving Service in the way of training, drill, inspection, and so forth. And though I have nothing but a friendly feeling toward these great services, having become more or less familiar with them in a legislative way, at least, by long service on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which has legislative jurisdiction over both of the services, I realize, on the other side, that the Life-Saving Service extends clear around the coast of the United States, up the rivers to some degree, and on the Great Lakes, and that there has been a more powerful propaganda or lobby in behalf of this bill than any other bill, I think, brought before Congress since the oleomargarine bill was passed. Most of the men in the Life-Saving Service, not being very busily employed—their work being erratic; not continuous—they have had plenty of time and some opportunity not only to write directly to Members of Congress but to secure other people to write to Members of Congress, and every gentleman here probably, or nearly every one from a coast district where there is a life-saving station, will be for this bill, not because Members have studied the bill, but because of influences at home. I myself regret that I feel it my duty to say a word against the bill; because even in my small district I have two life-saving stations, and I think they have been at times friendly to me, but doubtless from now on will be on the other side, although I do not think they have any political influence one way or the other. [Laughter.] But they have great influence in this House. Not only have they reached the Members of this House, but they have gone up until they have reached the President of the United States, who, I believe, in his annual message recommended the passage of this bill, without any intimate knowledge of what it contained or what it proposed.

During my service in the House we have several times increased the compensation of the men in the Life-Saving Service. They now receive $65 or $70 a month, if I remember correctly. I may be mistaken. During the months that they work they receive in addition a ration of 30 cents a day. That is not high pay, but it is a great deal higher than we pay in the Army or Navy, or even in the Revenue-Cutter Service itself, and we propose in this bill to leave the pay as now fixed, and with an increase of longevity pay in many cases, and in addition provide for retired pay at three-fourths of the regular pay and allowances. If this bill becomes a law, these men in the Life-Saving Service will receive higher pay than is given in any corresponding service in this Government, and higher pay than is given in any kind of service in any other nation of the world. We do not give the Army or the Navy high pay. Many of the warrant officers in the Navy do not receive one-half the pay that a surfman—an enlisted man—will receive in the Life-Saving Service under the terms of this bill. Paying moderate salaries to the enlisted men and the noncommissioned officers of the Army and Navy, we provide for their retirement under certain conditions, first, because the service is hazardous, and, second, because the pay is small.

When you take a man into the enlisted Army and pay him $15 or $16, or even $20 a month, there is some reason for giving him retired pay after 30 years' service. He does not receive much compensation while in the active service. In the Revenue-Cutter Service, where the enlisted men do not receive more than $30 or $40 a month, even if they receive that much, there is some reason for placing them on a retired-pay list at the end of 30 years' service. But the same reasons do not apply to the men who receive high pay as compared with these services, and have a less hazardous service to perform. Now, we furnish the food and the clothing for the men in the Army and the Navy. Well, we furnish the food now for the men in the Life-Saving Service, and this bill proposes to furnish their clothing in addition. How can we justify taking a civil service, like the Life-Saving Service, hazardous though it may be, and putting the men in the retired-pay class as against the Army and Navy, where we pay only moderate compensation to begin with during the service. I personally have always been in favor and am now in favor of telling the life-saving men, "When you start out in a boat on the water to save life you can go with the assurance that if you are injured the Government will take care of you during your life; and if you lose your life, the Government will grant a pension to your widow and your minor children." But there is no such proposition here. We do now grant two years' pay to the widow or dependent family of a life-saving surfman who loses his life. I would be perfectly willing to say to the man when he is injured or loses his life in the performance of a hazardous duty that the Government will protect him if he lives or his family if he dies.

But under the terms of this bill a young man goes into the Life-Saving Service at the age of, say, 20, receives a fair compensation and ration during his service, and at the end of 30 years he is retired for the balance of his life on three-quarters of his pay and allowances. That is very high retired pay. That is too high a pension to pay. It is not fair to expect the Government to pay such high compensation on a retired list.

It is true that the Secretary of the Treasury reports that this bill will cost an additional $390,000 now. Most of the men in the Life-Saving Service now can not be retired—only some of the officers. They will receive the fogy pay, but in course of time, under the terms of this bill, instead of having young men in the service from 20 to 30 years of age, the proper age for boys to go out in the life-saving boat in a time of stress, you will have the service filled up with men 40 and 50 years of age, who will have remained in the service because they could not make as much money anywhere else as they could by staying in the service, and knowing that from 50 years of age on the Government will support them without their doing any work. That will vastly increase the additional expense of this bill by increasing, first, the amount of retired pay and, second, the amount of the fogy pay.

The Secretary of the Treasury reports that the total increase involved is $397,700. That is where they figure it down just as fine as possible. The Life-Saving Service and the Revenue-Cutter Service now cost the Government in the neighborhood of $5,000,000 a year. That is the most expensive service of the kind by any Government of the world. This bill will increase the cost of the service in the course of a few years' time by at least a million dollars, in my judgment. Probably it will increase it more than that.

Is this a very good time, I will ask my friends on the Democratic side of the House, to increase unnecessarily the expenses of the Government? When the President read his address to the House last summer in favor of the stamp-tax bill he said that he did not think that the Government ought to withdraw from the banks the $75,000,000 in money which the Government then had in the banks. At that time the Government had in the Treasury free money to the extent of about $125,000,000 for immediate current expenses. By the Treasury report which reached us yesterday morning this free fund in the Treasury is reduced to less than $60,000,000. That is a decrease from the time the President addressed this body last September—if that was the date—of $65,000,000.

Now, you can not economize, each time when the question is presented, by appropriating more money than you did before. The only way to economize is when you have the question before you. Will you increase or decrease the expenditures of the Government? These things come in items and not in hundreds of millions of dollars at a time; and if we keep on, if we pass all the bills which this great Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, with its great and distinguished chairman, Judge ADAMSON, now has on the calendar, we will increase the deficit next summer by at least a number of million dollars more than would be the case if we did not pass the bills. I believe the Government ought to be conducted with a reasonable degree of economy. I know very well that wherever there is a large class of public officials drawing pay from the Government they consider it their duty, first, to perform their public duty—I think they place that first—and, second, to get any increase that they can for themselves out of the Government. They consider it their duty first to protect the public interests as involved in their respective service, and they expect us to take care of the Treasury. It is not the duty of the Life-Saving Service to protect the Treasury; that is the duty of Congress.

Of course they would like more pay. Of course they would like to go on the retired list. Why, this House, if it could never be known how any Member voted, if they could arrange to have 10 vote against it, and no one know who the 10 were, would provide retired pay for themselves when they go out of office. But, as they can not do that, they feel that they must protect the Treasury as against themselves. The Life-Saving Service does not have to protect the Treasury; that is our duty.

Why should a man in the Life-Saving Service receive retired pay and have three-quarters pay and allowances, which will amount to at least $50 a month? Why should he be placed on retired pay after 30 years' service, which will probably end when he is 50 years of age, for the balance of his life? We do not do it for anyone else at such a high rate.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. In just a moment. The man in the Army of the United States who goes on the retired pay does not get more, if he is an enlisted man, than $20 a month, or about that. I yield now to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. TRIBBLE. The gentleman saw the naval service come here and demand retired pay, and then longevity pay, and get it. Does the gentleman not think that the Life-Saving Service will be here next, as the Navy was, asking for a plucking board, in order that they may retire more of them and get them on pay without being on duty?

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly. In the course of time they will have to cut out lots of men in the Life-Saving Service who are between 40 and 50 years of age.

Mr. TRIBBLE. And they will need a plucking board.

Mr. MANN. A man who is my age—and I am over 50—may feel as though he can stand any kind of hardship, but other men know that the man who is 50 years of age is not the best suited for the temporary strenuous service which for a few hours a life-saving surfman must undergo when he is attempting to save lives from a wreck. The older men can not stand it, and in the end they will have to put them out in some way, and they will say that it is for disabilities incurred in the service, and they will retire them at three-quarters pay when the are 35, 40, or 45 years of age.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. I yield.

Mr. GORDON. I would like to ask, for information, whether or not the gentleman does not believe that the Life-Saving Service is very much more hazardous than either the Army or the Navy service? I refer, of course, to the regular service.

Mr. MANN. I should say not.

Mr. GORDON. I would like to ask further whether or not the gentleman is advised that there has been great difficulty in securing proper kind of men and keeping them in the service because of the low pay? I have been so informed by the superintendent of the service. He states that that is the fact, that it is difficult to get competent men and keep them after they get them because of the low pay.

Mr. MANN. That statement is made by the superintendent of the service and those connected with the service. Let us analyze that for a moment. The life-saving man does not serve the year around. On the Great Lakes they serve eight months of the year and along the Atlantic and the Gulf coast they serve 10 months a year.

Mr. THACHER. And on the Pacific coast they serve by the year.

Mr. MANN. That does not disagree with my statement.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I would like first to finish this statement. Of course, many of these men during these months go into some other occupation. Many of them do not return. The difficulty with getting men in the Life-Saving Service is one wholly owing to the fact that they are admitted through the Civil Service Commission. I am an advocate of what its proponents call the merit system, the appointment of public officials through the Civil Service Commission, but how many boys along the coast are going to take the trouble to take a civil-service examination for an appointment in the Life-Saving Service, which may never come to them, where their examination papers, as a rule, will not be examined for three or six months after they take the examination, and the appointment may not come to them for nine months or a year after their papers have been marked up?

If they would remove the Life-Saving Service from the civil-service examination and permit the superintendent or the keepers to pick up the young men who would like to go into the service at the salary which is paid them, they could fill the service ten times over without any difficulty. How many men do you think you could get into the Army through the Civil Service Commission? How many men do you think you could get into the Revenue-Cutter Service through the Civil Service Commission? How many enlisted men do you think you would get into the Navy if the men had to make application and take a civil-service examination for an appointment the year after next? How do they get them in all these services? They get somebody who wants to go in at the moment, not some one who wants to go in in a year or 15 months' time. That is a matter that the President of the United States can correct by Executive order in five minutes' time, but as yet no President has had the nerve or the knowledge, I do not know which it is, to do it. That is the only way that will be remedied. This bill does not purport to remedy that, I believe, though I am not sure about that.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am in sympathy with this measure and hope it will become a law. I desire to ask the gentleman a question, but before doing so, I simply want to say that I heartily indorse his position with regard to the civil service, as applied to this branch of the service. Living, as I do, on the coast, I know something about it, and I know there are plenty of young men who wait six months or a year for their papers to come back from the Civil Service Commission, and who in the meantime become disgusted and go and get some other job.

Mr. MANN. They have to get another job.

Mr. GOULDEN. They have to, and the better class of young men will not take the examination. I think it is a great mistake. While I am heartily in favor of the civil service, as applied to all branches of the Government, yet I think it would be well not to apply it to this particular service. The question I was about to ask the gentleman is whether he could tell us the average age of the 4,093 people to-day in the two services, which this bill proposes to regulate?

Mr. MANN. I could not; I do not know.

Mr. GOULDEN. My colleague [Mr. TALCOTT] says it is given as about 57 years of age.

Mr. MANN. Given by whom?

Mr. GOULDEN. I will ask him to answer the question.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. By the report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MANN. Where is it? I know enough about the service to know that that is not correct.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. The gentleman will find it, I think, on page 4 of the report, next to the last paragraph:

> It appears from the above that the men in the Life-Saving Service will have completed 30 years' service at an average age somewhere between 57.7 and 60 years of age.

Mr. MANN. The average age for entrance into the service being 45 years? Is that what the gentleman refers to?

Mr. HOWARD. What the gentleman from New York read applies to those who have completed 30 years of service.

Mr. MANN. I do not think they have among the enlisted men in the service any number, outside of the keepers or surfmen No. 1, who have been in the service 10 years, or who are 40 years of age.

Mr. HOWARD. The question I would like to ask the gentleman is this. As a matter of fact, the gentleman stated a while ago, and I think the gentleman is correct about it—in fact, I agree with the gentleman—that it does not make any difference about the age of these men; that they can retire them for rheumatic troubles or disabilities that are incurred in or incident to the service; and the gentleman stated a while ago they will be retired long before 50 years, and anybody who knows anything about the service ought to know it.

Mr. MANN. It is a question in reference to the classified service to which I had not intended to refer. I have great respect for the civil service. They insist that they shall have control in the selection of surfmen for the Life-Saving Service. They insist that all of these services of the Government shall remain under them so far as application for appointments are concerned, and I notice the President the other day excepted some lady or somebody from the classified service, as it was stated, contrary to the opinion or the expressed desire of the Civil Service Commission. They are always insistent upon keeping the powers which they have and extending them.

Mr. GORDON. So does everybody.

Mr. MANN. And some time ago, when Congress provided for examining the efficiency of men in the departments at Washington and authorized the Civil Service Commission to make the examination for efficiency, did they go to their methods in order to get a man to do that? No; not on your life. Did they advertise an examination for a man for the head of that bureau of efficiency? Well, you can be sure they did not. Did they apply their methods, which they insist shall be applied to all Government officials in the civil service outside of the Civil Service Bureau, in the selection of their officials? Well, not on your tintype. [Laughter.] They selected a man for the bureau without examination, without making the ordinary form of application, and without paying any attention whatever to any of the requirements for the selection of their own officials of the Government. They rule themselves to be higher than any other department of the Government. Well, doubtless they would object to letting the Government secure good life-saving surfmen in the only method by which we can secure them; but when it comes to themselves, they have got sense enough to try to select a good man whom they believe is capable, without putting him up against a high-school pupil to see which knows the most about geography or the sun.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman think they would not get a head of the efficiency bureau by an examination?

Mr. MANN. I think they could have gotten one better than the one they have without half an examination.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not talking about the individual, I am asking the gentleman if as a matter of fact there are not many positions in the Government service where it is impracticable to go to the extreme in selecting men by examination.

Mr. MANN. I was trying to show to the House that was the situation as to selecting men for the Life-Saving Service; that if they would adopt the sensible method there would be no longer any possible excuse for this pending bill, so the gentleman and I quite agree.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. Does the gentleman understand that the civil-service examination, if you call it that, for appointment as surfman is confined to geography and the sun, as the gentleman intimates?

Mr. MANN. I did not intimate anything of the kind.

Mr. COOPER. Well, very near it. The subjects the gentleman mentioned were geography and the sun.

Mr. MANN. I mentioned that in connection with the selection of a man in the civil-service office.

Mr. COOPER. Well, does the gentleman mean to imply that the examination for surfmen is anything like that? As I understand, it is confined, 95 per cent of it, to the physical and mental characteristics of the man; that is, to his physique, his courage, and so forth.

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not recall; but I dare say the gentleman himself has never seen one of the application blanks. I do not recall just what the examination is, although I went into that some years ago. I thought the examination at that time was somewhat grotesque; but still that is not the point I was seeking to make. It is that if a young man who wanted to go into the Life-Saving Service to-day should make an application, and his application was not marked up or examined for three or six months, and then he went on the eligible list, from which he could not be selected for a year, that a capable young man does not do that, but he would go to some other job. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. That objection would apply to any civil-service examination. The gentleman might as well say that a man would not take an examination and get his name on the eligible list for a clerkship in the Treasury Department because he might not be appointed for six or eight months, whereas the fact is that many a man is very glad to get on the eligible list and wait an indefinite time for an appointment in the Government service, knowing that while waiting he is free at any time to accept employment elsewhere and leave the Government position for some other person on the list.

Mr. MANN. That is the gentleman's opinion. I do not think the two cases are at all similar. Here is a life-saving station on the Virginia coast and a number of young men are living there and growing up, familiar with the water, accustomed to swimming, and familiar with that particular water. Here is a Government office. There is a vacancy, and the head keeper says to some young fellow, "Come in here and we will take you on," and he will go; but now, with no vacancy, they will say to a young fellow, "You make an application and 12 or 15 months from now we may possibly be able to appoint you. But God only knows when." He does not make his application. That is the difficulty, if he is bright minded at all. That does not apply to the clerical work in Washington. I will ask my friend from Wisconsin how many men he thinks we would get enlisted in the Army if we would take them in through the Civil Service Commission in the way we take other men into the other services of the Government now?

Mr. COOPER. In reply to the gentleman, I will say that I see only the very slightest resemblance or analogy between the two cases. There are comparatively very few of these life-saving stations. I have one in my city. I do not wish it so that I can go to the keeper of the station and say that I want this man or that man to have a place on the life-saving crew, and then, when there is storm and wreck with people facing death and clamoring for help, have the man I recommended, because he was a political wirepuller for me, show himself totally unfit to be a member of such a crew.

Mr. MANN. I do not, either. I do not think that would happen.

Mr. COOPER. I do not want such crews to be under the old spoils system, because their business is to save lives, not to save politicians.

Mr. MANN. Whatever may be the comparative merits of the old spoils systems and the present merit system, the people connected with the Life-Saving Service have all repeatedly stated that under present conditions they did not and could not get as good men as they used to have. I do not know what the conditions may be, but that is what they have repeatedly stated to us in the committee.

Mr. MOORE. We do not now pay pensions to the members of the life guard, as I understand it?

Mr. MANN. The men in the Revenue-Cutter Service go on the retired list. Men in the Life-Saving Service do not get a retired list; but if they are injured in the service they get two years' pay; or if they die their widows or minor children get two years' pay.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman has spoken of the three-quarters pay that this bill provides. Would the gentleman object to a provision for pensioning those men who actually go out in boats and are injured in the service or for taking care of the widows or orphan children of those who lose their lives in the service?

Mr. MANN. I do not think that can be done in this bill. I have always been an advocate of that. I think as to a man who goes out to sea in time of storm and who knows that if he dies he will leave a wife and minor children the Government ought to support them; or if he himself breaks a leg the Government will pay him a pension.

Mr. MOORE. Does this bill meet that condition?

Mr. MANN. No.

Mr. MOORE. Can this bill be amended so that that condition could be met?

Mr. MANN. I suppose so; but I could not amend it.

Mr. THACHER. The gentleman spoke about the civil-service examination. How is it that men are willing to take the examination for rural free delivery as other carriers? How does the civil service keep them out of the service?

Mr. MANN. That is a different thing. If the gentleman can not see the difference, I can not explain it. Of course, the gentleman represents a district on the coast, and his vote is controlled in advance.

Mr. THACHER. I am a Member of Congress of the United States.

Mr. MANN. But he is representing the life-saving stations, and I hope properly, in his district. I have great regard for the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 25 minutes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the gentleman from Illinois admit that the Life-Saving Service is practically as hazardous as the Revenue-Cutter Service?

Mr. MANN. On the average it is not.

Mr. BARKLEY. But practically it is, is it not? It is almost as hazardous.

Mr. MANN. I have answered the questions according to my information. Of course, if the gentleman is seeking to say that it is not, in order to get my opinion, I am willing that he should do so.

Mr. BARKLEY. For which I am duly thankful. I want to ask the gentleman why there is any reason for discrimination between the Revenue-Cutter Service and the Life-Saving Service?

Mr. MANN. That is not hard to answer. The Revenue-Cutter Service is given a retired list, and so forth, because it was placed as an arm of war in time of war Now, it is true that the Life-Saving Service says that it ought to be under the Secretary of Navy in time of war, and that it has been. In 1898, at the time of the Spanish War, when the Life-Saving Service closed up during July and August, the very last day or two of June, when nobody knew where the Spanish fleet was, and the people along the Atlantic coast were in tremors all the time for fear the Spanish fleet might land at Portland or New York or some other place——

Mr. MOORE. There were some reverberations of that tremor——

Mr. MANN. I am making the statement, and I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me in the middle of a sentence. At that time I brought into the House a bill, and got it passed, to keep the life-saving stations open on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts during July and August, so that the life guard might patrol the coast, so that if they saw the smoke arising from any of the Spanish Fleet they might notify their brothers and sisters along the coast in time to let them get inland. That is the only military service they ever performed. There is nothing to do, as a rule, along the coast during July and August. All they had to do then was to walk up and down in nice weather. That has nothing to do with the military service that actually was rendered by the Revenue-Cutter Service.

Mr. BARKLEY. Now, in times of peace, the only service rendered by the Revenue-Cutter Service is to rescue property and life?

Mr. MANN. That is not correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is practically true.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman makes the statement. Do not put it in my mouth.

Mr. BARKLEY. I make the statement.

Mr. MANN. I have an intimate acquaintance with the Revenue-Cutter Service. They have a great many duties to perform, and that is only one of the incidents.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is that any reason why the Revenue-Cutter Service should be a member of the military service of the country any more than the coast guard should, and join with the Revenue-Cutter Service for the purposes of defense or such other service as they may be called upon to render?

Mr. MANN. Well, it is a part of the military service. Let me be frank with the gentleman. I was not in favor of making it a part of the military service when it was done; but it is.

Mr. BARKLEY. If they are both part of the military service——

Mr. MANN. They are not both a part of the military service.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understood the gentleman to say that they were.

Mr. MANN. I am sure the gentleman did not hear me say that.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman said they were during the Spanish-American War.

Mr. MANN. They were during the Spanish-American War.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, one belongs to the Navy and the other belongs to the military, but they are both——

Mr. MANN. The Life-Saving Service has never belonged to the Navy. It has nothing to do with the Navy.

Mr. BARKLEY. Under the bill as now proposed, if it is converted into a coast guard, it will become a part of the armed forces of the United States.

Mr. MANN. Yes; under the bill it would be. The gentleman said it had been. That is another proposition.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Revenue-Cutter Service during times of peace—whether it be mainly so or not, very largely its duties are the saving of property at a distance from the coast at sea, going to the rescue of people in distress, and things of that kind—and if the Life-Saving Service is maintained for the purpose of saving life and property close to shore, what is the objection to combining both these services under one head so as to bring about more efficient service in one department?

Mr. MANN. They are both under one head now. They are both under the same control. They are both under the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BARKLEY. Practically they are, but technically they are not.

Mr. MANN. Technically they are. They are both under the Secretary of the Treasury, and this bill provides for two division chiefs. That is all they have now. They are both under the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BARKLEY. But the two services are to be coordinated more than they are under the present system.

Mr. MANN. I doubt that. They would still be the Life-Saving Service and the Revenue-Cutter Service, one having a Chief of the Life-Saving Service and the other a Chief of the Revenue-Cutter Service. There is no corelationship between them in the work they have to do, and there will not be any more than now exists.

As I said, I was opposed to the bill placing the Revenue-Cutter Service with the military branch of the Government, with retired pay, and I said then—and I do not give myself the credit of being a prophet for saying it, because it was too plain—that the next step would be to put the Life-Saving Service in as a part of the military service, with retired pay, and the next step would be to put the Lighthouse Service on the same basis with retired pay. I do not know what the next step will be, but it would be some service which was claimed to be hazardous.

Now, one of the most hazardous branches of the service is the Railway Mail Service. More men lose their lives in the Railway Mail Service than in connection with the Life-Saving Service. There are more injuries in the Railway Mail Service than in the Life-Saving Service. We thought we were quite liberal when, last year or the year before, we provided for two years' pay on account of loss of life of a man in the Railway Mail Service or injury in the Railway Mail Service incapacitating the person.

Yet you say this service is hazardous. Let us be perfectly frank about it. If you know anything about the Life-Saving Service, you will know that the average crew in the Life-Saving Service does not go out to perform hazardous service twice a year. Of course the time may come when it is extremely hazardous for them to go out. That is the case with all military service. But ordinarily their time is occupied in drilling and training.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Is it not true that the life is hazardous in another respect, that the exposure is such that it produces pulmonary diseases and rheumatism and diseases of that kind to a very large extent?

Mr. MANN. It is not true, because it is an outdoor service. Outdoor service everywhere prevents pulmonary diseases. What is the use of saying that a man who lives outdoors is specially subject to pulmonary diseases?

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. That is the testimony adduced before the committee.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I know more about pulmonary diseases, unfortunately, than those who testified before you concerning the Life-Saving Service.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. They spoke of the results of the service they have witnessed. They refer only to the surfmen; and in that connection I referred to the average age in the service, after 30 years of service.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but incorrectly.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Yes; incorrectly as to the average age in the service. I referred to the average age after 30 years in the service.

Mr. MANN. How many surfmen are there who have been there 30 years?

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. I should say very few now.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know?

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. The evidence shows that only 279 are in the service who have been there 20 years. The period of service is very short.

Mr. MANN. I do not suppose there is one who has had 30 years' service, and there ought not to be one; but this bill proposed to keep them there when they are old or else retire them at three-fourths pay. What you want is young men to pull an oar and turn a boat over and do work in connection with wrecks on the high seas. This bunch of men here, all put together, would not be able to do it well, because they are too old.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has seven minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] eight minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] is recognized for eight minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Illinois that this is not a good time to increase Government expenditures. I believe this is a good time to economize. But economy means a wise expenditure of money and not merely cutting down necessary expenses or depriving any necessary part of the Government service of money enough to do its work and do it well.

I will join with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in cutting down unnecessary expenditures. I have voted and will vote to cut out nearly $400,000 of money expended to scatter garden seeds over the country, two-thirds of which is probably wasted. I will vote to cut down mileage to actual traveling expenses once here and back. The cost of the garden seeds alone comes to as much as this bill involves. It is good business and good economy for the Government to pay money enough for any service to get efficient service. Anything less than that is poor economy and anything more than that is extravagance.

It is admitted by the gentleman himself and by everybody else that appeared before this committee that had this bill in its charge that it had been a difficult matter for a long time to get efficient men for the Life-Saving Service, and it had been difficult to keep those men in the service after you have got them. To-day there is a lack of men; many stations are undermanned, and many of the men in the service are undesirable. That condition arises because the inducements and the pay given by the Government are not sufficient to attract the right men. The pay ought to be sufficient not only to attract men to that service but to keep them in it. The men who actually do the work, the surfmen, receive to-day $65 a month, and 30 cents a day additional allowed for food, and they work only 10 months in the year on an average. So the annual income of these men whose business and duty it is to protect property and life from storm and peril at sea get an annual wage to-day of less than $600. I know little about the Army and Navy, but it must be apparent that if men go into the Army and Navy, where the pay is less, there are many other inducements besides the pay that attract them into those branches of the service. There are no inducements except the pay and benefits they receive from the National Government to attract men into the Life-Saving Service and keep them there. The work is not attractive or pleasant. It is practically continuous service, one night a week off and the rest of the time continuously on duty.

Mr. HULINGS. What is the pay?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. A No. 1 surfman gets $70 a month, but there is only one No. 1 surfman in a station. The rest are ordinary surfmen, and they receive $65 a month and 30 cents——

Mr. HULINGS. How much for subsistence?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Thirty cents a day.

Mr. HULINGS. Are they furnished with uniforms?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. I understand they have to furnish their own clothing and their own food, and pay their own expenses, for which they get an allowance of 30 cents a day.

Mr. ROGERS. In the course of the hearing, was there any indication of any kind that the present personnel of the Life-Saving Service is inefficient?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. It was the testimony of the men in charge that of late years the character of the men they are getting in the service is not as satisfactory as it used to be.

Mr. ROGERS. Character or efficiency?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. The character and efficiency of the men. It is difficult to get efficient men into that service.

Mr. PLATT. Is not that because they have to wait so long before they know whether they are going to get into the service or not? I have men who have been waiting a year.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. No; the testimony was that the reason why they do not stay in the service is because they do not get money enough. Let me say further, that while the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] seems to lay all the trouble to the civil-service rules, I understand that it was the desire of the department to get good men and keep them there that made the department demand years ago that the Life-Saving Service be put under the civil service. The men in charge did not want to be dictated to by Members of Congress and politicians as to what men they should hire. If there is any difficulty in the civil-service rules, they can be amended. But if this bill passes, this service will come under the regulations of the Navy Department, and will be filled by enlistment, and will not be under the civil service.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman say that the Navy will have anything to do with this service under this bill if it passes, except in case of war? Will the Navy have anything to do with the enlistment of the men?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. I believe it will be done in the same way it is done in the Navy. I do not say the Navy will directly have anything to do with the enlistment of the men.

Mr. MANN. I do not want the gentleman to be in error about it, because the Navy has nothing to do with it.

Mr. POWERS. You say that the efficiency of the service is not as great now as it was formerly. What about the pay of the men under the old system?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. I understand the pay has been increased from time to time in recent years, until to-day it has reached the magnificent sum of about $600 a year.

Mr. POWERS. It is more now than it was before they were put under the civil service?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. I think the pay has been increased.

Now, just a few words as to the importance of this particular service to the American people. By its importance we can judge whether it is wise to skimp the service and not pay enough to get proper men in it. During the year 1913 the Life-Saving Service rescued from peril over 4,000 men, women, and children, and it assisted from danger ships and cargoes valued at over $6,000,000 in money. It is a peculiar service and unlike any other that I know of in the Government. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that it is the duty of this House and the duty of the Government not only to pay these men good pay while they work, but to protect them when they are disabled and when they have reached years when they can no longer be of service. To my mind the chief advantage in granting the increased pay which is necessary, by their retirement pay and longevity pay, is that it will tend to keep good men in the service after they get there.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] yield some of his time?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I just want to tell a little experience that I had with the Life-Saving Service men during the serious floods a year ago last summer. I happened to be in Chicago at that time, and I saw the appalling number of deaths that were occurring everywhere, especially in Indiana and Ohio, and I took it upon myself to call the Chief of the Life-Saving Service of the Great Lakes over to my office by telephone, and I asked him if he would be willing to assemble all his lifeboats in that region and all the men that he could gather together and volunteer to go into the flood district to save life. He said he would not only be willing to do it, but that he would gladly do it. Then I called the commandant of the naval training station of the Great Lakes, and I asked him the same thing, and the commandant of the Naval Militia of our State. But the man at the head of the Life-Saving Service of the Great Lakes was the one man who appealed to me as worthy of the greatest consideration that could be given to men anywhere. And that applied to every man under him, because they were not only willing to work night and day but put their own lives at the service of the lives of other people who were in danger. Late one afternoon we received a telegram to the effect that an orphan asylum at Fort Wayne, Ind., was surrounded by the flood; that the water had risen as high as the second story of the building; that the local people had attempted to take a boatload of those children out of the building to a place of safety, but that the eddies and currents of the flood were so great that the boat was lost and every one of the children drowned.

At 7 o'clock that evening this man at the head of the Life-Saving Service at the Great Lakes, understanding the situation, loaded two lifeboats on a car and started over the Chicago & Pittsburgh for Fort Wayne at 7 o'clock. He reached Fort Wayne with his boats at 11 o'clock, and before 1 o'clock in the morning had all the 72 children still remaining in the building, not only out of the building but to a place of safety. [Applause.]

That was not all, he took his men everywhere throughout the flooded district. He did it on my request, without orders from headquarters. He said to me that to do what I wanted might require an expenditure of funds. I told him I would place $15,000 for him to draw against until I could be reimbursed. The money was placed at his disposal, and I went to the Association of Commerce in Chicago and told them what the situation was. They said that the $15,000 would be placed in a special fund and he could draw against it without vouchers of any kind. He never drew a cent against that money placed at his disposal. He worked night and day for nearly a month, and all of his men did the same thing. They were not required to do this work. It was out of their line of service, but, having accepted my invitation to do it, I proceeded to obtain a ratification of the order which I had given to these men from the proper authorities in Washington. They said they were glad I had undertaken the work.

Now, if men who are in the Life-Saving Service will do such things as I have feebly described, there is nothing on earth that the Government can do for them that it ought not to do. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE].

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I have but 4 miles of Atlantic coast line in the district which I have the honor to represent. When I first came here as a Member of the House, I represented the Cape Cod district, which had a large coast line on both sides of Cape Cod and which also contained the islands of Nantucket and Marthas Vineyard; and there were a large number of life-saving stations in the district. I recollect that on the 17th day of March, 1902, at noonday, while all was calm and peaceful in this House, there was a terrible storm on the Atlantic coast, which came up very suddenly, and the life-saving station at Mononomy Point discovered a vessel in distress. These men of the Life-Saving Service were called to their duties so suddenly that they were unable to put on the life jacket which the department requires they shall put on before they go out to perform their duties in their perilous service. These men took their lives in their hands and braved the dangers of the perilous trip for the relief of the crew of the vessel that was in distress. Although these men were accustomed to the dangers of the sea and were undaunted by the hardships and perils that awaited them, they entered the seething waters to save the lives of men unknown to them personally, but recognized by them as members of the human family who had displayed signals of distress. Heroic and self-sacrificing as is the work of the soldier as he enters the field of battle and perils his life to maintain the honor of his country, what can compare with the sacrifice and heroism of these men of the Life-Saving Service, who entered upon their dangerous undertaking, not for the purpose of destroying human lives, but these men risked their own lives for the sole purpose of saving the lives of others.

I have known of the work done by these men in that service many years before I had ever expected I should be called to render to them by any public duty the gratitude which I know my countrymen recognize is due them. With a long experience in public life and a knowledge of the sacrifices of my fellow men in the performance of their duties in the Army and the Navy, even before I came to this House, and since, I want to say that I believe there is no service anywhere that compares with the service of the men who follow the sea and brave its dangers in the Life-Saving Service. [Applause.]

With regard to the lobby that has been referred to in connection with these men in the Life-Saving Service, I desire to say that if there is a lobby—and I have no doubt men have been interested—but if there is an organized lobby I think they would have been likely to have called upon me, either at my home or in this city. No one has spoken to me regarding the pending legislation during the last 7 years. I have during the 16 years of my service in this House seen some men who have been connected with the service, who know of its dangers and of its requirements, who believe that it is essential that some provision should be made for these men in the service and for their families in case of their injury or loss of life when on duty. These men perform patrol duty at night, and it is not an agreeable duty. They have to perform a service and have to render a report when they have completed their tour of duty. They are on duty whether the storm comes to them or whether the coast is clear and the moon shines to illumine their lonely pathway. But when any surfman in the Life-Saving Service does the required duty exacted by the Government along the shores of Cape Cod, they will find that a large proportion of the time they are in the service they are upon a duty that means danger to their lives, and requires constant vigilance in the performance of the duties that the regulations of the department demand.

Allusion has been made to the widows drawing two years' pay when the men lose their lives in the service. Widows draw two years' pay in case their husbands are killed or are permanently injured in the service. I have had something to do with obtaining the money for the widows of some of these men who have been in the service, and it required a great deal more information to be filed and a great deal more of detail to be prepared to secure the money for those widows than it does to secure the money for a widow where a soldier or sailor has lost his life in the service of his country. [Applause.]

I have not examined the pending bill in all its details. The great Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce have given the bill patient consideration, and they have held many hearings for a long term of years.

I believe this bill should be enacted into law. When final action is taken an advanced step in humane and righteous legislation will be recognized by the people of the country regardless of their party affiliations.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Moss].

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I think as a rule a man goes wrong in differing from the distinguished leader of the minority. He is usually right, but in this instance I feel compelled to differ from him, because I believe that to the service of life-saving the greatest consideration should be shown. I can not agree with him that these men receive to-day what they should receive, considering the risk they run—the hazardous nature of their employment. It seems to me that there are four things which prevent sufficient enlistment of the right kind of men in this service: First, the delay incident to their civil-service application; second, their small pay and hazardous employment; third, the fact that they work only a part of the year and receive small pay only a part of the year, and that loafing period has a tendency to disorganize and demoralize and to destroy the steady character of those connected with the service; lastly, the fact that they know that when they reach a little beyond middle age they are to be kicked out of employment. I think all of these conditions are wrong. I think that this bill is a good bill, because it does away with these things and also provides for uniting the two services—the Revenue-Cutter and Life-Saving Services—which certainly will save expense and will promote efficiency. In addition, Mr. Chairman, there is another thing accomplished by this bill which I do not believe has been mentioned. It is a fact that in the service of the Army and of the Navy and of the Marine Corps, as I am informd, the enlisted men and the officers all have the retirement privilege except the officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service, and for some unknown reason they are deprived of that privilege. I understand this bill will correct that, and that constitutes another reason for my approval.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL].

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the principle embraced in this bill. I do not desire to consume the time of the House at this time, however, except to ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I shall object. When you cut off debate on a bill of this kind, I do not propose that the RECORD shall show there has been long debate.

Mr. HULL. I desire to extend my remarks on a tax item.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to the gentleman extending his remarks on some other subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THACHER].

Mr. THACHER. Mr. Chairman, the sixteenth Massachusetts district, which I have the honor to represent in the Congress, contains on its extensive coast line many life-saving stations. A large number are located on Cape Cod, where I was born and have lived, as have my people before me. This is one of the most dangerous portions of our Atlantic coast, and well do the hardy men of Cape Cod know its dangers. From time immemorial Cape Cod has produced many experienced sailors and fishermen, and there has never been a better maritime race than these sturdy sons of the sea. To-day there are more fishermen on the Cape than sailors. It is, however, from the above type of worthy men that the New England life-saving stations have been largely manned.

No true son of Cape Cod can help being interested in the welfare both of the men "that go down to the sea in ships, that do business in great waters" and those whose duty it is to rescue ship-wrecked mariners. My interest in legislation for the life-savers dates back nearly a quarter of a century, to 1892, when my father, Henry C. Thacher, of Yarmouth, as the Democratic candidate for the Cape Cod congressional district advocated legislation for the life-savers. I resolved then that if the time ever came I would do all in my power for the life-savers.

Moreover, there are other reasons, sentimental ones I will confess, why my heart beats in sympathy with those connected with the sea. Over 50 years ago my two uncles, Bartlett and Chandler Bray, were boys at Yarmouth. The elder, Bartlett, at the age of 14, went as cabin boy on the bark Mimosa, owned by my father, who was engaged in the Mediterranean business. The Mimosa made a successful trip from Boston to Smyrna and back. Just as the Mimosa was on the point of sailing with Bartlett on a second voyage to Smyrna, his younger brother, Chandler, aged 10, was accidentally drowned in Yarmouth Harbor. My grandfather telegraphed to Bartlett at Boston not to sail, but the message arrived too late. The Mimosa sailed for Smyrna, and on her homeward voyage she was lost with all on board. I was named after my uncle Chandler and my brother Louis after my uncle Bartlett.

I could other tales unfold, but rest assured, gentlemen, the men of Cape Cod well know the dangers of the sea and appreciate the work of the life-savers, who risk their lives to save others.

Mr. Chairman, before I discuss the coast-guard bill I wish to dwell briefly on the United States Life-Saving Service, its early history, the duties performed and pay received by the men to-day, and the necessity for this piece of legislation.

The Massachusetts Humane Society, originally founded in 1786, was a private benevolent society organized to furnish relief to shipwrecked sailors by building huts with life-saving equipment on the coast of Massachusetts, and it originated its coast service 36 years before England. In 1847 Congress made its first appropriation, $5,000, for rendering assistance to those shipwrecked on the coast, and in subsequent years further appropriations were made for lifeboats and houses on the New England and New Jersey coasts and the coasts of North and South Carolina, Florida, and Texas, and on the Great Lakes.

Dependence was placed upon volunteers to make use of a very inadequate equipment, and as there were no regular crews stationed at the few life-saving stations then established, and no responsible custodian in care of the equipment and property, the inefficiency of the Life-Saving Service as it then existed was soon apparent to all. In spite of many wrecks and disasters, Congress refused to make adequate provision. In 1853 a bill which provided for the increase and repairs of the stations and guardianship of the lifeboats passed the Senate, but did not pass the House. In 1869 a bill providing for regular crews of surfmen was defeated in Congress, which passed an inadequate bill. It was not until 1871 that, after the passage by Congress of a bill with an appropriation of $200,000, the present United States Life-Saving Service may be said to have had its birth.

Capt. Sumner I. Kimball, the present very able general superintendent of the United States Life-Saving Service, and at that time in charge of the Revenue-Cutter Service, immediately took steps to organize and put on as good a basis as possible the Life-Saving Service, which at first was a part of the Revenue Service.

Between 1874 and 1880 the United States tried to carry on its Life-Saving Service on the Great Lakes on the volunteer system, giving each man $10 for his services on each occasion when they were required. The results were so unsatisfactory that in 1880 Congress found it necessary to authorize the employment of regular crews. That this Life-Saving Service has paid for its cost many and many times over will be shown by the statistics which I shall cite later on. To-day the United States Life-Saving Service has 279 stations, to be found in these States: Maine, New Hamphire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Texas, Ohio, Kentucky, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Washington, Oregon, California, including one in Alaska.

What is the urgency for the passage at the earliest moment possible of this meritorious bill known as the coast-guard bill, which the Senate passed last March? Let us examine the conditions of service of these men. At present the life-saving stations on the Atlantic and Gulf coast are open for 10 months of the year and on the Great Lakes about 8½ months, and the surfmen receive $65 per month while on active duty and nothing while the stations are closed. Although they receive 30 cents a day for rations, they must provide out of their own pockets their uniforms, rubber boots, and oilskins, which cost about $45 the first year of service. The allowance of 30 cents a day, or 10 cents per meal, for rations for these men, who must live at the stations away from their families, is not a large sum. Moreover, on $65 per month for 8 or 10 months these surfmen are supposed to bring up their families and to set aside a fund to provide for illness and old age. This is plainly impossible. The No. 1 surfman receives $70 per month; the keepers, $1,000 per annum; and the district superintendent, $2,200 per annum.

This service requires picked men, sound in body, and quick in mind, with thorough knowledge of the sea and boatmanship, and they are tested by a thorough examination before they can be appointed. They are required to patrol the coast by day and night to warn vessels away from danger, go to the rescue of any vessels, her crew and passengers, or anyone else who is in danger. They must be prepared to launch their boats in the teeth of a bitter gale and storm, with the wind blowing 50 miles an hour and the thermometer perhaps below zero, and row hours at a stretch to rescue some one in distress. They must be ready at any moment of the night or day when duty calls them to risk their lives to save others. They must understand the currents and tides and be experts at handling their boats, for the slightest mistake by an inexperienced man means loss of life both to the crew and those whom they are endeavoring to rescue. Every night, whether vessels are in sight or not, they must patrol the beach for a watch of four hours. On Cape Cod and elsewhere where the stations are but 5 or 10 miles apart the solitary surfman who starts on his nightly patrol of four hours is required to walk until he meets another surfman from the nearest life-saving station, with whom he exchanges a check.

I give here an extract from the weekly transcript of journal used by the life-saving stations, showing the patrol work required of these men:

Weekly transcript of journal.

——— ——— Station. District No. ———

Sunday, ——— ———, 191—

Condition of the surf.

Midnight.	Sunrise.	Noon.	Sunset.
Smooth	Smooth	Smooth	Smooth
Light	Light	Light	Light
Moderate	Moderate	Moderate	Moderate
Strong	Strong	Strong	Strong
Rough	Rough	Rough	Rough
High	High	High	High
Very high	Very high	Very high	Very high

Weather conditions at—	Wind.		State of weather.	Barometer.	Thermometer.
	Direction.	Force.
Midnight
Sunrise
Noon
Sunset

PATROLS AND WATCHES.

[In the blank spaces below enter the names and numbers of men on patrol and watch duty, the time of each, and direction patroled. The patrols from all stations in a district (except as otherwise specifically authorized) shall be made in the same direction at the same time.]

Patrol.			Period of time.[1]	Station and day watches.
No.	Name.	Direction.		No.	Name.
			Midnight to .....a. m.
			..... a. m. to 4 a. m.
			4 a. m. to sunrise.
			Sunrise to 8 a. m.
			8 a. m. to noon.
			Noon to 4 p. m.
			4 p. m. to sunset.
			Sunset to.....p. m.
			..... p. m. to 8 p. m.
			8 p. m. to ..... p. m.
			.....p. m. to midnight

[1] Where a schedule other than that indicated is used, the time should be written in nearest corresponding spaces, beginning each day with first watch after midnight.

Answer such questions as apply to your station:

Have all patrol checks been properly exchanged?———

Do patrol clock dials show indentations at the proper times?———

Were telephonic reports made from patrol limits and properly recorded by station watch?———

RECORD OF ABSENCES AND SUBSTITUTES.

Member of crew absent. (Including keeper.)	Exact period of absence. (Hours and dates.)	Cause of absence.	Name of substitute.

Vessels sighted from station this day:	General remarks. (Under this head are to be stated all transactions relating to house or service.)
Ships
Barks
Brigs
Schooners Steamers
Sloops
Barges in tow

(If more space is needed, use letter paper.)

Each year these men must pass a thorough medical examination before they can sign for the ensuing year, for they must continue to be physically sound in order to remain in the service. Frequently, as rheumatic or heart symptoms become apparent from the performance of their duty, or perhaps weakness of the eyes from exposure in stormy weather on the nightly patrol to the biting sand and shore, these men are dropped without consideration except a maximum pay of two years to themselves or to their widows should they be killed while on duty.

If time and space permitted, I could cite many deeds of heroism performed by the life-savers of my district, and also some sad cases which have been brought to my personal knowledge when men have been obliged to quite the service owing to physical infirmities contracted in the service. Broken down in health, without sufficient money to pay for medical aid or to provide for their families, these cases were truly pathetic. Sometimes these men have died in the poorhouse.

To show that this service, under the present conditions, is suffering for want of men, I will quote from the public hearings held on this bill.

TESTIMONY BY THE SUPERINTENDENTS.

Capt. Kimball, General Superintendent of the United States Life-Saving Service, testified before the House committee:

We have great difficulty in getting competent men. In some of the districts we have no names on the eligible list from which to make certifications. As the matter stands now, the men grow old in the service at a rate of pay that barely supports them and their families, if, indeed, it does that at all times, and when these men become disabled in the line of duty or by age, they have to leave the service with nothing to live upon.

Capt. Dominy, superintendent of the fourth district, testified before the Senate committee:

We can not get men.

Capt. Chapman, superintendent of the tenth district, testified:

My own district averages from 25 to 30 per cent of vacancies in the crews, which are filled constantly by temporary men, who, to a large degree, are unskilled. The cry to-day from the keeper is, "Give me men; give me skilled men." The Buffalo crew last year had one enlisted man and seven temporaries. The Cleveland crew has about the same.

Capt. Kiah, superintendent of the eleventh district, testified:

I have trouble in not getting enough men. We are short, and have been.

Capt. Bowley, superintendent of the second district, testified:

We can not get good men to enter the service. There is nothing to care for them if they are disabled on patrol or regular work, and they simply will not come in.

Capt. Cole, superintendent of the fifth district, testified:

The personnel of the service is deteriorating rapidly.

Capt. Tunnell, superintendent of the sixth district, testified:

I am losing good men in my district—No. 1 men, very valuable fellows—because they don't see any prospect of advancement in the future, and they are going into commercial business.

Capt. Harding, superintendent of the first district, testified:

Our service is getting impaired. We can not get men, and why? You hold out no inducement for promotion. You hold out no reward. * * * I feel if you are going to pass the bill it should take effect immediately on its passage. Some of us may be dead before it becomes effective. We have sent men to their graves broken-hearted because the United States Congress, on their part, has not done something for us.

I wish we had the eloquence with which to go before the United States Senate and tell something of what has been done in the trying work of saving human lives.

Senator NELSON. Why does it require a brave man to be an efficient man in this service?

Mr. HARDING. The men who would be willing to lay down their lives and die with those they are trying to save—which should be the characteristics of every man in the service—are the men we want.

Senator NELSON. Are they called upon to do that, to do those things whereby they practically lay down their lives?

Mr. HARDING. Called upon! They are expected to do it, and that is why we are all to-day begging to get such men.

Gentlemen, I trust you will excuse me. I know I have been taking up too much of your time, but I would like to have these men come and tell you what it is to patrol the beach at night, alone and far away from human habitation. If a man falls and breaks a leg, or is injured in any way, it is death unless he has a signal in his pocket or some one hears his cries. It has happened, to my knowledge, and I know it has happened within the knowledge of the other gentlemen. The signal which gives light to warn vessels of danger is the means of saving his life. When some of you gentlemen would hesitate to go out in a storm to post a letter we, gentlemen, are patrolling the beach—north, east, south, and west—only 2 or 3 miles, perhaps, down the beach, but when you are coming back it seems like 10. We have been on the beach with a pocket handkerchief across our faces, and the sand cutting our eyes and getting into our ears, listening for what? The cry for help; and there is a great difficulty before you get there, Mr. Senator. A trained man, an experienced man, possesses instinct. Oftentimes they will hear a vessel which something tells them is in distress when a green hand will be whistling the latest song from an opera. He does not care as long as he gets his pay and 24 hours' leave. But the trained man is the man who always manifests the greatest human interest when he sees a wreck offshore.

Capt. Morgan, superintendent of the seventh district, testified:

We have had some trouble in getting men, and a good many of them are leaving the service. They find occupations that will pay them better.

STATEMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

The Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. W. G. McAdoo, in a letter dated August 25, 1913, to the Senate Committee on Commerce, stated—

That the officers and men of the Life-Saving Service are entitled to the benefits of retirement seems to be generally conceded, the principle being based upon the public sentiment which created retired lists for the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Revenue-Cutter Service, because of the extra hazardous duty connected with the work performed.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report, published on December 7, 1914, states:

It is again earnestly recommended that the coast guard bill, contemplating the consolidation of the Revenue-Cutter Service and the Life-Saving Service, be enacted into law. The measure has already passed the Senate and is now pending in the House of Representatives. This will greatly increase the efficiency of these two valuable arms of the Government.

The House Report No. 682, which accompanies the coast guard bill, states:

During the past fiscal year about 11½ per cent of the total force have either been discharged for physical disability or declined to continue in the service under existing conditions. In several of the districts it appears to be impossible to secure sufficient men to fill the current vacancies, and in one district particularly there are 58 vacancies and not a man on the eligible list. It is believed that the organization of the coast guard as proposed will remedy the existing evils and save this highly meritorious branch of the public service from decadence, inevitable unless the service is made more attractive.

The same report also gives the history of the Revenue-Cutter and Life-Saving Services, as follows:

HISTORY.

The Revenue-Cutter Service was founded in 1790, and was the first regularly organized armed maritime service of the Government. It has taken a conspicuous part in every maritime war in which this country has been engaged, and its military status has been fixed by Congress. Its officers and men have the benefits of retirement, military titles, courts-martial, and they rank with officers of the Army and Navy.

The Life-Saving Service was originated in the Revenue-Cutter Service, as hereinbefore stated, and for several years after its inception was operated under its direction. It became a separately organized service in 1878, but since that time officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service have been detailed as the inspectors and drillmasters of the Life-Saving Service.

During the Spanish-American War the Life-Saving Service along the Atlantic and Gulf coasts was temporarily transferred to the jurisdiction of the Navy Department, and operated as a coast patrol and signal service. As such an auxiliary to the Regular Navy its services were found to be of great value from a military standpoint.

"GIVE US MEN."

All along the coast of our country the story is the same. It is the same cry, "Give us men." The service is deteriorating. The young men of the type described refuse to enlist, and seek better-paid employments, such as fishing, operating motor boats, and other pursuits, and the older men, broken down sometimes in body, mind, and purse are leaving the service. These facts are indisputable. Let us examine the conditions which the Life-Saving Service faces to-day and the provisions of relief to be furnished by the coast guard bill:

EXISTING CONDITIONS SOUGHT TO BE REMEDIED.

1. Owing to insufficient pay and lack of a retired list, practically one-third of the life-saving stations are now either undermanned or manned with inefficient men.

2. An average of 11 men a year die in the service from disease or exposure incident to the hazardous duties.

3. In addition an average of 29 men are discharged annually before the expiration of their enlistments on account of physical unfitness, developed as incident to exposure and their hazardous duties.

4. The Revenue-Cutter Service and the Life-Saving Service, both devoted in the main to the saving of life and property from the ravages of the sea, are now operated as distinct organizations, although formerly administered by one executive head.

WHAT THE COAST GUARD BILL CONTEMPLATES.

1. Great increase in the efficiency of the Life-Saving Service by—

(a) Combining both services under one executive head.

(b) Providing a retired list for the men on account of age or after 30 years' service.

(c) Giving the men of the Life-Saving Service longevity pay for reenlistments.

(d) Giving the men of the Life-Saving Service clothing allowance, and medical attention from the Public Health Service.

(e) In lieu of a pension list for the dependents of those who lost their lives in the service a sum of money equivalent to two years' pay is given. This is much more economical for the Government than a pension.

2. It creates a naval reserve of about 4,100 trained and highly efficient officers and men, ready at a moment's notice to operate under the Navy Department whenever the President directs.

3. The coast guard constitutes a naval reserve without any additional cost to the Government as such, as the saving of life and property at all times is worth much more to the people than its cost of maintenance.

4. It places on the retired list at three-quarters pay Sumner I. Kimball, now 80 years of age, the man who founded the Life-Saving System and who has devoted the best years of his life to its upbuilding—a fitting tribute to one the effects of whose humanitarian efforts will last for ages.

WHAT THE COAST GUARD BILL DOES NOT DO.

1. It does not create, nor inaugurate in any manner, a civil retired list, as this bill especially provides that the coast guard shall be distinctly a branch of the military forces of the Government.

2. It does not in any way increase the number of employees of the Government.

3. It raises no basic salaries. All increases in pay are due to length of service only.

4. It does not increase the pay or allowances of any commissioned officer of the Revenue-Cutter Service.

WHAT IT WILL COST.

All the advantages of this bill, both to the Government and to the men, will be brought about at a maximum total increased cost of but $400,000 per annum, which is less than 8 per cent of the present annual cost for the entire maintenance and operation of the two existing services.

WHAT THE COAST GUARD BILL PROVIDES.

Mr. Chairman, the coast guard bill combines the Life-Saving Service with the Revenue-Cutter Service in the coast guard, operating in times of peace under the Secretary of the Treasury, as at present, but in time of war the coast guard shall be under the orders of the Secretary of the Navy or the direction of the President.

The officers and enlisted men of the coast guard will be entitled, as a part of our naval forces, to certain benefits due those engaged in an extra hazardous service, which, briefly, are these:

The surfmen will receive—

First. Retirement at 64 years of age, or after 30 years of service or for disability, on a retirement allowance of 75 per cent of their active-duty pay.

Second. Longevity pay, amounting to $1 per month increase for each three years of service.

Third. Clothing allowance of $45 for the first year and $20 for each subsequent year.

Fourth. Free treatment in the Government hospitals.

Fifth. Rations as at present.

The superintendents, keepers, and No. 1 surfmen will receive—

First. Longevity pay at the rate of 10 per cent increase for each five years of service up to 20 years of service and retirement and other provisions as provided for surfmen.

While I should like to see the pay of the surfmen increased in corresponding amount, and also a more liberal provision in case of death while in the service, yet I realize that the sum of $397,700 estimated by the Treasury Department as the annual expense required under the bill, including about $40,000 additional to the Revenue-Cutter Service, is all that reasonably can be asked for of Congress, and I believe it will accomplish the desired results at this time.

VALUE OF THE LIFE-SAVING SERVICE AS A NAVAL AUXILIARY IN WAR.

During the Spanish-American War Congress found it necessary to pass a special act—reported by Congressman MANN, of Illinois—on June 7, 1898, to keep the life-saving stations upon the Atlantic and Gulf coasts open throughout the months of June and July for the purpose of forming a part of the Coast Signal Service. This was done at the request of the Secretary of the Navy and with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The entire resources of the Life-Saving Service on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, including 1,443 men, were at once transferred to the Coast Signal Service, under the direct supervision of Capt. John R. Bartlett, United States Navy.

That officer, in making his official report to the Navy Department at the close of the war, made the following statements concerning the value of the Life-Saving Service as a military adjunct:

The necessity of covering the long stretch of coast between these isolated stations was at once apparent, and the value of the Life-Saving Service became self-evident. These crews constantly patrol the beaches from Maine to Texas, and no vessel can approach within sight of the coast and escape their attention.

The result of my experience leads me to believe that the Coast Signal Service should be an integral part of a naval coast-defense system, as it is most intimately connected with it, and should be in closer relation than that of an allied branch. * * *

Another valuable result of the experiment has been to demonstrate the great usefulness of the life-saving stations for the purposes of observation and international code signaling. * * *

In concluding his report he made a number of finite recommendations to the Secretary of the Navy, the first one of which follows:

That each life-saving station should be made a coast signal station, for the reason that they are all connected with each other by telephone and their system of the patrol of the beach places almost the entire coast line under constant observation. Moreover, the men in this service are trained to see everything that floats within the range of vision, are trustworthy and well disciplined, and are already excellent signalmen with the international code.

THE COAST GUARD AND NATIONAL DEFENSE.

While the question of national defense now more than ever before is brought into prominence it is well to consider the advantages of the coast guard from a strictly military standpoint.

The added efficiency which will be given to the Life-Saving Service under the terms of this bill will make available in the coast guard for immediate service in connection with the defense of our seacoasts a corps of approximately 4,100 trained officers and men, all in the best physical condition and all accustomed to life on the seas. The very nature of their emergent duties in peace times will make them quick of action, resourceful, and disciplined, all of which, it must be admitted, are absolutely essential to success in modern sea fighting.

Aside from the fact that the coast guard will be worth more to the country by its saving of the lives and property of its citizens than it actually costs, its value as a part of any scheme for the national defense can not be overestimated. Simply by a stroke of the pen the President can transfer this highly efficient corps of men, armed, trained, and disciplined, into the regular Naval Establishment at any time, whether in peace or in war. In strictly warlike pursuits it can not be denied that they will be the equal of any similar number of men in the regular Naval Establishment. This asset of military preparedness must therefore not be overlooked when appraising the value of the coast guard to the Government.

CASUALTIES IN THE LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

Since the organization of the Life-Saving Service up to January 1, 1914, there have been 320 deaths directly incident to the exposure and hazards of duty along the coasts. In the past decade there has been an average of 11.7 deaths each year. The causes of these losses are principally drowning and pulmonary diseases incident to exposure in the lifeboats or from patrolling the beaches in severe weather. There have been three deaths due to lightning striking the surfmen while out on patrol on desolate beaches, they being the only objects in the vicinity projecting above the level of the beach.

The average given is not representative of the actual losses of life incident to exposure, as the men in the Life-Saving Service are enlisted every year, and at each reenlistment they are examined and must be found physically sound or else they are rejected. Hence there are many instances where surfmen have contracted diseases on account of exposure while in the service, have been rejected when applying for reenlistment, and have died subsequently. Such cases have not, of course, been included in the list of deaths.

By far the most regrettable procedure incident to the existing conditions in the Life-Saving Service is the fact that during the past 10 years it has been found necessary to discharge an average of 29 of the enlisted men of the service before the expiration of their term of enlistment on account of physical disability incurred in line of duty.

It is on account of such severe conditions as the above that it is impossible to obtain and keep efficient men to man the various stations.

In three important particulars the statistical record of the operations of the Life-Saving Establishment for the last fiscal year, ending June 30, 1914, shows larger totals than are to be found in any similar annual enumeration of results in the history of the service, namely, the number of vessels reported as having suffered accident or disaster, the number of persons on board said vessels, and the value of the property (vessels and cargoes) exposed to damage or loss.

A summary of the year's casualty record of the service follows:

Number of vessels involved	1,937
Vessels totally lost	82
Persons on board	9,296
Lives actually saved	4,762
Lives lost	38
Persons succored	1,920
Days' succor afforded	1,234

Value of vessels involved	$17,304,840
Value of cargoes	4,203,020
Total value of property involved	21,507,860
Value of property saved	18,783,200
Value of property lost	2,724,660

SERVICE OF THE LIFE SAVERS ON INTERIOR WATERS.

The benefits of the coast guard will not be confined to the coasts of the Atlantic, Pacific, Gulf, and Great Lakes.

At all times when practicable the life savers have been sent to interior waters whenever great floods have worked havoc with lives and property along the banks of our great rivers. Within only the past 18 months two notable examples of these beneficial efforts have arisen.

The great floods which inundated the Ohio Valley during the months of March and April, 1913, are fresh in the memories of all. The whole country was horror stricken at the appalling results of the raging waters in portions of West Virginia, Kentucky, Illinois, Missouri, and Tennessee. The calls for help did not go unheeded by the United States Life-Saving Service. Seven crews were immediately dispatched to the scenes of distress, and other crews were held in readiness for immediate response in case the conditions grew worse.

In spite of almost insurmountable difficulties of transportation the crews arrived at the localities where their services were most badly needed, and immediate steps were taken to relieve suffering humanity. People were taken from house tops to places of safety, food and clothing were distributed to those in need, and in every conceivable way within the limit of their resources assistance was rendered to the stricken people. One of the many notable incidents was the rescuing of all the occupants of an orphan asylum at Fort Wayne, Ind., under most trying circumstances, without a single mishap.

The net result of the efforts of the seven life-saving crews during this particular flood was the rescuing and succoring of 3,509 persons and the saving of property valued at $30,000 which otherwise would have been lost.

FLOODS IN TEXAS.

In the early part of December, 1913, the overflowing of the Brazos and Colorado Rivers in the south-central part of Texas almost entirely inundated several counties. At once three life-saving crews and the revenue cutter Windom were sent to the flooded districts. Many of the unfortunate inhabitants were in a starving condition and in danger of being drowned. After many hazardous experiences quantities of food and clothing were distributed to the beleaguered people, and many of them were rescued and taken to places of safety. In all, 803 persons were either saved from drowning or given succor.

Many commendatory letters from prominent citizens and relief committees were received testifying to the very valuable assistance rendered by these coast life-savers. The Galveston central relief committee, through its chairman, wrote the Secretary of the Treasury that "their work was performed under the greatest difficulties, and, we are very glad, indeed, to add, cheerfully and willingly."

EQUIPMENT AND RESULTS.

As at present constituted the combined Revenue-Cutter and Life-Saving Services when merged into the coast guard will embrace the following:

Number of ships:
Seagoing	25
Harbor tugs and launches	19
		44
Number of coast-guard stations		279
Total authorized personnel, including commissioned officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men		4,093

RESULTS.

As indicative of the work which will be performed by the coast guard the following results of the operations of the two services when acting independently during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, may be taken to show the great importance of the proposed coast guard to the public:

Number of persons actually rescued from peril	5,238
Number of vessels to which assistance was rendered	2,147
Number of persons on board vessels assisted	10,983
Derelicts or obstructions to navigation destroyed or removed	31
Value of vessels assisted, including cargoes	$24,386,191
Cost of maintenance and operation for year 1914	$4,781,949

It will thus be seen that for the expenditure of each dollar for the coast guard there can be expected a conservation of not less than $5.09 worth of property of the public from the perils of the sea.

With the added efficiency which will undoubtedly follow the passage of this act even greater returns than this can reasonably be expected, and this without taking into consideration the humanitarian feature of the thousands of lives saved every year.

President Wilson indorses the coast-guard bill.

WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, December 19, 1914.

Hon. OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. UNDERWOOD: I hope that you will not think I am unduly burdening you if I write to express my very great interest in the bill which has been passed by the Senate and is pending in the House which provides for the consolidation of the Revenue-Cutter and Life-Saving Services. It is of the highest consequence for the efficiency of both services that this bill should pass, and I hope that some chink may be found for it even in the rush hours of the House Calendar.

With warmest regards,

Faithfully, yours, WOODROW WILSON.

Mr. Chairman, are not the statements and evidence submitted by the superintendents of the Life-Saving Service and the Treasury Department conclusive? Shall we not join together in the support of this meritorious bill? Mr. Speaker, whatever I may have accomplished in the two brief years I have had the honor of serving in this Congress, I have the satisfaction of knowing that I have served with many patriotic and distinguished men. I have tried to do my duty as I saw it and to give the best that was in me for the people of my district and country. I am glad to have had the opportunity of working with other distinguished men for this splendid piece of legislation. We have many heroes and heroines in our country, but there are no greater heroes than these life-savers, the heroes of peace.

I ask the Members of the House to give their hearty indorsement to the coast-guard bill.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to occupy any time, but have asked for a few minutes because I have just been informed that before I came into the Chamber the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] said something about a great lobby which he alleged has been at work to promote the passage of this bill. I never heard even so much as an intimation of this alleged lobby until I was told of that statement having been made by the gentleman from Illinois. I come from a city which has one of these life-saving stations. If any member of that crew or any friend of any member of the crew has written me one word in advocacy of the pending bill, I do not now recall it. The only person who has ever spoken to me on the subject, as I now remember, is the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THACHER]. He said to me in a letter, and he has said to me two or three times in person, that it is a good bill. I told him that I was of the same opinion. I have seen life-saving crews go out in storms, and $65 a month is slight compensation for men whose life work it is to face such dangers.

Mr. THACHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. THACHER. I suppose that the gentleman is aware that I crossed Lake Michigan many, many times, and knew the lake and something about the dangers that men incur on the Great Lakes, and I spoke to the gentleman for that reason.

Mr. COOPER. If there be any lobby, I am not a victim of its contaminating touch. The whole proposition that there is a lobby organized by a lot of poor men, nine-tenths of whom work for $65 a month, a lobby organized to influence the Congress of the United States, would have seemed to me, if uttered by anyone else than the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, to be so preposterous that I should have labeled it utterly ridiculous.

The reasons for the enactment of this bill into law are stated with force by the Secretary of the Treasury in his letter, which appears in the report of the committee. If the statements made by him are true—and of course they are—then I see no valid objection to the bill, but, on the contrary, every reason why it should become a law. He tells of stations where there are 58 vacancies and not a man on the cligible list. I wish to relate a little experience. I heard a man at the station in my city——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota to yield me one minute more.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER. I have not been to the station in my city for the last four or five years. The members of that crew are not political workers for me. All I wish of them is that they shall be strong enough and courageous enough to save men's lives and property. As I said, I once heard a man at that station say that the strong men of the service were often picked up by the managers of big corporations. In their large plants there is constant need for men of robust physique, men of great physical strength, and those managers know that on the average the members of life-saving crews must be such men. Accordingly these big corporations pick them out from time to time at better wages. That is one of the reasons why the Life-Saving Service can not keep them. The other reasons are advanced by the Secretary of the Treasury in his letter, and these seem to me unanswerable.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does not the gentleman think it would be better to pay them better wages than to create a retired list with a permanent pension?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE. I do not wish to discuss the bill further than to say that both the Revenue-Cutter Service and the Life-Saving Service are entitled to all praise for the special services they perform. Both of them are familiar to those of us who live along the coast line, and we are proud of their work. I have here the views of the Maritime Exchange of Philadelphia, approving the pending bill, and this I shall incorporate in my remarks:

PHILADELPHIA, April 2, 1914.

To the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

At a meeting of the executive committee of the Philadelphia Maritime Exchange held the 2d day of April, 1914, the following preamble and resolution was unanimously adopted, and is respectfully submitted for your information:

"Whereas action on bill S. 2337, entitled 'An act to create the coast guard by combining therein the existing Life-Saving Service and the Revenue-Cutter Service,' is now pending in the National House of Representatives; and

"Whereas this proposed measure has received the earnest indorsement of the Secretary and Assistant Secretary of the Treasury; and

"Whereas the Revenue-Cutter and Life-Saving Services, since their organization as separate bureaus, have worked in conjunction and the officers of the former service have been detailed to instruct, drill, and inspect the crews of the various life-saving stations; and

"Whereas the provisions of the proposed bill appertaining to retirement and pensions are in direct accord with views previously expressed by this exchange: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Philadelphia Maritime Exchange, believing that maritime commercial interests will be conserved by the consolidation of the Revenue-Cutter and Life-Saving Services as proposed in bill S. 2337, hereby indorses the measure and respectfully asks the cooperation of the Members of Congress from Philadelphia to assist in the enactment of the same into law."

THE PHILADELPHIA MARITIME EXCHANGE,
By J. S. W. HOLTON, President.

Attest:

E. R. SHARWOOD, Secretary.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCGUIRE].

Mr. MCGUIRE of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, we have not any storms at sea in my district, yet we sometimes see storms. This is a service to which ordinarily I have never given any attention. I am always willing to leave matters of this kind to the good judgment of Members immediately concerned and who have immediate general and detail knowledge, but I had occasion not long ago to observe the dangers to which these men are exposed, and while there has been some effort to put them upon all fours with the service in the Army and the service in the Navy, if I were to attempt to select the most hazardous service of the Government I should certainly say that it is that of these life-savers. Why, their very business is exposure of some kind almost every hour, almost every minute that they are employed. There is a retired list in the Army and a retired list in the Navy; then we come to a service, always exposed, always in danger, always hazardous, and yet there is no retirement provision. I confess, gentlemen, that I do not quite understand why we should not want to retire these men. They must be men of the best physical attainments, and ought to be men—and I presume generally are—of good judgment. You take them during the best portion of their lives, when they could be preparing a business foundation to keep them after they are unable to sustain themselves longer. They are employed by the Government, no opportunity to build for the future, and it seems to me under those circumstances we ought to retire them on sufficient pay to keep them. This would keep them in a meager way, that is all.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCGUIRE of Oklahoma. I will.

Mr. POWERS. The gentleman says they are engaged in a hazardous service. So are engineers on interstate trains. What would the gentleman think of retiring them on three-quarters pay at certain ages?

Mr. MCGUIRE of Oklahoma. I am speaking now of this service as a hazardous service. If there is any other service of the Government of equal hazard, then I would retire that service in the same way. [Applause.]

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCGUIRE of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The question propounded by the gentleman from Kentucky was in reference to engineers employed on interstate railways. I desire to suggest to the gentleman that they are not under a Government service. The gentleman is addressing himself to employees under a Government service.

Mr. MCGUIRE of Oklahoma. I realize the force of the suggestion of the gentleman from Virginia, and, I take it, that answers the inquiry of the gentleman.

Mr. POWERS rose.

Mr. MCGUIRE of Oklahoma. I have only five minutes—I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. POWERS. Is there any special reason for putting men on the retired list with pay because they are in Government service over other men engaged in other services?

Mr. MCGUIRE of Oklahoma. For this class of service we are responsible in respect to its proper control and proper remuneration. Our obligation does not extend to private service, as suggested by the gentleman from Virginia. Now, here are two services, I understand, partially separate. Here is what the Secretary of the Treasury had to say. He seems to be for this bill——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of New York. Mr. Chairman, some months ago I had the privilege of presenting to the House some remarks in connection with this bill now under consideration. Since those remarks are available to the membership of this House, I shall address myself to what has just been said by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. It is with some temerity that I match my inexperience in this House against his many years of active service here as a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which has jurisdiction over the questions involved in this debate, as chairman of that committee, and as minority leader; and yet I venture to state that I have been in a lifeboat a great many more times than the gentleman from Illinois, and I happen to know something about the service.

The gentleman from Illinois described the work of the Life-Saving Service as being "erratic, not continuous." This it undoubtedly is, because, as has been stated here, the surfmen are employed perhaps 8 or 8½ months, depending upon the seasons, on the Great Lakes; for 10 months on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts; and for 12 months on the California coast. Certainly this is not the fault of the Life-Saving Service; it is their misfortune.

The gentleman from Illinois stated that the men in the Life-Saving Service had not only reached the Members of this House, but had gone up until they reached the President of the United States, who, he believed, in his annual message recommended the passage of this bill "without any intimate knowledge of what it contained or what it proposed." Now, I do not pretend to know whether the President of the United States did or did not know what this bill contained when he advocated its passage, but I wish to suggest to this committee that unless the gentleman from Illinois can produce the proof that he did not know what he was advocating, the presumption is certainly in favor of the view that the President of the United States did know what he was doing. A glance at the elaborate report made in advocacy of the passage of this bill by one of his Cabinet officers, the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, certainly places the presumption on the side of the President and not on the side of the gentleman from Illinois.

The gentleman suggests that the pay of the surfmen in the Life-Saving Service, which is $65 per month for the time they are employed, with 30 cents a day for rations, while perhaps not very high pay in itself, is high as compared with the Army, the Navy, and the Revenue-Cutter Service. This is true; but it seems to me that this service is, in a sense, like a glorified war the whole time, because it is a war with the elements. In times of peace the Life-Saving Service, under this bill, will remain under the Secretary of the Treasury, and they will have to fight the elements, while in time of war they will be under the Secretary of the Navy, and then they will have to fight somebody else besides the elements. Furthermore, we have been so fortunate—and I hope may so continue—as to keep out of war most of the time, so that a man enlisting in the Army or the Navy presumably does not face the immediate prospect of a war.

The gentleman asks if this is a very good time to increase unnecessarily the expense of the Government. I would state to the gentleman that the increased expense to the taxpayers by reason of the adoption of this measure, as figured by the Actuary of the Treasury Department, is $397,700 a year. This is equivalent to an added burden of 4 mills per capita, assuming a population of 100,000,000 people in the United States. I have talked to a great many people who object to paying taxes for almost every reason conceivable, but I have yet to find a person who objects to paying his share of the $397,700 tax which this bill would impose. While $397,700 is a large sum of itself, yet it is only four one-hundredths of 1 per cent of the thousand million dollars or more which we annually appropriate for the maintenance of this Government.

The gentleman from Illinois states that the difficulty of getting men in the Life-Saving Service is wholly owing to the fact that they are admitted through the Civil Service Commission, and he wishes to know how many boys along the coast are going to take the trouble to take a civil-service examination for appointment in the Life-Saving Service which may never come to them; where the examination papers, as a rule, will not be examined for three or six months after they take the examination. Now, I can not speak for the whole Life-Saving Service on this particular point, but I have often heard the district superintendent of the Long Island district, in which I live, state that he would not for anything in the world return to the old method by which appointments in the Life-Saving Service were susceptible of political influence. While it is true that the Civil Service Commission has of late been so busy that the papers can not be marked in a less time than three months, yet the very fact that an examination is held makes it impossible to appoint men to the regular service who are not physically qualified to perform their difficult and arduous duties. The gentleman from Illinois refers facetiously to questions asked by the Civil Service Commission which are not pertinent to the occupations for which the candidate is being examined. The civil-service examination which must be passed by each surfman requires a physical examination just preceding the filing of his application, and a second physical examination within the five days next preceding his entrance upon his duties, which second physical examination must be made by a medical officer of the Public Health Service.

The examination further provides that the applicant—

(a) Must be a citizen of the United States.
(b) Must not be under 18 nor over 45 years of age.
(c) Must not be less than 5 feet 5 inches in height.
(d) Must weigh not less than 135 nor more than 205 pounds without clothing.
(e) Must reside within the district in which he seeks employment.
(f) Must be able to read and write the English language.
(g) Must not have passed an examination for surfman within approximately one year next preceding.
(h) Must be a good swimmer.
(i) Must have had at least three years' experience as a surfman; sailor, with incidental experience as row boatman; or row boatman: Provided, That where an applicant has had at least one year's experience in the handling and operating of motor boats in rough water, two years' experience as surfman; sailor, with incidental experience as row boatman; or row boatman shall be considered sufficient: Provided further, That no credit shall be allowed for experience of any kind obtained before the age of 15 years.

The following elements shall be considered in the examination:

(1) Experience; (2) physical ability. These elements shall be weighted as follows in the examination: Experience, 6; physical ability, 4.

I have quoted the above from the regulations of the United States Civil Service Commission. It is found therefore that the examination consists of two physical examinations and a statement properly vouched for of the experience of the applicant. While I admit the annoyance of a delay in receiving a rating, yet I believe that this delay is more than offset in the certainty of receiving into the service only such persons as are abundantly qualified to be part of the crew where the mistake of one may mean the destruction of all, both rescuers and rescued.

The gentleman from Illinois gives the impression that only very young men are sufficiently robust to stand the extraordinary strain to which surfmen are occasionally subjected in attempting to save lives from a wreck. If a life-saving crew consisted of only one man, who rowed the boat and rescued shipwrecked sailors and passengers from vessels, I should agree with him; but the fact of the matter is, as developed in the hearings before the Senate Committee on Commerce—which hearings I not only attended but read with great care—that the efficiency of a crew is determined in very large part by their ability to work together, and this result, of course, can only be obtained by continued practice. As I have stated before, one of the principal reasons for the urgency in passing this bill lies in the fact that under present conditions good men can not be persuaded to remain in the Life-Saving Service for the reason that the present rate of pay, with no retirement, offers them no inducement as compared with private employment. I would especially refer the gentleman to the hearings before the Senate Committee on Commerce, 1914, Part 1, pages 9 to 21; Part 2, pages 23 to 42.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would state that I am sure that there is no Member of this House who has a higher regard for the opinion of the gentleman from Illinois than myself, and yet, as I have said before, I feel constrained to state my opinion to the members of this committee concerning this particular bill with the earnest hope that it may shortly become a law.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, how does the time stand?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia has 6 minutes, the gentleman from Illinois 8 minutes, and the gentleman from Minnesota 13 minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I hope the gentlemen will use their time, as I contemplate only one speech in conclusion; and I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota if he desires to utilize the entire 10 minutes that I put at his disposal, or, if not, will he let me have part of it?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will yield just a few minutes and then I will use what remains after these gentlemen have concluded.

Mr. ADAMSON. I hope the gentleman will not stint himself. I desire to have the gentleman from Minnesota discuss this bill.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I represent a district which has the entire Pacific Ocean shore line of the State of Washington, the entire shore line of the Straits of Juan de Fuca, in all a very large shore line on the north Pacific coast, where many shipwrecks occur and where the Life-Saving Service is extremely limited. We read in the newspapers every few months most thrilling accounts of life-saving in the far Northwest, where these life-savers have gone far out in their boats and remained out for 24 or 36 hours, taking men off of ships and saving many lives. Sometimes that section is spoken of as the graveyard of the Pacific. It would not be so with more lighthouses, more live-saving stations, and larger crews. I believe this bill will greatly perfect the service. A letter was written to me by the wife of one of these captains, who has been at an isolated point for 12 years. To add to their slender income she established, some few years ago, a post office, which is a real benefit of the neighbors and which pays her the small sum of $12 a quarter. In this letter she appeals for a horse for the life-saving crew, extremely limited in numbers, in order to haul the lifeboat over the long stretches of sand when the small crew is exhausted. At that station many thrilling rescues have been made—several within the past year. If some of the gentlemen far from the oceans and the lakes could see some of the great storms that prevail, and realize the desperate work done by the live-saving crews in terrific emergencies, they would not stand against retirement after 30 years' service at small pay.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, how much time did the gentleman from Washington use?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman consumed one minute and a half.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY].

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and I yield back the balance of my time to the gentleman from Minnesota.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Minnesota will consume his time. I would rather hear him speak than to speak myself, and I will reserve all I have left for conclusion.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to occupy any time in the general debate, but at the suggestion of the chairman, and perhaps occupying a somewhat unique position as a convert to the cause, I will use the remainder of my time.

For several years, while I have been a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the honored chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], I opposed this sort of legislation. And I admit that I opposed it for two particular reasons. One was that in former years there was a lobby which infested the committee and besought the members for the passage of such a measure. This year not one person has been about the committee rooms talking to the members about it or spoken to me, that I know of, outside of the committee room, and the fact that a lobby was not here and has not attempted any influence has in part converted me.

Quite often I think one of the uses of a lobby is to prevent the passage of legislation which it may desire.

I have reached a conclusion, not without some difficulty, that the substance of this bill is for the public welfare. The substance of this bill is the retirement feature for the life-saving crews, and the rest of the bill is comparatively insignificant. There are some changes made in the law applicable to the Revenue-Cutter Service in the way of retirement, and I am not altogether certain that such changes ought to have been made or that such rules should be amended now. Indeed, I may suggest an amendment later as the bill is read under the five-minute rule. The principal feature, then, is the provision as to the retirement and increase of longevity pay as to the life-saving force.

I was rather amused at the statement made by my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] as to the comparative danger between the Life-Saving Service and service in the Army and the Navy. I served with great pleasure and profit to myself for quite a number of years on the Committee on Military Affairs, and I have some knowledge of conditions in the Army. The danger in the service in the Army is well illustrated by an incident which occurred while I was calling upon a commander of one of the military departments as they existed several years ago. An orderly came into the general's office upon some errand, and he was a very fine looking, intelligent man. I suggested to the general that it was rather strange that a man of that intelligence should seek service in the Army. So the general asked him how long he had been in the Army, and he replied that he had been in the Army for four or five years. Then the general asked him what service he had previous to his enlistment, and he said that he had been a locomotive fireman. The general said, "Why did you leave the service of locomotive fireman to enlist in the Army?" He said, "I wanted to get a good, safe place." [Laughter.] And I think that illustrates the comparative danger between those who enlist in the Army and those who engage in the Life-Saving Service.

Now, if the facts be true which the department stated and which were laid before the committee in the hearings, there is a deficiency of safe, reliable men in the Life-Saving Service, and it is impossible to secure the services of proper men to the number necessary for the proper performance of the service. As I have seen live-saving crews in my limited experience with them, and I confess it is not large, I have noticed there are some men in the crews, in every one I have seen, who ought not to be there on account of excessive age and physical inability to properly perform the work. The presence of such a man in the crew is a menace to the safety of the crew and a menace to the life and safety of those whom they try to help in the extremities they meet. Those life-saving crews ought to be composed of the best, strongest, and soundest men, and for that reason the authorities of the Treasury Department sought for the passage of this bill, because they believed it would attract that class and so would help preserve the life of the men in the service and the life of the people whom the service is designed to serve. This is the main reason that I believe it should be acceptable. I did not take much stock in the theory that the joining of these two services in one bureau will make for economy. I think that logically they should be in one service, and, in fact, they never should have been separated as they were, I think, in 1878. I think Congress made a mistake then, and it is only rectifying that mistake now. But it is a logical thing to do, not that it will make for economy particularly, but it ought to make for coordination and the improvement of the service of the Treasury Department so far as this bureau and these two divisions are concerned. So this bill does contribute that mite to the public welfare, and that is desirable.

Now, the additional cost of this measure will be divided into two parts: First, the cost of longevity pay and, secondly, the cost of retirement pay. The additional cost of longevity, as I gathered from the report, would be about $214,000, including longevity pay as a part of the retirement pay.

The benefit which would come by reason of the longevity pay would be that it would make professional life-saving men, skillful, courageous, and reliable as long as their service is good for anything, and they will render it to the limit, and when it is no longer good for anything they would be placed on the retired list. This makes for just such service as the country needs in emergencies of commerce and war.

Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] rather objected, and I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objected that the system provided in this bill for retirement of men in the Life-Saving Service is not a just and proper system. There are some objections to it, and some of their criticism was well founded. But at the same time the system provided in this bill, I think, would work out as much or possibly greater economy to the public service than the system of a life pension. Those gentlemen conveyed the idea that they preferred the granting of a life pension to those who were injured.

This provision in the pending bill instead of allowing any pension provides for two years' pay for the heirs of those who lose their lives in the service, and, of course, a retirement pay for those who may be injured. The men in the service seem to be satisfied with that provision, and so far as those men are concerned and their families it is a distinct saving to the Government. So far as those who are not injured and are retired are concerned, it is for the efficiency of the service that such a provision is made.

When the bill came from the committee there was a suggestion from those who are interested in it that the House committee should make no amendment. We made such amendments as we thought necessary. I have no doubt that others will occur when the bill is taken up for discussion under the five-minute rule. Considering the whole subject it seems to me that, first, it does make a service which can be used as a part of the naval defense, because it is always under military discipline. It can be of some use without waiting for the separate establishment of a part of the military service, and can be easily made a branch of our military defense; secondly, it is an improvement to an important part of our commercial public service. Our Nation now does very valuable work along that line, more than does any other nation on earth, but since we assume the responsibility, it ought to be done in the best way possible, and this increase in the appropriation will be met by a greatly increased efficiency on the part of those whom we enlist in this important service.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman tell me what sort of naval service these men will render? I am not opposed to the bill, but I would like to know what sort of military service these coast guards would render. I have lived with these men for 25 years, and I know them well. I would be glad to know what military service they would perform.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The gentleman is well acquainted with the naval service. He knows well that the Revenue-Cutter part of this naval system will go into storms and waters where naval vessels never go and would not dare to go.

Mr. BUTLER. That is right as to the first. Now come to the second.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will do it in my own time. Secondly, these life-savers will always patrol the shore. They will furnish an efficient means of communication, so that if any means is necessary for detecting the approach of a hostile fleet or the approach of light hostile craft, or anything like that, sufficient information will be obtained. They cover the entire coast, know how to do it most completely, and that is worth something to have such an organization always at hand——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think the proponents of this measure have made out a fairly good case for these Life-Saving Service people in the matter of pay. They ought not to be underpaid, but it seems to me the common-sense remedy for the difficulty is to give them better monthly pay and not to swell the already swollen pension system by adding materially to it. But to do it in the way proposed, it seems to me, would be vicious; that is, to give them 10 per cent increase of pay for every five years of service, not to exceed 40 per cent of the pay of their grade. To do that and then to retire them will be to retire them at a much higher rate of pay than any of the enlisted soldiers or sailors of the Government now get.

Then the suggestion made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS] that railway locomotive engineers undergo as much hardship as these people is altogether pertinent and not so absurd as some gentlemen seem to think. We have authorized the construction of railways in Alaska. The locomotive engineers on those roads will be servants of the Government, and they can use this precedent plausibly and apply for retirement pay; and if certain other legislation that has been proposed in this House is to become a law, it will not be very long until we shall have the Government engaged in transporting products across the seas, and then masters of ships, captains, and first and second officers, and seamen generally will be in the Government service and will be entitled to three-quarters pay, or should be entitled to it, under this as a precedent, when they are compelled by old age or physical breakdown to retire.

Now, there is another great element in our country which contributes as much, and, in my judgment, vastly more, to the public good than do these people, worthy as they are and commendable as is their work. I mean the farmers. They are exposed to the elements. They labor in the heat, and they labor in the cold; and if we are to establish a pension system generally, if we are to spread it until it covers all branches of the public service, how can we deny the farmers and the mechanics the right to share in this largess of the Government?

Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to call a halt on pension legislation. I shall gladly vote for an increase of pay for these men, if that is proposed, but I shall certainly vote against the measure as it is presented.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, my distinguished friend from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], in endeavoring to prove that service in the Army was safe, gave an instance which came under his observation where a man who had been a locomotive fireman, receiving pay of from $100 to $150 a month, left that job and enlisted in the Army at $16 a month because it was safer. I can explain that easily enough: The man simply lied. That was not the reason he went into the Army. [Laughter.]

Now, this bill provides for men who left the Army going into the Life-Saving Service. I would not say they left the Army to go into the Life-Saving Service because it was safer. At the time of the Indian wars the Army was a very dangerous proposition. It may be at any time. Either service may be hazardous.

My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] thinks the suggestion that there was any lobby in connection with this bill is ridiculous. Why, of course they did not go to my friend from Wisconsin. They found out how he would vote and lined him up long ago. They do not have to ask him now. They knew how he would vote. Speaking immediately before him was the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Moss], and immediately following him was the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCGUIRE]. Neither one of these gentleman has any occasion to know anything about this bill unless somebody has called his attention to it. Both made speeches in favor of it. Why? Presumably because somebody had called their attention to it in a legitimate way.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MANN. I will yield for a question.

Mr. COOPER. Does the gentleman remember that I said the only person who had spoken to me on the subject was a Member of the House, Mr. THACHER?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I know that; but the gentleman probably will not know that the life-savers in his district knew how he stood on this bill, and he admitted that he had neither read the bill nor the report until to-day. Lobbies do not come to Washington any more. They never did very much. Lobbying is done from home. The lobby in favor of the oleomargarine bill was the most powerful lobby that ever affected a bill in Congress; but that lobby was not in Washington. It was at home. Chambers of commerce and other associations in all the cities along the coast have passed resolutions in favor of this bill. Why? How did they learn about it? Well, it was not by second sight. They have been working on this thing for years. I served for a long time on a committee that dealt with the matter, and have received many letters from men scattered all over the United States and copies of resolutions passed by people who did not know what was in the bill, and did not pretend to, but who favored it. Now, I do not take any exception to that. I think that is perfectly legitimate. I am not condemning their methods, but they ought not to be too influential. Yet I realize that in this House—the most profligate in the wasting of the public money that ever assembled in this building—there is no hope of defeating any proposed expenditure of money which goes into the pockets of the constituents of Members. The other side of the House is the most extravagant body of legislators that ever met at this end of the Capitol, and this side of the House is not so very much better. We do not have the same responsibility, but we seem to have the same desire to get money for our constituents. I hear men on the floor denouncing every method to increase taxes and every proposition to prevent expenditures. I would like to see men bold and brave enough when they want to increase expenditures to say also: "We favor a method of increasing taxes." [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the policy of special benefits conferred by government upon organizations or individuals originated when Horatius kept the bridge so well, in the brave days of old.

They gave him of the corn land
That was of common right,
As much as two strong oxen
Could plow from morn till night.

Since that time when the governments would confer either pensions or retirement privileges they made the test military service. Business institutions outside organized pension and retirement plans, and thus helped to draw away from the Government service, which is not so desirable, the men the Government service needs.

The Revenue-Cutter Service and the Life-Saving Service grew up in one organization, and that was a military service. It was fighting for the country before the Navy was born. It has done military service in every war. It has acted as a signal corps. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has acknowledged that by his own procurement the Life-Saving Service, even in its present state of separation from its associate, the Revenue-Cutter Service, acted as a signal corps with great success and glory during the Spanish War. The two services were in one up to about 1878, when Mr. Kimball, the present venerated head of the Life-Saving Service, was the superintendent of the joint organization, up to that time undivided, the Revenue-Cutter Service. It was thought that by separating the two arms of the service the life-saving branch could be more efficiently organized and made more successful. It has been successfully organized, and, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] acknowledges, it is the best life-saving service in the world; but they can not secure nor hold their men.

For 14 years that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and I were on the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee together there came every Congress from the Senate to our committee the Frye bill to provide for the Life-Saving Service the right of retirement. That bill was met by the objection that it proposed a civil pension. I and other members of the committee said, and the gentleman from Illinois did not object to it, "Go back into your fighting organization, go back into your military service, and ipso facto you will become entitled morally and legally to these retirement fees." They finally took us at our word. We objected to their becoming the vanguard and entering wedge for a great civil pension list. Finally Mr. Foss, of Illinois, introduced a bill while he was in Congress and chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs to reunite the two services that originally operated together as a military service. It was not done then, but since then it has been indorsed by two administrations. Secretary MacVeagh during his administration caused the two branches of the service to agree on the terms of this bill, and he approved it. When the Republicans went out of the administration of the Government the present Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, indorsed the same bill, and the President of the United States indorses it and urges its passage. It is not true that it is retirement for a civil institution. It is the opposite. It opposes that idea. It removes the life-savers from the vanguard of the civil-pension people, restores them to their old place in a military organization, in which they will be entitled to retirement, and makes no precedent for civil pensions or retirement. It retires them after their position in the fighting organization, as a part of it, shall have been restored, and then only, but as such they will become entitled to this retirement. [Applause.]

The young men of the country are called on to go into the service, and in their old age, after serving 30 years in the service against enemies, elemental and human, are then kicked out, and like the celebrated cardinal they can cry, "Had I but served my God with half the zeal I served my (king) country, he would not in mine age have left me naked to mine enemies." [Applause.]

The consequence is that before these men become emaciated and feeble in the service they seek better employment in some other way.

One more word. If we are to be met at every juncture with the cry of economy when we come in to support the institutions of the Government, we can not get along decently. It is all right to spend $40,000,000 for a railroad, $300,000,000 for the Post Office, $35,000,000 for rivers and harbors, $30,000,000 for public buildings, two or three hundred millions for the support of the Army and the Navy, but when you come to talk about the organization which supports the civil system, collects the customs, defeats the pirates, catches the smugglers in time of peace, as well as saving the lives and property of the people, and fights our battles in time of war, they say you must not increase the expenses of the Government by $400,000. [Applause.]

This is the service absolutely essential to the Government to collect its revenues and protect it against disease, the public enemies, and the elements. True, we are levying heavy taxes, and I deplore the necessity for it and the hardship on our people, but the prime purpose of levying any tax is to support and operate the necessary functions of government. The present bill deals with the most valuable and most necessary service of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be established in lieu of the existing Revenue-Cutter Service and the Life-Saving Service, to be composed of those two existing organizations, with the existing offices and positions and the incumbent officers and men of those two services, the coast guard, which shall constitute a part of the military forces of the United States and which shall operate under the Treasury Department in time of peace and operate as a part of the Navy, subject to the orders of the Secretary of the Navy, in time of war or when the President shall so direct. When subject to the Secretary of the Navy in time of war the expense of the coast guard shall be paid as a part of the Navy Department: Provided——

The following committee amendment was read:

Provided, That no provision of this act shall be construed as giving any officer of either the coast guard or the Navy military or other control at any time over any vessel, officer, or man of the other service except by direction of the President.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer that amendment, and I want to say in offering it that I think it is already the law. It is in the Revenue-Cutter Service law, and by a subsequent provision in this bill, if adopted, would be held as the law governing the joint organization. But out of abundant caution some members of the committee thought we had better repeat it here.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. I find this provision in the bill:

When subject to the Secretary of the Navy in time of war the expense of the coast guard shall be paid as a part of the Navy Department.

Do you mean to give them the same pay that they get in the Navy?

Mr. ADAMSON. Oh, no; that is already the law. It is the law of the Revenue-Cutter Service that we repeated. We do not change the phraseology.

Mr. BUTLER. Very well; what does this mean?—

Provided, That no provision of this act shall be construed as giving any officer of either the coast guard or the Navy military or other control at any time over any vessel, officer, or man of the other service except by direction of the President.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have already stated, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania was listening——

Mr. BUTLER. I was listening, but I did not understand the language.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is already in the Revenue-Cutter law.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not care if it is in the Bible.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not know whether the gentleman would understand it then or not.

Mr. BUTLER. I presume that I would try to understand it, and I think that I would believe. That language does not to me mean anything:

Provided, That no provision in this act shall be construed as giving any officer of either the coast guard—

I can get along that far—or the Navy military—

What is the "Navy military"?

Mr. ADAMSON. It may not be punctuated right.

Mr. BUTLER. Would it not be well to have it read so plain that the blind, like me, could understand it?

Mr. ADAMSON. The military is separate from the Navy. I had not observed the omission of a comma.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not want to offer so important an amendment.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia if it would not be well to strike out the words "military or other"?

Mr. ADAMSON. It would mean the same thing. It is a repetition of existing law not necessary to be repeated at all, and I should think the restoration of the comma, as suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, would make it all right.

Mr. SMALL. Will the gentleman from Georgia permit me to read the language in the act approved April 12, 1902, to promote the efficiency of the Revenue-Cutter Service?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. SMALL. In that act is this provision:

Provided further, That no provision of this act shall be construed as giving any officer of the Revenue-Cutter Service military or other control at any time over any vessel, officer, or man of the naval service. Nor shall any naval officer exercise such military or other control over any vessel, officer, or man of the Revenue-Cutter Service, except by direction of the President.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by inserting the comma after the word "Navy."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to amend his amendment, and the Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 5, after the word "Navy," insert a comma.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

OPPOSING NEW PENSION ROLL FOR MEN NEVER ENLISTED IN ARMY OR NAVY ON RETIRED LIST.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, this bill seems to meet with considerable favor, and there may be no record vote. I want the RECORD to show that there is one man who opposed this bill. I have resisted all measures increasing retired pay for Army and naval officers. This bill goes farther than any bill I have ever seen before this House or any bill that has ever passed this House on the question of retired pay and longevity pay. This bill proposes to cover into a branch of the naval service 4,374 men of the Life-Saving Service with officers having rank of captains and other naval rank of naval officers, with pay of naval officers and retired pay of naval officers. It goes farther than privileges extended to men in naval and Army service by providing that all persons employed now or in the future in the Life-Saving Service shall be retired on a salary equal to 75 per cent of the service salary after a term of 30 years' enlistment. The employees of no other department of the Government are retired on salary. So far as the principle is concerned, I am just as much opposed to retiring the officers provided for in this bill on salary as I am to the other employees. I am seriously opposed to the principle involved as well as to the bill. Furthermore, it increases every five years the salary of the men 10 per cent, thus paying them in a few years more than this House should grant for service rendered.

If the gentleman will read with me the next section of the bill as follows:

That in the coast guard there shall be a captain commandant, senior captains, captains—

Mr. ADAMSON rose.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I have the floor, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. ADAMSON. I was about to ask the gentleman if this was the section——

Mr. TRIBBLE. I am discussing this bill. If I do not discuss the bill and the section, the gentleman can call me down on a point of order.

Mr. ADAMSON. Oh, I have no disposition to do that.

Mr. TRIBBLE. To continue:

Captains, first lieutenants, second lieutenants, third lieutenants—

And so on.

All of these offices are created by this bill and not now existing. Many years this Life-Saving Service has been trying to get this bill before this House, and now a Democratic committee presents it at a time when the country is financially paralyzed and the people are groaning under the load of a special tax.

Mr. BUTLER rose.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I will answer my colleague on the Naval Committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER], who has been trying to get information from the chairman. I can tell my colleague [Mr. BUTLER] what this bill means. It means the creation of officers who have never been to the Naval Academy and who have not equipped themselves for service and who can not take charge of battleships and submarines, but it places them in the same rank in order that they may receive the same pay. That is what it does, and I am here to say to you that this is not the time, when the people are burdened with stamp taxes, when they are burdened with all kinds of taxes to carry on the expenses of the Government, to create new offices and put new men on the retired list with pay. There is one man who will cast his vote against it.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRIBBLE. I hope to do so, but I have a great deal I want to say and I will not yield at this time. That is what this bill means. Read it for yourself. You did not read far enough, Brother BUTLER. Read it all. There is much objectionable legislation in this bill. We are about to take an unprecedented step. It is proposed to start a pension roll for all employees. There is over a million dollars to start with in this bill, and where will it lead us? The gentleman from New Hampshire refers to the farmers' seed as an item of economy that could be cut out of appropriations. Surely he does not mean this seriously, thus taking this little pittance of seed to make funds for retired pay. When the news goes to Georgia that a gentleman on the floor of this House said that this bill should be passed and the seeds should be taken from the farmers, if necessary, to furnish the funds, I want the farmers in my district to know that their Representative rose in his place and said they should have their seeds and that these men should not be retired on salaries to bask in the sunshine of retirement on their seed pay. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Not at this time. I call attention to the fact that this report admits that these men work only five or six months in the year. The average pay of the men is $840 for five months as a minimum time, with an average of nine months, and they get food from the Government. They reach down into the Treasury of the Government, and in addition to their salary they take out the food they eat and clothes they wear. They possess no superior qualifications to the ordinary enlisted men of the Army or Navy and get more than double the pay. They do not have to have buggies and mules or any expense as rural carriers do, and they do not work 12 months in the year as the rural carriers do. They work only five or six months in the year, and now it is proposed to make them officers and give certain selections among them rank and pay with the men who graduate at the Naval Academy and retire them after a few years' service. The official rank of captain provided herein carries the pay of $5,000 per year, and to that is added commutation, heat, and light in the sum of $1,311.30, making a total of $6,311.30 to this newly created official, who is to be retired to private life after 30 years' service on salary. There are now over 1,000 retired naval officers who render no service whatever to the Government, and many of these draw salaries each of over $10,000. Now, it is proposed to create new avenues for new officers to retire, that they may bask in the sunshine and enjoy the pay of a retired officer rendering no service. In addition to this, every man in the service may retire on salary and give the Government no service whatever.

I yield now to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that these officers enumerated in the first part of section 2 are the various officers now provided for the Revenue-Cutter Service.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I will answer that by saying that I was not here when the Revenue-Cutter Service bill was passed, and if I had been here I would have opposed it. [Applause.]

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. And they are subject to retirement now.

Mr. TRIBBLE. That does not make any difference to me. The law should be repealed. That answers your question completely. That Revenue-Cutter Service provision should be repealed, and if I could repeal it I would do it immediately.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Of course the bill is open to an amendment of that character.

Mr. TRIBBLE. But the revenue-cutter bill is not before the House. There is no use to undertake to cut anything out of this bill. It is going to be passed. It is staged to be passed; but I think the advocates of the bill know there are one or two men here who are opposing it. When a farmer makes a contract in this period of financial distress he must buy a Government stamp, and yet it is proposed by the gentleman from New Hampshire to take his agricultural seed money and apply it to increased pay of officers and employees of the Life-Saving Service and retire them on pay to do nothing but enjoy that agricultural seed money of the farmers. Yes; take his agricultural seed and call on him for stamp tax. Why this hurry about passing this bill of so much importance? I never heard of this bill until it was called up only a few minutes ago.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRIBBLE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BUTLER. Does my friend understand from the section that he is speaking about that the military service which these men might perform makes it possible for them to have their grades increased so as to receive the pay of officers of the Navy?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Certainly it means that.

Mr. BUTLER. I asked the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] that question. Certainly none of them will get the pay of captains in the Navy, $5,000 a year.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Read this report, and you will find that these officers get the pay of the rank of captain and other ranks of naval officers. No one can say that a captain will not get the pay of a captain. He will get the pay if you give him the rank. The committee has presented an amendment prohibiting a captain created by this bill from being placed in charge of a battleship. That was necessary to keep these officers, some of whom have never been on a battleship, from having the legal right as a captain to command on a war vessel. Why does not the committee add to that amendment also they shall not get the pay of a captain?

No; of course the committee will not add such a provision, because it is the purpose of the bill to give the officers herein created the same pay as naval officers.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, if that is in order, in order that I may ask the gentleman from Georgia a question. He and I agree on most things.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Yes. We did not agree on the plucking board, but we may come together on this, although I believe my friend did vote to knock out the plucking board last week in the Naval Committee. At last, after four years of hard fighting, I can announce to this House that my bill to repeal the plucking board has received favorable action by the committee; only two or three votes for the plucking board when the committee acted.

Mr. BUTLER. We agree on many things, and I want to see if we can not agree on this. I asked the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], the gentleman's colleague, the meaning of this provision of the proposed law at the top of page 2:

When subject to the Secretary of the Navy in the time of war the expense of the coast guard shall be paid as a part of the Navy Department.

I asked him whether that does not simply mean that they shall be paid along with the other men who are serving in the Navy. It does not in any way increase the pay of this service, does not give them the same pay as regular officers and enlisted men in the Navy have, but it provides that they shall be paid as a part of the Naval Establishment. I understand I am correct about that.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is my understanding.

Mr. BUTLER. The answer of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] was that it is a part of another bill, and that the bill was passed before he came to Congress.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Yes; and if I had been here before it was passed I would have opposed it.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not think the language of this section means to confer permanent grades in the Navy upon any of these men who are mentioned.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. When I answered the gentleman's question before I did not finish the answer.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman has had plenty of time to think it up in the meantime, and I yield to him.

Mr. ADAMSON. Oh, I thought it up long ago. The object of that language in the original law was to prevent that friction which is sometimes found in such profusion in military circles, and to see that each commander of a vessel would keep his own vessel and not be interfered with by the other service.

Mr. BUTLER. That is one of the pieces of patchwork to which I am used, and I know something about that; but that is not the part of the bill to which I directed the gentleman's attention, which says "shall be paid as a part of the Navy Department." I am not used to framing bills, but it seems to me a little awkward and it also struck the attention of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE], as well as mine.

Mr. ADAMSON. They are not getting naval pay at all; they are simply paid their salary by the Navy.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That in the coast guard there shall be a captain commandant, senior captains, captains, first lieutenants, second lieutenants, third lieutenants, engineer in chief, captains of engineers, first lieutenants of engineers, second lieutenants of engineers, third lieutenants of engineers and constructors, cadets and cadet engineers, warrant officers, petty officers, and other enlisted men, all of said offices, respectively, corresponding to the present offices of the Revenue-Cutter Service, which are transferred to the coast guard, and all the present incumbents, officers and enlisted men, are also transferred to corresponding positions in the coast guard; a general superintendent, assistant general superintendent, district superintendents, keepers, and surfmen, which offices and positions shall be transferred from the corresponding positions in the existing Life-Saving Service and be made like positions in the coast guard, and all the incumbent officers and surfmen shall be transferred to such corresponding positions in the coast guard, in which the superintendent shall be commissioned as such, keepers shall be warrant officers, and surfmen shall be enlisted men, of which enlisted men the No. 1 surfmen shall be petty officers.

There shall be in the administrative service of the coast guard two chiefs of division, one from each service, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, with annual salary of $3,000 each, together with such clerical and technical positions and the incumbents therein as it may be necessary to transfer from the two existing organizations to the coast guard. There may be such other clerical and technical assistance as may from time to time be authorized by Congress.

Except as herein modified all existing laws relating either to the present Life-Saving Service or the present Revenue-Cutter Service shall remain of force as far as applicable to the coast guard and the offices, positions, operations, and duties shall in all respects be held and construed to impose the same duties upon the positions and their incumbents in the coast guard as are now imposed upon the corresponding positions and incumbents in the said two existing organizations.

All duties now performed by the Revenue-Cutter Service and Life-Saving Service shall continue to be performed by the coast guard, and all such duties, together with all duties that may hereafter be imposed upon the coast guard, shall be administered by the captain commandant, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and all funds and appropriations now provided by law for the Revenue-Cutter Service and all funds and appropriations now provided by law for the Life-Saving Service shall be available for like purposes under the coast guard hereby created.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Page 3, in line 6, amend, by striking out after the word "division" the words "one from each service."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 3, by inserting after the word "organizations," in line 22, the following: "The provisions of the act entitled, 'An act to regulate enlistments and punishments in the United States Revenue-Cutter Service,' approved May 26, 1906, shall apply to and govern the coast guard."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia, the chairman of the committee, another question or two. Under certain conditions the persons who are incorporated into the coast guard—officials and enlisted men—become a part of the United States Navy, and are paid, as I understand it, out of the Navy fund, at least they are paid by the Navy.

Mr. ADAMSON. They are paid out of the Navy money.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Very well, there is not much difference between money and funds.

Mr. ADAMSON. I misunderstood the gentleman; I thought he meant the Navy pay.

Mr. SLAYDEN. This paragraph provides for captains commandant, senior captains, first lieutenants, second lieutenants, third lieutenants, engineer in chief, and so on. Now, I want to ask the gentleman, Are these officers of the present coast guard now provided by law?

Mr. ADAMSON. Down to the word "guard," line 19, are incorporated all the present officers in the Revenue-Cutter Service.

Mr. SLAYDEN. But not of the coast guard.

Mr. ADAMSON. They are already provided for. After that word then follows an enumeration of all the officers at present in the Life-Saving Service. It enumerates all of them and places all in the coast guard.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Now, are these titles of rank, such as captains and senior captains, first and second lieutenants, and so forth, analogous to the rank that goes by the same name in the Navy, and do they, while serving as part of the Navy, get the same rate of pay as men who have similar title in the Navy?

Mr. ADAMSON. As to those who are now in the Revenue-Cutter Service that is true, but that is already provided for in the existing revenue-cutter law.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does a captain in the Revenue-Cutter Service get the same pay as a captain in the Navy?

Mr. ADAMSON. My recollection is approximately.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Because he gets about $5,000 a year, if that is so.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not remember the exact figures. This law does not change that at all. It is just as it was before.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What I want to find out is if these people get the pay of naval officers and whether they enjoy the pay and rank of officers of the same title in the Navy?

Mr. ADAMSON. I have not the figures now in my mind, but when we improved the efficiency of the Revenue-Cutter Service 10 or 12 years ago I think we left very little difference between them.

Mr. SLAYDEN. My recollection is there was considerable difference, and that a captain of the Revenue-Cutter Service does not get the pay of a captain in the naval service.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will refer that question to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], if he is on the floor, if he remembers those figures.

Mr. SLAYDEN. As I understand it, a captain in the Navy corresponds to a colonel in the Army.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if he can answer the gentleman from Texas, who desires to know the present salary of officers in the Revenue-Cutter Service. I do not remember the exact figures, but I do not think there is very much difference between them and the corresponding officers of the Navy.

Mr. ESCH. We sought to assimulate the rank and pay in both services when Congress passed the act of 1902.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does a captain of the Revenue-Cutter Service get the pay of a captain of the Navy, which is about $5,000 a year and which corresponds, as the gentleman knows, approximately to those of a colonel in the Army, because if they do you are providing an extraordinary——

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will permit, down to line 19 and the word "guard" is an enumeration of the Revenue-Cutter officers, those already fixed in the law, and it is not changed. It is only from there down that it is changed, and I know they do not receive the salaries of naval officers.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me I have the law here and I will read from the act of 1902, section 2:

That the said commissioned officers shall rank as follows: Captains with majors in the Army and lieutenant commanders in the Navy; first lieutenants with captains in the Army and lieutenants in the Navy; second lieutenants with first lieutenants in the Army and lieutenants (junior grade) in the Navy; third lieutenants with second lieutenants in the Army and ensigns in the Navy.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Let me ask my friend: A lieutenant commander in the Navy corresponds with the grade of captain in the Army, does it not?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I assume a major.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes. I shall not use all of it, but I desire to ask another question.

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing before the committee. The Chair presumes the gentleman desires to strike out the last word.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SLAYDEN. The reason I asked the question, I will say to the chairman of the committee, is that this bill specifically provides that the coast guard, which is now not a part of the Navy, shall become a part of the Navy, and under certain circumstances it is to be paid from the naval fund or money, as the chairman calls it. And then it provides for certain titles. Now, those titles when applied to the men in the Navy carry very large pay. At least, some of them do. The captain in the Navy has a very handsome pay, indeed, and ranks with the colonel in the Army. I was puzzled, and I wanted to know of the gentleman whether or not these transfers of the coast guard to the Navy and the transfer of these senior captains and captains, and first, second, and third lieutenants, and so on, when transferred to the Navy, enjoy the pay and privileges of the officers of the Navy with a like title?

Mr. ADAMSON. They are given their titles in the Revenue-Cutter Service law. They do not take the titles of the Navy. It was intended, however, that they be paid out of the Navy funds, which was the word the gentleman used. I did not understand it, or I would not have corrected it. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] has just suggested to me that we can clear up the difficulty of the two gentlemen, from Texas and Pennsylvania, by striking out the words "as a part of the Navy Department" and say "by the Navy Department."

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 2, line 3, for the purpose of offering an amendment to strike out the words "as a part of" in that line, inserting in lieu thereof the word "by."

Mr. SLAYDEN. I think that will improve the bill very much.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to return to the first section in order to offer an amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out, on page 2, line 3, the words "as a part of" and inserting the word "by."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 2, line 3, by striking out the words "as a part of" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "by."

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, this language has been in the law for some time, but, as I understand, has never been interpreted, and I think there is grave doubt, with this service coming under the Navy direction, that it might be interpreted, if we leave the language "as a part of" that they should receive like compensation. I think, to save any doubt, the amendment should be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I am satisfied there is need for some amendment to the law with regard to our Life-Saving Service and also the Revenue-Cutter Service. I am inclined to think the plan to unite the two services is a good one, but this ought to be accomplished without any increase in the cost of the service; in fact, the change ought to lessen the expense. But I have wondered whether or not this bill saves all of the good features of the existing law governing these two services. I would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether or not the enactment of this bill into law will permit the use of the vessels engaged in this new service, enlarged as it will be, and the cost of which is increased, for private purposes, or only for public purposes?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not know what it means, and I do not know whether I heard the expression in church or at the theater. I do not play cards; but I use the expression I have heard somewhere, and say, "I pass."

Mr. GOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman, then, whether Members of Congress can use this service if this bill should become a law? Could they go onto these revenue cutters or these boats and use them for private purposes?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Iowa will excuse me, I do not wish to get into a political discussion on this bill. I want to go ahead with it.

Mr. GOOD. I want to know what the effect of the bill will be, as a matter of fact.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman really means in good faith to ask that question for information, I will state that the statute on that subject remains unchanged.

Mr. GORDON. It is still illegal.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman that some months ago I had a little exchange of ideas with the Secretary of the Treasury on this subject.

Mr. GORDON. And you got the worst of it, too.

Mr. GOOD. No; I did not. The next day after the discussion on this subject had taken place on the floor of the House I received what purported to be a copy of a radiogram sent from the Office of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States asking the commander of the revenue cutter Gresham to take on board young McAdoo, the son of the Secretary, and his party and convey them to the Harvard and Yale boat races at New London, and after they had visited the boat races to then convey them to Mattapoisett, Mass., which was the summer home of the Secretary of the Treasury. I do not vouch for the correctness of this message, but I believe it to be correct. If this bill does not prohibit things of that kind, then by some amendment I think we ought to make it clear that the present Secretary of the Treasury or any Secretary of the Treasury that may follow him, or any other Government official, can not use the vessels in this service for private purposes. No official of the Government should be permitted to turn the vessels employed in this service at great expense to the people into steam yachts for their private comfort and benefit. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, without passing on the correctness of the gentleman's position or the merits of the controversy between him and the Secretary of the Treasury I beg to state that there is a statute prohibiting the use of these vessels for private purposes. They are to be confined exclusively to public purposes, and that law is expressly made applicable to the coast guard by language in this bill.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman will recall, though, that the Secretary of the Treasury based his use of the revenue cutter for private purposes on the ground that the Secretaries of the Treasury who occupied the position before him had violated the law.

Mr. ADAMSON. I may have done the gentleman an injustice, and if I did I apologize, because I thought that was a political tilt he was indulging in, and I did not treasure it in my memory very sacredly.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman that if this bill does not prohibit for all time to come that sort of practice, I want to offer an amendment that will prohibit it.

Mr. ADAMSON. It prohibits it. I do not know whether for all time to come. A future Congress may repeal it.

Mr. GOOD. I mean as long as the law remains on the statute books?

Mr. ADAMSON. That law is preserved.

Mr. GOOD. Will it be observed?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 19424. An act to extend the time for the completion of the municipal bridge at St. Louis, Mo.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5295) to amend existing legislation providing for the acquisition of a site and the construction of a building thereon for the accommodation of the post office, United States courts, customhouse, and other governmental offices at Honolulu, Territory of Hawaii, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SWANSON, Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey, and Mr. WARREN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles:

S. 4012. An act to increase the limit of cost of the United States public building at Grand Junction, Colo.;

S. 5614. An act for the improvement of the foreign service; and

S. 6309. An act to establish the Rocky Mountain National Park in the State of Colorado, and for other purposes.

TO CREATE THE COAST GUARD.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That all existing laws affecting rank, pay, and allowance in the present Life-Saving Service and the present Revenue-Cutter Service shall apply to the corresponding positions in the coast guard and the officers and men transferred thereto and their successors. This shall include all laws and regulations which now give to the enlisted men of the existing Revenue-Cutter Service increased pay of $1 per month for each three years' service, allowances for uniforms, and all other allowances or gratuities due to enlisted men, which are hereby made applicable to the enlisted men of the coast guard who were formerly surfmen in the Life-Saving Service.

The provisions of sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9 of the act of April 12, 1902, in so far as they provide for the retirement of officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service, are hereby extended to include commissioned officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men of the coast guard. A commissioned officer, warrant officer, or enlisted man who has served 30 years may, upon suitable application, be retired from active service and receive 75 per cent of the duty pay, salary, and increase of his grade or rating: Provided, That such commissioned officer, warrant officer, or enlisted man may be assigned to such duties as he may be able to perform. The commissioned officers, warrant officers, and petty officers of the coast guard shall receive 10 per cent increase of pay for five years of service, such increase not to exceed 40 per cent of the pay of their grade or rating subject to the limitations of existing laws governing longevity pay: Provided further, That in computing length of service for any purpose all creditable service in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Revenue-Cutter Service, and Life-Saving Service shall be included, counting part of a year as a whole year where stations were operated only part of a year: And provided further, That no person shall receive for the same time retired pay and the extra pay allowed under section 7 of the act of May 4, 1882. The provisions of section 3 of the act of March 26, 1908, increasing the efficiency of the personnel of the Life-Saving Service shall apply to the death of any officer, warrant officer, or enlisted man on the active list in the coast guard: Provided, That no pension shall be allowed or paid to any commissioned officer, warrant officer, or enlisted man in the coast guard either on the active or retired list.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, there is a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 4, by inserting, after the word "affecting," in line 13, the word "rank."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 5, by striking out the word "providing," in line 3, and inserting the words "in so far as they provide."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next one.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 5, by inserting, after the word "service," in line 20, the words "for any purpose."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, there are some errors in the bill which should be corrected. On page 4, line 14, the word "allowance" should be plural. I move to add an "s" to the word "allowance."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 5, line 8, after the word "years," by striking out the word "may" and inserting, in line 9, before the word "be," the word "may."

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, all this does is to take "may" from line 8 and place it before the word "be" in line 9. That makes a better grammatical construction of the sentence, as will be evidenced when the remainder of the section is read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 5, in line 9, after the word "application," insert "and as to commissioned officers, on approval by the Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, for whom we all have such great respect, called the attention of the committee to the fact that the provision in this bill is more liberal as to the retirement of officers in the Revenue-Cutter Service than it is with respect to officers of the Army. Officers of the Army may be retired after 30 years' service upon approval of the President. We in this bill allow them to have the absolute right, upon their own motion, of retirement after 30 years. This amendment provides for the retirement upon application and upon the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, thereby putting the commissioned officers of the coast guard in exactly the same condition and on the same basis as to retirement with officers of the Army. The retirement of enlisted men is a little more severe in this bill, because they can only retire after 30 years' service, whereas in the Army they may retire after 28 years' service. But this puts the officers of the coast guard on the same basis as to retirement with officers of the Army.

Mr. ADAMSON. We accept that amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I wish to offer. On line 8, page 5, after the word "years," add: "Provided, That he shall have attained at that time the age of 60 years." I also offer another amendment in this connection, that, in line 10, page 5, we strike out "seventy-five" and insert "fifty."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 5, by inserting, after the word "years," in line 8, the following: "Provided, That at the time he shall have attained the age of 60 years."

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, those are two separate amendments. I desire to address myself briefly to both of those amendments.

Mr. Chairman, there has been throughout the country quite a great deal of criticism of the creation of retired lists in the Army and in the Navy. From my casual investigation of these retired lists I believe that the criticism is justifiable; that a great many men are retired now in the Army and in the Navy who are perfectly capable of rendering to the country efficient service. I believe the retirement privilege is being abused to a larger extent than any other privilege allowed to the ordinary Government employees and those who go to make up the working force of the Government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the expenditures of the Congress are mounting higher and higher every year. Very recently we have seen brought into this House and passed an urgent revenue measure, wringing out of the people's pockets $100,000,000 annually. The people in my country and in my section of the country to-day are disposing of their chief crop at from 2½ to 3½ cents per pound less than it costs to produce it. On the other hand, the foodstuffs that they are compelled to buy are mounting higher and higher every day on account of certain conditions abroad. If there ever was any time in the history of American legislation when a bill of this sort ought not to be in this House, that time is now.

This is not the time to increase the ordinary expenses of this Government $397,000. As was aptly said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], $397,000 without a man on this retired list; and the minute that this retired list is created I have no doubt there are 300 or 400 men in this service who, this very day, are waiting, with their mouths watering, for this piece of legislation to be passed so that they may be put as a charge on the Government of the United States because of the fact that they have been in the service 30 years. Thirty years is an arbitrary time. A great many young men now in the service will be perfectly capable of doing a good day's work in that particular class of service that is not so very irksome after they have served 30 years. So far as I am concerned, if this amendment is not adopted I am going to vote against this bill, I do not care who wants it passed. I do not say what I would do if this country was in a condition to stand all of these new-fangled ideas that because a man once gets a Government job he ought to be perpetually on the pay roll of the Government for life. I am looking every day for some man to have the temerity and the unmitigated gall to get up on the floor of this House and offer a bill putting Congressmen on retired pay at three-fourths of their pay—and it would be as meritorious as this bill is. There is no justification for putting these men on three-fourths pay, with their longevity pay and the other perquisites incident to a Government job. Why, people are clamoring all over the country now that the civil-service employees be put on the pension roll, which would mean the spending of all the money that we could raise for an army of men to wring money from the taxpayers of this country while sitting idly by in the shade and watching poor Uncle Rube dig it out of the ground.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask for three minutes more. I have two amendments, and I will let my speech apply to both of them.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for three minutes longer. Is there objection?

Mr. GORDON. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman's time is extended three minutes.

Mr. HOWARD. I am very grateful to the committee for giving me this opportunity to say what I am going to say. I say that this is no time to be bringing in these new-fangled retirement bills. Where is the very great necessity for it? Where is the necessity to go down into the pockets of the people of my district, who are already overburdened with taxation, and wring from them $397,000 additional above any expenditure we have ever had? Show me, if you please, and if you can, where you have saved anything this year in your appropriations. Give me some idea, if you can and if you please, where the annual appropriations for the coming year are going to be reduced. I went all over my district in 1910 and I proclaimed with unction that the Republican Party was not only spending money outrageously but it was almost bordering on criminal extravagance the way they were spending money, that there could not possibly be any excuse for it; and here we are, charged with a commission from the great people of this country, and supposed to have at least some economic tendencies, trying to go around and dig out of the ground and get hold of some highfaluting fellow to work up some new scheme to get money out of the Public Treasury. Then, after doing that, you propose to saddle these fellows on us, not for a year, not for two years, but as long as they live, at three-fourths pay. I say there is no justification for any such thing. I might stretch my conscience. I might be able——

Mr. CALLAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes; I yield to my good friend.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Do you not think that after a man has had hold of the public teat for a number of years and has learned to live in luxurious ease it is an undue hardship to rip him suddenly away from it?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes; it is an undue hardship to rip him away from it. The other day the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] was cautioning us over here that the people were going to rip some of us from our little part in this general program, and I happened to admonish him that the people had already choked him off, and that it would not be long probably before some others of us would go.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman from Texas permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOWARD. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does the gentleman think that the men in the Life-Saving Service at $600 a year, with the great risks that they take, are filling Government positions of luxury and ease?

Mr. CALLAWAY. I hope I will have time to answer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment which I submitted a few moments ago, and the observations I made upon that amendment, practically answer the argument of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD]. The bill now provides for 30 years' service before retirement as to the petty officers and enlisted men. The law now provides for retirement of enlisted men after 28 years' service in the Army. Consequently this bill already provides for two years' longer service in this branch of more dangerous public service than is provided now in the Army. Some of us think that this service is more arduous, more apt to cause physical disability, and to prevent a man being able to do any subsequent work for himself and family than in the Army. If so, the man will already have done his life work, and have exhausted himself for the public good. Some reasonable period should be fixed, so as to satisfy the judgment of reliable, sensible men whom it is desired to retain in the service. The provision in the bill is satisfactory.

Now, as to the age in which a man would probably finish the 30 years. On page 4 of the report of the committee there is an estimate submitted by the department as to the age when men enter the service and when the 30 years would expire. I will read from the text of this report:

> Of the 14 keepers, 12 will complete 30 years' service at the average age of 56 years, or, for the 14, an average of a little more than 58 years. Of the 102 surfmen, 90 will have served 30 years at the average age of 58.7 years, and the whole number at the average age of 60.25 years. Taking the keepers and surfmen together, they will be eligible to retirement at the average of 60 years. A tabulation of 326 surfmen who have entered the service during the preceding two years, distributed among the 13 districts, shows the average age at entrance to be 27.7 years—54 per cent were between the ages of 18 and 27 years; 87 per cent under 36 years. This shows a somewhat lower age at entrance than that indicated by the tabulation of the first district, but it is higher by over two years than that shown by a similar tabulation made six years before.

The point is that the amendment of the gentleman is superfluous; that the proper age for retirement and usefulness is practically covered now; that the limit of service of 30 years is longer than other limits of service in similar military departments; and that is the best way and the fairest way to work it out. Some few will gain a year or two and others will be obliged to serve until they are older than 60 years. The average may be slightly less, and it is not well to make an arbitrary age limit, because physical qualifications may require an earlier separation. But the best way, as experience has already indicated, is to fix a flat limit of 30 years' service, and give the men a chance, if there be a chance, although I think there are very few of them.

Mr. HOWARD. That is exactly what my amendment sought to do—to put all the men on an equal footing. The trouble is that none of the men are to be retired unless they attain the age of 60 years.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Your amendment prevents them from being put on a level, because some, as the report shows, enter at the age of 36, and those men would not be retired until they were 66 years old. The only way they can be put on an equal footing is to require an equal time and length of service, and that is exactly what the bill provides and other branches of the military service provide. The gentleman seeks to put them on an unequal footing, some performing more than others, and that is what we object to.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I did not anticipate taking any part in this debate. I served on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for quite a number of years. It is the committee that has charge of the matters affecting the Life-Saving Service. I voted for the bill that increased their pay and allowances. I heard the testimony before that committee of the men who came before us who were officers and men engaged in that service.

I am not in favor of pensions for civil employees, nor did I vote for the bill to place the Revenue-Cutter Service under the Navy, where they could draw a pension. I may have been mistaken in that vote, but I propose to vote for this bill, Mr. Chairman. If I err in my convictions at all, I will err in behalf of the people whose duty it is to save life and property and not to destroy it. [Applause.]

"Peace has its victories no less renowned than war," and there are heroes in peace as well as heroes in war. While the heroes in peace may not wear swords and epaulets, they perform deeds of heroism entitled to be remembered, in my judgment, long after those who perform deeds of daring in war have been forgotten.

I do not cheerfully vote for war measures or war supplies. I have seen the naval bill grow from $29,000,000 in 1895 to $150,000,000 now. That is not for the saving of life, but, if occasion arises, to destroy it. I have seen the Army bill grow from $26,000,000 in 1895 to over $100,000,000 in time of peace. I have seen the pension roll grow from a little over $100,000,000 to $180,000,000—men pensioned not because of wounds and disease, but men pensioned now merely because they enlisted for 90 days and were on the rolls. They are men whose duty it was not to save life but to destroy it.

I have no fears but that my people will approve when I shall go back and tell them that even in the stress of financial trouble that we are in I voted to increase the pensions of servants of the Government to the extent of $397,000, to men whose duty it was in all stress of weather and storm not to destroy life but to save it. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, as I stated, I do not heartily favor pensions in the civil list. I am not prepared to vote for it, and do not think I ever will be; but these men can not speak for themselves. True, they are civil employees, and this bill makes them a part of the Navy. They are men who in storm and all kinds of weather face great dangers, who do not count the life or memory of their loved ones, but go to save the life of anyone, and they are entitled to more consideration than those men who simply work in an office. They are entitled to the same consideration, in my judgment, as the soldier in time of war who risks his life on the field of battle. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, while I am in favor of the principle of the service provided in this bill, I am constrained for other reasons to oppose it. It is true there are some reasons why these men are entitled to even more consideration than the men who enlist in the Army or the Navy. The man who enlists in the Army or the Navy encounters the dangers and hazards of the service in the event of war, but the men in this service perform the dangerous and hazardous undertakings even in time of peace, and by this bill they are made a part of the Army and the Navy, and will assume the same dangers and the same hazardous service as a soldier or a sailor in the time of war. Yet this will not justify the broad policy of retirement provided for in this bill and covering more than those actually performing dangerous and hazardous service and whether actually performing military duty or not.

Mr. Chairman, the militarism of the world to-day is costing the people in the high billions of dollars annually, a sum so vast as to bewilder the human mind—a sum going far to feed all the people of the world, or to clothe all the people of the world, or to house the people of the world, or to educate the people of the world—and this sum is growing annually. Out of every dollar of taxes paid into the Public Treasury of this country it has been estimated we are expending directly and indirectly in time of peace from 65 to 71 cents as a consequence of war and to maintain the military and preparedness for war. And it will continue to grow from year to year.

Mr. Chairman, I am not encouraged to believe it will be possible to stop this increase of the Army and the Navy, by reason of the policy of rivalry dominating the nations to-day. As apparent as is the folly of war, as great as is the reproach upon our civilization, and as exhausting as is the drain upon the resources of the world, all efforts at retrenchment in military expenditures appears useless and unavailing.

The only relief I see from this ever-exhausting drain upon human resources and diversion from the arts of civil life is the employment of the powerful and efficient agencies of the Army and Navy to a service useful to mankind, in transforming the Army into a great engineering department directing operations, constructions, and works, and the Navy into a great department for navigation, world communication, and transportation, in time of peace and for military defense in time of war. The Panama Canal and other great engineering projects are examples of the possibilities of the high organization and efficiency of the Army, and the technical training and scientific knowledge carried to the highest state and perfection in the Navy may be likewise employed on the high seas in time of peace to win even greater glory and renown than in human slaughter in time of war. On this principle and to this extent I am in favor of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if it were proposed in another bill to increase the salaries of a number of officials of the Government at this time from $2,200 a year to $3,080 a year, and at the same time to give to those officials for the first time rent, light, and heat, or commutation of quarters, and somebody should say that that suggestion would be agreed to, the rest of us would feel like falling dead. If somebody proposes to increase the salary of a capable, competent official of the Government, say, $200 in one of the appropriation bills, we have the blind staggers, and I do not say that we ought to pass it by lightly; but this proposition as to certain officers is to increase their compensation from $2,200 a year, which it now is, to $3,080 a year at once, and to give them in addition an allowance for rent, light, and heat. Well, it will go through. What can you expect of a Democratic majority in this House, with a deficit in the Treasury staring us in the face? The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRAY] says he looks at the appalling growth of the expenditures, but sees no way to stop it. That is Democracy. They see no way to stop it—they propose to vote to increase it. The growth of expenditures is appalling—every time we talk about it we add to it. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] That is Democracy. But when the gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House meet here next December with the stamp tax expiring by limitation of law at the end of the year, and they have either to renew it while it is in operation or provide some other way of raising taxes to meet these extravagant expenditures which we are making, they will not have such a pleasant smile on their faces as some of them have to-day. The stamp-tax act was not so popular, even with the Democrats, after it went into operation as it was when they voted for it, and it is not very popular now with the fellows who are paying it. There are a good many druggists throughout the country who are sticking knives into the Democratic Party because of the stamp-tax law, and when you propose to extend it or to put some other tax in its place next December you will wish you had taken my advice and cut out some of these extravagant increases in salaries and some of these useless appropriations. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Alabama that debate is exhausted on this section and all amendments thereto. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have the amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk reported the amendment, as follows:

On page 5 amend by inserting, after the word "years," in line 8, the following: "Provided, That at that time he shall have attained the age of 60 years."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HOWARD) there were—ayes 37, noes 48.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. ADAMSON and Mr. HOWARD were appointed to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 42, noes 63.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote now recurs on the second amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, which, without objection, the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 5, by striking out, in line 10, "seventy-five" and inserting "fifty."

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to address myself to this amendment for a moment.

Mr. ADAMSON. Debate has been closed on all amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I did not so understand it. There were two separate and distinct amendments, coming in at two separate and distinct places in the bill, and I did not in my former speech make any explanation of the effect of this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee, by unanimous consent, closed debate.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes, to explain this amendment so that we may vote intelligently upon at least one proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I am willing to divide five minutes with the gentleman.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I modify my request to that effect. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for two minutes and a half and that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] may proceed for two minutes and a half.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have the amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, this amendment strikes out "seventy-five" and inserts "fifty." It does occur to me that men being retired at the age of 50 upon their own motion, after 30 years of service, ought not to be permitted, and there is nothing in this bill to prevent that. If a young man 20 years of age goes into the service and serves for 30 years, he has the right to make application for retirement at the age of 50 years, and there is nothing to prevent it.

Now, then, he is 50 years old, in full possession of every faculty that God gave him, because a man who is a man is generally in his prime at the age of 50 years. Now, then, may we not set an example that was set the other day by one of the highest ranking officers in the American Army, by receiving from the hands of his Government $6,000 a year as a retired officer of the Army and accepting a position with a great State at $10,000 a year, and he is drawing $16,000 a year to-day, and he is in possession of every faculty with which he was born and could render efficient service to the Government. Yet he is retired. Now, you propose to retire and saddle on the American people a lot of young men in their prime at three-quarters of their pay, counting in longevity pay, and 50 per cent of their original salary received by anybody is enough to at least satisfy the ordinary man with ordinary proclivities for begging, and not ask for 75 per cent, and especially when you increase the salary nearly $900 a year under the provisions of this bill. Do what you please with this amendment; vote it down if you want to, and, if you can, justify your conduct, as was aptly said by the gentleman from Illinois, in voting nearly $900 increase, and then vote three-quarters of the pay, counting in longevity pay.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that officers in this service—and I know it is true in the Army and Navy, where they do not do much in time of peace—may be in working condition after serving 30 years, but when the surfmen go out, when the men in the ranks go out and stand the shocks and exposure of this work for 30 years they are generally physical wrecks. It is already the law in the Revenue-Cutter Service that they are retired at three-quarters pay. This proposition would undo all of that. It is already the law in the Army and Navy that the generals and admirals and rear admirals and front admirals may retire in good health and good looks on three-quarters pay, who have worked and fought gallantly in time of war, it is true, and had a good time in times of peace on shore. Does the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD], who is so anxious to please the farmer vote, desire to go back home and say——

Mr. HOWARD rose.

Mr. ADAMSON. I withdraw that remark.

Mr. HOWARD. I desire to say to the gentleman he has got more farmers in his district than I have in mine.

Mr. ADAMSON. And I am for every one of them, and I have farmed with them and worked for them, and am working for them and expect to work for them, and this is to promote a service that is taking care of them—that protects our coasts, that collects the revenue to run the Government, and every farmer in my district will have sense enough to stand up and justify my vote. [Applause.] I do not pander to any mistaken notion of what would be an erroneous idea for popularity. I represent a district of intelligent people, who know that the institutions of the Government must be maintained. [Laughter and applause.] The proposition here is to retire the aristocrats on three-fourths pay, but that the men who work for the country in time of peace and fight for it in time of war shall be cut off with half rations. I hope and trust the committee will defeat this amendment overwhelmingly.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I understood the gentleman to refer to me as one favoring the retirement of these aristocrats. I have always opposed it, and every man in this House knows it.

Mr. ADAMSON. I withdraw that.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I do not desire the gentleman to withdraw it. [Laughter.] One of the aristocrats the gentleman proposes to retire here is retired on a salary of $3,000, and I will ask the gentleman if he knows he gets a commutation of quarters at $1,311.30 and lights——

Mr. ADAMSON. Who is that?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Thirteen hundred and eleven dollars and thirty cents, so the gentleman proposes to retire an aristocrat with $5,000 a year with commutation and light and fuel and all. The gentleman does not know they get $1,311.30, commutation, light, and fuel.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I would say I do not take stock in what the gentleman states.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I quote from the book; there it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have three minutes more in order to settle this dispute.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I am ready for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HOWARD. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 40, noes 75.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That hereafter, whenever a vacanacy occurs in the grade of keeper of a life-saving station or house of refuge, it shall be filled by promotion and appointment from the grade of surfman, and whenever a vacancy shall occur in the grade of district superintendent the vacancy shall be filled by promotion and appointment from the grade of keeper: Provided, That the district superintendents shall be the chief officers and first in authority in their respective districts.

When the organization of the coast guard shall have been perfected the President is authorized to retire the general superintendent on 75 per per cent of his present salary, and no further appointment shall be made to such office. At the same time the office of assistant general superintendent shall be abolished.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Page 6, after the word "district," in line 19, insert, "subject to the authority of the captain commandant."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I believe under the five-minute rule I have five minutes. I move to strike out the last word, and in that five minutes I desire to talk about this bill. Mr. Chairman, I see over here on page 5—I got in late on this proposition, because I did not know they really had up a pension question to-day or I would have been here earlier—I have some aversion to the way money is wasted on rivers and harbors, but as compared with my feelings toward the way they spend it on pensions the river and harbor feeling is very gentle, tame, and complacent. Good God Almighty! the way the House goes on, when you get to pensions, about somebody who has had hold of the public teat for some years is absolutely frightful to a man who wants to see this Government live and knows it can not with everybody on the pension rolls. On page 5 this bill says:

A commissioned officer, warrant officer, or enlisted man who has served 30 years may, upon suitable application, be retired from active service and receive 75 per cent of the duty pay, salary, and increase of his grade or rating.

Now, what do these fellows receive? Why, I see a table No. 2, grade, keepers; present pay, $1,000; retired pay, $750; after they have served 20 years with longevity increase—40 per cent—$1,400 a year; retired pay, $1,050 a year. Mr. Chairman, I come from a territory and have been part and parcel of a people that had to go out, not by the aid of any governmental help, and work out of the soil, and work out of the mines, and work out of the factories, and work out of their business their compensation. And a thousand dollars a year to those men would be a princely salary—and it is an enormous salary. But here is not only a salary of that amount, but they have their care and keep, their clothing, their feeding, their housing, and their warming through the year. And then after they have had this munificent place, according to my experience, according to the daily experience of the voters of this country who have to bear this burden of taxation, after they have been fortunate enough during a lifetime to hold this kind of a job for 30 years, then they go out on a retired salary, after 30 years, of $1,050 a year, and go into whatever business they want to go into. And do what? Saddle the burden of paying it on the backs of the men, women, and children in your district and my district, that go through the winter's cold and the summer's heat trying to feed and clothe themselves. These fellows have been clothed and fed through all these years and, in addition to that, they have had this salary, and our people have been struggling to clothe and feed themselves, and delighted if able to do it. How many men and businesses, what is the per cent of them, that come out at the end of their lives with anything saved?

They say these fellows in the public service, in these departments, and in other avenues of the public service have not been able to save anything. I go down here and see them come out of the departments at 4.30 in the evening. Doing what? Going to spend their day's salary. What do your constituents and mine, that have to dig out of the mines or dig out of the ground in agriculture or in stock-raising pursuits, or mercantile business, do? Do they go out and spend their salary at 4.30 in the afternoon? No; they stagger home under the load of their day's work after dark to go to bed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Give me a minute longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] asks unanimous consent for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like an agreement for debate on this section. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and amendments thereto close in 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Reserving the right to object, does that provide for the gentleman from Texas having five minutes?

Mr. ADAMSON. It gives him one minute.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Give me two minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield two minutes to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to this request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. CALLAWAY. They do not understand that a man can do anything except pander to a prejudice or appeal to the passions for votes. The gentleman from Georgia says his constituents have sense enough to understand the proposition. If the farmers, the miners, the business men, and those generally who earn their bread in the sweat of their faces understood the way this Congress spends money, and they could see these retired officers parading, and they knew the kind of salaries they were drawing and the retired pay that you provided for them, and did not kick you out of office, they would be a set of imbeciles. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] says that these fellows who rest in time of peace have these benefits. Why not give them to the men who work? Why does not the gentleman have the courage on the floor of this House to bring in a bill taking the "pap" away from those fellows who are doing the resting? Why add this other bunch also? That is the same argument that is being made in reference to civil-service employees that are knocking at the doors of this Congress now for civil pensions. They are going to get civil pensions if you do not turn back. And when they do get it I am going to move that people from one end of the country to the other, as near as I can move it, that every farmer, every washerwoman, every railroad employee, and every other person who has been bearing the burden of taxation through the years until it has made him flat-footed and bow-legged, shall go on the pension roll, so they will all look alike. You have overworked the soldier-pension business until you have broken the barriers down and all classes are coming in. Heaven save the day!

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRAY] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, I want to disabuse the apprehensions of my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. I stated in my remarks, or I tried to state, that while I was agreeable with the principle of the dual service provided for in this bill, I was opposed to other policies comprehended by its provisions.

And I am contending for another principle embodied in the bill. I believe that the policy of this Nation should be for defense, and not for aggression, and this service is for defense. It is for these reasons that I support these principles in the bill, but I am opposed to the measure as a whole, and I am therefor constrained to vote against it.

Mr. HOWARD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk report the amendment that I offered, to which I wish to address myself. It was, in line 22, page 6, to strike out the word "seventy-five" and insert "fifty."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 6, by striking out, in line 22, the word "seventy-five" and inserting "fifty."

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I have offered another amendment, which I presume will meet the same fate as my former amendments to this bill, because these amendments are in the interest of economy. I understand that this officer, whom the President has the power under the provisions of this bill to retire immediately upon the passage of this bill, now receives a salary of $4,500. His commutation is $1,080 and his allowance for light and fuel is $311.30, making a total of $5,891.30.

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, my distinguished colleague, Judge ADAMSON, awhile ago referred to the fact that my allusion to the farmers in my former presentation of my views on this question was tainted with demagogy, and said that he represented an intelligent district and that he could justify his position before his constituents. I hope that my distinguished colleague can justify his position. He should justify his position, because I do not know of an abler Representative in Congress now, or before, or coming hereafter, than my good friend. [Applause.]

I want to say to him that I represent a very intelligent district; in fact, the center of intelligence in the South is in the great city of Atlanta, which I have the great honor to represent. [Applause.] Besides the farming constituency, which is the most intelligent and industrious in the great empire State of the South, we have, in the city of Atlanta, some 6,000 or 7,000 union-labor men. About 2,500 of those good fellows, so I am reliably informed, are to-day walking the streets of the great city of Atlanta looking for work.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Why?

Mr. HOWARD. Oh, why? You know why. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] But you have not got the honesty to admit it, or the courage, either.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It is psychological? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. HOWARD. Oh, let me answer one at a time. You know that you are trying to lay it on the reduction in the tariff, when you have a higher tariff now than you ever had in the history of the Republican Party, to wit, no competition at all. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You know it is attributable to the horrible European conditions, the most horrible in the recorded history of the world; but you are demagoging and trying to lay in on the tariff and a Democratic President. [Renewed applause on the Democratic side.]

But that is merely a side remark. I say that these men are out of work.

It is because everybody is scared to death. And I want to say a word here and now to the American business man. I think they are the weakest-kneed crowd of fellows on the face of God's earth. If the Germans or English had the same opportunities and were surrounded by the same environments that the American manufacturers are surrounded by, they would have money in every pocket and every loom and spindle would be running full time, because they have got the courage to go out and get the business and supply the demand of a clamoring world market.

But that is aside from the subject. I will deliver myself fully on the tariff and other conditions later. Here is what I am driving at: You propose to retire a man who is drawing $4,500 a year, immediately after the passage of this bill, with three-fourths pay, counting his longevity pay. Now, how many thousands and thousands of citizens are just as worthy as he? Take the volunteer firemen in the great cities. Do you mean to say they do not risk their lives? They do, and yet they do not get a penny, but they risk their lives as often as these fellows you talk about as going out and saving so many lives.

I venture the assertion that many of them in the service never get their feet wet from one year's end to the other, but still you want to put them on the retired list at three-fourths pay. How many men in your district would be delighted to get one-tenth of the pay this man is going to get for doing nothing the balance of his life? I say 50 per cent of the pay he is now receiving would be ample pay for him to receive for the balance of his days for doing nothing. It is a far greater pension than any of the old soldiers who faced the bullets of the Civil War are drawing to-day, because it is considerably over $3,000 a year; and I hope, Mr. Chairman, that in this particular case, as this bill provides for the retirement of this particular person immediately after the passage of this bill—although I do not know who he is, and I take it that his present pay is more than sufficient—I hope the bill will not pass.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield all of my time except five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I would probably have had nothing to say in connection with this bill had not a certain question been raised concerning its report on the floor of this House. That question, Mr. Chairman, is of such vital interest to every decent legislative body that when raised it becomes the duty of every Member of that body to purge from the bill the foul stench of such a question.

The idea that the American Congress has been influenced by a lobby, either for the reporting of a bill in either branch of Congress or for the passage of such a bill, is of such importance that no decent Member can afford to allow such a challenge to go unanswered, and it is the duty of the honorable committee that has reported this bill to purge from it that foul stench surrounding it now on account of the question which has been raised by the minority leader, that it was influenced and brought out here on the floor of this House by a lobby. Mr. Chairman, there is no more serious question that can hang about the public conduct of any official than the charge that he has been influenced by a lobby, because a lobby, under the common acceptation of the term, means a jack pot or its brother. And if the gentleman from Illinois means that either a jack pot or a kindred influence has been brought to bear in order to influence the reporting of this bill upon the floor of this House or its passage herein, it becomes the duty of every Member of this House to see and know whether that charge is true. If it came from some man who was half in jest and who did not have the responsibility of being a leader, then the question might have been passed unnoticed, but when it comes from a man who claims to be a leader of men and of his party, then it becomes his duty to establish every word of the charge, and it becomes the duty of this side of the House to meet that charge and to cleanse this bill of every scent of putrefaction that hangs about it like a buzzard over a carcass. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to address myself very briefly to the amendment offered to this section, to strike out 75 per cent and insert 50 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. SMALL. I think I have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Georgia agreed to yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY].

Mr. ADAMSON. No; I added that in the calculation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand it that way; but if the committee did, and if there is no objection, the gentleman will be recognized for five minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I was trying to save five minutes for these two gentlemen over here, and so announced.

Mr. MANN. I understood that my friend from Georgia wanted five minutes in which to close on that side.

Mr. ADAMSON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I distinctly stated that I wanted to reserve five minutes for myself.

Mr. BUTLER. You said you gave it to your friend.

Mr. ADAMSON. But I wanted to reserve five minutes——

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman from North Carolina will be recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SMALL. I will ask the Chair to advise me when I have consumed three minutes.

I wish to address myself to the amendment to this section. Presumably the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD], who tore passion to tatters, were speaking with reference to the proposed retirement of the superintendent of the Life-Saving Service, Mr. Sumner I. Kimball. I favor this retirement provision just as it is contained in this section, and in order that it may be known of all that there is no partisan reason for my favoring Mr. Kimball's retirement except upon merit, I will state to the gentlemen who do not know it that he is a native of the State of Maine, and I have always understood that in sympathy he was a Republican.

Mr. Kimball deserves well of his country. He was at the head of the Life-Saving Service at its inception. As a man he has the qualities which make for genuine manhood, in character, in sincere devotion to duty, in loyalty to the Government which he represents, and in fostering the service at the head of which he has been general superintendent he is a model of civic virtue.

Mr. ADAMSON. He is 80 years old.

Mr. SMALL. He is now nearly, if not quite, 80 years of age, and in the course of nature this retirement fund can not be enjoyed by him for many years. Mr. Chairman, whatever the Life-Saving Service is to-day, the pride of our country and the pride of the world, in the saving of life and property, is due to the genius and the consecration to duty of Sumner I. Kimball. [Applause.] And if we shall adopt this section, which will authorize the President to retire him, it will demonstrate that at least in this instance one Republic is not ungrateful. I hope the amendment will be defeated. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. I think I have two minutes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SMALL. I asked the Chairman to advise me when I had consumed three minutes. That leaves two minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, some of the men who have criticized this bill have created a very false impression, I do not suppose intentionally, as to its effect. To-day officers in the Revenue-Cutter Service have retirement pay, and this bill adds nothing to that expense. The men who would be chiefly affected and benefited by retirement pay are the men in the Life-Saving Service. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Texas to the fact that these men who, to use his own classical language, "Have been sucking the Government teat in luxury all their lives," have been receiving $65 a month for 10 months in the year for patrolling the coast of this country. Those are the men who will be chiefly benefited by this legislation.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Yes.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Do not they get in addition board and clothing?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. They do not get their board and clothing or other expenses; they are allowed 30 cents a day for food in addition to the $65 a month.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Do they get anything in the way of clothing and the heating of the house?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Nothing; they get 30 cents a day for food and $65 a month, and they are employed only 10 months in the year and are only paid for those 10 months. That is the Government teat they have been sucking in luxury.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Under this bill they will get clothing and food.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. They will get something, and I wish it was more, and so would the gentleman from Texas if he knew about the facts of this service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired, and all time has expired.

Mr. HOWARD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Georgia rise?

Mr. HOWARD. I want to withdraw my amendment on the statement made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. MANN. The gentleman must ask unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment in Committee of the Whole; he can not withdraw it except by unanimous consent.

Mr. CALLAWAY. And I object to its being withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas objects to the withdrawal. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I understand under parliamentary procedure that I have the right to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Not in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CALLAWAY) there were 17 ayes and 65 noes.

So the amendment was lost.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the captain commandant of the coast guard shall submit to the Secretary of the Treasury, for transmission to Congress, an annual report of the expenditures of the moneys appropriated for the maintenance of the coast guard and of the operations of the coast guard during the year.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a new paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 6, page 7, insert a new section as follows:

"Any person using any vessel in the coast guard service for private purposes in violation of law shall upon conviction therefor be fined $1,000."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. GOOD. I want to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. MANN. What is the point of order?

Mr. ADAMSON. That it is not germane to this part of the bill, or to any other part of the bill.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, if it is germane to the bill at all, it is germane to this section of the bill providing in the first place that there shall be established in lieu of the existing Revenue-Cutter Service a life-saving service or coast guard. And then, on page 3 of the bill, line 14:

All existing laws relating either to present Life-Saving Service or the present service shall remain in force.

On the 7th of July, 1884, in enacting the sundry civil bill, Congress enacted this law:

And hereafter the revenue cutters shall be used exclusively for public service and in no way for private service.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I have already explained that we have a provision making it illegal to use these vessels for private purposes. I do not think that we will admit that it has been done by adopting this provision, and I will accept the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa and withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 6, page 7, insert a new section, as follows:

"Any person using any vessel in the coast-guard service for private purposes in violation of law shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined $1,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GOOD) there were 47 ayes and 15 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LINDBERGH] desires to be recognized, but unless there is some amendment to be offered to this section I suggest that the next section be read.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to section 6.

Mr. ADAMSON. I suggest that the Clerk read section 6.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to make this statement. When I offered the amendment I did a moment ago to section 4 of this bill, to reduce the pay of this officer of whom I knew nothing to 50 per cent of his pay, I did it for the purpose of trying to stop an abuse of putting people upon the retired list when they have no business there; but after I heard the statement of the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] about the extreme age of this gentleman and his distinguished public service, I thought that as the committee had voted down the other amendment it was only proper that I should withdraw that amendment. I am very glad that I did withdraw it, and I am very glad that the committee voted it down.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be recognized for 10 minutes, if that is agreeable.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, we agreed this morning that the gentleman from Minnesota should have 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Oh, there was no agreement of that kind.

Mr. ADAMSON. I agreed not to object.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman agreed to yield to him in general debate, but he was not here to get it.

Mr. ADAMSON. I told the gentleman afterwards that I would not object to his having an opportunity under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MANN. But this has nothing to do with the bill, as I understand it, and the gentleman tried to cut me off from talking on the bill to-day.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I desired to give the gentleman all he wanted.

Mr. MANN. I had to take what I could get.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for 10 minutes, out of order. Is there objection?

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to know what he is going to talk about.

Mr. LINDBERGH. I am going to discuss a letter that was written concerning me personally on the subject of a resolution I introduced.

Mr. CARLIN. I shall not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Chairman, certain false statements have been published about me in my official work. If the false things published were about the particular work I am doing, I would not answer but let the work itself be the answer. But a man of straw was built up, and then they proceeded to burn it. That being the case, my answer will be to show what I was really doing. Since there is not time to give my entire speech on the floor, I wish now to outline some of the particular features of it.

I shall show—

That the bankers monopolize the money and credit of this country and use it to suit their own selfish interests.

That the people place over $19,000,000,000 of deposits in the banks, on about half of which the banks pay no interest and pay from 2 to 4 per cent on the rest—an average of about 1½ per cent on all their deposits. That this $19,000,000,000 is really the basis on which the so-called Money Trust operates, which in effect amounts to the people furnishing their own funds to maintain the Money Trust, and that is why the cost of living to the consumer is so high and the return to the producer is so low.

That whenever the "interests" allied with the Money Trust wish to borrow they are given preference over the plain people who wish to borrow, and that the latter are forced to pay the highest rates of interest that the banks can collect, examples of which are being furnished by the foreign loans that are being made and the refusal of the banks to furnish reasonable credit and rates to the plain borrowers in this country.

That under the old banking system the Money Trust banks had a real monopoly because of the conditions they created, as well as the fact that the laws extended to them special privileges, and that they speculated with the use of the people's deposits till they expanded the system to the straining point and then brought on a panic to form the basis for an excuse to obtain from Congress an absolute legal monopoly for the Money Trust.

That in pursuance of that plan they devised a plan for the formation of so-called citizens' and other leagues to educate the public to their way of thinking, and that the final outcome of the campaign they started was that they secured the Federal reserve act, now in incubation.

That that plan was drafted in Wall Street for Wall Street greed by Paul M. Warburg in about 1902 and placed in cold storage till just before the panic of 1907; but even then its real purpose was disclosed only to those in the secret.

I shall show that all along, from 1906 to the present time, the Money Trust forces have adroitly managed the campaign for the building up of this Federal reserve act and putting it into operation, and it will appear that the President selected for the Federal Reserve Board members who have been schooled in the Money Trust system and that a majority of them are pupils of that system.

I shall further show by facts and figures that can not be successfully disputed—in fact, that the conditions themselves already prove—that there is no chance at all for material improvement in the conditions of the plain working people of this country so long as the Federal reserve act, as it now stands, is the only available source from which the finances of the country are operated.

Those who control it can and may bring on temporary activity at different times; but its main effect will be to give employment at the lowest possible wages for subsistence for the workers and to accumulate vast capital for the trusts, on which to increase their "vested rights" to collect a so-called "reasonable return."

I shall show that the only way to get without this most unfortunate condition is to give to all the legitimate industries of this country, when so organized as to make the securities ample, the same privileges that are now exclusively given to the banks. I shall show how the Government should aid in their organization as it has in the organization of the banks.

I shall show that it is absolutely essential to the people of this country, if we are to continue along our present general business ways, to give the people the privilege of depositing, without limit, their funds with the Government in the postal savings banks, and that these funds may be used by the Government to finance the other business interests of the country rather than giving that exclusive power to the banks. I do not advocate the giving of any privilege to any business greater than that which is given to the banks now, and while I do not believe in the present plan, even if it were extended to all the legitimate business without discrimination, I am not discussing any other general plan of finances than that which we have, and my special reason for not doing so is that it seems reforms can only be secured in installments.

I will show that the same old game is being played in the same old way to postpone the consideration of this law, its operation and effect. That is one of the ways that is always used to postpone action when the "special interests" put one over on the people. They wish the people to wait till they have been skinned and the holdings of the "interests" have been heaped up higher and higher, so that when the people finally say "Stop, thief!" by that time their newly acquired wealth will have become "vested rights," and then the courts will come in with a decree enforcing a levy upon the overpatient people for a "reasonable profit" on their new holdings in favor of the "special interests."

The high cost of living to the consumer and the small return to the producer can not both exist at the same time in a well-governed country. Both these conditions do exist in this country at this time, and because of that fact I have used every minute of time that I could spare to discover and point out the reasons for their existence. It happens that in pointing out the principal cause and explaining how it could be remedied I trod upon the toes of the Money Trust. From that time on, as was to be expected, I have met opposition from this source. It has defrayed the expenses of several campaigns made against me in my district. Its agents and that portion of the press which it controls circulate falsehoods about me and try at all times to make me appear ridiculous. They make false reports of how I vote in Congress, and have even had the nerve to cite the record of my acts in Congress, falsely pretending that it showed things of me that are not there.

They are bold to do this, knowing that comparatively few people ever see the RECORD, and they therefore hope that people will not find out the real facts and catch them at their game.

All this performance of theirs is of no general importance, and I do not mind it. But a recent performance of one who seems overquick on the trigger in defense of the downtrodden trust appeals to me as worthy of a few moments' attention.

On January 6, 1915, I introduced House resolution 696, which I ask unanimous consent to include in my remarks without reading. I also ask that a letter from Mr. Henry B. Joy, of Detroit, Mich., dated January 7, 1915, and addressed to Hon. F. A. Delano, vice governor of the Federal Reserve Board, a copy of which was mailed to each Member of the House, together with my reply thereto, may be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

My resolution, together with certain articles which appeared in the Chicago Tribune, apparently provoked the outcry from Mr. Henry B. Joy, who is a director of the Federal reserve bank of Chicago. It was mailed by copy to all Members of the House and, I am informed, to Senators, governors, and other State officers, and to banks, bank examiners, business firms, and corporations throughout the Nation, and has been printed in many newspapers. I first received notice of it several days after its date, when a copy came to me through the mail and I replied to it under date of January 13, 1915.

The copy of Mr. Joy's letter was printed on the office stationery of a company whose business it is to manufacture a high-priced automobile. I would like every Member who has not already done so to read this letter very carefully, and see if you can find one word in it of solicitude for the farmer, for the laboring man, or for the consumer of this country. See if you can find anything in it that holds out to the unemployed the promise of a job; anything that looks like lowering the high cost of living. And, while we are on this subject, I want to say that you will not find any of these things in any utterance that has emanated from any member of the Federal Reserve Board that has been appointed by the captain of the Democratic team to preside over the financial destinies of this country.

What does Mr. Joy care for the farmer or the laboring man, for the producer or the consumer? No laboring man, at $1.50 to $4 per day, and mighty few farmers are going to invest $7,500 in one of his cars. I will tell you who is going to invest that amount of money in "Joy" rides, if you want to know. It is the man who lives without work—the man who wants the rates of interest and dividends kept just as high as possible, in order that he may not be compelled, against the dictates of fashion, to ride this year in last year's model buzz wagon.

Why should Mr. Oh Be Joyful try to prevent me from working effectively for the establishment by this Government of a proper rural credit system, such as has been adopted and put in working order by nearly every other civilized country, and for financial aid to all the industries of the country and to people generally, when their necessity requires and the security offered is acceptable, upon equal terms with the banks? No other reason in the world, except that he is in favor of the discrimination shown by the Federal reserve act, which gives a monopoly of Government credit to the banks controlled by the "Money Trust." There is neither fairness nor zeal for the public interest in those who favor monopoly.

Mr. Joy is a fair sample of the kind of men who, quite generally, have been selected to control the Federal reserve banks. He manufactures an article which only the rich can buy. He need not mind how high interest rates are. The higher, the better for him. Like all great corporations, he simply adds interest, dividends, rents, and profits to the cost of his product, and the people who are rich enough to buy, in their turn, charge the cost of his product up to whatever business they are engaged in, and it is all finally paid by the plain producers and consumers. He says that he has not opposed Messrs. Forgan and Reynolds in any act they have taken with reference to the management of the Chicago reserve bank, and, if so, and if the charges of the Chicago Tribune are true, he supported them in their efforts with the Federal Reserve Board to keep the rates of rediscount so high that the country banks were compelled to do business with the banks they controlled instead of making use of the reserve bank.

It seems to me high time that all the people begin to understand a fact which is inevitably true in the final analysis. It is that all interest, dividends, rents, and profits are nothing more nor less than a tax, falling upon both the producer and the consumer, for the benefit of capital. Whether that tax be high or low is regulated by the prevailing rate of interest. Which, think you, is the worse practice for a Government to engage in—to farm out the Government credit for "vested rights" to make a profit on at the expense of all the people, or to provide a just and equitable protective tariff on imported goods, equal to the difference in cost of manufacture here and abroad, for the benefit of American labor? Can you reduce the high cost of living by adding to the profits of the idle rich, to be consumed by them in riotous living and "joy" rides? Why is it that the President and those he has appointed can see only one way to relieve the distress which the railways complain about, and that is to raise the rates which the railways charge to the people? They say, "We must get higher rates in order to make expenses and pay interest and dividends." Why not fix it so they will have to pay less interest—put them on the same footing, as to Government credit, with the banks—and then they can lower the rates?

Now that the banks have been given unlimited opportunity to avail themselves of the Government credit at low rates, it is my purpose to fight as long as I am able in an endeavor to obtain from that same Government, which belongs rightfully to all the people, the same privileges, on the same terms, for all industries, whether upon the farm or in other work or business, and to the railways also—since whatever interest charges they pay are charged back to the people in cost of service—in order that the excessive tax now levied upon all the people through the medium of usurious interest rates may be lowered to the level of a reasonable burden imposed justly and equitably upon the industrious many. When all kinds of legitimate business have equal opportunity with the banks, then the cost of living to the consumer and the return to the producer will be relatively just and fair. Both will receive the advantages due them.

If there is anything wrong in this; if what I am fighting for has any measure of injustice in it or lack of appreciation for the welfare of the human race; if there is any virtue in the system that has been established, giving to the banks the entire control of the industrial affairs of our country for their sole use and benefit, regardless of the wrongs they may choose to inflict on the rest of us; if there is anything holy in the Federal reserve act or the reserve banks established under it, which renders them so immaculate as to constitute them, as my friend, the director of the Federal reserve bank of Chicago, seems to suggest, immune from criticism, then "On with the dance; let 'Joy' be unconfined."

There was a sinister purpose involved in the wide circulation of this letter. Mr. Joy and those associated with him knew that I was on the job and would probably expose the purpose of the Federal reserve act more completely than I had been able to do before; that I would be able to show that Congress was deceived in order to get that act and certain amendments to it enacted into law; that it is the most outrageous piece of legislation ever enacted by any legislative body on earth, giving, as it does, the power to one class to enslave and oppress the balance of the people; and that the Underwood Tariff Act, bad as that piece of legislation is, will not do one-hundredth part as much damage as the Federal reserve act will do if allowed to remain in force, unless so amended as to give other industries equal advantages with the banks.

Nothing in my resolution nor any act or word of mine was in any way responsible for the mention in the Joy letter of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. Every Member of the House has profound respect for the ability and integrity of the able chairman of the committee. If he had not been under constant pressure from the "titular" head of his party and bound and gagged by the caucus, it is my candid opinion that the Federal reserve act would have been a heap better than it is. No more am I responsible in any way for his bringing in the name of the Senator mentioned by Mr. Joy.

That is all I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, about the Joy letter. I had a far more important purpose in arising to address the House, and will now proceed to carry out that purpose.

The high cost of living to the consumer and the small return to the producer can not both exist at the same time in a well-governed country. Those conditions do exist here, and I propose to discuss its principal cause. I shall point out—

That far-seeing speculators have gotten control of the banking and currency system and are raiding the industries and the people of this Nation;

That the principal owners of the stocks in the large banks also own the controlling interest in the trusts;

That the deposits in the banks belonging to the people have been used to form the Money Trust, and by speculators to control the markets while at the same time they have been withheld from those of the people themselves who must borrow unless they pay usurious interest. That by depositing their money in the banks, thus surrendering its control, the people have given the trusts the very means with which they themselves have been robbed; and

That when the people found economic conditions were becoming worse they demanded of the officials whom they had placed in charge of public affairs remedial legislation, but without defining any plan, it having been supposed by them that the officials would do that; that immediately the Money Trust, seeing what was up, framed a plan which would give it greater power than it had ever had before, and that it succeeded in getting its plan enacted into law; that most of the so-called "reform legislation" thus far enacted by this administration is buncombe, and that no existing law or any that is at present contemplated that has any prospect of passage will destroy the root of existing evils.

I propose also to discuss some plans that if followed would really provide a remedy.

THE PUBLIC BEHIND TIME.

Private greed, unobstructed, has appropriated the forests, the valuable minerals, the water powers, the most valuable patents, the transportation systems, and the other most valuable agencies to mankind. It was brought about by the bad banking and currency system. As long as that remains the exclusive means for financial dealings it will be impossible for the masses to succeed. The old politicians did not dare to speak, so greed got the prize and went away with it. But are we to surrender our rights to correct the evils of the present system? Certainly not. Now is the time to fight greed and recover the control as a means of restoring the people to the exercise of their rights.

As I stated in opening, the high cost of living to the consumer and the small return to the producer can not both exist at the same time in a well-governed country. It is because it does exist that a state of uncertainty also exists as to what should be done to correct government, and since nothing tangible has been done to overcome this wrong universal dissatisfaction prevails and manifests itself in many ways in many places. In Europe it has produced war, but war does not solve economic problems. It creates more problems.

IMMENSE WEALTH.

This Nation is vast; so are its resources. The improved inventions and new methods employed cause immensely increased production over what was formerly possible. The increase is so great that under fair management all might have success in the realization of the ideals of life. Formerly wealth consisted mostly in the ownership of land and animals. Now it consists in the ownership of the tools of production, the means of transportation, and in the control of money and credit. The few who have this control possess the means of levying tribute upon the owners of the land and animals. As many of the people as they require they employ to operate their systems and fix the prices in all cases, so that the toilers receive merely what is required to give them a bare subsistance. Even a small profit off each toiler and each consumer is in the aggregate an enormous sum and gives the few proprietors the wealth with which they control industry. It is not only the accumulation of wealth that burdens the toilers, it is the use of the wealth to control the expenditure of human and mechanical energy, forcing the production of what comparatively few are able to make use of.

PRIVATE CONTROL OF MONEY AND CREDIT.

On June 30, 1914, there was $1,630,000,000 money in the 26,765 reporting banks and $1,772,000,000 out amongst the people. Of this last sum a small undetermined amount is held by banks not reporting. The money held by the people outside the banks is paid from person to person and covers probably less than 3 per cent of all business, while the banks handle the rest. On the same date the individual deposits in the reporting banks were $18,517,732,879—eleven times the actual money held by them. This was before they began to operate under the new system. That is wonderful expansion over the actual cash and shows its credit elasticity.

In 1907 the bankers found that they had stretched the old system to its limit, and as commerce and speculation had developed more rapidly than the banks could sell credit to accommodate, the Money Trust presented a new scheme for further expanding credits, which finally resulted in their getting the Federal reserve act, now incubating.

GOING TO RUIN ON THE BANKING SYSTEM.

The annual cost of operating the Federal Government is several times less than it costs to run the banks. The Government annually appropriates what it proposes to expend and taxes the people for that sum only, and thus it ends. The banks, on the other hand, are run solely for private gain. Not only are the people charged for the cost of operating them, which, including profits, exceeds the entire cost of operating the Federal Government, but in addition the people are forced to pay for building up of enormous fortunes that the owners of the banks acquire from the use of other people's money. At short intervals their profits and dividends are set aside as new capital for the banks and the stockholders, upon which they collect additional dividends and profits. This is repeated one or more times annually, while the Government, on the other hand, collects no dividends or profits.

That explains the difference in the cost of the Government doing business for the public and the cost of the banks doing the public business for the benefit of the banks. The Government charge is for the expenses alone, while the banks' charge, in addition to covering expenses, is for the private fortunes of the bankers.

THE WAY THE BANKS DO IT.

The capital of the banks is approximately $2,000,000,000. Only a small part of that represents original capital. They usually start with small capital. In addition to the usual dividends, they collect from borrowers annually a surplus, and this has been used to increase the capital and to accumulate surplus of which they have now nearly $2,000,000,000.

People having money deposit much of it in the banks, because that is now the only convenient place to put it, unless in the postal savings banks, and when they do that the Government turns it over to the banks, so the banks get it anyway. Now, while everybody knows all this, not many of us stop to consider its effect. It gives the banks $18,517,000,000 of the people's money to use. By including the banks not reporting it is $19,100,000,000. My figures are taken from the report of the Comptroller of the Currency for June 30, 1914. Upon the most of it they pay no interest. Upon a part of it they pay from 2 per cent to 4 per cent, but pay 4 per cent upon only a small part. It gives the banker that $18,517,000,000 belonging to the people to speculate with.

No one ever started a bank merely to handle his own money. It is the depositors money the bankers want, and they want it to speculate with. It is not the first year's interest that the banks collect from the people that taxes us the most. Great as that is, it is small when compared with what it becomes after it has been put into business or reloaned and interest and dividends compounded from year to year. From the compounding of interest and profits principally comes the so-called "vested rights," which would, if properly named, be called "privileges to rob."

Legislatures, courts, Congress itself, have established a rule that "vested property" must have a "fair return." But the rule which they have fixed bears no relation with what men and women receive or should receive for their work in creating and conserving this so-called "vested property." The rule that has been fixed compares more with what the different speculators make off their respective schemes for scalping profits from the products of labor. The farmer strives year in and year out, the wageworker toils till he becomes too feeble to work more, but no rule was ever fixed by legislatures or courts, nor by Congress, to give either to the farmer or to the wageworker a fair return for creating the property—the very property to which the "vested-rights" privilege attaches.

If either has controversy regarding what he shall receive, it is settled by fixing the price at what others in his class obtain for the like, which price has been previously fixed by the "privileged class." It bears no relation to the cost of living or its true relative service to mankind.

SO-CALLED "VESTED RIGHTS."

What do vested rights, as now interpreted by Congress, legislatures, and courts, mean? It is that dividends, rents, interest, and profits are recognized as having a superior claim upon the lives of men and women who possess no income property, but must work to get a living. I shall give a table to show how the different rates accumulate in 100 years in order to show what is happening to us because of the accumulated capital of the past, and how much worse fate will befall our children if the same rule continues to be applied. But I wish, for present application, to consider it in another way.

In order that there may be "reasonable" return—and I use the word "reasonable" in the sense of its application in present business practice—under the so-called "vested right" rule, it is claimed that there is approximately $90,000,000,000, including debts owing by corporations and others, upon which the public is forced to pay interest, dividends, and profits. Including all the ways that are in vogue by means of which the toilers are skinned, it is rather understating than overstating the fact to say that the average rate of profit for the use of capital is 7 per cent above expenses. This nets an annual return to capital of $6,300,000,000. Including expense the annual cost of use of capital would be well over $10,000,000,000. Now, while I do not claim that these figures are very nearly accurate, for there is no way of getting the exact amount, I do claim that they are not far out of the way and they fairly demonstrate the principle that I want to make clear. It is this: That the cost to the people of maintaining the so-called "rule of reasonable return" for the use of capital, as it is now applied, means that the toilers upon the farms, in the shops and elsewhere, mental and manual, are forced to pay approximately $10,000,000,000 annually for that which to them is not bread; in other words, a tax. This is an average of $100 for every man, woman, and child, and is increasing in exact proportion to the increase of "vested property." If you will examine the table that I will give, you will understand what a calamity it will be to our children to carry this load. It is the working people who are compelled to pay it. It is deducted from their wages, or from the products they sell, if they are farmers or others who do not work for wages. The $100 average, understand, is for all people in the United States, including children, people without work, and those who can not or will not work. It can not be deducted from their earnings because they have none. Therefore it means that very much more than $100 must be deducted from the earnings of the actual toilers for the support of "vested capital." That is what the present financial system means to the toilers.

But lest some one may still not understand, let us make the statement in another form. This $90,000,000,000 owned by just a few persons the courts decree and "society" accepts that when it is employed, as all this is supposed to be, is entitled to a "reasonable" return, which now averages in practice more than 7 per cent above cost of upkeep. There are not to exceed 30,000,000 people who do any work. Not nearly so many as that work full days. The rest are children, people so old that they do not work, or people who live without work; so the burden of keeping up the interest, dividends, and profits falls upon the 30,000,000 directly. The 10 per cent cost for interest, profit, and upkeep is equivalent to a charge of $300 per annum upon each of the 30,000,000 workers. Thus a man who is paid $600 a year for his labor or for his farm products and the wife who does the work at home have had as their wages or income $600, the sum paid the husband, whereas if it were not for the profits to capital it would be $1,200. But we will say that capital is entitled to a reasonable return, and that is 2 per cent with 1½ per cent more for upkeep, or 3½ per cent. That is about the rate the Government furnishes it to the banks for. On that basis the husband and wife depending on their work would get $400 per annum more than they do now.

I have paid during my few adult years more than twice as much interest for borrowed money as the property I own is worth. I would be worth more than twice as much as I am now if I had paid only 3½ per cent interest. Those who owe no debt for borrowed capital are paying interest. It is added to what they must buy to live on and to use. We can not get away from the interest. I can now probably show what the "kernel" in the "nut" on the compound-interest table means.

We have $90,000,000,000 of debts, which is massed centralized income-producing property owned by the few. The interest is to be paid by all who work. Including profit on speculation as well as legitimate income, the people undoubtedly pay the equivalent of 10 per cent annually upon this huge sum. If this were to be compounded annually, as to some extent is done, it would double itself in eight years and amount to an additional income-producing hoard of $90,000,000,000. In 16 years it would amount to $180,000,000,000, in 24 years to $360,000,000,000, and in 32 years to $720,000,000,000. This impossible sum represents a capitalization greater than all the property in the world is worth. It represents, however, the toll that would be levied, if it were possible to endure it, upon toil under the principles laid down by the courts of this country with the acquiescence of Congress and the State legislatures.

The only reason that income-producing capital does not or has not attained these huge proportions is that a portion of the debt is being constantly liquidated by failures to pay and bankruptcies, and by the toilers depriving themselves of many of the necessities of life in a vain endeavor to keep pace with the enormous accumulations of greed. But even though it does not pile up with the celerity that would be produced by complete compounding, it does increase at a much faster rate than can be met by the forces of production, and unless something be done by Congress and the legislatures to remedy the drain on production widespread bankruptcy will, and must be, the inevitable result. How long will this thing go on? That question may only be answered by the further question, How much can the people endure? But this ought not to be. There ought to be enough patriotism and statesmanship in the White House and in Congress to grapple with and solve this problem in the very near future and thus avert the catastrophe that is impending over this country. Of one thing I am absolutely sure—there can be no material reduction in the cost of living so long as this condition exists. There may be temporary prosperity as compared with present conditions, but it will be only temporary, and will be used to forge more strongly the bonds that already sink into the flesh of the helpless masses of mankind to press down more cruelly upon the brow of labor this "crown of thorns."

RESERVE DEPOSITS.

The $18,517,000,000 individual deposits does not include the banks' deposits with each other and in reserve banks. There are billions of these deposits also. If they were made principally for exchange purposes, they would serve a need, but they serve the purposes of speculation principally. It was these reserve deposits, together with the savings of life insurance holders and the deposits of wage workers and others living in the large cities, that formed the "nest egg" for greedy speculators. They employed them to form the "Money Trust" and buy up the best of the forests, the valuable minerals, the useful patents, the railways, and other properties. Therefore it is seen that the effect of the people placing $18,517,000,000 in the banks and the use of the reserves by the "Money Trust" banks was to let the speculators get it to secure a control of the commodities and the instruments of service that the people must be supplied from. That accounts for the high cost of living to the consumer and the small return to the actual producer, which could not be if the people did not themselves aid by the very system that I am describing.

New York City alone got reserve deposits from other places, sums that grew from $94,394,210 in September, 1898, to $451,050,573 in September, 1911, and kept it climbing, which is one item alone in only one city. The system was cleverly devised to give the "Money Trust" the use of the people's deposits, for one thing, but in another way it served the "Money Trust" a still greater purpose, because it deprived the people of the use of their own money to finance business for themselves. Therefore the trusts had no competitors.

Originally the bankers themselves were less interested in speculation, and this is true of many of the country bankers still. But the great city speculators discovered that they would have it their own way if they owned the banks, because then they would control the people's savings left in them. It was then that the principal speculators, the big stockholders and officers in corporations, started new banks and bought controlling interests in many of the old reserve city banks. These banks not only got the city people's deposits, but the country banks also gave them a part of their deposits. Thus the speculators obtained complete control of finances, which no power on earth can wrest from them except the Government, and it can do that only by giving aid to the farmers, the industrial and transportation systems, and others when properly organized, and by direct Government loans to them.

Now, the ones to make the fight for this are the farmers, the laboring people, and all others who earn their living principally from their manual and mental work. As long as the corporations are backed up by legislatures and by Congress and supported by court decrees in charging all their expenses, including interest and the dividends, as well as the water in the stocks, to the people by increasing the price of the goods they sell and the services they render, just that long they do not care to lower the cost of living and will be tied to the Money Trust. Instead, they send their attorneys to the Government commissions, and the railway presidents and bankers will call on the President of the United States, as they did lately to get the passenger and freight rates increased, and it will be granted and charged to the people, as they were.

THE BANKS MADE USE OF THEIR OPPORTUNITIES.

By using the people's deposits and discounting their future earnings the banks built up an arbitrary credit system more than eleven times greater than the money they hold, and as much of that as they do not use for themselves and their allied interests they loan at usury rates. But they used the people's credit and money so rapidly in the formation of trusts and for entering into speculation generally that it soon became absorbed to such an extent that honest business enterprises were left without sufficient support.

Bank deposits are supplied generally from the plain people, among which are those in ordinary business, but still the plain borrowers were not given an even chance with the speculators to secure credit. It was then that honest business and plain people demanded more money and credit, but they offered no plan for a remedy. They believed that Congress would make a plan. This was just what the Money Trust had been waiting for, because it had expanded and manipulated watered stock and bond operations and carried on other schemes to the limit that the old system would bear. Now, they wished more, but would have to find some excuse for asking it.

This was at a time when the country had produced the best crops and natural conditions were right for great prosperity, but to take advantage of this the Money Trust planned the panic of 1907. It was made the excuse to present a plan to Congress to give the money kings the additional power they wished. Of course, the public was made to believe it was a plan in its interest. In 1908 they secured the act that paved the way for later acts, which would not only give them greater control in the United States, but would also give them a world-wide field for speculation. The Money Trust was and still is the invisible government, possessing greater and greater power as the years succeed each other.

At the same time the trust agents raised a large sum of money to secure the formation of so-called "citizens' leagues" in most of the States. Secretly it was managed to get officers in control of them who would serve the trusts, and as pay for their service they were given high positions in the new Federal reserve system and in other places. Only such literature was used and speakers sent out as the trusts had secretly provided. To give color to the pretense that the leagues were nonpartisan and at the same time had no private greed to serve, the source of their principal support was kept from public knowledge, and citizens with the best of intentions were induced to join, not knowing the sinister motives of the promoters.

Mr. James Laurence Laughlin is a professor in Chicago University, an institution endowed by Rockefeller with near $50,000,000. I believe the professors there are supposed by Mr. Rockefeller to teach the students to think as he wishes them to think. Mr. Laughlin was given a year's vacation to work for a new banking system. A newspaper was also published and lecturers sent out for the same purpose. Prof. Laughlin was an unwilling witness in the Money Trust inquiry. He testified that the Mortgage & Trust Co., of New York City, alone gave $1,036 to the fund. Here is an expense account which Prof. Laughlin swore to, showing how money was used to influence public sentiment and to get the people to work for the Money Trust and against themselves.

NATIONAL CITIZENS' LEAGUE FOR THE PROMOTION OF A SOUND BANKING SYSTEM.

[Total disbursements, June 1, 1911–May 25, 1912.]

Salaries:
Chicago office (including seven speakers)	$58,736.29
New York office	43,729.45
Traveling and lectures	13,399.21
State organizations (including salaries, postage, traveling, rent, clerk hire, etc.)	50,547.94
Printing (including book Banking Reform, fortnightly journal Banking Reform, pamphlets, etc.)	16,915.36
Rent	3,200.00
Furniture and fixtures	2,373.37
Postage and freight and express charges	4,121.52
Press clippings, books, and periodicals, etc	1,333.20
Telephone, telegrams, laundry, water, light, etc	763.11
Sundries	89.70
Working funds	14,088.60

There is much more, not only of what Prof. Laughlin swore to of this account, for that does not show all that was expended. The funds to campaign for the adoption of this bill were raised by the big banks and trusts. Prof. Laughlin wrote a book for the very purpose of deceiving the people into believing that the so-called "citizens' leagues" were inspired to have it done in the interest of the public, when in fact it was intended to educate the people as Wall Street wanted them to be educated. Since the passage of the Federal reserve act they have gotten very bold and defiant. Now they have the "bird in hand which is worth two in the bush," and they do not need so-called "citizens' leagues." A notable instance, which is but one among hundreds, is the new book written and published by C. W. Barron, who also publishes the Wall Street Journal for Wall Street. This new book attempts to educate the people to submit to the Federal reserve act, and remain the bonded slaves of the greedy. Of course, it does not do so in the terms that I express it, for I speak of the effect. Prof. Laughlin's testimony is on pages 96 to 106 of the Money Trust Investigation Reports. They fooled the country and got what they asked, to wit:

THE FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Congress was again deceived, and extended to the banks a greater gift than they themselves expected; but, just the same, they worked for and accepted it and grumbled because they were not given more. The Money Trust made it appear that the banks opposed it, and because of certain promises the President made many people supported it. Very few knew that it was designed to serve the speculators only. It was purposely made to appear that it was forced upon the banks, whereas all the time the Money Trust bankers were secretly working for it, and it was practically, though not entirely, as they wished it. The people have already learned that they were trapped by this Federal reserve act. The vise is tightening.

SPRINGING THE TRAP.

This Federal reserve act deprived the banks of no material advantage secured to them by the old system for which it did not immensely overcompensate them by new and special privileges; nor did it confer any benefit whatever upon the people. It permits the banks to loan approximately $500,000,000 which heretofore was held in their vaults as reserve for the protection of depositors. Another huge sum will be added to this when State banks become members. It makes the Federal reserve banks, which are solely banks for banks, fiscal agents for the United States; that is, they are to receive and disburse the Treasury funds. I call attention to this feature, for it is quite certain that they will be used as the Government fiscal agents, because the act authorizes it, and we have seen how ready this administration is to surrender everything to the banks.

The President has frankly admitted in his Indianapolis speech and on other occasions that politics sway him, and even went so far as to claim that his party might be played as a college "team" plays football or baseball; and, should the exigencies of politics require, no one knows how much more he will be ready to yield to the Money Trust banks, who are the captains of his Federal reserve bank team. The situation is all the more unfortunate in view of the fact that the President too often does not claim to act as the President of the United States, but only as the "titular" head of a party, and the bedrock fact of grave importance is that he does not even act as the head of that party, but only as leader of its bosses who have usurped control and are operating to defeat the real purposes of the honest Democratic voters.

This nefarious act has opened the door to give the administration a pull on the banks for campaign funds and for other favors by offering as a bait the money in the Treasury to be used for the bankers' private gain, and when they have once secured the Treasury funds and they have been absorbed in speculation, then, by a threat to withdraw suddenly, the banks are at the mercy of the politicians in power. On the other hand, the bankers may use it as a club over the administration in times of stress. This they did last fall, when they had $75,000,000 of Treasury funds. They made the President appeal to Congress for an act to levy a war tax on the people when we had no war, and now we have the ridiculous farce of paying a war tax in times of peace, not for any war of our own, past or present, but in order to let the bankers continue their speculation with the $75,000,000 Treasury funds while the European war goes on.

How much worse it will be when the several hundred millions of dollars in the Treasury is turned over to the banks. Oh, for a President of the United States instead of a "titular" head to preside over the destinies of an oligarchy for the distribution of political patronage. What an opportunity President Wilson had! But, oh, what a rank injustice he perpetrated when, with whip and spur, supplemented by gag caucus rule, he got the Federal reserve act passed for the benefit of the Money Trust.

The Federal reserve act expressly favors the banks to the public detriment; but greater than all of the gifts for the banks that appear in the express terms of the act are the advantages that accrue to the Money Trust banks by reason of the intimate knowledge that they obtain from facts forced from the other member banks when they apply to their respective Federal reserve banks for rediscount. With the official facts thus obtained, the Money Trust is enabled to discount conditions far in advance of public knowledge and thus gouge the people by their speculations. It was for this purpose and one other, neither of which appeared on the face of the act, that the Money Trust made supreme efforts to secure the passage of the Federal reserve act.

The other unexpressed but secret purpose secured by the act was to give the Money Trust banks and their allied interests the fullest freedom, without danger to themselves, to exploit the people not only of America but of the entire world, which the Federal reserve act permits, and reenforces them with a guaranty that if they should miscalculate and become so deeply entangled in speculation as to be unable to extricate themselves, then the Government would be forced to aid them.

It was because of these two unexpressed and secret purposes that the Money Trust banks seek to conserve the credit of the United States exclusively for the use of their Federal reserve banks. Because of that, and for other selfish reasons, they oppose Government aid to a farmers' rural-credit system, and likewise oppose any plan that would give Government aid directly to a credit system for financing railways and other industrial institutions.

The Money Trust managers and their agents in a majority of cases were selected to control the Federal Reserve Board and the 12 Federal reserve banks, and because of their mutuality of interest they form a natural as well as a legalized trust. Because of the peculiar provisions of the act the country banks with $25,000 capital and upward and the banks in large cities with more than $200,000 capital are forced to become a part of this trust, and those with less capital are to be squeezed to death.

The people's deposits in the banks are absolutely under the control of the banks. The banks, at their own option, may or may not contract or expand loans and currency by forcing borrowers in the one case to pay, and in the other by freely extending loans and making use of the Government to supply funds to them to loan.

The President in creating the Federal Reserve Board appointed men who had been educated by the Money Trust system, believed in it, and knew no other. The Federal reserve act gives a power to the Federal reserve banks that makes the Government impotent to protect the people until further legislation shall be had. It is not within the power of President Wilson to repair the damage to the Nation that he has brought upon it by championing this Federal reserve act, and by selecting a Federal Reserve Board the individual members of which a majority have been educated to believe as the Money Trust operators believe; that is, that they have a right to the exclusive control of the finances of the country and of the world, and in its administration to secure the greatest possible private gain and when in trouble to come to the Government for help.

PERSONNEL OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD.

We must be perfectly fair in this consideration, as well as in all others. In my opinion the President has betrayed the Nation in the selection of the members of the Federal Reserve Board, yet I do not question that the members of the board intended to do what in their opinion is right. But as previously suggested, they were educated in a false system and believe in a plan that makes success for the masses impossible and a plan which is principally to blame for the high cost of living to the consumer and the small return to the producer. It stands between the producer and the consumer, robbing them both.

Take the case of Paul M. Warburg. He is not only a member of the Federal Reserve Board, but I believe he absolutely dominates it. That is not because of lack of intelligence, ability, or character in the other members. It is because of the peculiar relations held by Mr. Warburg to the great Money Trust interests, whose influence dominates the new system. That influence is represented by Mr. Warburg in the training that he underwent from childhood up to taking his place on the Federal Reserve Board. It controls him absolutely, as does the religion of any devoted member to a particular church, and as the southern planter had been trained from childhood up to believe that slavery was right and just. I respect Mr. Warburg as a man of extraordinary ability, and with intentions to do what he believes in, and therefore very dangerous to the people. The fault is with the system for which the man stands and not with the man himself.

Who is Mr. Warburg? That is best explained by his own statement printed in a Senate report, on pages 1 and 2, made August 1, 1914, before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee. That statement, parts of which I shall read, shows the kind of man the President has selected to take a most prominent part in the domination of the people's finances. Mr. Warburg's statement shows that he was the scion of a great banking house in Hamburg, Germany, trained in Hamburg, London, and Paris. He came to this country, married a daughter of a member of the firm of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., of New York, and became a partner in this firm, engaged in international banking, and found by a committee of this House to be a constituent part of the Money Trust.

During the past 50 years it has been the business of such firms as Kuhn, Loeb & Co., J. P. Morgan & Co., Lee, Higginson & Co., Kidder, Peabody & Co., and a large number of firms and bankers which all together make up the Money Trust, and of whom the ones named are only the leaders; I repeat, it has been their business to make and market stocks and securities of American railways and industrial corporations. At this trade they have worked industriously, so industriously, in fact, that when, in 1907, they began to take stock of what they had done they found that an overfeast of "melons" had been cut—that is, watered stocks and securities issued and distributed—so great that the world could scarcely digest it. It was the late Mr. Morgan who correctly described the situation when he named the cause of the 1907 panic "undigested securities."

Quantities of those securities had been sold abroad by the Money Trust firms. It has been currently stated that the sales to foreigners were approximately $6,000,000,000, but several times that amount had been worked off in one way and another on our own people.

Corporations having good credit, wherever these Money Trust firms could obtain control, were plunged into debt and waterlogged to purchase securities of other corporations having little or no credit. Any excuse and no excuse was alike sufficient to pile up debt for the American people, ultimately, to pay. They discounted the future, gambling on the boundless production, enormous natural resources and expanding necessities of the Nation which, though still in its beginning, had a population of 90,000,000 souls. Mr. Warburg, as appears by his statement to the Senate committee, was a partner in a firm, one of those promoters. But there was one thing that this set of promoters failed to discount, and that was their rapacious greed to stack up and profit by their stock and security issues. Mr. Warburg said in his statement that there was competition among these people, and I believe him, for it plainly appears that each was trying to make and market more watered stocks and securities than the other. None of them seemed to think of the future, therefore the future was overdiscounted.

THE FOREIGNERS.

These Money Trust firms must keep the field for foreign speculation open. That was a part of their game, and finally a time came when the farther-sighted of them awoke to the fact that they must save the foreign branch of their trade and give the foreigners protection from loss because of the overdiscount. It was not necessary to sit down and figure out with a pencil to those fellows that if the holders of $6,000,000,000 securities abroad should get scared and demand payment at once there was not money enough to stand the drain, and certain bankruptcy would ensue. They knew that and they knew their own danger if it occurred.

BUT WHAT WAS TO BE DONE?

The Money Trust firms had the idea well fixed in their heads. It was the credit of the Government that must be invoked. They knew that nothing else was strong enough to weather a storm such as the unloading of $6,000,000,000 securities would bring. So they figured to get the right to use the Government credit in order that a storm might be averted. Right here the idea of the Federal reserve act had its birth. Paul M. Warburg in his statement said he originated the idea. It was matured and fostered by him for the speculators. He is the father of the Federal reserve act.

All Members should read Mr. Warburg's statement made before the Senate committee. It may be hard to get it, because not many were printed. If it had been testimony to show the poor how to cook scraps of meat that the rich would not eat, a thousand copies for each Member of Congress would have been printed for his constituency. But this important document, which would show that the President had named a "Money Trust" man to dominate the Federal Reserve Board—a board which will hold the destinies of this Nation in its fist as long as the Federal reserve act controls our finances—this important document, I assert, is hard to get. There are 99 closely printed pages in the document that contains Warburg's statement. I take time to quote only a few of his answers to the chairman and other members of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee. He said, page 4:

When I came here—

Meaning to this country—

I was at once impressed with the lack of system by the old-fashioned nature of the system that prevailed here, and I got immediately into one of those periods of high interest rates, where call money went up to 85 and 100 per cent, and I wrote an article on the subject then and there for my own benefit * * * and I kept that article till the end of 1906, shortly before the panic.

Members will please notice the time, and remember that the panic of 1907 was brought on by the speculators in order to force Congress to enact the kind of currency legislation they desired.

THE MAN AND THE PLAN HAD ARRIVED.

Mr. Warburg was the man, and it was his plan, framed to serve the great "Money Trust" coterie of firms. Remember also that the same old gang, in the same old way, ever since, whenever they have wanted something, have been frightening the President and Congress with a threat of a panic.

In 1908, when the first emergency currency act was passed, I stated to this House facts which Mr. Warburg's statement to the Senate committee corroborates. I have reiterated it in my speeches every year since, in the hope that Members would awaken to the danger that this country is in. But never before had I any such direct evidence that Wall Street was drafting the bills for Congress to pass. I knew that it had done so, because many of the important bills passed by Congress were framed in the interest of the "Money Trust." They could not be drawn in the form that they appeared except under the direction of Wall Street agents. But to get back to Mr. Warburg's statement. Page 4, he went on to say:

I kept that article till the end of 1906, shortly before the panic, when those conditions arose again, when one newspaper wanted for the issue, at the end of the year, an article dealing with the conditions in our country. Then I took that article, touched it up again, and brought it up to date; and it was the first article of mine that was published. It was called "Defects and needs of our banking system."

You see Mr. Warburg was educated in Europe's high financial circles, in the Old World, where the masses live in poverty. He had never associated with the real producers of Europe, nor had he associated with those of America. He knew what the defects and needs of our banking system were, so far as they did not suit the big speculators. He knew that as soon as he came here.

Is it any wonder that Mr. Warburg saw the thing from the standpoint of one whose duty and purpose it was to protect his foreign investors? After he had stated that it was needless to issue more notes and that the most important thing was to get a liquid form of commercial paper and cease decentralizing reserves, he went on, page 5:

That was, however, the first time that I know of that the question of the discount system and the concentration of reserves was really brought out, and I got a great many encouraging letters asking me to go on and explain my ideas.

Mr. Warburg stated that after that he was quite active in writing pamphlets and articles in newspapers and magazines and delivering lectures explaining his idea. To impress upon the Senate committee how important it is that Congress hastens to obey the beck and nod of Wall Street, he said, page 5, in connection with the extended emergency currency bill that had just been passed:

And if you had not had prompt action last night, I think we would be in a very dangerous situation.

This was the day after the Senate passed the bill. Bear in mind that Mr. Warburg had been named by the President for a position on the Federal Reserve Board, and that for a long time he refused to allow the Senate to question him; but Wall Street needed this man on the Federal Reserve Board, so finally, when the Senate refused to confirm him without his answering the questions, expediency made him submit to the indignity, as I suppose he thought it to be, of allowing the Senate to find out something of his past.

It might occur to some whose minds are not unduly impressed with the idea that it is necessary for this country to lend its public credit to make good to domestic and foreign holders the watered securities which the "Money Trust" had printed and sold to them that we might just as well have a panic first as last, in order to squeeze the water out of these securities in order to save the people paying interest on them, and also to get them down to a bedrock basis of actual value, instead of deferring the time of settlement until these men had an opportunity to make and market more under a guaranty of the United States, which will be the ultimate effect of the Federal reserve act if it is allowed to stand. But I will hasten on.

I am now showing the part played by Mr. Warburg in securing the adoption of his plan in the Federal reserve act passed by this Congress under whip and spur applied by President Wilson. Excusing the banks for that especial feature of the "Money Trust," the system of interlocking directorates, Mr. Warburg said in his statement, page 33:

While I do not agree with the conclusions of the Pujo committee—I think they are vastly exaggerated—still I do not believe in the system which we had, which was a decentralized banking system, which was disconnected throughout because we had no Federal reserve system, no central-bank system, no discount houses, and we had no branch houses as they have in Europe. Consequently, in order to have some kind of self-protection, the banks had to do this; they had, on account of the lack in our system of cooperation, to find some cooperation by which they could protect themselves in cases of emergency and also exchange views about the commercial credit situation.

Now that we have a Federal Reserve System, they have worked out a plan to exchange views about the commercial credit situation by compelling every bank applying for a rediscount at a regional reserve bank to answer, in writing, many questions in regard to the business and credit situation in that community in general and of the bank itself and of the makers of the paper offered in particular.

Mr. Warburg, as was to be expected, early attracted the attention of ex-Senator Aldrich, who was at the head of the Monetary Commission. In this connection the Senate report shows that Mr. Warburg had the following colloquy with Senator BRISTOW, page 78:

Senator BRISTOW. Were you connected with the Monetary Commission?

Mr. WARBURG. No; not directly. The only connection I had with it was that I was asked to write a pamphlet on the discount system of Europe, with which you are familiar, which I did.

Senator BRISTOW. Yes. Were you consulted in regard to the report of the Monetary Commission in any way?

Mr. WARBURG. Yes. Senator Aldrich consulted with me about details and I gave my advice freely.

Senator BRISTOW. And in regard to the bill which was prepared by Senator Aldrich in connection with the commission, were you consulted in regard to that?

Mr. WARBURG. Yes.

Senator BRISTOW. Yes. What part did you have in the preparation of that bill, directly or indirectly?

Mr. WARBURG. Well, only that I gave the best advice that I could give.

Senator BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. WARBURG. Very frankly, and I did not agree with all parts of it either.

Senator BRISTOW. What did you think of the bill as a whole?

Mr. WARBURG. I think, on the whole, the bill proceeded on fundamentally sound principles.

Senator BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. WARBURG. As far as the idea of centralizing reserves and of creating discount markets was concerned. That is the same principle that our present—or rather, it is the same object that our present bill achieves. I did not quite agree with the construction of it; but on the whole, so far as the fundamental ideas are concerned, I thought it was a good bill.

Senator BRISTOW. Yes. Do you think it was a better bill than the present law?

Mr. WARBURG. No; I do not. In some respects I may prefer some features of that, and in other respects I think this is a better one.

Now, for the purpose of emphasis, I want to interpolate right here this thought: That it is now well known that the Money Trust was active through the public press in promoting the Aldrich plan, while they made it appear that they were opposed to the present law right up to the time of its passage. Knowing the affiliations of Mr. Warburg and his activity in promoting this sort of legislation, does it not look as though the pretended hostility of the Money Trust banks to the enactment of the present law was a play to the galleries? The colloquy continues on pages 78 and 79:

Senator BRISTOW. What are the fundamental differences between the two?

Mr. WARBURG. Well, the Aldrich bill brings the whole system into 1 unit while this deals with 12 units and unites them again into the Federal Reserve Board. It is a little bit complicated, which objection, however, can be overcome in an administrative way.

Please note, my Democratic friends, how this representative of the "Money Trust," appointed by your President to the Federal Reserve Board, proposes to nullify a provision of an act of Congress which you passed and have advertised to the country as a distinct improvement of the Aldrich plan, made by your party. In the following language he went on to show how he will do that—page 79:

And in that respect I freely criticized the bill before it was passed. I think that this present law has the advantage of dealing with the entire country and giving them different rates of discount, whereas as Senator Aldrich's bill was drawn it would have been very difficult to do that, as it provided for one uniform rate for the whole country, which I thought was rather a mistake.

Note that Mr. Warburg thought it would be a mistake to have a uniform rate of interest all over this country. Why discriminate? Can you see any good reason why Minnesota or any other State should not have the same advantages of access to the public credit as New York, or why the farmers should not obtain Government currency as cheaply as the speculators of Wall Street? Watch the discount rates that have already been established by the Reserve Board and to be established in the future. It will show the discrimination, varying from time to time and place to place to meet the conditions framed by the "Money Trust" and in its interest.

I repeat Mr. Warburg's statement, that "it is a little bit complicated, which objection, however, can be overcome in an administrative way." The Federal Reserve Board is at it "in an administrative way" now, and has been for several months. Last fall the Federal Reserve Board, through the influence of Mr. Warburg, induced the Senate to pass a bill to compel the banks to keep all their lawful money reserve in the Federal reserve banks. In that form the bill came to the House Banking and Currency Committee, of which I am a member. The House committee amended the bill to make it optional with the banks for a period of 36 months. I made an adverse report to the bill, as follows:

Mr. LINDBERGH submitted the following minority views [to accompany S. 6505]:

To that paragraph of the bill relating to the Secretary of the Treasury being authorized to provide a system of clearances I concur with the majority members of the committee in recommending its being enacted into law; but I can not join with the committee in recommending that the member banks of the Federal reserve banks be authorized to remove from their own vaults any portion of reserves now required of them to be kept in their vaults. I was first to suggest in our original committee meetings the reduction of the reserves required to be kept. That reduction was adopted, I supposed, in the interest of the localities where deposits are made. But this amendment proposes to let the banks remove all the reserves from their vaults. It is admitted to be the purpose, practically stated by Mr. Warburg, a member of the Federal Reserve Board, that all the lawful money be taken from the country generally and placed in the 12 Federal reserve banks. He stated to the committee, with reference to the proposed amendment, that, if adopted, "with the pressure we could place upon them, it would be done."

I took down that statement and later asked Mr. Warburg what he meant by "the pressure we could place upon them." His answer indicated that, through the Federal Reserve Board, pressure would be brought to bear on the banks which would practically force them to remove the lawful money from their own vaults and place it in their Federal reserve banks. While the banks themselves own the Federal reserve banks and would profit thereby, I do not believe that the smaller country banks would be so disloyal to their localities as to take all the lawful money of their depositors and centralize it into the 12 Federal reserve cities.

I was opposed to the original bill. I know that many Members voted for it under protest, but I doubt that these would have voted for it if the bill then had given to the Federal reserve banks all the lawful money. Of course, anyone owning any money that is in circulation can get it redeemed. Any bank will accommodate its customers, and also courteously exchange it for others than customers, as things now are, but if the bank would be required to ship currency to the reserve centers and have these ship back lawful money, it would incur expense. The people may not generally observe whether they have lawful money or not, as long as it all passes at par, but if they find out, as they will and have a right to, that the money left to circulate among them is not the best, you may find that they will seek the best for the very purpose of hoarding. If the Federal reserve banks are going to set the example of hoarding the lawful money, not even the bankers could "peep" if the people followed the example.

Congress has given to the bankers the exclusive privilege to inflate the currency several billion dollars. Nearly one and one-half billions of dollars are granted to them in the act of August 4 last. If this amendment is passed, allowing the banks to be put in a position where the Federal Reserve Board can "with the pressure" it "could place upon them," force all the lawful money into the Federal reserve banks, they will be able to secure from Uncle Sam the issue of still more bank currency. What would happen if the whole system were to break down? Who would get the lawful money? Do you think it would be the plain people, who have no time to study the different kinds of money? Would they be the first to get into the vaults of the reserve banks, which belong to the other banks? No answer is needed. We all know who would get it.

The very purpose of accumulating all this lawful money in the central banks is to make it the basis for further inflation of credit for one thing, and another to enable certain speculators to pluck a prize that will be ready when the readjustment from the effect of the European war begins. This is the credit that the bankers sell, and is in effect backed by Uncle Sam. The plans are laid to sell that credit to an enormous extent in order to reap interest returns from the borrowers to enrich the professional speculators. We are approaching the limit—the falling-off place. It is utterly impossible to keep the pace. Practically all of us will suffer when the break comes. If it should come while the European war is on, the interests, as well as those responsible for this kind of legislation, will have the good fortune of being able to make the war the goat. But in reality the only thing the war has to do with it is to hasten the day of reckoning. No country can long withstand this drain upon the general population caused by centralized wealth through this process of pyramiding credits on which to collect interest, and in payment seize the products of the toilers. After the war there will be a readjustment of world-wide influence. The New York bankers and their affiliated interests everywhere are preparing to make a "ten-strike" in that readjustment. They wish to use the capital of the country—that is, the people's deposits—to accomplish that. That is the purpose of their pressing for this amendment. They want to gather all of the lawful money into their 12 reserve banks. They want the kind of money they can use to buy out the Europeans, and make the enormous profits that will result. That capital may be used by the speculators to make us pay dividends and profits on. It will be just that much more to offset against the labor of the toiling millions—the "reasonable profits," as the courts term it. These people figure far in advance; so in anticipation of the great rake-off that they hope to secure in the near future, they now seek to centralize the aggregate deposits of the lawful money belonging to the people in order that it may be within their control when the prize is ready for plucking. If it were merely a question between our speculators and foreign speculators, we might prefer the success of our own, but why permit them to gather in all of the people's lawful money to make the speculation on? The move to secure this amendment was not originated by the bankers generally, but was started by the large speculative interests who control the largest banks.

C. A. LINDBERGH.

The above was my minority report. Fortunately, later, the other members of the committee abandoned their report, and the House killed the bill. But the important thing about it is that the "Federal Reserve Board," as Mr. Warburg says, intends to overcome some of the real purposes of the Federal reserve act, as most of the Members of the Senate and House understood it.

I quote further from the colloquy between Mr. Warburg and Senator BRISTOW, page 79:

Senator BRISTOW. That is, you can charge a higher rate of interest in one section of the country, under the present law, than you charge in another section, while under the Aldrich plan it would have been a uniform rate?

Mr. WARBURG. That is correct.

Senator BRISTOW. In that respect you think the present law is superior, do you?

Mr. WARBURG. In that respect I think this law is superior.

Senator BRISTOW. And the centralization of the control in the Aldrich bill was more desirable than under this law?

Mr. WARBURG. Well, I will not say quite that. I think the Aldrich bill made a mistake in centralizing the control too much in the hands of the bankers themselves and gave the Government too little influence in that.

Now, that was a clever way to put it, and doubtless Mr. Warburg was perfectly innocent in stating it that way. Under the Aldrich plan there would have been no opportunity for the President to appoint Mr. Warburg on a Federal Reserve Board. Much as that plan would have given to the Money Trust, it did not have this one objectionable feature; that is, of giving an opportunity or allowing an administration that could be manipulated or bulldozed by threat of panic to show favoritism to that section of the country which could do most harm to the party by sandbagging business or do most good for the "titular" head and political generals of an oligarchy of office seekers calling themselves a political party by way of campaign funds.

Again quoting the colloquy, still on page 79:

Mr. WARBURG. While the system that I had planned provided for a mixed administration, checking one thing up by the other.

Note this remark—"While the system I had planned." This was Mr. Warburg, of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., a constituent firm of the Money Trust. He planned the "Federal reserve act." How do you like it, my Democratic friends? Most of you were led to believe that it was the plan of your "titular" head, who pressed you for its passage. But to resume the colloquy:

Senator BRISTOW. Now, what are the weaknesses of the present law that you think can be overcome by administrative agencies?

Mr. WARBURG. Well, the weakness is that, of course, the Federal Reserve Board has got to have very large powers in order to overcome the decentralization.

He is alluding, remember, to that feature of the present law which you Democratic leaders and your "titular" head claimed as the distinctive advantage of your law over the Aldrich plan. Mr. Warburg is going to overcome that. He goes on, in the statement before the Senate committee:

The Federal Reserve Board must bring about cooperation. I think with a good Federal Reserve Board that is possible. With a strong Federal Reserve Board, and leaving myself out of consideration entirely, I believe we are getting one * * *. But what I had in mind was that in the future there might be conditions where you might get the wrong kind of men into the Federal Reserve Board, and then, of course, it would be very difficult.

Here Mr. Warburg sees danger. Danger from his viewpoint. Fancy, if you please, the distress that would ensue to the associates and backers of Mr. Warburg upon the election of a President who would serve all of the people of the United States. That is, be President of the United States as contrasted with being the "titular" President of a party, one who would appoint a Federal Reserve Board, for instance, having at heart the best interests of the farmers, laboring men, and consumers of the country and not the money lenders alone, one who could not be influenced by threats of panic or considerations of patronage and the "frying of fat" for campaign funds. But I resume the colloquy, page 79:

Senator BRISTOW. You think by administration that you could so organize the present system as to make it conform to the desirable features of the Aldrich bill so far as centralization and control are concerned?

Mr. WARBURG. I think so.

Now, in the light of this testimony, again I ask my Democratic friends to review what has been done already by the Federal Reserve Board and see if Mr. Warburg is not playing hob with your decentralizing provision, just as he intended to do and said he could do. He has defeated the one provision in your act that you bragged most about.

Mr. Warburg claims he made great sacrifices of a personal nature to accept a position on the Federal Reserve Board. On this point he says, in the Senate report, in a colloquy with Senator Reed, pages 55 and 56:

Senator REED. If you are going to sever your banking connections and break them all off, it must be at a tremendous financial sacrifice?

Mr. WARBURG. A sacrifice; yes; I think it will be a bigger sacrifice than any of these gentlemen around the table has any idea of.

Senator REED. Well, may I ask what your motive is or your reason for making that sacrifice?

Mr. WARBURG. My motive is that I have, as you know, taken a keen interest in this monetary reform since I have been in this country. I have had the success which comes to few people—of starting an idea and starting it so that the whole country has taken it up and it has taken some tangible form * * *.

When President Wilson asked me whether I would take this thing and put it up to me in a very kind way and asked whether I was willing to make the sacrifice, because he thought I was the man for it, I felt that I had no right to decline it, and I will be very glad to make the sacrifice, because I think there is a wonderful opportunity for bringing a great piece of constructive work into successful operation, and it appeals to me to do that.

It is worthy of note that, while Mr. Warburg came to this country and engaged permanently in business here as a partner of Kuhn, Loeb & Co. in 1902, he did not make up his mind to become an American citizen until just about the time it was found that his services would be of material importance in an official way in connection with the Money Trust plan to obtain control of the public credit for the benefit of all his clients and their partners and associates.

He took out his first papers in 1908, and his second, or full citizens papers in 1911. In answer to a question of Senator BRISTOW as to why he waited so long, he said this, after stating that he reluctantly concluded to sever his former allegiance to Germany (p. 77):

Mr. WARBURG. I may add this: That a thing which had a great deal of influence on my making up my mind to remain in this country and work here and become a part and parcel of this country, was that monetary reform work, because I felt I had a distinct duty to perform here; and I thought I could do that; and in fact I have been working on it since 1906 or 1907.

And, by virtue of the present administration, he is working on that duty right now, and some of the effects of the working out of his duty to the foreign customers of the Money Trust are becoming frightfully apparent in the complaints that are pouring in from all over the country from banks and business men in regard to the abuses which they now plainly see were the inevitable effect of the passage of that bill and its administration by a board dominated by a man who does not hesitate to say to a committee of the Senate that, with a proper board of associates, it will be both feasible and desirable to nullify the provisions of an act of Congress by an adroit application of its administrative features. All this and much more of material interest is given in the Senate report.

The United States issues currency exclusively to the Federal reserve banks, and the banks which own the Federal reserve banks have the exclusive privilege of getting it from them. To these the borrowing people must go, on bended knee, in suppliant submission, to obtain credit and pay high rates of interest for the use of what they—that is, the Government—create and which is made good by the product from the daily toil of the people. Furthermore the very paper they sign to show their debt to the banks is pledged as security to the Government. The banks, which furnish nothing, take the profits. Those officeholders responsible for that condition have a terrible thing to answer for.

The individual who would manage his own affairs that way would find himself under guardianship—unfit to manage his own business, but the chains of bondage to the banks have been fastened upon the people by this act of Congress, urged to do it by the President.

Is it any wonder that the high cost of living is appalling to all who live by honest industry? The currency and credit system is the most important of all the agencies of trade, but Congress and the President made a present of it to the banks, and the people will remain in abject bondage until a remedy is provided.

The "special interests" supported by this false system, may inaugurate a brief period of busy days, and thereby enable those who earn their living by daily toil to get a little more work and secure the small fraction of their earnings that is left after the banks and speculators have taken out their expenses, interest, dividends, and profits.

This act gives the banks a remedy against panics, but the people have no remedy against poverty.

George M. Reynolds, the greatest banker in Chicago, and as great as any in the world, and the man who said that less than a dozen men—he one of them—control the finances of the country, published in October, 1914, over his signature, this:

The new Federal reserve banks, one of which will be established in this city, are banks for banks. By which I mean that banks only which are members of the Federal reserve association can deposit or do business with these banks. Individuals can not, therefore, either deposit or borrow money direct from them. * * * The plan as covered by the law is not calculated to lower the normal or reasonable rates which have heretofore prevailed, but, rather, it is expected that the new system will stabilize rates through giving to the banks an ability to rediscount their customer's paper, and thereby giving to the public the assurance that credit to the extent of all reasonable requirements will be obtainable.

G. M. REYNOLDS,
President Continental and Commercial National Bank.

Thus a man of the highest authority in banking circles, and now a director of the Chicago Federal reserve bank, published to the world that "the plan as covered by the law is not calculated to lower the nominal or reasonable rates which have heretofore prevailed." Take particular notice of the clause "which have heretofore prevailed." Thus it appears that the people will have to go on paying the interest rates that have been driving them to poverty. This new Federal reserve act makes it practical for the banks to tax the people hundreds of millions of dollars annually more than they have done heretofore. Is it any wonder that Secretary Bryan would say, it having been reported that he said it, that it was the greatest gift ever presented to the banks? In fact, it is the greatest gift that ever was made to greed. The act established and legalized the most gigantic trust on earth, such as the Sherman Antitrust Act would dissolve if Congress had not by this act expressly created what by that act it prohibited.

The voters in the Democratic Party, I do not believe, would knowingly sanction the action of the leaders in Congress and the President for placing the finances of the Nation and of the people in the hands of greedy private speculators. And when I so express it I do not distinguish between the selfishness of a banker and the selfishness of others, for I recognize that whoever is in business, if he follows the usual practice and expects to succeed, will take all the profits that he can get. But it is because of that universal practice, which it seems that all observers ought to know, that the President and Congress are culpably to blame. That these leaders meant to give them this privilege appears to have been their intention, for in the selection of the Federal Reserve Board the President selected one member from a firm which, according to the Money Trust investigators, selected by the Democratic leaders, was one of the five that controlled the "Money Trust," and had, by a system of manipulations, and was shown to have exercised his power to the injury of the country. The President also attempted to select another of the same kind, but this one the leaders in the Senate could not get their colleagues to join them in confirming. The Federal Reserve Board is dominated by men who believe that the banks have a right to charge the rates that are driving the people to bankruptcy.

This administration has given the banks the greatest of all special privileges, to wit:

(a) The exclusive privilege of securing from the Government over a billion dollars emergency currency, of which they have already used $369,558,040, paying 3 per cent and collecting from the borrowers from 6 to 10 per cent.

(b) Permits the banks to keep $75,000,000 to $80,000,000 of the United States funds at 2 per cent, they loaning it at 6 and 10 per cent, while the administration "team" levies a war tax when we are at peace, thus permitting the banks to retain that money and make a new tax collection instead of making the banks pay.

(c) Permits the national banks (Sept. 12, 1914) to loan for their own exclusive profit $464,919,076 additional deposits belonging to the people, which will be supplemented by another large sum when the State banks become a part of the "team."

(d) Gave the banks a clutch on the United States Treasury by making them the fiscal agent of the Government, thus permitting the banks to loan the Treasury funds for their own private gain.

(e) Created a new United States currency to be loaned exclusively to the banks, and takes as security the obligations of those who borrow from the banks.

(f) Permits the establishment of banks in foreign lands, thus involving danger, not only to the United States Treasury, but to the people's deposits in the banks as well.

These are but a few of the many gifts made by the administration to the banks. The rest of the alphabet could be exhausted in naming others, and still this administration pretends to be acting in the interest of the people. Whether knowingly or not, this administration in providing the new Federal reserve act has betrayed the people beyond the possibility of words to describe its awful ultimate influence in subjecting them to the domination of the Money Trust.

It is not what the Federal reserve act upon its face gives to the banks that will draw most heavily upon the people, but it is what incidentally follows, for it might be called trifling compared with the wrong that will be perpetrated by greedy speculators on the outside because of information they secure from the inside.

This act welded the banks into a gigantic trust. The fact that there are 12 districts does not keep the information secured by any of them from the officials of the other 11, as we have already observed. They are sure to learn, for human nature has undergone no radical change because of the Federal reserve act. The members of the Federal Reserve Board were tied to the Money Trust. They were all in a business the success of which depended on the Money Trust. The same is true of most of the members on the Federal reserve bank boards. Does anyone think they will speculate no more? Certainly, no one thinks that.

No one can finance any enterprise without its being open to the scrutiny of one or the other of these boards, and known to them all, if important. This set of men will have knowledge of the business affairs of all the people and an advantage over them. Those who have such information take advantage of it. It will make Morgans and Rockefellers of those on the inside. Consider this enormous indirect advantage, and at the same time realize that the banking system will soon have approximately $25,000,000,000 of the people's money and credit under its control, with the privilege of loaning it or withholding it, as they like, and for what they loan receive not less than 6 per cent, which alone will cost the people billions of dollars. These billions, however, will be less by far than what the speculators clear off the people because of using information which they secure from the banking business.

Compounding profits by the banks and speculators is eating out the vitals of the people. One bank alone in New York City paid back to its stockholders 172 times its capital in 50 years. Besides it paid enormous salaries to its principal officials.

All this, of course, came from the people. But in the 50 years there was more made in speculation on the outside by those who controlled that bank than they made directly from the bank's profits. It was through the information that they got in the bank, because of the bank finding out the business of its customers, that this could be done. Now, when all the banks are joined it will be still worse.

Let us carry the calculation of the way people are robbed to the farmer for an illustration. In 1880 a certain farmer in Morrison County, Minn., my home, borrowed $600 upon his 160-acre farm. He renewed the mortgage for $900 in 1885; renewed again for $1,200 in 1893; renewed again for $2,000 in 1898; paid all the time annually 10 per cent. In 1903 he renewed again for $3,000 at 8 per cent. In 1912 he renewed for $3,500 at 6 per cent. Each time except the last he paid bonuses in addition to the interest, and every time paid the expenses of recording and drawing new papers. Several times, in order to pay the interest, he borrowed money on chattel mortgages, and this sometimes cost him at the rate of 24 per cent. What would become of the farmers of the country in 100 years at even 6 per cent and up to 24 per cent is shown by a table of compound interest on $1 for that period. It is as follows:

Compound interest on $1 for 100 years.

6 per cent amounts to	$340
8 per cent amounts to	2,303
10 per cent amounts to	13,808
12 per cent amounts to	84,075
18 per cent amounts to	15,145,007
24 per cent amounts to	2,551,798,404

The money loaners have not had 100 years under full sway against our own farmers, but they have been getting down to it effectively in the last 50 years.

Since 1880 the Morrison County man to whom I referred has paid $5,200 in interest for the use of the money borrowed on his farm, and, in addition, bonuses, recording, and extra interest on chattel mortgages, given in order to get the money, which he said amounted to about $2,000, making his expense and interest cost more than $7,000.

But this does not represent the total loss to the community, for the different sums which he paid the lender reinvested. Assuming that they were compounded annually at the rates mentioned, the lender got $14,182 interest alone, which does not take into account the other expenses.

This sum which I named was the draft upon one man only, now living in my home town. He and his sister both have until lately lived upon the farm; dragged their lives in toil to keep the farm going on the mortgage; but finally gave up the struggle and sold it for a little margin, that will not support them for five years. There were, on an average, probably 3,000 cases of that character in my county alone. The people of that county have undoubtedly paid $15,000,000 in interest on money borrowed on farms and homes in excess of what would have been required if a proper rural credit system had been operated with the aid of the Government. It means that if there had been, the people of my county would be worth $15,000,000 more than they now are, or an average of $600 for every man, woman, and child. The county itself paid 10 per cent annually for 30 years upon $30,000 and frequently borrowed money to pay the interest, and at the end of 30 years borrowed money at a lower rate to pay the principal. There never was a time that there was any doubt that the county was abundantly good and certain to pay.

One of the northern counties in my district is paying 6 per cent on several hundred thousand dollars now, and is at the present time unable to sell its 6 per cent bonds. That county is absolutely good and could pay ten times all of its obligations, and the unfortunate thing of it is that under the present system of semiannual compounding of interest by the banks that county is likely to pay ten times its present debt, even if it never borrows another dollar except to pay on its present promises with the interest. And I refer now only to the public indebtedness of that county. The farmers, small business men, and workingmen, borrowing on their homes, most of them up there and in several of the other counties pay 10 per cent, and frequently a bonus in addition. But the boundless natural resources there, together with the activity and thrift of the people, enable them to do this and still be quite prosperous. But the mere fact that they can do what would be impossible in most places does not justify the Government granting to the banks the monopoly which enables them to force this burden upon those people.

From nearly every State I am getting letters from farmers and small business men saying that they are unable to borrow money except at very high rates of interest, from 6 to 10 per cent, and that in many places can not get it at any price. In connection with that, let me call attention to what the Money Trust is doing with the people's deposits that are in the banks and the $75,000,000 belonging to the Treasury of the United States which President Wilson had Congress vote a war tax on the people in order that he might let the Money Trust banks keep it at 2 per cent. I want you to notice the 2 per cent rate of interest, because I shall never let up in this fight till the farmers and other legitimate business get aid from the Government at the same rates that the bankers do. Now, I repeat, I wish to call attention to what the Money Trust is doing with all this money. The press has been publishing, from time to time, what is happening with some parts of it. I give you the following, taken from one of the New York City dailies, as one of the examples of it:

RUSSIA GETS LOAN OF $12,000,000 IN UNITED STATES—MORGAN AND OTHER BANKERS NEGOTIATE ARRANGEMENT WITH PETROGRAD GOVERNMENT.

PETROGRAD, January 13.

A group of New York bankers, including J. P. Morgan & Co., have agreed to loan the Russian Government $12,000,000, according to an official announcement made here to-day.

This amount is subject to draft by Russia at one, two, or three months at 4½ per cent, with a half of 1 per cent additional for acceptance.

Prominent Petrograd bankers say that this is a forerunner of further credits to be extended Russia by American financiers.

The president of an important Petrograd bank has left for New York, where he expects to confer with financiers and Government officials with the idea of perfecting Russian exchange facilities.

—

NEW YORK, January 13.

J. P. Morgan & Co. confirmed to-day the dispatches from Petrograd in respect to a loan to the Russian Government by stating that a group of New York banks and bankers had made a "purely banking" arrangement with Russia by undertaking to accept short-term drafts of the Russian Government.

It is understood that the National City Bank is one of the members of this group.

Other cases of the same character could be cited if I had the time.

What can the people think of the President of the United States, who has boasted of the Federal reserve act, which gives the worst monopoly on earth to a set of Money Trust banks who are loaning in foreign lands for war purposes while our own people can not obtain loans at near as low rates?

What show have the farmers, small business men, those wishing to buy homes, and other plain people in this plan? They furnish, so to speak, all the oil to run the whole business, but themselves are left without. What show, I repeat, have they in this plan?

The President said in a message to Congress that the farmers did not ask and should not have financial aid from the Government, and in another message in this session reasserted his position in that respect. But the President did not need to advise Congress what his position was in that respect, for every act of his shows that he will not, till forced by the people, use his influence to get Government aid for the farmers and other legitimate business. Even if they force it, if they do not get on the job themselves to see that the act is properly shaped, the President will give them a plan to be controlled by the Federal Reserve Board, made up of men who believe in the Money Trust rule.

In this connection it is worthy of note that in a careful perusal of 98 pages of Mr. Warburg's statement before the Senate committee I find no word showing how the Federal reserve act could be used in any way for the benefit of the farmer, laboring man, manufacturer, or anybody except the bankers and money lenders. The bankers and money lenders are to use it to widen the gap in the price that the consumer pays and the producer receives. But what about the other members of the Federal Reserve Board, also selected by the President? How do they stack up toward the plain people and what care have they for the toilers?

HERE THEY ARE.

William G. McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury. He was admitted to the bar. Removed to New York City, 1902. Was president and director of the Hudson & Manhattan Railway Co. He completed the first tunnel under the Hudson River in 1904 in New York City and built other tunnels later. Several hundred million dollars was required to do that.

John Skelton Williams, Comptroller of the Currency. He was the organizer of the Seaboard Air Line Railway from 1899 till 1904; president of the Trust Co., section of American Bankers' Association, in 1901; organizer and president of several banks and trust companies. His confirmation by the Senate as Comptroller of the Currency was fought by every progressive Member of the Senate.

Charles S. Hamlin, practiced law in Boston in 1886. Assistant Secretary of the Treasury 1893 to 1897 and in 1913. Also an author of several financial pamphlets and a digest.

Frederick A. Delano, manager at Chicago of the Burlington & Quincy Railway from 1901 to 1905. President of Wabash Railway 1905 to 1911 and one of the receivers. President Monon Route (Railway) 1913. Trustee of the Chicago University (a Rockefeller institution).

William P. G. Harding, a banker and director of several small railways, and so forth.

Adolph C. Miller, an economist. Professor at Harvard 1890 to 1892. Professor in the University of Chicago (a Rockefeller institution) and in University of California.

These six men and Mr. Warburg constitute the Federal Reserve Board. I have given a few of the former associations of these men. No personal criticism should be made of these gentlemen because of their former associations. They undoubtedly came by them in a natural way and were men of good standing in their work. But, as before suggested, these men, with perhaps one exception, depended upon the Money Trust system to make them successful. They could not otherwise have occupied the places they did and succeeded in a financial way. They were educated by the Money Trust system, believe in it, and know no other. What show have the mental and manual workers of this country, who make up the rank and file of the plain people, with Mr. Warburg and his associate members of the board?

The public press lauded the President to the skies in the beginning of his administration, and the people followed in their admiration of their President. Everybody joined to make of President Wilson a great and useful President. None ever had the opportunity to do as much for the people with as little effort as President Wilson had, but to the misfortune of all he saddled on them this nefarious Federal reserve act. He took the responsibility, a responsibility which he and his friends will regret to the last. But bad as the act itself is the country might charge it to his ignorance of its effect, because before his election it is reported that he claimed he had not given study to the financial problems, and certainly could not have had time since. But as against this unfortunate situation he has shown his opposition to giving Government aid to anyone but the banks and money lenders, and to them he has given the absolute control. He could not have been innocent, even on the ground of ignorance, as to his selection of the Federal Reserve Board. He certainly intended to select a board educated in the "Money Trust" ways, and one of them an organizer of it.

Since this matter has come to the front I have received a great many letters from all parts of the country, all complaining of the failure on the part of banks under the new system to take care of the business of the country. You all know well how the country was promised, when the plan was under discussion, that it would be a help to business and that no worthy borrower would need to be refused. Listen to this, which is a fair sample of the letters I am receiving, and I especially commend it to my Democratic friends:

MILLER, NEBR., January 13, 1915.

Mr. C. A. LINDBERGH.

DEAR SIR: I am just reading your defense of the farmers in Congress. The farmers in the West and South are in a pitiable condition. The farmers of the West have had several years of failure of crops and partial failures, and have borrowed large sums of money to carry them through the bad years at 10 per cent and up. Now the banks refuse to lend any money at any rate. The people have no money in their pockets. Stores and business houses are beginning to stop credit. Lumber yards, meat markets, stores, etc., are looking up, saying no demand for the goods at a cash basis, and this condition is widespread. In New York State and all over the New England States they report conditions not good. We are large farmers, have our own valley farms free of debt, and have plenty of money in the bank. We loan money at 6 per cent and cancel all interest in bad years. It is the millions of those who have not got money that I am pleading for. I have questioned many bankers in the South and West in regard to the correct amount of money in the different reserve banks, and they all say they would not take out a dollar of it, so you see the Glass-Owen bill is a humbug. It is very common now, when farmers whose crops were dried out talk about the tight money market, some one will say, "Just like Cleveland times." Bankers are telling that these are Democrat times; that the Democrats have Wilson, Bryan, Senate, and Congress, and they are to blame for low tariff, free trade, etc., and thousands are beginning to believe it; and if something is not done to get some money in circulation amongst the people this Nation will soon have the worst panic this Nation ever saw. The banks now have absolute control of the people's money. Not a dollar of the billion dollars now in our Treasury can get out amongst the people if the banks do not want them to have it. The prices of cattle and hogs are going down until many farmers will not raise them. Millions of men and women are not eating meat, for they can not get money to buy it. All over Nebraska and Kansas and the South one will find many strong men begging for a meal. All building is shutting down. Skilled workingmen can not get work at any wage; they and their families suffering. Something must be done. If you are Democrat and friend of common people, call President Wilson's attention to this and save the country, for the banks are organized to bring hard times and discredit him and his party.

Respectfully,

T. J. QUAIL.

Many things in Mr. Quail's letter particularly appeal to me, and especially the latter portion of it; yet I submit that I have not had much influence with President Wilson or his party, for I have from the very beginning fought this law.

Here is another letter on the same subject—a business man's letter. I am getting them from all parts of the country:

[JAMES A. MARTIN, manufacturer and wholesale dealer in lumber of all kinds.]

JOHNSON CITY, TENN., January 8, 1915.

Hon. Mr. LINDBERGH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have just clipped and read from the daily papers a statement of your resolution to investigate the legalized Money Trust.

It is a great pleasure to me to commend you in your effort to show up this trust and to thank you for your honest effort to get into the workings of this greatest of all money hoarders.

I want to tell you that I wrote Mr. McAdoo a letter on this subject some several weeks ago and he failed to answer it, but his Assistant Secretary tried to do so.

I have written our Senator three letters on this subject, and he writes as though he had a good opinion of my complaints, but at last refers me to the "proper officers."

I intend to write him again and see if he will not take this matter up himself, as he is certainly our representative in the United States Senate.

While it is true that laws have been enacted to reduce the national-bank requirements for reserves, it is also true that something near to $300,000,000 has been abstracted by legal enactment from these same banks to build up these reserve banks and that this money is now carried as a great money hoard.

The board of managers have kept the loaning rates so much higher than other money centers that this hoarded money does not circulate, but has really decreased the volume of money in this country that is or should actually be in circulation.

They have made lower rates for 30-day loans than for 3 and 4 months' loans, and as you quite well know that such loans are only beneficial to the money sharks of Wall Street and are but little better than call money, as the business of this country is done on 3 and 4 months' commercial paper.

The plutocrats of this country certainly have charge of this system of banks They do not want an increased volume of money and they are not going to allow any increase.

Here in the South, where the conditions are appalling and where money costs 8 and 10 per cent, and no practical relief for cotton growers, it is astounding to think that this board of managers hold the rate for three and four months' loans at 6 to 6½ per cent.

No bank can pay this rate and loan money at less than 8 to 10 per cent.

I am glad to recall that this is Jackson Day, and what a pity that he is not now alive, so that he could handle this momentous question of withholding this money from circulation to be hoarded.

December 31 I noticed that the Philadelphia Reserve Bank was making but few loans, but at rates one-half per cent lower than in the West and South.

Why should one part of this United States have to pay these banks higher rates than any other section?

From their statement of December 26 I note that they had "resources of $271,683,000," and that of this amount they held a hoarded fund, withdrawn from banks and from circulation, of the enormous sum of $258,316,000.

Pray tell me what use is this money to the southern cotton planters or to the farmers of the West, who are the mighty bulwark of our Government?

I again want to refer to this three and four months' commercial paper and ask, Why should it not be discounted at 4 per cent, as it is the real basis of all business and commercial transactions in this country?

At this rate the banks could then discount paper and loan money at 6 per cent interest.

I would be glad that you can have a talk on this matter with Senator SHIELDS, of Tennessee, as I propose to fight this matter through to a finish.

The people of this country are absolutely indignant.

Yours, very truly,

(Signed) JAS. A. MARTIN.

HOW THE RESERVE BOARD HANDLES THE ACT.

I have already shown the business character of the members of the Federal Reserve Board who were selected by the President. The act gives them unlimited power over the business of this country. That board could send out a circular any day that would instantly bring a panic. No board should have such power, for it may be used to direct business to the advantage of some and against other sections of the country, and favorable to certain kinds of business and antagonistic to others. This board has not been in action long, but it is worthy of our thoughts to see what it has thus far produced.

One of its first acts was an attempt—and it almost succeeded—in getting Congress to take and place in the Federal reserve banks all the lawful reserves of the member banks. This, in my judgment, was for the purpose of putting the Federal reserve banks in a position to aid the speculators in financing certain speculative enterprises that are sure to grow out of the European war.

The board has issued a number of circulars preparatory to getting the system down to where it will have the control where it wants it. On my request the board furnished me copies of these circulars. Some of them are important to show the working plan of the board. From circular No. 2 I quote the following clause, taken from the Federal reserve act:

The Federal Reserve Board to have the right to determine or define the character of the paper thus eligible to discount within the meaning of this act.

Circular No. 3 I quote in full, as follows:

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, November 10, 1914.

Whenever a member bank shall offer for rediscount any note, draft, or bill of exchange bearing the indorsement of such member bank, with waiver of demand notice and protest, the directors or executive committee of the Federal reserve bank may, until January 15, 1915, accept as evidence that the proceeds of such note, draft, or bill of exchange were or are to be used for agricultural, industrial, or commercial purposes (and that such notes, drafts, or bills of exchange in other respects comply with the regulations of the board), a written statement from the officer of the applying bank that of his own knowledge and belief the original loan was made for one of the purposes mentioned, and that the provisions of the act and regulations issued by the board have been complied with.

CHARLES S. HAMLIN, Governor.

Circular No. 4 I also quote in full:

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, November 10, 1914.

From and after January 15, 1915, all notes, drafts, or bills of exchange offered for rediscount shall show on their face, or by indorsement, a statement substantially to the following effect:

Eligible for rediscount with Federal reserve banks under regulations of the Federal Reserve Board circular No. 13—

Credit file No._____
District No._____
Name of member bank_____

The credit file number shall refer to evidence in possession of the member bank that the proceeds of such notes, drafts, or bills of exchange, under the terms of the loans made or to be made, were, or are to be, used for agricultural, industrial, or commercial purposes, as required by section 13 of the Federal reserve act and as imposed by regulation No. 2 of the Federal Reserve Board, and such credit files shall be open to inspection by any examiner appointed by the Comptroller of the Currency or selected by the Federal reserve bank discounting same, and copies of such files, or any part thereof, shall be furnished to the officers of the Federal reserve bank upon request.

The credit files referred to should contain not only evidence of the purpose or purposes for which such loans are made but also full and complete information as to the financial responsibility of the borrower, including a short general description of the character of the business, balance sheet, and profit-and-loss account of the borrower. Assets should be divided into permanent or fixed investments, slow assets, and quick assets. On the liability side should be shown capital, long-time loans, and short-term loans. Short-term loans should be in proper proportion to quick assets, and the statement should contain satisfactory evidence that short-term paper is not being sold against permanent or slow investments. The statement should, furthermore, show the maximum aggregate amount up to which the concern supplying this paper expects to borrow on short credit or sale of its paper, and the individual, firm, or corporation giving the statement should obligate himself or itself to obtain the member bank's consent before exceeding the agreed limit. The affixing of the stamp stating such paper to be eligible for rediscount will be considered a solemn and binding declaration by the member bank that the statement has been examined from this point of view, and that the paper bought complies with all the requirement of the law and of the regulations hereby imposed.

CHARLES S. HAMLIN, Governor.

The board sent out the following notice relating to circular No. 4:

The governors of the Federal reserve banks have expressed the desire that the operation of regulation No. 4, which under its terms was to go into effect on January 15, should be deferred for the present. This regulation relates to statements that member banks would be required to receive from their customers in the future, and the unanimous opinion expressed by the governors was that it would be desirable and helpful, particularly to the country banks, in many districts to allow ample time for both member banks and their customers to adjust their methods to these new requirements.

The board has therefore decided that regulation No. 4 shall not go into effect on January 15, but that it will be held in abeyance for several months. A definite announcement will be made in due course. It is the desire of the board to facilitate the operations of the reserve banks in any way consistent with the law.

Circular No. 6 I quote. It is as follows:

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, November 10, 1914.

Whenever bank acceptances are offered for rediscount it must appear on the face of such acceptances that the proceeds thereof were used or are to be used in connection with a transaction involving the importation or exportation of goods; that is to say, it must appear that there has been an actual bona fide sale which involves the transportation of goods from some foreign country to the United States or from the United States to some foreign country.

CHARLES S. HAMLIN, Governor.

Circular No. 13 is important to show the work of the board as it develops. I quote it, as follows:

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, November 10, 1914.

To all Federal reserve banks:

In view of the impending opening of the Federal reserve banks, the Federal Reserve Board deems it proper to outline in this circular, in broad, general terms, the discount policy which it believes might be pursued to advantage by the Federal reserve banks at the outset.

While the most acute stage of the recent financial emergency appears to have passed, the conditions in other countries make it necessary that the United States should, to the utmost degree of efficiency, organize and make available its own resources, in order that it may provide for its own needs and replace the facilities suddenly destroyed by the closing of so many of the accustomed channels of credit and trade.

The directors and governors of the Federal reserve banks at a conference in Washington on October 20 and 21 recommended that the banks be opened without attempting at the outset to perform all the functions and duties contemplated in the act, but that they be prepared to accept deposits of reserves payable in lawful money, to discount bills of exchange and commercial paper, and to accept the deposit (after the reserve payments had been made) of checks drawn by member banks on any Federal reserve bank or member banks in the reserve and central reserve cities within their respective districts. It was the opinion of the conference that arrangements for the exercise of the additional powers granted by the act to the Federal reserve banks be completed as rapidly as the establishment of safe and efficient organizations would permit. The Federal Reserve Board is in accord with these suggestions.

It should be borne in mind that, although our exports are showing a gratifying increase, there is still a large cash balance due to European countries for which gold may be demanded, and that a large quantity of American securities held abroad may be returned to the United States; while on the other hand more than $300,000,000 of emergency currency must be gradually retired. No one can estimate the duration of the war or predict what will be the financial and commercial conditions when peace shall be restored. Our own industrial development has been greatly facilitated by foreign capital, and we have been accustomed to borrow large sums annually in Europe and to sell American securities there, which attracted foreigners because of their higher rate of return as compared with European investments. It is probable that at the end of the war interest rates in Europe will be higher than they have been in the past and greater investment returns will be yielded. The tremendous destruction of property and waste of capital will not only check the flow of European savings to the United States, but may dispose foreign investors to return us the securities they now hold. Lower money rates in this country would be likely to accentuate this tendency, while, on the other hand, higher interest rates and larger investment returns on our side would check it.

The function of the Federal reserve banks is, therefore, of a twofold character. They should extend credit facilities, particularly where the abnormal conditions now prevailing have created emergencies demanding prompt accommodation; and, on the other hand, they must protect the gold holdings of this country in order that such holdings may remain adequate to meet demands that may be made upon them. While credit facilities should be liberally extended in some parts of the country, it would appear advisable to proceed with caution in districts not in need of immediate relief and to await the effect of the release of reserves and of the changes which the credit mechanism of the country is about to experience before establishing a definite discount policy.

Commercial paper: The Federal Reserve Board, under section 13 of the Federal reserve act, has the right to determine or define the character of paper eligible for discount, to wit, "notes, drafts, and bills of exchange arising out of actual commercial transactions; that is, notes, drafts, and bills of exchange issued or drawn for agricultural, industrial, or commercial purposes, or the proceeds of which have been used or are to be used for such purposes."

Bearing in mind the requirements of the present situation, the Federal Reserve Board believes that it would be inadvisable at this time to issue regulations placing a narrow or restricted interpretation upon the section defining the character of paper eligible for discount. It has, therefore, been decided not at this time to enter upon the discussion of the question of single or double name paper, but to admit both forms of bills to rediscount with the Federal reserve banks.

The Federal Reserve Board proposes, however, to prescribe the following basic principles for the guidance of Federal reserve banks and member banks:

(a) No bill shall be admitted to rediscount by Federal reserve banks the proceeds of which have been or are to be applied to permanent investment, and regulation No. 2 has been formulated with the intention of giving effect to this principle, and is herewith inclosed.

(b) Maturities of discounted bills should be well distributed. It is the well-established practice of European reserve banks to invest only in obligations maturing within a short time. It is a general rule not to purchase paper having more than 90 days to run. The maturities of these notes and bills are so well distributed as to enable those banks within a short time to strengthen their hold on the general money market by collecting at maturity or by reinvesting at a higher rate a very substantial proportion of their assets. Acting on this principle, the Federal reserve banks should be in position to liquidate, whenever such a course is necessary, substantially one-third of all their investments within a period of 30 days. Departure from this principle will endanger the safety of the system. It is observance of this principle that affords justification for permitting member banks to count balances with Federal reserve banks as the equivalent of cash reserves.

(c) Bills should be essentially self-liquidating.

Safety requires not only that bills held by the Federal reserve banks should be of short and well-distributed maturities, but, in addition, should be of such character that it is reasonably certain that they can be collected when they mature. They ought to be essentially "self-liquidating," or, in other words, should represent in every case some distinct step or stage in the productive or distributive process—the progression of goods from producer to consumer. The more nearly these steps approach the final consumer the smaller will be the amount involved in each transaction as represented by the bill, and the more automatically self-liquidating will be its character.

Double-name paper drawn on a purchaser against an actual sale of goods affords, from the economic point of view, prima facie evidence of the character of the transaction from which it arose. Single-name notes, now so freely used in the United States, may represent the same kind of transactions as those bearing two names. Inasmuch, however, as the single-name paper does not show on its face the character of the transaction out of which it arose—an admitted weakness of this form of paper—it is incumbent upon each Federal reserve bank to insist that the character of the business and the general status of the concern supplying such paper should be carefully examined in order that the discounting bank may be certain that no such single-name paper has been issued for purposes excluded by the act, such as investments of a permanent or speculative nature. Only careful inquiry on these points will render it safe and proper for a Federal reserve bank to consider such paper a "self-liquidating" investment at maturity.

Turning now to the question of procedure, it is not thought necessary to impose upon the banks the observance of methods which would involve needless difficulty or delay. It is therefore not deemed essential that a statement of condition be attached to each bill when sold to a Federal reserve bank. It is, however, thought advisable by the board to require that on and after January 15, 1915, no paper shall be discounted or purchased by Federal reserve banks that does not bear on its face the evidence that it is eligible for rediscount under the principles and definitions above outlined and as expressed in regulation No. 2, and that the seller of the paper has given a statement to the member bank. A rubber stamp stating, in substance—

ELIGIBLE FOR REDISCOUNT WITH FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS
UNDER REGULATIONS OF FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD CIRCULAR NO. 13.
CREDIT FILE NO. ———
DISTRICT NO. ———
(Name of Member Bank.)

is considered sufficient evidence to that effect at this time. It would be understood that the Federal reserve bank could at any time call for the appropriate credit file, and it may well be expected that the data thus gathered—particularly the files of more important firms and of those rediscounting in larger amounts—will be so catalogued as to furnish the nucleus of an effective credit bureau which in turn may eventually develop into a central credit bureau for the benefit of all the Federal reserve banks of the system.

For the time being certified accountant's statements will not be required. This matter is reserved for regulation at a later date. The required statement as outlined above should be signed under oath and should contain a short general description of the character of the business, the balance sheet, and the profit-and-loss account. Assets should be divided into permanent or fixed investments, slow assets, and quick assets. On the liability side should be shown capital, long-term loans, and short-term loans. Short-term loans should be in proper proportion to quick assets, and the statement should contain satisfactory evidence that short-term paper is not being sold against permanent or slow investments. The statement should, furthermore, show the maximum aggregate amount up to which the concern supplying this paper expects to borrow on short credit or sale of its paper, and the concern giving the statement should obligate itself to obtain the member bank's consent before exceeding the agreed limit. The affixing of the stamp stating such paper to be eligible for rediscount will be considered a solemn and binding declaration by the member bank that the statement has been examined from this point of view and that the paper bought complies with all the requirements of the law and the regulations hereby imposed.

The board appends two additional regulations: No. 3, covering discount transactions on or before January 15; No. 4, discount operations on and after January 15.

Six months' paper: The law provides that the Federal Reserve Board shall fix the percentage of its capital (by which is understood that portion of the capital paid in) up to which a Federal reserve bank may discount "notes, drafts, and bills drawn or issued for agricultural purposes, or based on live stock, and having a maturity not exceeding six months." The law permits the Federal Reserve Board to deal with each Federal reserve bank individually in fixing this limit.

The Federal Reserve Board has determined to fix this limit generally and until further notice at 25 per cent of the capital that shall have been paid in from time to time. For those districts in which, during certain seasons, six months' paper is particularly required to carry through agricultural operations the limit will be increased from time to time upon requests made by Federal reserve banks to the Federal Reserve Board.

Regulation No. 5, relating to six months' paper, is appended hereto.

Regulation No. 6, relating to bank acceptances, is likewise appended.

CHARLES S. HAMLIN, Governor.

The board has been very prompt and courteous in furnishing me with these circulars. It was currently reported that many questions were being asked of the banks applying for loans and as to the makers of paper offered for discount. In order to know whether the Federal Reserve Board was connected with those I directed an inquiry to the board, and in asking for further information I received the following answer:

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, January 14, 1915.

HON. CHARLES A. LINDBERGH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. LINDBERGH: In reply to your letter of January 12, I write to say that Circular No. 13 and the accompanying regulations are absolutely all that has been sent out by this board with respect to the matter you refer to, viz, "questions * * * asked of member banks of the Federal reserve banks when they applied for rediscount, both as to the applying bank and the makers of the paper offered as a security." As to what questions the various reserve banks may have asked, we are not informed. Doubtless the officers of those banks asked such questions as they thought in each case that the requirements of the applicant for a loan demanded, and this, it is fair to say, would vary widely as between different districts and different banks. I have no idea that there have been any stereotyped lists of questions even within a single district; but if there were, I do not know of it, and I do not think that anyone here has any knowledge of it.

Further, as I stated in my letter to you the other day, there have as yet been no amendments to original Circular No. 13 and its attached regulations, although, as I have stated, such a revision is under consideration and, in fact, the revised draft is in the press at this time. As soon as it is ready to issue I shall gladly send it to you. Just how the several banks will put the new regulations into operation, or what questions they will ask for the purpose of satisfying their own minds that it has been complete, we can not, of course, predict.

Very truly, yours,

H. PARKER WILLIS, Secretary.

I have no doubt that the board and its officers are pursuing the whole plan as they believe right, but they are all working to high finance, and not to the needs of the plain people. The latter may struggle in any way they can, but it must be without the consideration of the help from the Federal Reserve Board. Therefore they are left, as we have seen, to the mercy of the money lenders.

Let us examine the circulars and letters. I again quote the clause in No. 2:

The Federal Reserve Board to have the right to determine or define the character of the paper thus eligible to discount within the meaning of this act.

Then, in No. 13, I quote the following from it:

It is probable that at the end of the war interest rates in Europe will be higher than they have been in the past and greater investment returns will be yielded. The tremendous destruction of property and waste of capital will not only check the flow of European savings to the United States, but may dispose foreign investors to return us the securities they now hold. Lower money rates in this country would be likely to accentuate this tendency, while, on the other hand, higher interest rates and larger investment returns on our side would check it.

The function of the Federal reserve banks is, therefore, of a twofold character. They should extend credit facilities, particularly where the abnormal conditions now prevailing have created emergencies demanding prompt accommodation, and, on the other hand, they must protect the gold holdings of this country in order that such holdings may remain adequate to meet demands that may be made upon them.

The statement should, furthermore, show the maximum aggregate amount up to which the concern supplying this paper expects to borrow on short credit or sale of its paper, and the concern giving the statement should obligate itself to obtain the member bank's consent before exceeding the agreed limit.

This Circular No. 13 and the letter of H. Parker Willis should be studied by Members with the object in view of understanding the powers of the board. It will be observed that the board may, if there is a drain of gold for export to foreign lands, cause a raise in the rates of interest to induce gold to remain at home. The banks may, without hindrance, ship gold for the very purpose of creating a drain to force higher rates of interest. J. P. Morgan & Co. and others are making loans in foreign countries—in Europe and South America.

Have Members given any thought to who gets the benefit of an arbitrary raise of the rates of interest? Just think of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks causing a raise of interest rates to stop an outflow of gold. It becomes a tax upon the people to stop what they are not to blame for and to give the benefit to the banks, which, in nearly every case, themselves will be to blame. A certain number of our people spend hundreds of millions of dollars in traveling abroad. Speculators in this country speculate abroad and the Federal reserve act authorizes the banks to go to it, and whether it be the travelers, the speculators, or the banks that ship or take money to other countries, the payments are made in gold; and if they travel, speculate, too hard or create too many foreign banks and the gold goes too fast, they raise the rates of interest to our people to keep the rest of the gold at home. It is, in effect, a fine to be collected from the toilers of this country and kept by the banks.

The particular thing I wish you to observe about these circulars is in paragraph (b) in Circular No. 13. See how strict the rule is for keeping the paper collectible within from 30 to 60 days, and at least one third within 30 and another third within 60. That serves a certain purpose very well; that I shall not discuss, because the purpose is served, and in some respects it is a good thing. But it was pretended and the attempt was made to make the farmers believe that this act was good enough for the farmers, and the President refuses to support a rural-credit system with Government aid to the farmers, partly claiming that this act will do. There is nothing in this act compelling the banks to loan to the farmers, and if they should care to there is no limit on the charge that they may make. The banks are given everything by the act, but they are not required to do anything, and the truth is that the banks are not and never will take care of the farmers' business without overcharging.

This whole act is intended simply to handle liquid paper, which means handling the commerce on which the speculators of this country are reaping their harvests. It expressly avoids taking care of the fixed indebtedness. No farmer can go on and improve his farm with 30-to-90-day money. Farmers need the money, if they require any at all, even longer than that to handle their crops. Anyone who claims that this act is in the interest of the farmers is either ignorant on that subject or dishonest.

As a matter of fact, we shall have to have some way to take care of the fixed indebtedness, if we are forced to stay upon the present general way of doing business. We shall have to have very low rates of interest or a general breakdown. The banks and money lenders are extremely selfish. They have been given everything that could be given to them by any government; still, without themselves paying more for deposits, they raised the rates of interest when more of the deposits were released for loans by the Federal reserve act. I wish to exhibit something of how selfish they really are. I shall quote you four instances out of the many thousands of cases that show how selfish they are. My purpose is to show that any government that lets the banks have the exclusive control of finances is not a well-governed country. Now, I name the cases. Here is the first one. It was sent out by the money lenders during the Civil War. It was known as the Hazard circular, having been drafted by a lobbyist for the banks and sent to bankers. This is it:

Slavery is likely to be abolished by the war power and all chattel slavery abolished. This I and my European friends are in favor of, for slavery is but the owning of labor and carries with it the care of the laborers, while the European plan, led on by England, is that capital shall control labor by controlling wages. The great debt that capitalists will see to it is made out of the war must be used as a means to control the volume of money. To accomplish this the bonds must be used as a banking basis. We are now waiting for the Secretary of the Treasury to make this recommendation to Congress. It will not do to allow the greenback, as it is called, to circulate as money any length of time, as we can not control that. But we can control the bonds and through them the bank issues.

The second one to which I call your attention was sent out by authority of the Associated Bankers of New York, Philadelphia, and Boston in 1877. It was signed by James Buel, secretary, from 247 Broadway, New York, and reads as follows:

DEAR SIR: It is advisable to do all in your power to sustain such prominent daily and weekly newspapers, especially the agricultural and religious press, as will oppose the greenback issue of paper money, and that you also withhold patronage from all applicants who are not willing to oppose the Government issue of money. Let the Government issue the coin and the banks issue the paper money of the country, for then we can better protect each other. To repeal the act creating bank notes, or to restore to circulation the Government issue of money, will be to provide the people with money, and will therefore seriously affect our individual profits as bankers and lenders. See your Congressman at once and engage him to support our interests, that we may control legislation.

In 1893 the American Bankers' Association sent out the following circular:

DEAR SIR: The interest of national banks requires immediate financial legislation by Congress. Silver, silver certificates, and Treasury notes must be retired and national bank notes upon a gold basis made the only money. This will require the authorization of five hundred millions to one thousand millions of new bonds as the basis of circulation. You will at once retire one-third of your circulation and call in one-half of your loans. Be careful to make a monetary stringency among your patrons, especially among influential business men. Advocate an extra session of Congress to repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman law and act with other banks of your city in securing a large petition to Congress for its unconditional repeal, per accompanying form. Use personal influence with your Congressman, and particularly let your wishes be known to your Senators. The future life of national banks as fixed and safe investments depends upon immediate action, as there is an increasing sentiment in favor of Government legal-tender notes and silver coinage.

The Secretary of the Treasury was quoted by the press in September and October, 1914, as claiming that letters were sent out from large banks to some of the smaller banks, which letter the press quoted in the following language:

DEAR SIR: Absolutely shut down on any more loans. Now is the time for collecting in and not for putting out. This until money here shall become easier, by reason of the selling of cotton, etc., and the consequent increase of deposits and paying of notes.

Do not, under any circumstances whatever, make any further loans to your customers to pay notes and accounts to the wholesalers. Let the latter do their own toting.

It also includes lending on cotton warehouse receipts of one form or another, and also the lending of small amounts to farmers and others in order to keep from selling cotton.

Stop this "lending" money in the shape of overdrafts. When you allow a party to overdraw, and he then takes the position that he can not pay and can cover only by a note, he's "got" you. Cut out persistent overdrafts, not only with cotton accounts, but with all.

Collect up the notes falling due from now on, to the very best of your ability. Do your very utmost to get in every dollar that you can on your present loans.

Do not consent to renew any of your present notes without special authority in each case from our office.

I have not given these quotations to prejudice you against the bankers. Speculators make all the money they can as a rule. Bankers are no worse than others. The only difference between the bankers and the other speculators is that the people take their money to the banks, and the Government has turned its prerogatives to the banks, and the banks use other people's money, including that of the Government, to speculate with. I would probably do the same if I was a banker; so would you; and many of you are bankers. But we are not here to represent the bankers. They do not pay us our salary, and therefore there was no reason to give them the exclusive right to get Government loans and the exclusive privilege of keeping the people's money in their banks. The latter the act does not in express terms give, but the conditions force it, so it amounts to the same thing.

Selfish as the banks are, and much as I would like to see the Federal reserve act repealed, that is not my purpose in making this speech. Let the banks for the time being—since you would not repeal the act, anyway—have the act stand. But do not let it stand as the exclusive law governing finances. Give to the people a law that will permit them to deposit with the United States money, checks, and other proper evidences of credit without limitation as to amount, and fix the rates of interest which the Government will pay therefor at from 2 per cent to 3 per cent, depending on the conditions of deposit, and authorize the organization of the farmers, the railways, the industries, and make direct loans to them when they give the security that justifies it upon terms as favorable as the Federal reserve act gives to the banks. If that is done, the Money Trust will at once dissolve and the business of this country will flourish as it never has before, and all people will then prosper.

I would draft such a bill myself, but the majority of this House does not wish to have an act of importance bear the name of one who is not a member of the majority party. Therefore, I have simply indicated the principles upon which it should be drawn to break the struggle of the Money Trust banks, by means of which they are raiding the people and the industries of this Nation. I will help you draft a bill and let you have the name for yourself. You drafted the Federal reserve act in secret behind closed doors and would admit no one but Democratic members of the Banking and Currency Committee. I am sure no one will long envy you this distinction. I never did.

This subject is enormous in its scope when considered from present methods. It is complicated, and one would need to use much more time than one speech can occupy to go into many phases of the problem. If finances were treated and practiced scientifically instead of arbitrarily, they would be very simple. But that would not suit the money lenders, and they have it their way at present.

We must be practical and consider things as they are, even if they are different than they should be.

Capital has a place in economies, not a theoretical place, but a practical one. If men and women would cease being personally selfish and all would acquire the habit of industry, then we would be prepared for pure socialism. But all admit that most men and women are personally selfish and that under existing conditions some personal selfish action is necessary to sustain existence. We also admit that not all of us are industrious. So far as we admit those two things—that is, so far as they are facts—we are not prepared for complete socialism. But we have socialism in a limited way in some divisions of human affairs, and as we improve the field of socialism will be enlarged. Evolution will eventually bring us to it in the same way that we have gradually taken on socialism in some of our work. In those fields where socialism is not now applied we must deal with capital as it relates to men and women. The proprietors of capital have been given a special privilege that enables them to levy upon the industry of the people generally an unfair advantage, and they have not hesitated to use it.

I wish to offer a warning to the farmers of this country, and that is to beware of the Federal Reserve Board and present no rural-credit plan that gives the Federal Reserve Board any control over it. When proper rural-credit and proper industrial-credit plans are enacted, let them be governed by their friends. I have repeatedly proclaimed that the Federal reserve act was drafted in Wall Street for Wall Street, and long before it had taken concrete form that that very thing would be done. I was safe in saying so, because I knew the conditions under which it was framed, and I have shown enough to-day to convince anyone who is not unduly prejudiced.

What the people of this country should observe to know whether they are successful or not is not the stock market, nor the balance of trade, nor the amount of work that can be found by the toilers to do, or any other business activity, but the test is this: Do the people obtain from their employment such compensation as will give them advantages suited to their needs? In other words, is the net return from employment—the difference between what the toiler receives for his labor and what he pays for the necessaries of life—what it fairly ought to be? This and this only is the true test of a nation's prosperity. It has been demonstrated over and over again that a leisure class is not the most productive of even the finer things. Statesmen, jurists, poets, painters, and musicians—all the greatest come from the humbler walks of life.

I have said considerable about the President favoring the trusts. I realize that he is not alone to blame. Congress has the power as well as the responsibility to act when it comes to legislate. But whether the people are to blame for not taking notice of it, or what the cause is for the President dominating Congress and getting legislation of so vicious a character as the Federal reserve act, I leave it to your intelligence to answer in your own conscience. I, for one, am willing to take my "medicine," since I fought this vicious act which the President has secured with appointments to public offices as the bribe stakes.

This may be plain language—at least I intend it to be—but so long as the "Money Trust" can control all the advantages and make the rest of the people work for that trust and give them in pay only enough for a bare subsistence, I am willing to at least express the truth about it. It has seemed strange to me, if the White House and Congress can make the people believe that this is a well-governed country when the consumers are forced to pay so much and the producers receive so little.

If it were not so serious and one did not care for his constituents, it would be amusing to watch the proceedings down here in Washington. There is no such other farce in this country. That is because the stakes are larger, and therefore the game seems to those who play it for the stakes to be worth more.

Of course, all the Members who spend their time in Washington know something about the game. I am sorry for any Member who thinks that he must have the office, or even needs it, because that places him between two fires. He thinks that he must fool the people on the one hand and the selfish interests on the other. Really, I think there are mighty few whose hearts are not actually with the people, but there are many who believe that the people do not keep well enough informed to find it out, and it is because of that fact that they secretly let the selfish interests get control. These "interests" control a large part of the public press and see to it that those who support them are given praise and favorable publicity and their proportion of patronage and favors. Furthermore, they are taken care of in their campaigns with funds and helpers. On the other hand, they believe that if they do not do this that they will have to fight their campaigns without help, and that that portion of the press that is subsidized by greed will publish all kinds of lies and try to make the people believe what is not true of them.

It is between these two fires that Members who think they must have or need the office find themselves. Therefore, if they see some great injustice perpetrated upon the people, such as the Federal reserve act is—though many Members did not know that, because they took the President's word that it was good—I say, while they often see the injustice, still they do not protest because of the attack that would be made upon them by the "special interests" if they did.

It has seemed strange to me that the people have seen private greed, unobstructed, appropriate the forests, the minerals, the water powers, the most valuable patents, the transportation systems, and the other valuable agencies, even including the banking and currency, without proper protest. It is strange that they reelect the same old officeholders that let private greed appropriate all these valuable agencies of mankind.

But the day is not far distant when it can be done no more. The enormous advantages that did exist have most of them passed from the plain people. We can no longer go to the West as we formerly did to grow up with the country. The West is also appropriated, and we struggle there as elsewhere. The resources that are capable of monopoly have been taken, incorporated into stock holdings to make the people pay for them, which I described before. Things are getting down to hardpan. We can hardly expect those who held office while greed appropriated without their protest the best of the natural resources will be able to get back what they let them take. For them to pretend now to be progressive is in most cases mockery and insult to the intelligence of the people.

I warn fellow Members that what is happening over in Europe is not alone the fight of kings. They struck the spark that exploded the war magazines of the nations; but there is a deeper social intelligence in this world now than there was in the times of other great wars, and a different condition will come out of it. You need not think that the people who are fighting the mighty battles at a cost of many billion dollars are going to pay very many more billions of interest on top of it. When the war closes and peace terms have been signed a light will appear and the fake money systems of the world will be forever foreclosed and the false speculative commercial greed which breeds wars will be supplanted by natural commerce.

Oh, what a pity that the United States did not have a statesman in the White House whose word would have been taken for a good law, a thousand times better than for Wall Street's Federal reserve act. I do not hesitate to say that the country can not safely rely upon the President, and that now is a time that Congress should come to its own and look with scorn upon the patronage bait. This and the Congress soon to be should divorce itself from the domination of the President and only listen with wisdom to the advice he offers, and then weigh it in the scales of justice for all mankind and enact laws that will take from the "special interests" the power to levy tribute upon the toiling millions.

I am gratified with the very first results of my resolution. It recited facts that could not be ignored. It recites the truth about the President being on the side of the "Money Trust," and that when questions arise in which it becomes necessary for the President to choose whether to favor the people or the "Money Trust" he favors the latter, and because the resolution gave notice of that fact and was published by the press it became expedient for the President to get some action; therefore the governors of the Federal reserve districts were called together to take action. So the rates of interest had to be lowered, and they have been lowered slightly, and probably will be lowered more, and efforts will be made to start up business and put the unemployed to work. They might even bring on a little boom; but it will all come back to the same grind as a still further charge upon the masses if the people accept without question what greed has and, it seems, can put over.

The "Money Trust" has complete control of the Federal political machine in Washington. Members will have to fight for the public as against the administration, which has been proved false to its trust. This fight may be long and severe, for money has a power that is potent, and the Government itself, under the act that has been pushed through Congress by this administration, furnishes the "Money Trust" with the money to fight the people. Every State should, for the protection of its own people, provide methods by which its people may organize its agricultural and industrial forces to conserve the finances of its own population for their own use. The best power for handling credit is in the Federal Government, but the States nevertheless are not impotent and should make laws that will enable the agricultural and the industrial forces to make use of their own local resources instead of allowing their resources to be spirited away for the use of greedy speculators. The States can, by proper laws and regulations, bring it within the power of the people of the States to use in a safe and sane way their own resources; but it could be done more effectively and with greater celerity by the Federal Government; yet when the Federal Government fails to perform its function, then the States should act individually, within the Constitution, for their individual populations.

I can not, of course, discuss financial problems in very much detail in a single speech. We have the experiences of business to guide us, but we do not all seem to take notice of them. They prove conclusively that our financial system is not natural, but a created one for the speculators, and causes enormous injustice and hardship. Outside of—that is, except the exercise of—the functions of government itself there is no other problem of such importance as having a just system of exchange between the people wishing to deal with each other for their goods. I was recently impressed with a great work, brought down to date, by T. Cushing Daniels, 1416 F Street NW., Washington, D. C. Mr. Daniels has made a life study of the subject and wrote two books—one "High Cost of Living—Cause, Remedy"; the other, "Daniels on Real Money." Members feeling that they have not time to dig to the bottom for themselves would be interested in reading these.

Often as I have examined the politics of the country and reflected how men alone have run them, and see the result both in business and politics, I have wondered if they really wanted that result, and if that is the reason why they prevent the women from having a hand in politics. I noticed that it was those who support this administration, principally, who voted against the resolution to let women exercise a right which they really have but are prevented from exercising. If the women of this country had been given the same responsibility in government that men have had, a remedy, I believe, would have been applied long ago. The women see, feel, and have intuition as well as judgment. We men see but have but little intuition and fail to exercise our judgment in a proper administration of laws.

It is because of the conditions that exist that I introduced the resolution which created the disturbance among the Federal reserve banks. I carefully weighed everything I put in that resolution, and I now quote it as a part of my speech. Here it is:

Resolution (H. Res. 696).

"Whereas it appears that banks are the only available depositaries for people's savings, business, and community accounts; also that they are the only agency for financing business, and that independent of bank control there are not funds enough to finance 5 per cent of all business;

"That the largest banks compose the Money Trust and finance business in the interest of their principal stockholders; that by operation of the banking system the smaller banks have been forced to become the feeders to the Money Trust banks by transferring to them a part of their deposits;

"That by reason of the banks being the only available depositaries for the people's finance accounts, and therefore the only agency for financing business, the banking system has long been the real Money Trust power, separating the owners of deposits from the borrowers of the deposits, and thereby also separating the producers from the consumers by making each pay charges for excessive interest, dividends, and profits, thus making it impossible for the masses to succeed;

"That the people's deposits in the banks approximate $19,000,000,000; that the people owe to the banks approximately $21,000,000,000 and to those allied with the banks a still greater sum; that the banks pay no interest on a majority of the deposits and small interest in proportion to what they collect on the residue; that the aggregate difference between what the banks pay for deposits and what they collect for loaning deposits is enormous; that, in addition, those controlling the Money Trust banks secure even greater profits from investments they make on the outside because of information borrowers in securing loans are forced to disclose, and they use the depositors' funds to make the investments; that all these profits collected from the people give to the banks a constantly increasing selfish control over the people and their affairs;

"That in 1907, a year of great production and well-nigh perfect physical conditions, the Money Trust banks forced a panic, under cover of which Congress was induced to pass the emergency currency act, by which was created a committee to formulate a plan for later legislation on banking and currency; that a plan was formulated and leagues formed in the States, officered by the Money Trust agents, to advocate legislation on banking and currency; that to allay suspicion of their being influenced by the Money Trust these leagues did not advocate a specific plan, but merely urged legislation; that in the meantime the Money Trust had adroitly managed to have appointed to all important Government offices having to do with finances persons who had been educated in the Money Trust ways and knew no other, and thus secured the formulation of their plan, while at the same time they adroitly made it appear to the public that the Money Trust was opposed to it;

"That in 1913 Congress enacted the new banking and currency law known as the 'Federal reserve act'; that under its provisions the United States is divided into 12 districts, each with a Federal reserve bank; that the public can have no stock or property interest in them and is prohibited from doing business with them; that these banks are owned by the other banks subscribing for the capital and are exclusively banks for banks; that no provision whatever was made for the people to make deposits nor for the people borrowing other than that heretofore existing, and therefore the people are forced to deposit and borrow in the same old way; that no limit is made in the act on the interest that the banks may charge borrowers;

"That nothing of material advantage secured to the banks by the old system has been taken away by the Federal reserve act for which they have not been immensely overcompensated by new and special privileges, nor have any benefits or privileges accrued to the people from the passage of the act; that among the many new special bank privileges, figuring the national-bank deposits alone, they are permitted to loan approximately $500,000,000 more than heretofore, to which will be added another huge sum when the State banks become members; that they are also privileged to act as the fiscal agent of the United States and to obtain a clutch upon the Treasury funds and may use them for private gain; they may also pledge to the United States the debts of the people and secure new currency; they may establish banks in foreign lands, thereby involving, as the European war has shown, a risk to the United States Treasury funds, as well as to the deposits of the plain people; that the gifts of the Federal reserve act to the banks thus referred to are expressly supplemented by many others to the public detriment, but that greater than all of the gifts to the banks that appear in the terms of the act are the advantages that accrue to the Money Trust banks by reason of the intimate knowledge that they obtain from facts forced from the other member banks when they apply to their respective Federal reserve banks for rediscount; that with the official facts thus obtained the Money Trust is enabled to discount conditions far in advance of public knowledge and thus gouge the people by their speculations; that for this purpose and one other, neither of which appeared on the face of the act, the supreme efforts of the Money Trust were made to secure the passage of the Federal reserve act; that the other unexpressed but secret purpose secured by the act was to give the Money Trust banks and their allied interests the fullest freedom, without danger to themselves, to exploit the people, not only of America but of the entire world, which the Federal reserve act permits, and reenforces them with a guaranty that if they should miscalculate and become so deeply entangled in speculation as to be unable to extricate themselves, then the Government would be forced to aid them; that because of these two unexpressed and secret purposes the Money Trust banks seek to conserve the credit of the United States exclusively for the use of their Federal reserve banks; that because of that, and for other selfish reasons, they oppose Government aid to a farmers' rural credit system, and likewise oppose any plan that would give Government aid directly to a credit system for financing railways and other industrial institutions;

"That Money Trust managers and their agents were selected to control the 12 Federal reserve banks, and because of their mutuality of interest they form a natural as well as a legalized trust; that because of the peculiar provisions of the act the small banks are forced to become a part of the trust; that the people's deposits in the banks are absolutely under the control of the banks; that the banks, at their own option, may or may not contract or expand loans and currency, by forcing borrowers in the one case to pay and in the other by freely extending loans and making use of the Government to supply funds;

"That Congress, by the passage of the Federal reserve act, put into the control of the banks not only the means by which they may obtain information in regard to the financial standing of every subsidiary bank, railway, and industrial corporation, and use such information for purposes of speculation to their enormous advantage over others not having access to the same means of information, but it has placed it in the power of the Money Trust to make and determine prices of speculative and other commodities at its will. To cause high prices, all it will have to do will be to lower the rediscount rate so that the associated banks will more generally apply for and receive the Federal reserve notes, producing an expansion of credit and a rising stock market; then when business and business men have adjusted to these conditions it can check world-wide prosperity in midcareer by arbitrarily raising the rate of discount; it can cause the pendulum of a rising and falling market to swing gently back and forth by slight changes in the discount rate, or cause violent fluctuations by a greater rate variation, and in either case it will possess inside information as to financial conditions and advance knowledge of the coming change, either up or down; that this is the strangest, most incomprehensible, and dangerous advantage ever placed in the hands of a special privileged class by any Government that ever existed; that this act makes it not only possible but ridiculously easy for the Money Trust to control absolutely every bank and bank official. Should any bank or officer of a bank refuse to submit to its dictation in business or in its support of candidates favored by it for President, Senators, Members of the House, governors, judges, members of legislatures, and others, all it will be necessary to do to mete out condign punishment to such bank will be for the trust to withhold from it the information that it will be in a position to bestow upon its more subservient competitors;

"That the President in creating the Federal Reserve Board appointed men who had been educated by the Money Trust system, believed in it and knew no other; that the Federal reserve act gives a power to the Federal reserve banks that makes the Government impotent to protect the people until further legislation shall be had;

"That already the Federal reserve banks have cornered the gold and gold certificates, so that these are no longer in circulation among the people; that finances generally are absolutely in the control of the banks by authority of the Federal reserve act;

"That the whole banking system is a private institution conducted for the sole purpose of obtaining the greatest possible profits for the use of other people's money and in the interest of the stockholders and those allied with them; that it is inconsistent with free government to subject every industry and enterprise in the country to the domination of the banks which have been granted the exclusive privilege to control the people's finances;

"That the banks have power to create panics when they please by making demand for payment of even as low as 10 per cent of the obligations owing to them and by refusing to make new loans or extend old ones; that by insidious means the Money Trust banks control legislation, and by that means have secured the special and exclusive privileges they now possess; that under existing conditions the people not having formulated a plan on which the general public has been able to make a specific demand on Congress, it has been impossible to secure the action of Congress to enact the proper legislation for the people; that the Nation confronts a crisis and action must at once be taken to extend to the farmers a proper rural-credit system with aid from the Government, and also proper means must be provided to finance the railways and industrial institutions with aid from the Government; that by extending such aid to the farmers, the railways, and to other useful industries, it will prevent the Money Trust from despoiling them with the usury charges to which they are now subjected;

"That the farmers, most of all, are defenseless under the present system because of the inability of the banks to make long-time loans in sufficient amounts, even at their usurious rates, to meet the farmers' demands, and because the banks do not aid the farmers even to the extent the laws permit; and for the further reason that the Money Trust banks have intentionally kept the farmers from securing proper relief, which is especially evident by the acts of the present administration and of the present Congress, the President himself having expressed in messages his opinion that the Government should not grant aid to the farmers, while at the same time he urged and demanded of Congress that it grant unlimited aid to the banks; that at the breaking out of the European war Congress and the administration were frightened by the Money Trust, and thereupon extended to the banks a special privilege to secure from the Government, at 3 per cent, over a billion dollars, if they should need so much for the use of speculators to save them from loss, and of this authorized sum actually advanced to the banks $369,558,040, and was ready to advance the balance on demand of the banks, while at the same time the farmers of nine States appealed in vain to the President of the United States and to Congress for Government aid to save them from $400,000,000 loss; that to divert the farmers the administration, in conjunction with the Money Trust banks, urged the farmers not to seek Government aid, but to let the banks make up a $250,000,000 pool with which to aid these farmers; that as soon as Congress had adjourned and action could not be had the administration and the banks were freed from the farmers' efforts to secure legislation then, and the $250,000,000 pool fizzled and the farmers were left to their loss and lasting distress;

"That the railways, because of the unreasonable rates of interest that they are forced to pay to the bankers and money loaners, have been in distress and forced to ask the Interstate Commerce Commission to advance freight and passenger rates; that the presidents of the railways appeared before the President of the United States and asked him in the same way the farmers did, for his influence to get the Interstate Commerce Commission to increase their railway rates, and that the President lent his aid to that end and this relief to the railways was granted;

"That every important country in the world has long since provided a rural credit system for its agricultural interests and that the United States is the only country that has failed to perform this important duty; that the Money Trust has secretly formulated a scheme to have enacted into law a fake rural credit system for the purpose of making the farmers believe that they will be provided for; that it is their scheme to delay the passage of any rural credit system as long as possible, but when the farmers become too persistent, then to bind their proposed rural credit system to the present Federal reserve act or make it largely dependent thereon and not possible to be operated except under the influence of the Money Trust, and to effect but a small reduction of interest to the farmers, whereas not only the farmers, but all legitimate borrowers, are entitled to have the interest rates reduced at least one-half, even under a moderately fair system; that unless Congress acts forthwith to inaugurate a proper rural credit system suited to reduce the rates of interest to farmers generally at least one-half, and provides for proper means of financing the transportation and industrial companies, the Money Trust will manipulate to make it more and more difficult to accomplish;

"That in view of these circumstances it is becoming more and more apparent to the country, if not to the administration, that something should be done immediately to break the strangle hold which the Money Trust has secured upon the finances, the agricultural, transportation, and industrial systems, and the politics of the country: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That a special committee of five Members of the House be appointed by the Speaker to inquire into the influences that have been exercised by the Money Trust in the organization of the Federal reserve banks, and the extent, so far as practical, of the control the Money Trust exercises in the same, and to report to the House as soon as possible.

"Resolved further, That the full Committee on Banking and Currency is authorized and directed to immediately hold meetings, and to continue such meetings from time to time, and sit in meetings during sessions of Congress as well as during recess, for the purpose of formulating a plan and reporting a bill for the organization and cooperation of rural credit associations and aid to the farmers by Government loans to them.

"Resolved further, That the said committee is authorized and directed to formulate a plan and report a bill for the organization and cooperation of the transportation systems and aid to them by Government loans, in order that the rates of interest may be lowered so as to makes lower freight and passenger rates possible.

"Resolved further, That the said committee is also authorized and directed to formulate a plan and report a bill for the organization and cooperation of the industrial companies which are producing the common necessities, so as to reduce the cost of production and the cost of living, and to aid them by Government loans;

"Resolved further, That the said committee is authorized and directed to formulate a plan and report a bill for permitting the people to make deposits of money, checks, and proper evidence of credit, without limitation as to amount, and fix rates of interest which the Government shall pay therefor and the manner in which such funds may be invested in order to reduce the rates of interest generally to the people and to promote the several purposes to be accomplished by the several bills which said committee is authorized and directed by this resolution to report; that all of said purposes may, if it seems practical to the said Committee on Banking and Currency, be reported in one bill; the intent and purpose of such legislation being to enable the agricultural, industrial, and transportation systems to obtain, when necessary, credit and financial assistance from the Government on an equal footing with the banks."

The following is the Henry B. Joy letter:

DETROIT, MICH., January 7, 1915.

Hon. F. A. DELANO, Vice Governor,
Federal Reserve Board, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. DELANO: I certainly am so thoroughly disgusted at the dragging of the Federal reserve bank of Chicago into the limelight by Congressman LINDBERGH, of Minnesota, and others, that I feel warranted in writing you. I have to-day also written to Mr. Hamlin, of which letter I have sent you a copy. Of course we business men and bankers all felt that the Federal reserve bank would become the football of politicians and of a certain class of newspapers, but it has come so much sooner than I expected.

In the Chicago Tribune of January 6 is again a long article by the staff correspondent giving interviews by Congressman LINDBERGH, of Minnesota, and Congressman GLASS and Senator OWEN, etc.—a lot of pure, unadulterated sensational slush to stir up prejudice and trouble. This, I have no doubt, is a very laudable object from somebody's point of view and probably pays or they wouldn't do it. I do feel that it is one of the prerogatives of the Federal Reserve Board to demand that politicians and newspapers allow the business of the Federal reserve bank to pursue its course under the direction of the Federal Reserve Board and work out its own salvation as best it may. Such gratuitous and unnecessary disturbing of conditions—which, so far as I know from any stockholding banks within district No. 7, are working out just as well as it is possible to do and just as fast as it is possible to do under the circumstances—is entirely unwarranted. I have kept closely in touch with every stockholding bank in Michigan, and I have not heard one single unfavorable comment on the work of the Federal reserve bank of Chicago. If there are any unfavorable comments from any source, it would be, indeed, most gratifying if they would be permitted to reach members of the directorate in an authoritative manner from the Federal Reserve Board in Washington, if they have any such complaint filed with them. But that the Federal Reserve Board in Washington should allow itself to be undermined and the Federal reserve system brought into disgrace by ambitious politicians and sensational newspapers is utterly criminal in effect, unless there is some warrant in fact for such sensational political criticism; and even in that case, then it should be required by the Federal Reserve Board, I venture to suggest, that criticisms of a district bank should be made to the Federal Reserve Board, so that it might itself be informed, and that it might in turn inform the directors of the district bank which are being attacked for their methods and results obtained.

Is it anything less than criminal for a politician, who can enlist the columns of a newspaper of the character of the Chicago Tribune, to put out the following statement? The Chicago Tribune prints the following as the words of Mr. LINDBERGH,

"To cause high prices all the trust, as typified by the control of the Chicago bank by Mr. Forgan and Mr. Reynolds, will have to do will be to lower the rediscount rate so that the associated banks will more generally apply for and receive the Federal reserve notes, producing an expansion of credit and a rising of the stock market.

COULD EASILY CREATE PANIC.

"Then when business men have adjusted themselves to these conditions the trust can check world-wide prosperity in midcareer by arbitrarily raising the rate of discount. It can cause the pendulum of a rising and falling market to swing gently back and forth by slight changes in the discount rate, or cause violent fluctuations by a greater rate variation."

Now, whatever Mr. Forgan and Mr. Reynolds may have done they will have to be responsible for. They could have done nothing or taken no action as the executive committee or as directors without the sanction and approval of the other members of the executive committee or of the other directors. If any act has been taken by the executive committee, the record of it is on file in the minutes of the meetings of the executive committee, which minutes are submitted to the regular monthly directors' meeting for the approval of the board itself. So far as I know and am able to ascertain, the work of Mr. Forgan and the work of Mr. Reynolds has been diligent, ceaseless, and unfailingly in the interests of the promotion of the welfare of the Federal Reserve System and of the Federal Reserve Board in Washington and of the Federal reserve bank of Chicago, district No. 7.

Every act which has been done by the executive committee has had the approval of the board of directors, and though I have been unable for various reasons to attend myself every board meeting, yet I should have voted for everything done there had I been present. So far as I know the only negative vote ever recorded at a meeting of the directors of the Federal reserve bank of Chicago was my personal vote recorded in opposition to the small compensation which the other members of the board voted as being proper and adequate for their services. I voted "no" because I thought the compensation was ridiculously small, and did not begin to dream of paying in any way for the time necessarily spent on the affairs of the bank as a director. I favored $100 a meeting as the fee to each director and $100 a month for incidental expenses, correspondence, and time devoted to keep educated on the current affairs of the Federal reserve bank. The Federal Reserve Bank Board in Washington has, however, overruled even the small compensation which I felt was too small, and has granted a still smaller compensation to Federal directors. I am sure, therefore, that Mr. Forgan and Mr. Reynolds can not be charged with grabbing exorbitant fees. The fees are ridiculous and not adequate and will not ultimately prevail, and should not.

I myself to-day am on my way to Chicago from New York, having left New York yesterday when I greatly desired to remain there, in order to attend the meeting at Chicago on account of the political disturbances and turmoil injected into the affairs of the bank by Congressmen and Senators above enumerated.

Whatever the directors of the Federal reserve bank of Chicago have done they will have to be responsible for, and I am one of them, and I do not propose, without picturing the iniquity of it, to permit such slush to be fed to the public by anybody, attacking the sincere work of the directors of district No. 7 toward the working out of the Federal Reserve System and the sincere work of the Federal Reserve Board in Washington in aiding and controlling and regulating under the Federal reserve act the actions taken by the Chicago district bank directors.

Any person almost, with the sense of a chicken, would know that what Mr. LINDBERGH states as being within the possibilities for Mr. Forgan and Mr. Reynolds to do in the way of fixing the rate of interest up and down in the Chicago district is utterly false in every particular and totally impossible, because whatever rate of interest is recommended by the directors of the Federal reserve bank must first be approved under the provisions of the Federal reserve act by the Federal Reserve Board in Washington before it is put into effect. All the rest of the articles and interviews in the Chicago Tribune are on a par with the sensational slush which I have quoted.

If we are going to save the Federal reserve bank and make the most of it which it is possible to do in the interests of business, I most urgently appeal to the Federal Reserve Board in Washington to save those gentlemen who are serving their time as directors on the Federal reserve bank in Chicago without compensation, practically, and who are sacrificing their own interests to attend to the affairs of the bank, hoping to upbuild it and aid in its evolution, from just such newspaper and political attacks as that being fomented in this instance.

If there are any acts done by Chicago district No. 7 bank which are to be criticized by the bankers of the district who own the stock in the bank as member banks, and who own and supply its capital as member banks, or by the business men of the district who do business with the banks of the district, whether member banks or nonmember banks, the business-men directors and the Government directors and the bank directors are here on the job in the district to hear any complaints and criticisms. I have heard none, nor do I know of any so far. It is indeed with deep regret that I find a newspaper or politician willing to thrust the Federal Reserve Bank System into the mire of pothouse politics and newspaper sensationalism.

Very truly, yours,

HENRY B. JOY,
Director Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago.

The following is the reply that I made to the Henry B. Joy letter:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 13, 1915.

Mr. HENRY B. JOY,
Detroit, Mich.

DEAR SIR: I beg to acknowledge receipt of yours of 7th instant, which is a circular copy addressed to all Members of Congress—and I am informed has also been sent to bankers and large business concerns—of a letter from you to Hon. F. A. Delano, vice governor Federal Reserve Board, Washington, D. C., in which you rather emphatically undertake to call me to account for a recent action which I took in my representative capacity as a Member of the House. On January 6 I introduced a resolution, a copy of which is inclosed for your information, and it was in reference to that resolution that the article appeared in the Chicago Tribune to which you refer.

The burden of your criticism of me appears to consist in this, that you seem to feel that no newspaper, official, or citizen has any right to criticize either the act creating the Federal Reserve Board or the conduct of that board or of the officials of the reserve banks organized under it in anything they may do or undertake to do. It goes almost without saying that your specific criticism of me does not apply to what I said. No remark or utterance of mine would imply that I thought the directors of the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago had or now have the power to raise and lower the discount independent of the Federal Reserve Board. A careful reading of the quotation you have made from the Chicago Tribune shows that I did not say that. What I did say was that the Money Trust, now in control of the Federal Reserve Board, and the entire system for that matter, can raise and lower interest rates at its will, with the attendant consequences which I pointed out.

Your general criticism of my action deserves more careful attention. It reminds one so completely of the complaints that used to be made years ago by the common carriers of the country when it was suggested that governmental agencies, both the State and Nation, had the right to regulate rates and conditions of transportation. Do you not remember how the railway barons who had, as they thought, the destinies of the Nation in their hands used to say:

"Why, we own these railways. It was our money that built them and it is our money that is now invested in them. It is none of the public's business how we run them or what rates we charge."

Surely you remember that? But the courts have held that the public has an interest, even in railways owned by private corporations, and may criticize the management and even control rates, stopping only short of actual confiscation.

But, you will say, the case of the Federal reserve banks is different. Quoting your own words, you "feel that it is one of the prerogatives of the Federal Reserve Board to demand that politicians and newspapers allow the business of the Federal reserve bank to pursue its course under the direction of the Federal Reserve Board and work out its own salvation as best it may."

Though how the Federal Reserve Board would operate under that prerogative to make good its demand is more than I can understand, and you have failed to say. Under our system of government, Members of Congress can not be called in question in any other place—not even in the Federal Reserve Board—for what they do or say on the floor of the House, and even newspapers are allowed quite wide latitude in free America as to their utterances in regard to questions of a public character. So, in view of this immunity granted both to "politicians"—as you are pleased to call me—and the press, and in view of what I know, both as to the inception and proposed operation of the Federal Reserve System, I am very much inclined to believe that your worst fears as to the Federal reserve bank becoming the "football of politicians and of a certain class of newspapers" are more than likely to be realized, because as soon as the true purposes of the system are clearly understood the people will rise in their might and kick it all over the lot.

Had not the Money Trust demanded and received as a component part of the Federal reserve system a monopoly of the use of the public credit of the United States to bolster up and reenforce its speculative schemes and the almost free use of the Treasury funds, as well as a monopoly of the banking and private credit interests of the country, you might, with far less effrontery than you are now in a position to do, demand that the public, and even a Representative in Congress, refrain from all criticism of its affairs. But it did demand and receive all these things, and what else can you now expect than that a Representative of the people in Congress who wishes to do his duty not only to his constituents, but to his country as well, will feel it incumbent upon him to watch as carefully as he can to see if that public credit and the Treasury funds are going to be used to oppress the people or for their benefit? Believing, as I firmly do, that it is the purpose and intention of the Money Trust to use both this credit and those funds to oppress the people, you may be very sure that so long as I remain in Congress I shall take a very lively interest in all the affairs of the Federal Reserve Board and the various organizations under its jurisdiction, and shall not hesitate to criticize the conduct of any of them whenever I find it necessary to the public welfare to do so.

One other suggestion in your letter deserves attention from me. You intimate that such criticism of the Money Trust and the Federal reserve system as I have indulged in "is a very laudable object from somebody's point of view and probably pays or they wouldn't do it." It has never paid me in the way in which you seem to infer. It is true that there is a certain satisfaction in knowing that one has faithfully performed a public duty, but my observation has been that if one wanted to profit, either financially or in the way of political preferment, from his public acts it is rather safer to take the other side than the one I have identified myself with. For instance, such criticism as yours of an official act of a Representative in his representative capacity, coming in the way yours did from a director of a reserve bank, but on the other side of the question, would probably be taken by the Federal Reserve Board as a just and proper cause for dismissal from further service as such director. I do not know how they would regard your criticism of my representative action and am too busy just now to find out, but will say to you this, that if you think I have introduced my resolution because I thought it would "pay" me to do so, you were never more mistaken in your life.

Sincerely,

C. A. LINDBERGH.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RAKER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 2337 and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. RUSSELL was granted leave of absence, for two days, on account of sickness.

TO CREATE THE COAST GUARD.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a reading of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] demands a reading of the Senate bill.

Mr. MANN. That would be the Senate bill with amendments, of course. Well, I do not know myself how it ought to be done, and I do not know whether anybody else does, so I withdraw the demand.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman demand the reading of the engrossed copy of this bill?

Mr. MANN. Yes; I am demanding the reading of it. We know the Senate engrossed copy is there, of course, but it would have to be read with the amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

Mr. MANN. I said that I would withdraw the demand. I do not think the Clerk can do it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The House is dividing. I think it would be an automatic call.

Mr. MANN. Will not the gentleman from Oklahoma raise the point on the vote?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. He was making it on the vote.

Mr. MANN. The question was not put.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Speaker was putting it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and sixty Members are present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of passing the bill will answer "yea," and those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 212, nays 79, answered "present" 3, not voting 130, as follows:

YEAS—212.

Abercrombie	Alexander	Aswell	Barchfeld
Adair	Allen	Austin	Barkley
Adamson	Anderson	Avis	Bartholdt
Aiken	Ashbrook	Baker	Bartlett

Bathrick	Esch	Kelly, Pa.	Parker, N. Y.
Beakes	Farr	Kent	Patten, N. Y.
Bell, Cal.	Fergusson	Kettner	Peters
Blackmon	Ferris	Key, Ohio	Phelan
Booher	Fess	Kiess, Pa.	Plumley
Britten	Fields	Kinkaid, Nebr.	Price
Brockson	Foster	Kirkpatrick	Prouty
Broussard	Francis	Kitchin	Rainey
Brown, N. Y.	Frear	Knowland, J. R.	Raker
Browne, Wis.	Gallagher	Konop	Rauch
Browning	Gallivan	Korbly	Rayburn
Bryan	Gardner	Lafferty	Reilly, Conn.
Buchanan, Ill.	Garner	La Follette	Roberts, Mass.
Buchanan, Tex.	Gerry	Lazaro	Rogers
Bulkley	Gillett	Lee, Pa.	Rubey
Burgess	Gilmore	Lenroot	Scully
Burke, S. Dak.	Gittins	Levy	Seldomridge
Burke, Wis.	Glass	Lindbergh	Sherley
Burnett	Godwin, N. C.	Lloyd	Sherwood
Butler	Goeke	Lobeck	Shreve
Byrnes, S. C.	Good	Loft	Sims
Carlin	Gordon	Logue	Sinnott
Cary	Graham, Ill.	Lonergan	Slemp
Casey	Greene, Mass.	McAndrews	Small
Chandler, N. Y.	Greene, Vt.	McGillicuddy	Smith, Idaho
Church	Gregg	McGuire, Okla.	Smith, N. Y.
Clancy	Gudger	McKellar	Stafford
Coady	Guernsey	McLaughlin	Stanley
Connolly, Iowa	Hamilton, N. Y.	Maguire, Nebr.	Stedman
Cooper	Harris	Mapes	Steenerson
Cramton	Harrison	Martin	Stephens, Cal.
Crosser	Hawley	Mitchell	Stephens, Nebr.
Cullop	Hayden	Montague	Stevens, Minn.
Curry	Hayes	Morgan, Okla.	Stevens, N. H.
Danforth	Helgesen	Moss, W. Va.	Stone
Deitrick	Hensley	Mott	Stout
Dent	Hinds	Murdock	Switzer
Dershem	Holland	Neeley, Kans.	Talcott, N. Y.
Dickinson	Houston	Neely, W. Va.	Tavenner
Dixon	Hughes, Ga.	Nolan, J. I.	Taylor, Ark.
Donohoe	Hughes, W. Va.	O'Brien	Temple
Donovan	Hulings	Oglesby	Thacher
Doolittle	Humphrey, Wash.	O'Hair	Thomson, Ill.
Doremus	Humphreys, Miss.	Oldfield	Treadway
Driscoll	Igoe	Padgett	Tuttle
Drukker	Johnson, Wash.	Page, N. C.	Underwood
Dupré	Jones	Paige, Mass.	Volstead
Eagan	Keating	Palmer	Watson
Edwards	Kelley, Mich.	Parker, N. J.	Young, N. Dak.

NAYS—79.

Anthony	Floyd, Ark.	Kreider	Sloan
Bailey	Fordney	Lesher	Smith, J. M. C.
Baltz	Fowler	Lieb	Smith, Minn.
Borchers	Garrett, Tenn	Linthicum	Smith, Tex.
Byrns, Tenn.	Gill	McKenzie	Stephens, Miss.
Callaway	Goodwin, Ark.	Manahan	Stephens, Tex.
Candler, Miss.	Graham, Pa.	Mann	Sumners
Caraway	Gray	Mondell	Sutherland
Claypool	Green, Iowa	Moon	Thompson, Okla.
Cline	Hardy	Morrison	Towner
Collier	Haugen	Moss, Ind.	Tribble
Connelly, Kans.	Heflin	Norton	Vaughan
Cox	Helm	Park	Vinson
Crisp	Helvering	Peterson	Watkins
Davenport	Hill	Platt	Webb
Dillon	Howard	Powers	Williams
Doughton	Howell	Quin	Wingo
Eagle	Jacoway	Reilly, Wis.	Witherspoon
Finley	Johnson, Ky.	Sisson	Young, Tex.
FitzHenry	Kindel	Slayden

ANSWERED "PRESENT"—3.

Gard	Hull	Lee, Ga.

NOT VOTING—130.

Ainey	Fairchild	Lever	Scott
Barnhart	Faison	Lewis, Md.	Sells
Barton	Falconer	Lewis, Pa.	Shackleford
Beall, Tex.	Fitzgerald	Lindquist	Smith, Md.
Bell, Ga.	Flood, Va.	McClellan	Smith, Saml. W.
Borland	French	MacDonald	Sparkman
Bowdle	Garrett, Tex.	Madden	Stringer
Brodbeck	George	Mahan	Taggart
Brown, W. Va.	Goldfogle	Maher	Talbott, Md.
Bruckner	Gorman	Metz	Taylor, Ala.
Brumbaugh	Goulden	Miller	Taylor, Colo.
Burke, Pa.	Griest	Moore	Taylor, N. Y.
Calder	Griffin	Morgan, La.	Ten Eyck
Campbell	Hamill	Morin	Thomas
Cantor	Hamilton, Mich.	Mulkey	Townsend
Cantrill	Hamlin	Murray	Underhill
Carew	Hart	Nelson	Vare
Carr	Hay	O'Shaunessy	Vollmer
Carter	Henry	Patton, Pa.	Walker
Clark, Fla.	Hinebaugh	Porter	Wallin
Conry	Hobson	Post	Walsh
Copley	Hoxworth	Pou	Walters
Dale	Johnson, S. C.	Ragsdale	Weaver
Davis	Johnson, Utah	Reed	Whaley
Decker	Kahn	Riordan	Whitacre
Dies	Keister	Roberts, Nev.	White
Difenderfer	Kennedy, Conn.	Rothermel	Wilson, Fla.
Dooling	Kennedy, Iowa	Rouse	Wilson, N. Y.
Dunn	Kennedy, R. I.	Rucker	Winslow
Edmonds	Kinkead, N. J.	Rupley	Woodruff
Elder	Langham	Russell	Woods
Estopinal	Langley	Sabath
Evans	L'Engle	Saunders

So the bill was passed.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On the vote:

Mr. BARNHART (for) with Mr. DIES (against).

Mr. KAHN (for) with Mr. GARD (against).

Until further notice:

Mr. BELL of Georgia with Mr. MILLER.

Mr. WILSON of Florida with Mr. DUNN.

Mr. CANTRILL with Mr. AINEY.

Mr. CARTER with Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK of Florida with Mr. DAVIS.

Mr. CONRY with Mr. EDMONDS.

Mr. DALE with Mr. CAMPBELL.

Mr. DOOLING with Mr. COPLEY.

Mr. ESTOPINAL with Mr. FAIRCHILD.

Mr. FITZGERALD with Mr. CALDER.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia with Mr. GRIEST.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas with Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE with Mr. JOHNSON of Utah.

Mr. GORMAN with Mr. KEISTER.

Mr. GRIFFIN with Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island.

Mr. HAMLIN with Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa.

Mr. HAY with Mr. LANGHAM.

Mr. HENRY with Mr. MADDEN.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina with Mr. MOORE.

Mr. LEE of Georgia with Mr. MORIN.

Mr. LEVER with Mr. NELSON.

Mr. MORGAN of Louisiana with Mr. LANGLEY.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY with Mr. LINDQUIST.

Mr. POU with Mr. PATTON of Pennsylvania.

Mr. RAGSDALE with Mr. PORTER.

Mr. ROUSE with Mr. SCOTT.

Mr. RUCKER with Mr. SELLS.

Mr. RUSSELL with Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH.

Mr. SABATH with Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada.

Mr. SPARKMAN with Mr. WOODS.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland with Mr. WINSLOW.

Mr. WHALEY with Mr. VARE.

Mr. FAISON with Mr. WALLIN.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, may I ask if the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] voted?

The SPEAKER. He did not.

Mr. GARD. I am paired for this occasion with Mr. KAHN. I wish to withdraw my vote of "no" and answer "present."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. GARD and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present, and the Doorkeeper will open the doors.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RESIGNATION FROM A COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a letter of resignation from a committee, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., January 19, 1915.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SPEAKER CLARK: Having been assigned to service on the Committee on the Judiciary, I beg leave to tender my resignation as member of the Committee on Military Affairs in the House of Representatives.

Very truly, WARREN GARD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation will be accepted.

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAILEY] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the bill just passed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 6309. An act to establish the Rocky Mountain National Park in the State of Colorado, and for other purposes; and

S. 4012. An act to increase the limit of cost of the United States public building at Grand Junction, Colo.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I believe it is too late to call up another bill to-night, and I therefore move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 49 minutes) the House adjourned, in conformity with the order previously made, until to-morrow, Thursday, January 21, 1915, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and refered as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting letter from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, with copies of reports and map, on preliminary examination and survey of Black Walnut Harbor, Md. (H. Doc. No. 1508); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting letter from the Chief of Engineers, with copies of reports and map, on preliminary examination and plan and estimate of cost of improvement of Wicomico River, Md. (H. Doc. No. 1509); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. WITHERSPOON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 20694) to repeal section 9 of the naval personnel act of March 3, 1899, and to transfer certain classes of officers from the retired to the active list of the Navy and Marine Corps, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1304), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 4146) granting certain lands to school district No. 44, Chelan County, Wash., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1305), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ESTOPINAL: A bill (H. R. 21068) to provide homes for Confederate veterans of the Civil War; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. EDWARDS: A bill (H. R. 21069) providing an appropriation of $30,000 for dredging, repairs, and other improvements at the Savannah, Ga., quarantine station; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. LOGUE: A bill (H. R. 21070) to further regulate the purchase of sites and the erection of public buildings thereon and the making of appropriation therefor; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 21071) to provide for the protection of subcontractors and material men engaged in doing work or furnishing material for the erection of Government buildings; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 21072) to provide for the establishment of a bureau of public buildings, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. BARTHOLDT: A bill (H. R. 21073) for the better protection of aliens and for the enforcement of their treaty rights; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. ALEXANDER: A bill (H. R. 21074) increasing the limit of cost of the United States post-office building at Excelsior Springs, Mo.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. CARY: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 406) authorizing the Sergeants at Arms of the House and Senate to supply each Member of Congress with an identification insignia; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WITHERSPOON: Resolution (H. Res. 707) for the consideration of H. R. 20694; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, resolution (H. Res. 708) to make it in order to consider certain paragraphs of the bill to make appropriations for the naval service, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Rules.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BAILEY: A bill (H. R. 21075) granting an increase of pension to Susannah Ditterline; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BROWN of West Virginia: A bill (H. R. 21076) for the relief of George T. Goshorn; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BRYAN: A bill (H. R. 21077) for the relief of W. F. Crawford; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CURRY: A bill (H. R. 21078) granting a pension to Thomas F. Tierney; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HAMILTON of New York: A bill (H. R. 21079) granting an increase of pension to Mary A. Wallace; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HAWLEY: A bill (H. R. 21080) granting an increase of pension to George Van Nortwick; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HOWELL: A bill (H. R. 21081) for the relief of Truman G. Peters and others; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. LANGLEY: A bill (H. R. 21082) granting an increase of pension to Disia Stamper; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. O'SHAUNESSY: A bill (H. R. 21083) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to reenlist Roger S. Culp, a chief gunner's mate, in the United States Navy; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. SHACKLEFORD: A bill (H. R. 21084) granting a pension to John H. Campbell; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SLOAN: A bill (H. R. 21085) for the relief of William H. Phillips; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 21086) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Armstrong; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama: A bill (H. R. 21087) granting a pension to Gertrude S. Kessler and her three minor sons; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WALSH: A bill (H. R. 21088) granting a pension to Thomas Travers; to the Committee on Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER (by request): Petition of the board of trade and citizens of Put-in-Bay Island, Lake Erie, Ohio, protesting against the passage of the seamen's bill in its present form; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Also (by request), memorial of West Liberty Iowa Christian Church, relative to the Mormon Church in the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. ASHBROOK: Memorial of city council of Mansfield, Ohio, favoring the passage of the Hamill bill, H. R. 5139; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

Also, evidence to accompany H. R. 21038, for the relief of Mary A. Shannon; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BAILEY: Petitions of W. L. Stewart, of Johnstown, Pa., and Albert W. Wharton, of Altoona, Pa., protesting against amendment to Post Office appropriation bill relative to freedom of the press; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. BALTZ: Petitions of sundry citizens of St. Clair, Ill., protesting against passage of Senate bill 6865; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also, petition of citizens and members of St. Mary's Church, of Alton, Ill., protesting against export of munitions of war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin: Petition signed by August L. Buettner, William Engel, and other residents of Shawano, Wis., asking that House joint resolution 377, which prohibits the export of arms, ammunition, and munitions of war of every kind, be enacted into law; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition signed by Rev. F. Brockmann, George Stolze, and other residents of Wausau, Wis., asking that laws be passed which will enable the President of the United States to place an embargo on all contraband of war, save foodstuffs only; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petitions signed by Rev. G. H. Schilling, jr., John M. Johnson, and other residents of Embarrass; August Bonke, Alb. Gomoll, and other residents of Clintonville; Will Thiel, William Boehm, and other residents of Weyauwega; H. Belter, A. A. Graichen, and other residents of Coloma; George W. Lippert, Herman Habeck, and other residents of Athens; Otto Bartel, August H. Raatz, and other residents of Waushara County; H. W. Marquardt, Emil Hoffmann, and other residents of Marathon County; R. C. Hennig, William Braun, and other residents of Athens; John Ulmer, F. Pamperin, and other residents of Marshfield; Fred Kuhn, William F. Beyer, Rudolph Schlender, Fred Knoke, August Miller, August Zietlow, F. W. Retzlaff, August Beversdorf, Rev. E. R. Kraeft, W. P. Nichols, Rev. E. C. T. Sterbenooll, Richard Tews, William Brown, Fred Grimm, Ernst Kruger, Martin Mussack, and other residents of Shawano County; and William F. Becker, F. William Strohschoen, and other residents of Marion, all in the State of Wisconsin, asking that House joint resolution 377, which prohibits the export of arms, ammunition, and munitions of war of every kind, be enacted into law; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin: Resolutions adopted by Home Order of Foresters, Court No. 1, of Sheboygan, Wis., and Schiller Lodge, No. 68, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of Sheboygan, Wis., asking for the passage at this session of Congress of a law to enable the President to levy an embargo upon all contraband of war save foodstuffs only; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. CALDER: Memorial of St. Wojiecha B. M. No. 211, of south Brooklyn, N. Y., and Abraham Goldfaden Lodge, No. 505, Independent Order B'rith Abraham, of New York, protesting against the passage of the immigration bill, H. R. 6060; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. CARY: Petition of Richard Jaehnigen, William Rasche, Frederick Zahm, J. H. Thiesen, Gustav Kerlin, Eugene Schmidt, Frank Roth, G. Frohberg, C. Schubert, A. Wenzel, Helmuth Gotwald, Max Drews, and 300 others, all residents of Milwaukee County, Wis., urging the passage of House joint resolution 377; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. DILLON: Petition of citizens of Wakonda, S. Dak., and vicinity, protesting against shipment of war supplies by United States; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition of citizens of South Dakota, favoring passage of House joint resolution 377, relative to shipment of munitions of war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. DONOVAN: Petition of citizens of Danbury, Conn., favoring House joint resolution 377, to forbid export of arms; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. EAGAN: Petition of Consistory of the G. E. Church, of Hoboken, N. J., protesting against shipment of munitions of war by United States; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. ESCH: Memorial of Anthony Piotrowski, president of Branch No. 6, Polish Alliance of America, and Martin Burzynski, president of Polish Alliance of America, Thorp, Wis., protesting against the literacy test in the immigration bill; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Also, petition of Rev. C. F. W. Voges and 28 other citizens of Ridgeville, Monroe County, Wis., favoring passage of House joint resolution against shipment of munitions of war by United States; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. GILMORE: Petition of Men's Bible Class of the Congregational Sunday School, of Sharon, Mass., relative to admission of Japanese immigrants; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Also, petition of priests of diocese of Scranton, Pa., favoring exclusion of certain publications from the mails; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. HOXWORTH: Petition of citizens of the fifteenth Illinois district, favoring passage of House joint resolution 377; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island: Petition of Polish Falcons, of Central Falls, and To Po Sw Mi Ar 1180, Y. N. P., of Woonsocket; T. and W. Rycerze Polsy Wladyslow Kozlowski, of Providence; and Union Club, of Jamestown, all in the State of Rhode Island, protesting against the passage of the immigration bill; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. KINDEL: Petition of Pueblo (Colo.) German and Austrian Widows and Orphans War Sufferers' Society, favoring bill to forbid export of arms; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. KONOP: Petition of citizens of Florence, Wis., protesting against prohibition in District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also, petitions of citizens of the ninth congressional district of Wisconsin, favoring passage of House joint resolution 377, relative to shipment of munitions of war by United States; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. LEVY: Petition of citizens of New York City, favoring Palmer-Owen child-labor bill; to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. LONERGAN: Petition of Andrew Oberz, president of Polish National Alliance Society, Glastonbury, Conn., protesting against the Smith-Burnett immigration bill; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. MADDEN: Petition of citizens of Chicago, Ill., against Senate bill 6865, to prohibit sale of liquors in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. MAGUIRE of Nebraska: Petition of sundry citizens of Nebraska, favoring passage of Senate resolution 6683, relative to export of munitions of war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. MAHAN: Petition of sundry citizens of Norwich, Conn., and vicinity, favoring House joint resolution 377, relative to export of munitions of war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. METZ: Memorial of Holy Name Society of Our Lady of Lourdes parish, Brooklyn, and Brooklyn Diocesan Branch of the American Federation of Catholic Societies, and citizens of the tenth congressional district of New York, favoring legislation to bar from the United States mails publications that slander the Catholic Church; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. MURDOCK: Petition of citizens of Garden Plains, Kans., favoring the passage of House joint resolution 377; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. J. I. NOLAN: Petitions of sundry citizens of San Francisco, Cal., favoring the passage of House joint resolution 377, prohibiting the export of munitions of war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. O'HAIR: Petition of citizens of Iroquois county, Ill., favoring House joint resolution 377, to forbid export of arms; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. REILLY of Connecticut: Petition of citizens of the State of Connecticut, favoring the passage of House joint resolution 377, relative to export of munitions of war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petitions of citizens of Wallingford, Conn., protesting against the passage of the immigration bill (H. R. 6060); to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. STEPHENS of California: Petition of board of supervisors of San Diego County, Cal., favoring plan of an appropriation for construction of a military road from Yuma; to the Committee on Roads.

Also, petitions of Emily G., Ella M., and Elizabeth W. Hunt, of Pasadena, Cal., protesting against shipment of American horses to European battle fields; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition of San Francisco Camp, No. 4, National Indian War Veterans, San Francisco, Cal., favoring passage of the Keating bill to place Indian war veterans who served between 1865 and 1891 on regular Indian war veterans' pension roll; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, petition of California Associated Societies for the Conservation of Wild Life, favoring passage of Rocky Mountain Park bill; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, petition of Kullman, Salz & Co., of Benicia, Cal., relative to amendment to present tariff law; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. VOLLMER: Petitions of 524 American citizens for the adoption of House joint resolution 377, prohibiting the export of war materials; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition of the Clinton Turn Verein Vorwaerts, of Clinton, Iowa, comprising a membership of 312, to lay an embargo upon all contraband of war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition of the Vorwaerts Turn Verein, of Muscatine, Iowa, comprising a membership of 43, to lay an embargo upon all contraband of war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition of the Muscatine Mannerchor, Muscatine, Iowa, comprising a membership of 59, to lay an embargo upon all contraband of war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 21, 1915.

(Legislative day of Friday, January 15, 1915.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 6856) to authorize the United States, acting through a shipping board, to subscribe to the capital stock of a corporation to be organized under the laws of the United States or of a State thereof or of the District of Columbia to purchase, construct, equip, maintain, and operate merchant vessels in the foreign trade of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Chamberlain	Lea, Tenn.	Reed	Stone
Clapp	Lee, Md.	Robinson	Swanson
Culberson	Lippitt	Root	Thomas
Dillingham	Lodge	Saulsbury	Thornton
Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard	Vardaman
Gallinger	Norris	Sherman	Warren
Gronna	Owen	Simmons	Weeks
Hollis	Page	Smith, Ariz.	White
Jones	Perkins	Smith, Ga.	Williams
Kern	Ransdell	Smoot	Works

Mr. GRONNA. My colleague [Mr. MCCUMBER] is unavoidably absent from the city. He is paired with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CAMDEN].

Mr. CLAPP. The senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] are absent on official work of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. BRANDEGEE, Mr. BURTON, Mr. CAMDEN, Mr. CATRON, Mr. CRAWFORD, Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. KENYON, Mr. LANE, Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. STERLING, Mr. SUTHERLAND, Mr. THOMPSON, and Mr. WALSH answered to their names when called.

Mr. BRISTOW, Mr. MCLEAN, Mr. BRADY, Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, Mr. ASHURST, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. LA FOLLETTE entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey for a question only. I can not yield the floor.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have no desire to take the Senator from the floor, but I desire to make a statement of an occurrence which happened in my Commonwealth yesterday wherein a most horrible crime was committed.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I yielded for a question.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. This is a question as to the right of humanity in this land of freedom.

Mr. WEEKS. I answer that by saying it is not a question put to me.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I wish to take the time of the Senate but a moment. I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to make the statement I desire, which will take but a few minutes, and I trust in the interest of humanity, decency, and justice no Senator will object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Regular order!

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I regret that the Senator from Georgia has seen fit——

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a call for the regular order, and the Senator from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I trust the Senator from Georgia may be induced to withdraw his call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey is certainly aware of the fact that when the regular order has been called for he has no right to proceed.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I realize that I have no right to proceed, and I am only requesting the Senator from Georgia to withdraw his demand for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The difficulty is that when the Senator has no right to proceed he does proceed. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota for a question only.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to ask unanimous consent to submit a report.

Mr. WEEKS. That is not a question to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts has refused to yield the floor for any purpose save for a question.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota will state his inquiry.

Mr. GRONNA. My question is if the Senator from Massachusetts should yield to me to make a report and unanimous consent is given, would it take the Senator from Massachusetts from the floor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would rule that if there were unanimous consent given for that purpose, it would not take the Senator from Massachusetts from the floor nor should it count against the two addresses he is entitled to make upon this question. But the Chair thinks that the Senator from Massachusetts having refused to yield save for a question, that that is an objection to the reception of the report.

Mr. WEEKS. My only purpose in declining to yield is not to give up my right to the floor. I am quite willing that the Senator from North Dakota should make a request, if it does not in any way affect my right to continue my first speech.

Mr. GRONNA. Then, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Joint Commission on Federal Aid in the Construction of Post Roads.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I did not hear the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request is for unanimous consent to make a report.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I object, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an objection. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I notice in the press from day to day, in referring to the proceedings of the Senate, the general suggestion that a filibuster is being engaged in by Republican Senators. Speaking for myself alone, and I think perhaps I may properly speak for others, I want to say that Republican Senators are not engaged in a filibuster. This bill comes to the Senate under unusual circumstances and conditions. No hearings have been given on the bill, or at least no hearing since this particular measure was proposed. No opportunity has been given to the business organizations of the country to express their opinion either to the Senate or to committees. Those who have expressed their opinion, as I shall try to demonstrate later, have done so adversely to the legislation.

So Republican Senators are forced to take an unusual course in this matter, not on their own volition, but because of the narrow and technical position in which they are placed by the recent construction of the rules. It is not a fair and it is not a public-spirited way to discuss a great public question to impose upon Senators the necessity of talking for many hours. The way to discuss this question and get the facts would be to do it in the usual orderly way which has been followed in the Senate. Comparatively young Senators, like the senior Senator from Ohio and the junior Senator from Massachusetts, may be able to undergo the severe strain which is being imposed upon us; but it is not fair to those Senators who are not in as firm health, and it is not a businesslike way to proceed to insist that men who are not in firm health or who are not as young as some of us shall undertake to discuss this question under the conditions which are now being imposed.

What we are seeking to do is to call to the attention of the country legislation which we believe will be inimical to the best interests of the country. Speaking for myself and myself alone, there are two propositions in the pending bill which as long as I can interpose an objection will not be adopted by the Senate. One of them is the possibility of purchasing ships belonging to a belligerent nation and the other is the possibility of putting this Government into a transportation business of any kind.

I am entirely opposed to those two propositions. One of them is temporary, to be sure, and it may not get us into serious trouble. I do not know, and no Senator knows, what might result from the possibility of conflict in our foreign interests by purchasing the ships of a belligerent nation. That will be incident simply to the continuation of the European war; but the other is a question that will return to plague us as long as we are a Government. That is the precedent which is now being deliberately set, to put the Government into the ownership and the conduct of transportation companies.

We are not filibustering at all. We are trying to save the Democratic Party from itself under the conditions which exist, but more broadly we are trying to save the country from a policy which we believe will not only be ineffective in its results, disappointing to those who are contending for it, but which we also believe will possibly lead to a manner of conduct of affairs of transportation lines and other operations which will be very detrimental to the best interests of this country.

With that preliminary suggestion and with the positive denial that there is any attempt to do anything more than to get before the public the facts bearing on this case, I wish to take up the matter which I was discussing when the Senate took a recess last night.

At that time I was suggesting that there were three possible ways of restoring our merchant marine. One by a very radical modification of the navigation laws. Personally I do not think very much more can be accomplished along those lines. We have been modifying them since 1912, and we have obtained no real result in a permanent way which is going to be beneficial to this cause. The only direction in which we have not modified the navigation laws is in those ways which will apply directly to the seafaring man who is going to sea, and personally I am not in favor of in any way modifying the standard which we have established. If anything, the standard should be raised rather than lowered. So, in my judgment, any further attempt to modify our navigation laws will not only be ineffective, but I do not think it can be done without injustice to those who are engaged in the conduct of such affairs.

The second proposition—the one I was discussing last night—relates to a subsidy in some form, either a subsidy pure and simple, or a mail subvention, or in some other way. I prefer a subsidy made directly to somebody, so that there is an absolute record of what the Government is doing, how much it is going to cost the Treasury, who is going to get the benefit of it, if anyone, rather than an indirect subsidy which, in effect, in my judgment, will be very much greater if any such scheme as that which we are now considering is put into operation.

I intend, Mr. President, to try to demonstrate that Government operation is not successful anywhere under any conditions. It is admitted by those who are the sponsors for this legislation that this operation is to be undertaken at a loss for a considerable time, and ten millions, as I understand, is being set aside really as a subsidy, but to make good any loss which is incurred. I do not think there will ever be any change in that condition. I do not think it will be possible to undertake Government operation and produce a profit under the conditions which will exist, so that the subsidy of $10,000,000 will be continued until the end of the experiment which is being undertaken.

The way the world has dealt with this question, however, is entirely different. We are disinclined in every way to take the experience of others and apply that to our own needs. Why should we fly in the face of the experience of every nation which has developed a merchant marine anywhere at any time? No man can indicate an instance where there has been any other method followed in the development of a merchant marine than that of, in effect, a subsidy, though it may not be that in name or in form.

I was speaking last night of the conditions in Germany. Except in the east African service and the eastern service generally through the Suez Canal the German Government does not pay direct subsidies to its shipping; but the German Government pays greater subsidies to its shipping in many other ways than does any other nation that has developed great maritime interests. Its railroad rates are so constructed and arranged that the bringing of products of the German colonies to Germany in German ships and transporting them to the interior, if they are brought in German ships, is done at such a rate by the railroads of Germany that the methods provide a distinct, even a great, handicap on the products of any other nation delivered in the interior of Germany in the same way by the same general route, except in coming from German colonies or in German ships, and discriminations are made in a multitude of other ways.

I suggested last night as to the management and operation of the German railroads, and especially of the Prussian railroads, that they have been so conducted as to promote the purpose of the German nation in building up its harbors, its wharves, its docks, its shipping, its coal mines, its manufacturing industries by a thorough system of cooperation, not to say reciprocity, between these operations, which I do not advocate for this country, because I think it would produce all of the things which we have overcome as a result of our railway laws; but it has brought about a system of cooperation under Government direction which has been the means of making Germany one of the great maritime powers of the world.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have heard the statement made that it was possible to ship from one of the manufacturing centers of Germany to a point west of Chicago in the United States at a lower freight rate than prevails from New York to that same point in the United States. Does the Senator from Massachusetts know anything about that—whether there is any such plan of subsidy or discrimination in the German railroads and with the German maritime service as to make that possible?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I have heard that statement; I have seen it frequently made, and undoubtedly it is true. In just what way I can not tell in any particular instance; but, as I suggested, two-thirds of the rates of the Prussian railroads are special rates; the general rate applies to a very moderate part of the traffic of those roads. The whole purpose has been in the case of foreign trade to develop the docks, the wharves, the harbors, and the shipping of Germany.

Now, I wish to take up the course followed by other nations. I referred last night briefly to Austria and to France and was discussing Germany. Italy pays the following subsidies under present conditions: To the National Co. of Maritime Service, $1,840,000 annually. This line runs from Italy to India and to China. It pays to the Venetian Navigation Co. $200,000 annually. This line runs from Venice to Calcutta. Those are subsidies that apply directly to the traffic through the Suez Canal, to put the shipping of this country on all fours with the shipping of Great Britain. In addition, there are navigation bounties, amounting to $470,715, which are very largely paid to the National Co., to which I have just referred.

There are also construction bounties, fixed at a maximum of $440,000 a year, and I think the maximum substantially is paid every year. Last year $959,880 was allowed for construction bounties and losses due to customs dues on account of the remission of dues to various lines, a part of which applied to the National Co., to which I first referred, these lines all using the Suez Canal.

Japan in the year 1911 allowed $1,617,440 as subsidies to steamers employed in the European service, in addition to which there are various kinds of bounties for construction, repairs, and so forth, which I will enumerate later.

The Netherlands in 1911 appropriated $125,000 to the Java-Japan line, operating through the Suez Canal.

Portugal pays $20,000 to a line plying between Lisbon and Portuguese East Africa. It will be noticed that all of these apply to Suez Canal traffic.

Russia in 1912 appropriated $3,670,000 for the encouragement of its mercantile marine. Of this amount, between $395,000 and $445,000 was paid to Russian vessels using the Suez Canal, this being intended to be and confessed to be a sufficient amount to pay the tolls of those vessels through the canal. This is not, however, the entire amount which Russia pays to ships passing through the canal, because part of it is covered by navigation and other bounties.

Spain in the year 1911 paid a subsidy, based on speed, displacement, and mileage covered, to ships engaged in the Asiatic trade. The total bounty paid for service of this character by Spain in 1911 amounted to $580,000, in addition to which $148,650 was paid on account of shipbuilding bounties, some portion of which went to vessels engaged in trade through the Suez Canal.

Sweden has a considerable number of methods of encouraging its shipping trade, including postal subventions to steamship lines, bounties on shipbuilding, and other forms of giving assistance. In 1907 there was an authorized subsidy not to exceed $102,000 to the Swedish East Asia Co. to meet the expenditures incurred by the company in payment of the Suez Canal dues. This has been reduced to $83,330, the amount paid last year.

In Great Britain a similar method is followed as applied to those vessels using the Suez Canal. The Peninsular & Oriental Steamship Line, which runs a large number of ships to the East, is receiving at present $1,650,000 in bounties, and it has had liberal assistance ever since the year 1840.

This method of assisting traffic through the Suez Canal is applicable to the traffic to other parts of the world as well as in general subsidies. For instance, Austria pays $165,000 a year subsidy to a Brazilian line of steamers. In addition, the Austrian Lloyd, which has a fleet of about 70 vessels engaged in various trades, received a total, including mail subventions and subventions of various other kinds, in the year 1910 of $1,750,000. The Belgian Government has another method of procedure——

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to inquire of the Senator why Austria would pay a subsidy to a Brazilian line? What would be the object of such a governmental policy as that?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the Senator misunderstood me. It is not a Brazilian line; it is a line from Austria to Brazil, owned and controlled by citizens of Austria. I may not have the exact facts at hand, but I think there are one or two instances in which countries pay a subsidy to a line which is owned and controlled by citizens of some country of South America. I may come across the details of that, but there are few such instances.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator a few moments ago stated that one of the European nations was paying a subsidy of some character to a Japanese line. Do I understand that to be a line that runs to Japan, but not a line belonging to the Japanese people?

Mr. WEEKS. That is correct; it is a line in the Japanese trade, but controlled by the people of the country paying the subsidy.

Belgium has a different method of procedure. In one instance at least the Belgium Government remits all pilotage and other dues to vessels of what is known as the Cosmos Line, which is engaged in the South American trade.

The Brazilian Government has a contract, entered into on September 12, with certain Italian steamship lines—this may be the instance to which I wanted to call attention—the subsidy for this service being fixed at approximately $20,000 per round trip, two-thirds of which is paid by the federal Government and one-third by the State government at Sao Paulo.

The Chilean Government pays a Chilean line of steamers $40,000 a year for service along the west coast of South America, and gives the Pacific Steam Navigation Co., which is an English company, valuable facilities for the discharge of cargo at the Government wharves in Valparaiso.

I hope I will not overlook one of the conditions which is embarrassing the trade of to-day much more than not having sufficient tonnage at some particular port to carry the cargo which may be offered, and that is the lack of facilities to discharge cargo when vessels reach their destination. I have had called to my attention within two or three days the fact that one day last week, at Genoa, which is the most important of the Italian ports, every grain warehouse was filled with grain, every dock was occupied by grain-carrying ships, and there were 47 ships lying at anchor in the harbor waiting to discharge. Senators must not overlook the fact that the great cost of transportation is not alone due to the dangers incurred in the service, the possibility of a ship being blown up or of being delayed for search purposes or otherwise, but is due to the delay in loading and unloading.

Perhaps at this point I may as well refer to that a little more in detail. This is an editorial from the New York Times of yesterday, which reads as follows:

> Washington dispatches say that the Senate committee is putting the "finishing touches" upon the Government shipping bill.

I am glad to see progress being made in putting touches on this bill, which will make it, I hope, a measure which everyone on both sides of the aisle who desires to build up a merchant marine may be able to support. I hope the conferences of the Senators who control this legislation may be continued and that they may be led to see the light by continuing to put on these "finishing touches," to make it not only a reasonable measure but one which will produce the results which every American citizen desires.

To go on reading from this editorial:

> That seems superfluous for two reasons: The action of the caucus was almost fatal, and the trade returns published yesterday ought to be quite so. An increase of exports in December, 1914, over the figures of December, 1913, by $13,070,419 indicates no such deficiency of shipping that the Government should intervene to supply it at the cost and risk of the taxpayers.
>
> That is true also of the year's total exports, which have been exceeded but twice. The excess of exports over imports by the great sum of $131,863,077 surpasses every previous December, and has been equaled only in a single month in the Nation's history. The fact is that only one considerable class of exports might have been increased by shipment in Government boats. A Government line might have carried contraband in ships acquired from belligerents more freely than privately owned shipping. But that way of making trouble will hardly be proposed as a reason for proceeding with the Government line. Those who have our moral approval of their contentions are in control of the seas and can get all the contraband they need. To supply contraband at a profit to those who on the merits we think ought not to win this war, questions of friendship apart, is not a duty of government.
>
> It is especially fatuous to provide Government shipping, or private shipping with Government aid, when the necessity of the case is not so much shipping as facilities for loading and unloading. To the facts on this point as given by carriers' spokesmen on this side of the ocean may now be added incontestable evidence from the other side. Twenty-one vessels arrived at Liverpool last Thursday, and not one of them was able to get a berth to discharge its cargo. Sir Norman Hill, in an official report on the situation, said:
>
> "The main cause, beyond question, is the shortage of labor, not only on the quays but in the transport services, by which the quays are cleared."
>
> It would be idle to add to such congestion by providing more ships. The trouble is not one of trade but of war. Some ports are closed, throwing more business upon others than they could do in favorable times. Many dock laborers have enlisted and others are earning such high wages that they are independent. Commerce is not running in accustomed lines. Strange boats are on unfamiliar routes and require more attention than liners running on routine. If any Government should intervene, it is not ours. We are shipping full volumes of goods at our own prices, and the freight is paid by the buyers. They should worry, not we. We should worry only if those who are more eager than wise should thrust us into an experiment which is not only unnecessary in a commercial sense but is obnoxious politically. No Democrat can keep the name and support a subsidy scheme concealing Government ownership and operation. In proportion as the "finishing touches" meet these objections the bill will lose attractiveness to those who now support it because of these defects.

I have more evidence, which I will offer later, about the incompleteness of the facilities for handling traffic at both ends of the line. It is an important element to consider, quite as important as the question of ships, and would not be in any way remedied if we bought all the ships in the world.

I now continue the statement about the subsidies paid by European nations:

France pays for the Brazil and River Plate service $260,000 annually for postal subventions, and $995,600 annually for postal subventions to the West Indies, in addition to which $80,000 is added for the Mexican postal service. This includes a speed bounty. It pays $2,215,000 annually for the New York and West India service. This is in addition to construction and other bounties which are paid, a portion of which should apply to the vessels in this North American service.

The German lines' preference to Central and South American ports is included in preferential railway rates on German State railroads for all classes of goods.

Italy pays the Genoa-Central American Line $100,000 annually, in addition to which there are large bounties paid for navigation, construction, and repairs; the total bounties for these purposes paid in the year 1912 being $4,065,000.

I wish to emphasize the conditions under which the Japanese have developed a very great tonnage in a few years by what seems extravagant bounties. Japan paid, in 1911, $2,330,000 direct bounties for North American lines, and $372,560 bounties to South American lines, in addition to large amounts in other forms of subsidies, which included, in 1911, $5,584,000 for the extension of steamship routes, $840,000 for the encouragement of navigation, $563,000 for the encouragement of shipbuilding, $2,500 for the training of seamen, and $10,000 for subsidy to lifeboats, a total in the year 1911 of more than $7,000,000. Taking into account the relative resources of Japan and the United States, with similar encouragement, we would pay three or four times that amount of bounty annually, which would be sufficient to buy all the ships which are being considered under the provisions of this bill.

The Mexican Government paid for subsidies to steamship lines in the year 1911 a total of $275,000, which includes $100,000 for service between Canadian and Mexican ports on both coasts; $96,000 to the Pacific Navigation Co., an English company; and other smaller amounts to different steamship lines.

The Netherlands Government pays a direct subsidy to the Royal West Indian mail service of $30,000 annually.

The Peruvian Government pays $150,000 per annum to the Peruvian Steamship & Dry Dock Co. for various services, including the use of the company's steamers as auxiliaries in case of war.

That is one of the propositions that is pending before the Senate, and in a tentative way before the House—the necessity of providing our Navy with suitable auxiliaries to be used during war.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. BRISTOW. Will the Senator please state the difference between the pending measure and the bill which he introduced, and which was finally passed some time last year, providing for additional ships for our Navy to be used in commerce?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the bill to which the Senator from Kansas refers was a general proposition to take those ships of the Navy which might be available for the purpose, and establish a line from the east coast of the United States first to the west coast of South America, with the hope of gradually supplementing that line by the construction of merchant ships, ships which would be available for cargo carrying, and at the same time available for use by the Navy in case of war. That is a very different proposition from putting the Government directly into the transportation business. That was a temporary measure, the purposes being to develop auxiliaries for the Navy in the first place, and to encourage those shippers engaged in the transportation business to take up this question with the Government, and try to have provided suitable ships for the two purposes to which I have referred.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, if I understand the Senator correctly, I should like to make a further inquiry about the bill which the Senate passed something like a year ago, and to which he has referred, providing for the construction of ships and the acquiring of ships for the Navy to be used for the purpose of developing commercial routes. While the method is different, if that bill had been enacted, and the Government had proceeded under its provisions, would it not have accomplished what is sought to be accomplished by the present measure?

Mr. WEEKS. It would have been a step in that direction, without any doubt. That bill is lying dormant in the Naval Affairs Committee of the House.

Mr. BRISTOW. Does the Senator know whether the same committee that reported this bill has that bill now in its possession?

Mr. WEEKS. No; it has not; because that bill went to the Naval Affairs Committee. The committee that reported a bill similar to this—the Alexander bill, as it is called—is the Merchant Marine Committee of the House. They are entirely different committees.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, does the Senator remember about when that bill was passed?

Mr. WEEKS. It was about a year ago, I should say.

Mr. KENYON. It has been lying dormant about a year?

Mr. WEEKS. I should think so; just about a year.

Spain pays two lines of steamers—the North of Spain, sailing to Cuba and Mexico, and the other sailing from Mediterranean ports to New York, Cuba, and Mexico—a subsidy based on sailings, speed, distance, and displacement of ships, in addition to which it pays shipbuildings bounties in various forms.

Great Britain pays to the Royal West India Service or Steamship Co. $400,000 annually; to the Pacific Co., operating to Central and South American ports, $162,000 annually, to which additions have been recently made to cover the west-coast service on the opening of the Panama Canal. Furthermore, Great Britain has aided its shipping in many other ways, incidentally in loaning to the Cunard Line the money necessary to build the Lusitania and the Mauretania at 4 per cent, I think, which enabled the construction of those great steamers, of course, with the proviso that they could be withdrawn from the Cunard service at any time in case of war, when they might be needed for the purposes of the Government.

I have taken some time to give some details relating to subsidies which are paid by European nations to show that there has been no variation in the methods followed by all other countries, our commercial rivals and others, in developing such merchant marines as they have. I take it for granted that every Senator is desirous of doing something which will be effective, businesslike, and reasonable in the way of aiding our merchant marine. What I am contending is that we are throwing away the experience of the rest of the world; that we are undertaking a policy which was never undertaken under the sun; that there is no precedent of any kind for it; that no one has had an opportunity to appear before the committees of the Senate and the House and express his views on this bill; that the opinion of those who are entitled to have their opinion considered in such matters has not been asked; and that there is no evidence, either before the Senate or before any committee of the Senate, which warrants the passage of this bill. On the other hand, Mr. President, I am going to try to demonstrate that there is universal criticism and objection to what we are about to do.

I do not know where the proposal for making this kind of an appropriation originated, but I want to quote from the President on that subject.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARDWICK in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. BRISTOW. Before the Senator goes into that subject I wish to make an inquiry of him. I can not get out of my mind the bill that we passed about a year ago. Has the Senator any information as to why that bill which we passed and which provided that the Government might build these ships or acquire them for naval purposes and use them in commerce, has been permitted to sleep for a year without any action being taken on it by the committee?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not know.

Mr. BRISTOW. Can the Senator tell us why he thinks no attention should be paid to a measure that has already passed the Senate and another measure such as the one we have now brought forward and its passage insisted with such impetuous haste as is being demanded now?

Mr. WEEKS. One of the purposes I had in introducing the bill to which the Senator refers was to have the moral effect of a line of American steamships from the Atlantic coast to the west coast of South America in operation the day the canal was opened. I believed that it would be something which would appeal to the pride of Americans to feel that we were really going to do something besides talk in developing trade with South America; and while I did not believe, and I do not believe now, that there are on the Navy Register ships that would conduct that traffic at a profit, there are a considerable number of vessels which could be used temporarily for that purpose, and those vessels are, most of them, tied up at the docks and of little service in ordinary times.

One of the best features of the general proposition, which I think the Senator from Kansas favors and which I do, the building up of auxiliaries for the Navy, is that those auxiliaries instead of being idle nine-tenths of the time—I hope for all time, as far as war is concerned—may be turned over to private management to help out the trade of the world. It would not be idle capital. Even if the return were a minimum received by the Government, they could be put to some useful commercial purpose.

Now, to go on with the Senator's general suggestion, I think no doubt that there is great pressure being brought by those who own or control the ships belonging to or flying the flag of a belligerent power to sell ships. You can hear rumors any day about the prices at which the ships interned in New York can be purchased. I have heard it said that there were three prices, and that when the trade was made, if the Government bought any of those ships it would be paying the maximum of the three prices; that there was a large commission to be paid to somebody in some way if that were undertaken.

I confess that this is all rumor. I do not know that there is anything definite about it, but it is natural when a proposition appears which is going to put $30,000,000 in the hands of somebody to spend for some purpose that there should be pressure to promote that proposition, and the pressure would naturally come from those who had something to sell.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. BRISTOW. Will the Senator please state what those three prices were and the basis upon which they were alleged to be made?

Mr. WEEKS. I can not name the prices. I am not in the secret of those, if there are such, who have options on those steamers; but the intimation was made here that there was a price at which the owners of the ships were willing to sell, that they were to be transferred to somebody and a commission paid, and then the hope that the Government would buy them and another commission be paid.

Mr. BRISTOW. Does the Senator think that could account for the failure to enact into law the bill which the Senate passed something like a year ago providing that our naval auxiliaries and others to be constructed should be put into this commerce, there being no commissions involved in that case, and that that is the reason why that bill is permitted to sleep while the one fruitful of commissions is pushed forward to passage?

Mr. WEEKS. The Senator's experience and his imagination are as great as my own. That is a conclusion that would be reached if we followed previous conduct in such transactions. It may be possible that it is so.

But I want especially now, while I think of it, to call the attention of the Senate to this fact: If the Government is going to buy ships under present conditions, it is either going to buy the ships of belligerents with the possibility of foreign complications at the same time or else it is going to buy shipping which is now engaged at its maximum capacity in the trade of the world.

There is no ship of a neutral power to-day which is not employed to its limit. It is not going to add one single ton to the carrying capacity of the world's traffic. It goes without saying that this shipping being employed and there being a great demand for ships of neutral nations the rates are high. They are high for very many reasons, but because they are high those who have ships undoubtedly are reaping a harvest under the conditions which prevail.

Now, Mr. President, does any one think under those conditions the Government can go into the general market and buy ships at a reasonable price, at a normal price, or at a price at which those ships might sell if it desired to transfer them six months or a year after the war had been ended? Of course we are going to buy at excessive prices. The Government always pays enough for things, but under these circumstances we will pay extraordinary prices, and there will be great depreciation resulting as soon as the emergency has passed. Now, to illustrate that——

Mr. BRISTOW. Can the Senator inform the Senate as to what prices were paid for the ships which we had to have during the Spanish-American War, and what those ships were afterwards sold for?

Mr. WEEKS. That is what I have in my hand as an illustration.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Before the Senator passes to that, I wish to ask him a question. I understood the Senator to intimate a moment ago that options are in existence for the purchase of some of these interned ships.

Mr. WEEKS. I want to make that clear. I said there were rumors that there are such options. I have heard from two or three sources that there are individuals who hold options on the interned ships.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I understand the only ships which are interned are German and Austrian ships?

Mr. WEEKS. German ships very largely; I presume there are some Austrian ships.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. As I understood the Senator, the option is held by individuals?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. For the purchase of those ships?

Mr. WEEKS. That is what I have been told.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And very likely in anticipation of a bill of this character?

Mr. WEEKS. That would seem to be a natural conclusion.

Mr. President, in 1898, when we suddenly found ourselves in a state of war with Spain, it was necessary to transport our troops to Cuba and it was necessary to furnish supply ships to accompany our fleet. We had no transports at that time worthy of the name. We had no supply ships, no fuel ships, no repair ships. All of those necessities had to be supplied.

I was personally familiar with the methods which were followed by those who had to do with the purchase of suitable ships. I know they made a great effort to protect the Government's interest and to buy vessels that would be of use to the Navy after the war was over. I have in my hand a complete list of the ships which were purchased at that time. I will put the list in the RECORD, with the permission of the Senate, but I want to comment on it before doing so.

Among the 113 vessels purchased was the Alicia, renamed the Hornet. The purchase price was $117,500. She was sold within a few years of the termination of the war for $5,100. I hope Senators will pay attention to the depreciation in the prices paid for these ships which were purchased under those circumstances.

The Niagara, a commerce carrier, purchased for $200,000, sold within two or three years of the close of the war for $75,563.

The Zafiro, a yacht, I think used as a converted yacht; purchase price, $87,597; sold for $3,300.

The Fearless, her Navy name was the Iroquois; purchase price, $150,000; sold for $4,653.86.

The Vulcan; purchase price, $350,000; sold for $175,750.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will ask the Senator if he can specify the dates of those sales?

Mr. WEEKS. I can not give the exact dates, but every one of these sales was made before 1907, within nine years of the termination of the war, and most of them very soon after the war ended. But I have not the dates.

The Chatham; purchase price, $350,000; sold for $175,750; a good ship.

The Scindia, renamed the Ajax; purchase price, $267,657; sold for $20,521.27.

The Governor Russell; purchase price, $71,000; sold for $25,000.

East Boston, purchase price, $57,500; sold for $38,091.

The Scipic, purchase price, $85,769; sold for $41,550.

The Inca, purchase price, $35,000; sold for $1,800.

The Eugenia, renamed the Siren, purchase price, $40,000; sold for $2,352.50.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. NELSON. Were those vessels purchased by the Government?

Mr. WEEKS. Those vessels were purchased by the Government at the beginning or during the Spanish-American War.

Mr. NELSON. How many did we purchase?

Mr. WEEKS. One hundred and thirteen, I believe.

Mr. NELSON. Vessels?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. And have we disposed of all of them?

Mr. WEEKS. No. There are at this time some of them on the Navy list. Many of them are on the Navy list. A few of them were transferred to the Army for transport service.

Mr. NELSON. Has the Senator the figures showing the aggregate amount of those which have been sold, what we paid for them, and what we lost in the sale?

Mr. WEEKS. I am going to put into the RECORD some information on that subject.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. BRISTOW. May I ask the Senator to give the date of the sale and purchase, as nearly as can be done, when he puts the list in the RECORD?

Mr. WEEKS. All the purchases were made during the summer of 1898, probably between the 1st of March and the 1st of September.

The Bristol, renamed the Cheyenne, purchase price, $20,000; sold for $1,690.

The Shearwater, purchase price, $26,000; sold for $1,536.

The Pedro, renamed the Hector, purchase price, $200,000; sold for $65,150.

Curiously enough, Mr. President, more of these vessels have foundered at sea than all other classes of vessels in the recent history of the Navy, indicating that they were not very seaworthy craft.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. NELSON. From whom were those vessels, as a rule, purchased?

Mr. WEEKS. They were very largely—almost entirely—vessels that were engaged in the coastwise trade, although quite a number of them were yachts and were converted. For instance, the Gloucester, which was distinguished at the battle of Santiago, was a converted yacht.

Mr. NELSON. Were any of them purchased from foreign owners or foreign Governments?

Mr. WEEKS. Only in two instances, and those vessels are still on the Navy list. They were men-of-war. One was purchased from Brazil and the other was purchased from England. I was saying that there has been a strange fatality in the case of these vessels which would seem to indicate that they were not overseaworthy at best. For instance, the Nezinscot, which was a tug, foundered at sea. The Yankee, which was formerly the El Norte, of the Morgan Line, a large ship used as an auxiliary cruiser during the war, costing $575,000, foundered at sea.

The Yosemite, formerly the El Sud, of the Morgan Line, purchased at the same price, foundered at sea.

The Marcellus, formerly the Titania, renamed the Marcellus, a large ship, foundered at sea.

I think there were one or two others, but certainly there are four or five such on the list. I have not the figures before me, but at one time I figured the percentage of loss on the vessels which were purchased under those conditions and later sold.

It will be noted from what I have read that hardly one of them was sold for 50 per cent of its cost, and in many cases they did not bring 25 per cent of the cost. So if the total amount that was paid for these vessels, aggregating something like $17,000,000, had been realized when sold and vessels built for the purpose for which these vessels are being used had been constructed, we undoubtedly would have saved in the transaction as many as $10,000,000. That shows conclusively the effect of undertaking something as an emergency measure to meet a condition which existed at that time. The condition now is temporary, and will not be in evidence when any ships that can be provided now are ready for service.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. BRISTOW. May I ask the Senator how many of these vessels now belonging to the Navy or the Army could be used for commercial business in the event that that was desired?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, all these vessels are now comparatively old. It is 17 years since the Spanish War. If the charge-off for depreciation had been made in these cases from 3 to 5 per cent a year—it should be 5 per cent probably for vessels of this character—17 years would make 85 per cent.

Mr. BRISTOW. May I ask the Senator how many vessels now owned by the Navy or the Army that are not in use could be used for commercial purposes? How many does the Government own now that could be used for that purpose?

Mr. WEEKS. It owns about 90 of the vessels that were purchased at that time. I will put into the RECORD the complete list. The Navy Register shows the list, their tonnage, and the purposes for which they are used. Some of them are tugs. Some of them were converted yachts and are laid up much of the time, and some of them were cargo-carrying ships and are used as auxiliary cruisers to-day.

Mr. BRISTOW. How many of these ships would be suitable for the over-seas trade?

Mr. WEEKS. I think very few of them. As I was saying a moment ago, these ships are now at least 17 years old, and if the Government had followed the course pursued by private companies and had charged off 5 per cent a year, that would be 85 per cent of the total cost. Of course they are not worth to-day anything like the price which was paid for them. Even assuming that they have been kept in good condition, they have depreciated on account of age.

Mr. BRISTOW. How many of the vessels that the Government owned, either those or any others, could be equipped and put in the service as cargo-carrying vessels?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, under the head of fuel ships in the Navy list there are 23 vessels having a displacement of from 4,000 to 19,000 tons. I think it would be fair to say that those 23 vessels, or at least most of them, might be useful as cargo carriers, or might be used; I will not say usefully or effectively.

Mr. BRISTOW. Would the ships which have been under lease, which have been chartered, and which have been lying around the ports, for which I understand the Government has been paying $100 or $200 a day, or something like that, be available for a commercial line?

Mr. WEEKS. Will the Senator name one ship of the kind to which he refers?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not know the names of the ships. The Senator from Massachusetts will remember that during the controversy here over an appropriation bill it was alleged that a large number of ships were tied up, that they were not being used, for which the Government was paying charter charges. My inquiry is, could those ships be used commercially; that is, could the President use those ships to establish a commercial line as well as charter them and not use them?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not know about that, Mr. President. I do not recall the vessels, and I do not recall the purpose for which they were chartered.

Mr. BRISTOW. I was inquiring as to the vessels chartered in connection with the Mexican trouble.

Mr. WEEKS. I recall now that there were some vessels chartered at that time; I do not know whether or not they are now under charter; I presume they are not; but they were provided for transport purposes and were used, I think, in transporting our troops from Texas to Vera Cruz.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator doubtless does not remember. I was inquiring about the number of vessels which were chartered that had not been used. The statement was made that a large number of such vessels were chartered and not used. My inquiry was whether the President would have authority to use for this purpose the vessels which were chartered and were not being used, instead of asking Congress to provide for the purchase of vessels.

Mr. WEEKS. If there are such vessels, I have no doubt the President would have the right to use them for these purposes at this time or for some purpose that would be useful; but I am not informed about their names or their capacity. I will, however, put the list to which I have referred into the RECORD. It is an excellent example of what will happen if we undertake to buy cargo-carrying vessels under the conditions which now exist.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the list referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts will be inserted in the RECORD. The Chair hears none.

The list referred to is as follows:

List of vessels purchased for use during War with Spain, purchase price, final disposition of each, and selling price where sold.

Name before purchase.	Renamed.	Purchase price.	Disposition.
Columbia	Wasp	$895,000	Still in Navy.
Alicia	Hornet	117,500	Sold, $5,100.
Almy	Eagle	110,000	Still in Navy.
Hermione	Hawk	50,000	Do.
D. C. Ivins	Nezinscot	30,000	Foundered at sea.
P. H. Wise	Sioux	25,553	Still in Navy.
Winthrop	Osceola	100,000	Do.
El Toro	Accomac	40,000	Do.
Wilmet	Potomac	125,300	Do.
Edward Luckenback	Tecumseh	45,000	Do.
Walter Luckenback	Uncas	75,000	Do.
Atlas	Wompatuck	65,000	Do.
Josephine	Vixen	150,000	Do.
Mayflower	Mayflower	430,000	Do.
Sovereign	Scorpion	300,000	Do.
Creole	Solace	600,000	Do.
Diogenes	Topeka	170,327	Do.
(Not named)	Manly	24,250	Do.
Do	Somers	72,997	Do.
Saturn	Saturn	290,000	Do.
Lebanon	Lebanon	225,000	Do.
El Norte	Yankee	575,000	Foundered at sea.
El Rio	Dixie	575,000	Still in Navy.
El Sol	Prairie	575,000	Do.
El Sud	Yosemite	575,000	Foundered at sea.
Nitcheroy (El Sid)	Buffalo	575,000	Still in Navy.
Amazonas	New Orleans	1,429,215	Do.
Almirante Abru	Albany	1,205,000	Do.
Merrimac	Merrimac	342,000	Sunk, Santiago, Cuba.
Niagara	Niagara	200,000	Sold, $75,563.
Sterling	Sterling	190,000	Still in Navy.
Enterprise	Modoc	30,000	Do.
No. 18	No. 18	2,800	Lighter.
Nanshan	Nanshan	155,728	Still in Navy.
Zafiro	Zafiro	87,597	Sold, $3,300.
Alice	Alice	19,000	Still in Navy.
C. G. Coyle	Choctaw	82,500	Do.
Penwood	Powhatan	42,500	Do.
Fearless	Iroquois-Ionie	150,000	Sold, $4,663.86.
Vigilant	Vigilant	60,000	Still in Navy.
Active	Active	75,000	Do.
Hercules	Hercules	40,000	Do.
Southery	Southery	100,000	Do.
Venezuela	Panther	375,000	Do.
Yumuri	Badger	367,000	Transferred to War Department.
Yorktown	Resolute	475,000	Do.
T. P. Fowler	Mohawk	44,000	Still in Navy.
Tespia	Hist	65,000	Transferred to War Department.
Restless	Restless	29,000	Still in Navy.
Illawara	Oneida	60,000	Do.
Viking	Viking	30,000	Transferred to War Department.
Chatham	Vulcan	350,000	Sold, $175,750.
Penelope	Yankton	125,000	Still in Navy.
Right Arm	Pontiac	30,000	Do.
Philadelphia	Peoria	100,000	Do.
Corsair	Gloucester	225,000	Do.
Nememsha	Iris	145,000	Do.
John Dwight	Pawnee	25,000	Do.
Justin	Justin	145,000	Do.
Hortense	Takoma-Sebajo	28,000	Do.
Aileen	Aileen	55,000	Do.
Scindia	Scindia-Ajax	267,657	Sold, $20,521.27.
Comanche	Frolic	115,000	Transferred to War Department.
Illinois	Supply	325,000	Still in Navy.
Kingtor	Caesar	175,194	Do
Dorothea	Dorothea	187,500	Do.
Gov. Russell	Gov. Russell	71,000	Sold, $25,000.
East Boston	East Boston	57,500	Sold, $38,091.
W. H. Brown	Piscataqua	130,000	Still in Navy.
J. D. Jones	Apache	54,510	Do.
Celtic King	Celtic	340,900	Do.
Rhaetia	Cassius	160,594	Transferred to War Department.
A. W. Booth	Massasoit	30,000	Still in Navy.
Joseph Holland	Hannibal	147,941	Do.
Atala	Alexander	206,826	Do.
Eliz. Holland	Leonidas	147,941	Do
Harlech	Pompey	111,929	Do.
Abarenda	Abarenda	175,000	Do.
(Not named)	Scipio	85,769	Sold, $41,550.
Peter Jebson	Brutus	215,000	Still in Navy.
No. 55	Water barge No. 1	21,000	Do.
Whitgift	Nero	215,000	Do.
Norse King	Rainbow	176,576	Do.
Enquirer	Enquirer	80,000	Transferred to War Department.
Inca	Inca	35,000	Sold, $1,800.
Huntress	Huntress	27,500	Still in Navy.
Stranger	Stranger	75,000	Do.
Kate Jones	Seminole	25,000	Transferred to War Department.
Bristol	Cheyenne	20,000	Sold, $1,600.
Eugenia	Siren	40,000	Sold, $2,352.50.
Elfrida	Elfrida	50,000	Still in Navy.
No. 295	Sylph	50,000	Do.
Shearwater	Shearwater	26,000	Sold, $1,536.
Sylvia	Sylvia	25,000	Still in Navy.
Hercules	Chickasaw	15,000	Do
Confidence	Waban	20,000	Do.

List of vessels purchased for use during War with Spain, etc.—Contd.

Name before purchase.	Renamed.	Purchase price.	Disposition.
Kanawha	Kanawha	$50,000	Transferred to War Department.
Pedro	Hector	200,000	Sold, $65,150.
Port Chalmers	Glacier	340,550	Still in Navy.
Titania	Marcellus	90,000	Foundered at sea.
Refrigerator ship	Culgoa	247,704	Still in Navy.
Lucilene	Arethusa	218,992	Do.

Mr. WEEKS. A little time ago I was referring to the reasons for this legislation.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator a question at that point?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Government would not be under the necessity that it was at that time for hastening the acquisition of ships with which to transport troops. Any cause for hurry like that would have passed; there would be no occasion of that sort for being pressed immediately into the necessity of acquiring ships; and no such advantage could be taken of the situation by others who might desire to sell ships to the Government.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I understand there are two reasons assigned for the passage of this legislation—one is to establish a permanent policy, which is bad, and the other is to provide for an emergency. The emergency exists in but two possible kinds of traffic—one is the transportation of grain to European ports and the other is the transportation of cotton. I think Senators must have overlooked the fact that the emergency in both of those cases will probably have passed before there will be any possibility of making suitable purchases of ships for the carriage of such cargoes.

We have shipped 54,000,000 bushels more grain up to a date within two or three days this year than we shipped last year, and substantially that amount more than we have ever shipped, which shows that there has been a very considerable amount of carrying capacity. By the middle of March—that is, within six week, and I hope before this bill can be passed—the necessity for the transportation of last year's crop of grain will have entirely passed, because the present transportation facilities afforded by the ships which are now engaged in that service will have carried to the other side every bushel of grain that we shall have to export.

The only other emergency is the carrying of cotton. The ships which will be released from the grain-carrying trade as soon as about 75,000,000 bushels more grain have been transported will be available for the carrying of cotton. In the meantime cotton is moving pretty freely, and within two or three months even that emergency will have passed. Before we can possibly provide any kind of fleet, even by purchase, the emergency which is supposed to now exist will have passed. So we may eliminate any excuse for the passage of this bill for that reason.

I will merely say, in addition to that, Mr. President, that, in my judgment, there will be a very considerable amount of idle tonnage as soon as the wheat and the cotton which we have to send to the other side shall have been delivered to its purchasers; that there will be more shipping than is required for the trans-Atlantic service; and, in any case, this bill, as an emergency proposition, is not going to add, as I have said before, one ton of additional shipping to the amount which now exists.

Referring once more to the reasons for urging this legislation, I want to quote from the President's Indianapolis speech. In referring to the minority Senators he said:

> These self-styled friends of business, these men who say the Democratic Party does not know what to do for business, are saying that the Democrats shall do nothing for business.

Incidentally I want to say in passing, Mr. President, that I do not believe there is a Senator on this side of the Chamber who is not in favor of doing what he believes will really inure to the best interests of the business of this country; but Senators are not going to be deluded into doing something which they believe will be inimical to business under the guise of benefiting it. They must use their own judgment as to what will be really beneficial when the legislation is submitted to them.

> I challenge them to show their right to stand in the way of the release of American products to the rest of the world.

Well, I have just referred to the shipping of American products, and have stated that we have exported more than ever before of one of the great products, and we are in the way of shipping more of another product. Nobody wishes to stand in the way of a reasonable proposition to relieve those conditions.

> Who commissioned them, a minority, a lessening minority?

Well, Mr. President, our States have commissioned us and have sent us here to use such judgment as we have relating to the business of the country, and we are going to continue to follow our judgment about what is best for those whom we represent.

> For they will be in a greater minority in the next Senate than in this. You know it is the peculiarity of that great body that it has rules of procedure which make it possible for a minority to defy the Nation.

Mr. President, under the up-to-date construction of the rules of the Senate I do not think there is any reasonable possibility of defying anybody's right to act. The rules are, and should be, so constructed that they will allow reasonable debate. This is the place which the American people have had in their minds as a possible vent for exposure of what they believe to be legislation which is not for their best interests, and I conclude that the rules of the Senate are as liberal in that respect as anyone who is familiar with them thinks they should be.

> And these gentlemen are now seeking to defy the Nation and prevent the release of American products to the suffering world which needs them more than it ever needed them before.

Yes; we have sent 54,000,000 more bushels of grain abroad since the harvest of the last crop than we did last year. We are defying the Nation by shipping more than has been shipped in other years; and I will submit some figures to indicate the volume of trade, which show that the world's commerce is being pretty well cared for under the conditions which exist.

> Their credentials as friends of business and friends of America will be badly discredited if they succeed.
>
> If I were speaking from a selfish, partisan point of view, I could wish nothing better than that they could show their true colors as partisans and succeed. But I am not quite so malevolent as that. Some of them are misguided; some of them are blind; most of them are ignorant. I would rather pray for them than abuse them. But the great voice of America ought to make them understand what they are said to be attempting now.

Well, Mr. President, the great voice of America is the press, at least that is the greatest voice with which I am familiar, and I am going to submit to the Senate in great detail samples of the expressions of the press in every section of the country. I ask the Senators on the other side who have charge of this legislation to submit any evidence, either in the press or elsewhere, in favor of this legislation. They will have an opportunity to do so, and I challenge them to compare in any way the character and the qualifications of the witnesses who will testify in favor of this pending bill with those who are protesting against it.

Whether one agrees with his public utterances, since President Wilson took the oath of office, it must be admitted that he has displayed poise and good taste previous to the Indianapolis speech, and it continues to be an increased cause of wonderment to the people of this country, if the press correctly represents their sentiments, how the President could have so far lapsed as to go to the other extreme by indulging not only in questionable taste but the unfounded statements with which his whole address is filled. He refers with words of praise to the "independent," which, if it means anything, is the man who thinks for himself and who generally comes to his own conclusions on public questions which are honest, if not sound, but in the very next breath he attacks in a bitter way those who are opposed to a legislative measure unprecedented in its character in the legislative annals of the world. Those who are opposed to it are not entirely on this side of the Chamber, Mr. President, they can be found in every class and in every political party, and I am not sure that a great majority of them are not in the political party to which the President belongs.

Before any new idea of such character is to be put on the statute books it should have public sanction and approval. The President assumes it has this approval, but his statement is a mere assumption, not in any way borne out by the facts. I want to believe that he made it thinking that he was stating a fact which is without question, but, if that is true, the charge made that he seldom seeks advice, but comes to his own conclusions, and believes that they are public sentiment, is an explanation of his statement in this case.

The first evidences of public sentiment are always found in the press, and as far as that evidence goes there is almost universal condemnation of the project which the President says must be passed and against the opposition to which he warns Senators of any party who may come to a different conclusion than that held by himself. Could there be given a more violent wrench to popular government than to have the head of the Nation, speaking to the whole country, asserting that those who do not agree with him are misled, ignorant, self-assertive, and misrepresentative?

The way to determine whether this legislation is at all in accord with public desire is to thoroughly discuss it, and as a result of that discussion Senators and Representatives will be sure to hear from their constituents whether or not the bill has the approval of those thinking people who have an opportunity to give it any suitable consideration. This process is sometimes a long one, but in this case, as the idea which the President is urging is new, is entirely outside our experience and the experience of other nations, there is no other course to follow for those who doubt its effectiveness, who hesitate at the dangers of complication with other nations which it may involve, those who believe that it is economically unsound and unwise, than to give it such thorough discussion that the country may understand what it actually means, and the results which will come from its passage.

As one of those opposed to this legislation I deprecate the President's declaration not because I have any desire to oppose the legislation which originates with an administration with which I am not in political sympathy, for I have, as have many other opposition Senators, already shown my independence on that subject; indeed, it may be said that no President in our recent history has had as much support on strictly administrative matters from opposition Senators as has the present incumbent of the White House, and in one case, that of the tolls bill, affirmative action could not have been obtained if it had not been for the assistance of some of those Senators who are now being attacked by him because they are going to vigorously oppose this measure. I believe that there are the possibilities of the gravest international complications involved in the passage of this bill; that if it passed it would be ineffective, utterly failing to carry out the wishes of its sponsors; that it is economically unsound, ill advised, and dangerous; that the sentiment in its favor among those who have given it consideration in or out of Congress is almost negligible; that if it is passed by this Congress or any other Congress, it would be done not because those who vote for it, generally speaking, favor the legislation, but as a result of the most flagrant political pressure, and, speaking for myself, I consider it a duty, which I am going to perform, to throw every possible obstacle in the way of its passage by discussing not only the objections which I have just named, but every other phase of the question involved in establishing a suitable merchant marine. This can not be done by me in an hour or in a day. I want to have what I have to say, feeble and ineffective as it may be, given a chance to reach those who should be informed on the subject, and as the first phase of this discussion I am going to take up at this time the President's statement that "the minority in the Senate are seeking to defy the Nation," and his intimation that the public is demanding the passage of this bill by showing, as far as I am able to show, that there is no public sentiment in favor of the passage of this legislation.

For that purpose I am going to turn first to the report of the merchant-marine committee of the Boston Chamber of Commerce, made to the directors of the chamber of commerce and adopted unanimously by that body. The Boston Chamber of Commerce is one of the largest commercial organizations in the United States. There are more than 3,000 members. It includes a very large percentage of the larger of the business interests of Boston, of all classes and all grades. It is as representative as any organization can be of the business in its locality. It has on its marine committee men who have devoted their lives to the marine industry. They are among the men who, if a proper procedure had been followed, would have been called before the committee of the Senate and inquiry made of them as to the practicability of carrying out this project. Many of the men in a great port like Boston who belong to a commercial body are those who are familiar with seafaring life and seafaring methods; so that this report, which as I said was unanimously adopted by the chamber, should have, I think, the weight to which it is justly entitled. In order that it may have that weight I am going to read from it and make some comments on the suggestions which are made:

To the executive committee and board of directors:

There is some precedent, in the practice of other nations, for Government ownership of railroads; there is none whatever for Government ownership of a merchant marine.

The only instances I have been able to find where a Government has done anything in the way of the ownership or control of merchant-marine lines are one or two instances of river steamers owned by the Balkan States, and one or two instances of river steamers on the Kongo owned or controlled by the Belgian Government; but they are so few that they may be neglected, so that the general statement made in this report is correct.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. NELSON. Are not the instances which the Senator cites instances where the boats that are employed are connected with some special commercial enterprise?

Mr. WEEKS. Undoubtedly. I think I know one steamer or one small line of steamers on the Danube which might not come under that head; but, substantially speaking, that is correct.

Mr. NELSON. In the Kongo case to which the Senator refers, is not the steamer service maintained for the purpose of exploiting the special interest of the Belgian Government in commercial and producing transactions engaged in by the Government in that country?

Mr. WEEKS. Undoubtedly. It has the same general function, I think, that the steamers belonging to the Panama Railroad Co. have had in connection with the construction of the canal—incident to the construction and primarily not operated for other reasons.

Such experience in this direction as exists is either an accident or a fragment. The United States bought a small steamship line from New York to Colon as a part of the assets of the old French Panama Canal Co., and has operated that line as an incident of canal construction, at a nominal bookkeeping profit of about 2 per cent for 10 years, with insurance, depreciation, and interest disregarded—imperative charges of a regular steamship concern, which if paid by the Government line would have involved a huge deficit and bankruptcy. The government of Western Australia has owned and operated a small coastwise steamship line for two years, with a loss of $114,000 the first year and of $96,000 the second. It is now believed that this enterprise will be abandoned.

That statement is taken from a report of the attorney general of Western Australia.

This is the net experience in government ownership which the world affords—two lines, both of them financially failures. Yet the ocean steamship business as a whole, in private hands, is and has been reasonably prosperous—as prosperous, on the average, as other industries, or it could not have procured capital for its great and constant growth. Twenty-five years ago the tonnage of all nations recorded by Lloyds was 22,151,000; 10 years ago it was 36,000,000; now it is 49,089,000.

A very rapid growth, and one which conforms, I think, with the growth of the business the world over.

There has been almost no increase in the over-seas tonnage of the United States in this period, but the causes are well known; this is not the place for their discussion at length, and they can not be remedied by a mere expedient of Government ownership. Steamers of a Government-owned line would, if built in the United States, cost more than competing foreign-built ships, or if bought abroad, would cost no less than such competing ships and would cost considerably more to operate. They would, of course, equally with private-owned American ships, be debarred from the subsidies of foreign Governments. A half a century of actual trial proves that under such conditions and with only such exceptions as serve to prove the rule American ships can be maintained in over-seas commerce only at an annual loss that finally becomes prohibitive.

That is borne out by the experience of the two ships, originally called the Tremont and the Shawmut, which were purchased by the Government for the canal service. They were built at a cost of about $1,000,000 apiece and were put into service to run from Seattle to the Orient. They were operated for six years as economically, I think, as possible. They were well-constructed ships and were suitable for the purposes for which they were constructed, and yet they never earned a dollar of net profit during that six years. They were purchased by the Government at their cost price, less an estimated depreciation of 6 per cent a year, or 36 per cent. The ownership of those ships was largely distributed because there was a desire on the part of citizens of Boston and vicinity to try the experiment of putting on an independent line of steamers under natural conditions and seeing what the result would be. It was almost a patriotic act on their part. The result of that experiment was a loss of interest for six years and a loss of 36 per cent of their principal, the Government buying the ships for the purpose, as is well known, of transporting cement to the Canal Zone, with a provision in the bill that they should be turned over to the Navy for auxiliary purposes when that service was terminated. That is an experience which bears out the conclusions stated in this report from the Chamber of Commerce.

The report goes on to say:

MORE COSTLY THAN A REGULAR SUBSIDY.

This inevitable loss under these bills will have to be made up out of the Treasury of the United States through appropriations for the maintenance of the Government-owned steamship service. There is no proof or suggestion that a Government-owned line under the American flag can be operated at any less expense than a private-owned line.

I shall undertake, Mr. President, before the completion of this discussion, to prove that a Government-owned line can not be operated as economically as a privately owned line; that it will cost very much more than the cost of operation of a privately owned line, so that if a privately owned line is a failure the Government line is sure to be. In that event, the loss must be made up by taxing the people, many of whom are not interested in the operations conducted, which really means the payment of subsidies, and indefinite subsidies at that.

In fact, the expense of a Government-owned line would certainly be greater, for it has been established again and again that the Government can not conduct any business so economically as private individuals trained from youth in that business and dependent on it for profit or for livelihood.

Experience has shown that it costs about 20 per cent more to build battle ships in Government navy yards of the United States than in private yards under like systems of accounting, and it is a fair assumption that there would be at least an equal contrast in the cost of ship operation. Therefore it is a reasonable expectation that if a subsidy of a given amount were required for the profitable maintenance of a private-owned merchant marine, a Government-owned merchant fleet would demand a subsidy at least 20 per cent, and probably much more than 20 per cent, greater, in the form of appropriations from time to time for the Government steamship corporation, of whose stock the Government holds 51 per cent, while private capitalists may own the remainder.

I am going to discuss later the question whether private capitalists would own the remainder. My judgment is that a person who subscribed for any of that stock, hoping that it would be a profitable investment, would be a fit subject for St. Elizabeth's.

Without entering on a consideration of the expediency or justice of a subsidy system, it is indisputable that this Government ownership project involves a particularly wasteful form of subsidy expenditure, inasmuch as trained and responsible private shipowners would be able to provide a given service at a lower cost, or for the same amount to render a more efficient and comprehensive service.

SHIP OWNING A SPECIALIZED BUSINESS.

The proposed bills hold that the Government-owned merchant marine shall be managed by a shipping board, composed of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster General, and the Secretary of Commerce, not one of whom, probably, would have had the slightest experience in or knowledge of the ocean shipping business, which is a profession by itself, complex and difficult, requiring intense application and exceptional aptitude.

We seem to be prone to pile onto department officers responsibilities of the character which are suggested in the pending bill. My judgment is, and I think it is the judgment of those who have served in Cabinet positions—and their opinion should be worth much more than mine—that they should devote, there is ample opportunity for them to devote, their entire time to the conduct of their departments; and yet there is hardly a commission provided under our recent legislation of which some Cabinet officer is not made a member, which means that the work is going to be done by some other person than he, or it means that he is going to neglect the administrative duties for which he has been appointed. The Secretary of the Treasury is especially subject to these selections for commission places. I submit to the Senate the suggestion that they examine the qualifications of the Secretaries of the Treasury and Secretaries of the Navy during the recent decade, as probably suitable officers, based on experience, to manage an ocean transportation line.

I am informed—I do not know whether it is true or not—that one of the conferences which have been recently held has seriously considered adding two civilians to this board. If they will add competent civilians and take off the Cabinet officers and make a real shipping board of it, they will remove one of the very objectionable features of this bill, in my judgment, and they will provide, as far as may be done, for efficient management. It is not necessary for somebody immediately connected with the Government to be on these commissions. Men who are more competent and have more time than they can be found for such service; and, in my opinion, it is a mistake to put any Cabinet officer on a technical board such as the shipping board provided for in this measure.

I hope the majority will not only carry out the suggestion which I have seen reported in the press of adding two civilians to the board, but I hope they will take every one of the Cabinet officers off the board and put men who are trained for such service on it, so that we may have the best results obtainable under what I believe will be a bad system at best.

It is not to be expected that Cabinet ministers, even of the highest general abilities, could compete in this highly specialized calling with men who had made it the one thought and effort of their lives.

The Panama Canal line is a conspicuous case in point. Its president is and has been Col. George W. Goethals, the distinguished builder of the canal. This Government line, though favored in the transportation of officials and employees, supplies and materials, has failed to earn a sum equivalent to its insurance, depreciation, and interest, which must be regularly met by all private steamship companies.

"Does an emergency exist?" is the question in the report.

It is said that an emergency exists because of the great European war, and that this emergency justifies a disregard of all precedents and demands immediate and extraordinary legislation. We deny that there is any such extreme emergency. Chartering is active; vessels long idle are being employed; freight rates have advanced. But these higher rates are due in chief part to risks incident to the war, to higher insurance rates, and to an increased cost of coal, supplies, and wages. Shipowners and merchants who have been questioned state that there is ample tonnage offering in the world in general for the reduced amount of trade that is being transacted.

I have been told, Mr. President, within a day or two that there are some 20 vessels on the Pacific coast belonging largely if not entirely to the Pacific Co. which are not now being used, and which are available if anyone needs their services by bringing them to the Atlantic coast to carry on the trade which is just now under a pressure.

In South American commerce especially, on which stress is laid by the proposed bills, there are said to be more ships than cargoes. A widespread business depression, due to the war and other causes, has suddenly reduced the purchasing power of the South American Republics.

That is not peculiar to the South American Republics alone. The only pressure for the purchase of anything under present conditions is those munitions and supplies which are incident to war. We are having spurts of good business in the United States, but in every instance where there is relatively good business it is due to the demand from Europe on account of the necessity of furnishing the contending armies with supplies, either munitions or the other equipment which is necessary for military service. Some branches of the woolen trade, some shoe manufacturers, some makers of lathes and other machinery used in the manufacture of ammunition are the branches of business in this country which are even normally active; but in other instances the purchasing power of the world has been crippled and is less than in normal times. That, of course, is true as applied to Europe outside of the war necessities. It is stated here that it is true of South American countries, and it is true of the United States itself. Every person in the United States is to some degree economizing in his expenditures. The President, in his Indianapolis speech, made some happy remark about getting over the 1st of January this year because the financial conditions were such that not so many dividends are being paid as heretofore. There were not any dividends being paid in many cases, and anyone who is familiar with securities will find that there has been a very material reduction in the incomes of Americans, and necessarily as a result a reduction of the expenditures which they make. Therefore when this war pressure is over we are almost certain to see an amount of tonnage available for the over-seas traffic which will be greater than its requirements.

A new American freight steamship line has recently been established to Brazil. Other American steamships naturalized under the new free-registry law are scheduled to sail at frequent intervals for Argentina, Uruguay, Chile, and Peru. There is and long has been an American line to Venezuela, and there are two or three American lines, one the Government-owned service, to the Isthmus of Panama, aside from the six American lines regularly plying through the canal in the coastwise trade between the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards. The managers of the lines to the further countries of South America state that because of the prevalent business dullness they are finding it difficult to load their ships and maintain their sailings without the additional handicap of having the Government of the United States as a competitor. (The United States & Brazil Steamship Line, under the auspices of the United States Steel Corporation, operates three American freight steamers from New York to Rio de Janeiro and Santos. Norton, Lilly & Co. operate three American freight steamers from New York to Montevideo, Buenos Aires, and Rosario. W. R. Grace & Co. (Merchants' Line) and the New York-South American Line both operate American freight steamers from New York to Chile and Peru. The Red D Line operates four American mail, passenger, and freight steamers under ocean mail pay to Venezuela. The United Fruit Co. operates several American mail, passenger, and freight steamers from New York to the Isthmus of Panama and Colombia. The Panama Railroad Steamship Line operates several American mail, passenger, and freight steamships from New York to the Isthmus of Panama, connecting at Balboa for ports on the west coast of South America.)

AS TO LACK OF COTTON SHIPS.

There is some difficuluty in securing a sufficient number of ships on the route from the southern cotton ports to Bremen. But it should be understood that because of mines and other conditions this is an extra-hazardous service. British and French ships, of course, are not available for the carrying trade to Germany, and the German Government has stipulated that cotton shall be brought to German ports only in ships of American register, which are also preferred for the export of German dyestuffs and chemicals. Twelve or more American steamers from the coastwise service have accepted charters in the Bremen cotton trade during the few weeks since that trade was opened.

The information of the committee is that the real difficulty in the Bremen trade is not lack of ships, but lack of marine insurance on hulls and cargoes. A Federal war insurance board has already been instituted for temporary service through the European war. Proposals to extend the authority of this board, so that it can assume marine risks for the time being, while conditions remain as abnormal as they are now, are already before Congress.

I wish to suggest that in one case a merchant ship constructed of wood, a ship about 20 years old, was undertaking a trip to South America. She could carry a cargo having a value of about three-quarters of a million dollars. But the marine insurance companies, considering the character of the ship and her age, would take only two-thirds of the cargo in insurance. That is one of the conditions which the insurance department of the Government could very well take under consideration and possibly provide suitable insurance to carry on that line of traffic. It was submitted to the department having charge of our insurance methods, and the last time I had any information on the subject no decision had been reached. In the meantime the cargo and the sailing of the ship has been delayed. A delay in the sailing of a ship with such a substantial cargo as three-quarters of a million even for a day is a measurable loss in the probable profits which might be obtained from the cruise.

Such an expedient—

Speaking of insurance—

Such an expedient would solve the problem without any need of resort to the costly and dangerous expedient of Government ownership. If proper insurance can be had, more ships will be available. There are still suitable American steamships not yet chartered. From this fleet, with return cargoes practically assured, enough tonnage should be had to carry all the cotton required for direct import by Germany. In addition to these steamships there is a large fleet of seagoing sail vessels capable of carrying cotton or other cargoes with reasonable safety if insurance can be had. Indeed, several American sailing craft have been chartered in the past few days for lumber freights from the Gulf of Mexico to the Mediterranean.

A HAZARD TO NEUTRALITY.

There are large considerations of national prudence why any American ships employed to carry cotton or other goods to German ports should be private-owned ships instead of the property of our National Government. Hon. Robert Lansing, the counselor of the Department of State, recently emphasized before a subcommittee of the House Committee on Naval Affairs the grave risks that would be run in the transportation of conditional contraband to a belligerent port in a public ship of the United States. Raw cotton is regarded as noncontraband, but the very appearance of a national-owned ship in belligerent waters is fraught with a peculiar hazard to neutrality that does not attach to the voyage of a private-owned vessel.

An accident or affront to a Government-owned ship would be a vastly more serious affair than a similar happening to an ordinary commercial vessel not of a public character. A Government-owned merchant marine, created in the stress of war, would be a potent agency for the embroiling of the United States in the terrible catastrophe now convulsing Europe.

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP WILL NOT INCREASE TONNAGE.

No considerable increase in the amount of tonnage actually available for the carrying of our over-seas trade in any direction can be anticipated from this proposed expedient of Government ownership. All the American ships and all the neutral ships that could be bought and utilized for this purpose by the Government can be had equally well for charter for export, at current rates, on application to their present owners. Government ownership has no magic power to increase the tonnage of the world. New ships can not be constructed in either American or foreign yards in a period less than 7 months; 9 or 10 months or a year would be required for the largest cargo vessels.

That statement simply adds to the evidence which I have submitted, that as an emergency measure this proposition will be entirely futile and without any appreciable effect. It will not add to the tonnage of the world, and the vessels which might be available for purchase can be better used by private individuals than under public ownership.

The British Government on December 23 proclaimed an embargo on the transfer of British ships to foreign flags without the assent of the British Board of Trade, which, in present circumstances, would hardly be forthcoming. Dutch, Scandinavian, Spanish, Italian, and other neutral steamers are in such active demand and are earning such unusual rates of freight that it is not probable that our Government could purchase them now without the payment of inordinate prices. A scheme of Government ownership and operation, hazardous and difficult at any time, could be effected at the present juncture only by a prodigious expenditure.

I have illustrated the possibilities under that statement by illustrating with the purchase price paid for the ships we bought when we had an emergency at the time of the Spanish War and the prices obtained for those which were not needed for naval purposes after the termination of that war.

Thirty or more German steamships, some of them of large tonnage, are interned at present in ports of the United States. The Hamburg-American Co., the larger of the concerns owning them, has recently declared that its ships were not for sale. Moreover, last August a rumor that these German steamers might be bought by the American Government immediately drew a notification from both Great Britain and France that the purchase and operation of these belligerent vessels under the American flag would be regarded as an unfriendly act and as a violation of neutrality.

The committee is deeply interested in the real revival and restoration of the American merchant marine in overseas trade, but is profoundly convinced that an ambitious scheme of Government ownership would discourage and delay and not promote this great object, dear to the hearts of the entire Nation. Shipowners and shipbuilders state that the introduction of these proposed bills has had the unfortunate result of halting private enterprise and defeating important plans for the extension of steamship services and for new construction. No business man, no business corporation, however resolute and resourceful, desires to have as a possible competitor the Government of the United States.

MENACING THE COASTWISE TRADE.

The proposed bills profess, in general language, to provide Government-owned ships only for "the foreign trade," but this profession is thrown to the winds by an amendment adopted in the Senate Committee on Commerce, which includes Hawaii among the regions to which a Government-owned fleet shall operate. Hawaii is not a foreign country. It is not a dependency like the Philippines or Guam. It is a regularly organized Territory of the United States, and its ports are ports of the United States, exactly as are Boston and New York and Philadelphia and San Francisco. Trade with Hawaii is and has been since 1900 American coastwise trade, in which none but American vessels may lawfully participate. There has not been a word of suggestion or complaint that the war in Europe affected in any way the transportation of merchandise between Hawaii and the American mainland, for which a large, new, and increasing American fleet is available.

As a matter of fact, the trade of Hawaii is very much less than it has been in the past, due largely to the legislation which has been adopted by the Democratic Party. It gave the sugar industry in Hawaii not perhaps its deathblow but a blow which would discourage any development of it, and would induce those engaged in it to seek some other means of using their capital.

The inclusion of Hawaii among foreign ports in foreign trade is without a shadow of excuse. All interested in the American merchant marine will rightfully regard it as an ugly menace, as an "entering wedge" to Government competition in the entire great coastwise commerce of this country, reserved for more than a hundred years to American ships and American owners and now employing a vast shipping of upward of 7,000,000 tons. Any plea that the help of the Government is needed in this mighty trade is wholly baseless and indefensible.

THE LEASING CLAUSE.

The amendment added to the bill in the Senate Committee on Commerce, authorizing the Government to charter, lease, or transfer its ships to private corporations, is a frank recognition of the force of the criticism which the original plan has met with everywhere from the representative mercantile bodies of the United States.

I want especially to call that to the attention of the Senator in charge of this bill. Speaking entirely for myself, if the possibility of Government operation of these steamers were removed under any and every circumstance, if it were not launching into a policy which I believe will be one of the most dangerous we have undertaken, I should view this legislation with much more complacency. It would remove, as far as I am concerned, one of the great objections, and I hope before the conferences which are now being indulged in are concluded the majority of this Chamber will reach the conclusion that it is unadvisable under any circumstances for the Government to operate these ships in over-seas or any other trade.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I inquire of the Senator if he would support the bill if the provision for operating ships were stricken out of it?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I want to answer the question frankly. That is not my only objection to the bill, but it is one of the principal objections I have. I am not opposing this bill, and I am not going to vote against it because it originates with a Democratic administration or because it is favored by the majority of this Chamber. I will vote for the bill when it is finally completed if it appeals to my judgment that it is going to in any way relieve, temporarily or otherwise, a condition which every American citizen believes ought to be relieved.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator a further question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARDWICK in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Government should decline to operate these ships, and there should be no provision giving the Government the power to operate them, then would not the Government simply be put in the position of buying ships which would be used for the benefit of those engaged in the shipping business, and wherein would that differ from the Government guaranteeing the bonds of some private individuals or corporations that would build the ships themselves if the Government would guarantee the bonds? Is there much difference between the Government buying the ships and being compelled to charter or lease them and the Government undertaking to guarantee the bonds of some corporation that would build its own ships?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, other nations have furnished the capital to build ships for privately owned companies. That is one of the forms of subsidy that has been adopted, as I instanced, in the case of the building of the Lusitania and the Mauretania. But I will say to the Senator from Florida that, in my judgment, if there is a real demand for additional tonnage at any time the Government will have no difficulty in chartering any vessels that it may have available for effective and efficient transportation service. It is not going to mean, because the Government can not lease them, that there is any prejudice against those particular ships. If they are efficient ships they can be leased easily enough and operated much more cheaply than can be done by the Government.

Speaking of the amendment for leasing:

But this modified proposal also is essentially unsound. So long as merchant ships cost more to operate under the American flag than under foreign flags, no Government-owned ships will be chartered by experienced shipowners unless the amount of this additional cost of operation is subtracted from the charter price, leaving that price merely nominal. Under such conditions the Government, of course, will actually be paying a concealed subsidy, which might much better be a frank, open, and stated one.

I differ somewhat from the conclusion reached in that instance, Mr. President, because I believe chartering can be obtained for ships of that character and that we owe it to our military and our naval services that we provide them with suitable ships for auxiliary purposes. We sent our fleet around the world accompanied by coal carriers flying the flags of other nations, a most humiliating spectacle, in my opinion, and we ought to have a sufficient number and tonnage of ships of this character to make homogeneous naval equipment, whether it is used for any other purpose or not. But I have not any desire personally to have money invested in an equipment of that kind which, under the kind of pressure which exists to-day, may not be made available for commercial purposes.

Mr. KENYON. From what is the Senator reading?

Mr. WEEKS. I am reading from the report of the Boston Chamber of Commerce.

The conclusions reached by the committee which prepared the report from which I have been quoting are as follows:

(a) It is a sound principle that the Federal Government should not engage in a business which under suitable conditions can be conducted to equal or better advantage by private enterprise.

(b) Such an undertaking would be an unwise departure from the traditional policy of the American people, which would involve a wasteful expenditure of public money, and would imperil our neutral position in the great European war.

(c) No present emergency justifies the Government in embarking in the ocean shipping business; increased governmental facilities for marine insurance will largely solve the immediate problem of the cotton trade; Government ownership could not immediately add to the number of ships afloat upon the seas, and whenever there is a real need for vessels they can be as easily supplied by other means without resorting to this unsound and hazardous experiment.

(d) The proposed legislation would discourage private capital and personal initiative and thereby indefinitely defer the development of an American ocean shipping industry, so vital to the commercial progress of Boston, of New England, and of the whole United States.

We make the following suggestions as to methods for the creation of a strong and enduring merchant marine, which would be preferable to Government ownership and operation as proposed in the pending bills, and urge their consideration by Congress:

The suggestions are as follows:

SUGGESTIONS.

1. The establishment in the Department of Commerce of a shipping board of five members after the example of the British Board of Trade and similar organizations of other maritime Governments; such a shipping board to be composed of the Commissioner of Navigation, a representative of the shipowning interests, of the shipbuilding interests, and of the shippers in water-borne trade, and an expert in marine insurance; this board to have general supervision of the American merchant marine.

I hope the Senator from Florida will make particular note of the first suggestion which this committee offers. It is so entirely different in its character from the proposition in the pending bill, and appeals to me as so much more likely to bring efficient results, that I hope the Senator and those associated with him will not neglect it, but will carefully consider the propriety of substituting such a shipping bill as this for the one the bill proposes.

2. A prompt revision and modernizing of our navigation laws and regulations, so far as they unnecessarily increase the cost of operating American ships as against foreign vessels.

As I stated this morning, in my judgment the modification of our navigation laws has been carried substantially as far as can be done under the legislation which has passed Congress since 1912. Any further modification, except in some minor detail, would be to lessen the protection which we have provided for those who are following a seafaring career; and I am not disposed to consider that, and I do not think it ought to be considered by anyone.

3. An amendment of the ocean mail law of 1891 so that the compensation now paid to 20-knot ships to Europe can be paid to ships of less speed, of the second class, suitable to establish regular mail, passenger, and fast-freight services in naval reserve ships on the longer routes to South America, Australasia, and the Orient.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I interrupt the Senator to make an inquiry before he leaves that last suggestion?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. What does the Senator believe was in the mind of the chamber of commerce with reference to the modification of the navigation laws? What were they intending to convey there? I do not know whether the Senator understands their position or not.

Mr. WEEKS. I have not any information as to what was in the mind of the committee, but I presume the committee, in making that recommendation, had overlooked the action taken by Congress in the legislation passed last year modifying the purchase of foreign ships, the age at which they can be purchased, the carrying of foreign officers and crews on ships flying the American flag, and other similar modifications. As I tried to point out yesterday, it has not lessened the cost of the operation of those ships, because the foreign officers who come into our service under such conditions immediately demand the increased wages which are paid under the American flag.

Mr. FLETCHER. Can the Senator state whether the chamber of commerce would recommend admitting to the coastwise trade those ships admitted to American registry and now allowed to engage in foreign trade?

Mr. WEEKS. I am confident that no man who has considered the results of our coastwise laws and of our over-sea laws would be in favor of letting down the bars and let into our coastwise trade foreign shipping. I pointed out yesterday, and I think the Senator heard me, that the coastwise trade is now conducted on a reasonable basis. If anybody thinks it is not, he can easily find out the results that may be obtained by buying some one of the several lines of steamers which are for sale, and for sale at less than their reproduction cost. That is a complete answer to the statement which has been made that there is a monopoly in our coastwise trade and that somebody is making more money out of it than he should. It is not true, and nobody of any experience, I think, will so state. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Florida that in order to get the final judgment of those gentlemen who are responsible for this report, who know navigation and who know over-seas trade, that they be called before his committee, and let them tell as experts what they think should be done in this very important matter.

4. In place of an investment of $40,000,000 in Government ownership and operation, a Federal fund of the same amount, to be administered by the shipping board above referred to for the purpose of guaranteeing mortgages examined and approved by the board, or for careful loans upon shipping built or purchased for over-seas trade and fitted for auxiliary naval service.

The purpose of that is that construction shall be entered into or purchases shall be made for naval purposes primarily—that is in accord with the substitute which will be offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]—and that, in order to provide for that shipping with certainty and have it under the control of private operators, loans shall be made under reasonable conditions, taking the ships as a mortgage. In that way the Government would be absolutely protected, the most economical operation would be provided, and the ships at the same time would be certainly available for naval purposes.

The sum of $40,000,000 devoted to ownership and operation of a Government-owned fleet would produce only a relatively small fleet, but a proper use of a Government fund in the manner indicated would provide a large one, of far greater value to the commerce of the Nation.

Of course it is not intended to spend $40,000,000 in part in building or buying ships; it is only proposed to spend $30,000,000 under this act. That does not take into consideration the very important problem which I have suggested of providing suitable docks and wharves, the termini of the routes which are to be followed by these lines of steamers, and the many other incidentals, which will cost a very considerable amount of money. It is not possible that anything like $30,000,000 could be properly invested in the purchase of ships without taking into consideration other matters incident to traffic of that kind.

Mr. FLETCHER. Would not those matters be provided for by the capital stock of $10,000,000. The amount to begin business with, required to be paid up, being 51 per cent, or $5,100,000, could be used for acquiring terminals, and possibly also for purchasing some of the ships.

Mr. WEEKS. I think that would be sufficient for a year or two. I have not figured out just how long, but it would certainly be lost inside of two or three years. Then the corporation would be under the necessity of borrowing money or selling some of its ships or of its other property. It would not be safe, in my judgment, to undertake to carry on business for any considerable time with only $10,000,000 surplus, because I can see how that might be dissipated in a comparatively short time under Government management.

5. Annual retainers of a proper amount to citizen officers and men of merchant vessels of the United States, after the practice that has proved so successful, particularly in the British mercantile marine, and special compensation to steamships not under contract for carrying mails, but built on designs approved by the Navy Department and pledged to the service of the Government as fuel ships, supply ships, or transports, so that the Government may be able to control an adequate American auxiliary fleet and a naval reserve of officers and men in time of need.

That is a general provision which has been incorporated in all of the mail subvention laws which Congress has had under consideration during the last 10 or 15 years. It is an extremely important consideration, in my opinion, because we are losing a larger part of the effectiveness of our Navy by not having a sufficient and proper reserve. This is one of the ways of providing a reserve. I do not think it is the only way, but it is one of the ways of adding to the effectiveness of our Navy without materially adding to its expense; and there should be no loss of time, in my judgment, in adopting a suitable naval reserve policy as well as a suitable Army reserve policy, both of which will inure directly to our benefit without increasing our expense.

6. To meet a present condition, an extension of the powers of the existing Bureau of War Risk Insurance to cover marine insurance on hulls and cargoes, with the understanding that this bureau shall be discontinued when the war has ended.

That is simply a recommendation to extend the power of Government insurance which was provided by Congress last year. At that time I did not think, I am frank to say, it was necessary or desirable to do that; but the limitations placed around the insurance business, which can be conducted under the act as it now stands, might, I think, be temporarily relieved—that is, until the end of the war—and it would increase very materially the carrying capacity of some of our American ships.

The opposition to this legislation does not come entirely from organizations interested directly in seafaring life, but it comes from every available source. It is not located entirely on the seaboard; it is not located in any one section of the country; but the universal belief is, so far as I have been able to learn, that it is impracticable and dangerous. I am going to submit some evidence of that general statement.

Here is an editorial from the Chicago Tribune of January 12, 1915. It can not be charged that the Chicago Tribune has been unfriendly to this administration or that it has any particular prejudices that might possibly go with a newspaper published on the Atlantic or the Pacific coast. This is what it says of the pending bill:

WHAT IS BEHIND THE SHIP-PURCHASE BILL?

Secretary McAdoo's address in this city on the ship-purchase bill may have been intended to be direct and pointed, but as a matter of fact it was evasive and superficial. It failed to deal with the most fundamental objection to the measure; it did not attempt to justify what all intelligent critics regard as its inherent and incurable defect or vice.

That vice is this—that the bill rests on no definite, acknowledged theory. Its sponsors can not agree on any defense of it. The President gave us one theory in his message, and Secretary McAdoo hinted at another one in his speech, but neither adhered to his theory and both contradicted themselves.

If the bill is an emergency proposal called forth by the great war, then it should frankly be advocated as a makeshift and stop-gap, and, moreover, as Senator BURTON has said, the alleged emergency should be demonstrated by relevant facts and figures. This demonstration is not forthcoming; certain misleading figures have been cited, but the shipping and transportation experts have repudiated the interpretation put on the figures by the sponsors of the bill. No business authority has been or can be quoted in its favor.

If, on the other hand, the bill is not an emergency proposal, but a serious and constructive piece of legislation designed to give impetus to the development of a merchant marine, then the very worst time has been unhappily and absurdly chosen for the introduction and passage of such a measure. A time of stress and uncertainty, of unprecedented disturbances in trade and shipping, a time altogether anomalous from every financial and business viewpoint, is assuredly not the time to try to take a momentous step toward the establishment of a merchant marine. We have waited 50 years, says Mr. McAdoo, forgetting that he has advanced the emergency view of the bill. Well, if we have waited 50 years, we can wait another year or two; we can wait till peace has been reestablished and normal conditions have been restored. The sensible man does not during a baffling crisis sit down to deliberate on lines of policy to be pursued under ordinary and normal conditions.

What alternative course do you propose? ask the defenders of the bill. Alternative to what theory, in what sense—as an emergency measure or normal and permanent one?

The simple truth is, neither Secretary McAdoo nor Senator FLETCHER nor anybody else has considered or met the many objections to their bill that the minority of the Senate committee or the chambers of commerce have advanced in reports and circulars. They have dealt in mere generalities and charged "partisanship." Mr. McAdoo "deplored" the fact that "great men" will fight a good bill solely because it is "sponsored by an opposite party." Before deploring that alleged fact he should have answered the arguments—the facts, figures, and reasoning—of the minority and the business men just referred to. He did nothing of the kind. Those arguments remain unanswered, as we shall show, and the charge of partisanship is gratuitous and totally unwarranted. The stubborn insistence of the administration respecting this dubious departure is in direct proportion to the feebleness of the arguments advanced for it. As the debate proceeds and this fact develops, curiosity is aroused.

Why is this bill being pressed so vigorously? What is the pressure behind it?—

I hope the Senator is noting this article and will answer these questions—

Certainly not the pressure of overwhelming facts and cogent reasoning, for they would be brought forward.

It is not cynicism but common sense, therefore, that asks for more light.

What is behind the ship-purchase bill?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am prompted to ask the meaning of the particular sentence which the Senator from Massachusetts has read—"What is behind the ship-purchase bill?" To whom can that refer?

Mr. WEEKS. These questions were asked by an editorial writer in the Chicago Tribune.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I should like to ask whether the Senator from Massachusetts is himself able to answer just what that expression refers to?

Mr. WEEKS. I have heard rumors that there were very large commissions to be paid in case of the purchase of certain lines of ships.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Surely the Senator from Massachusetts does not for an instant believe that those who are pressing this bill have been prompted by such venal and selfish motives as the commission which might be paid on the purchase of the vessels?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not believe that the President of the United States has had anything to do with it or that Senators on this floor have had anything to do with it, but that does not exclude everyone who may be urging the passage of the pending bill.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I will myself say that I can not believe that those who are prompted by any such purpose would have or have had any influence whatsoever.

Mr. WEEKS. Well, I do not know that they have; but I hope the Senator from New Jersey will not take me from the floor by making a speech, and I know he does not want to do so.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. No; I do not want to do that. I have the greatest admiration and respect for the Senator and for his ability, but, without any thought of taking him from the floor, I want to say that I am in favor of a shipping bill providing for a Government-owned marine. There are many features of this bill that I hope to see corrected, but I shall be glad to see the day come when the Government will own shipping facilities without any thought of leasing the privilege to any private corporation.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I assume my right to the floor has not been affected. There is much in common between the Senator from New Jersey and myself. We are both extremely anxious to develop a merchant marine, but I want to do it under methods that have been approved by the experience of the world. I did not ask those questions myself, but I hope they will be authoritatively answered, and that we may have an answer to a question which I have asked several times and which I am going to ask several more times: What ships are under contemplation for purchase? Who owns the ships? Is there an option held on those ships by anyone for any purpose? Are we going to buy ships of belligerents or are we going to buy neutral ships? I hope those questions will be answered before this debate is concluded.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, it will be impossible for me to answer the questions propounded by the Senator. Although I am not a lawyer, I can understand how there might be very grave——

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I want to warn the Chair that I am not yielding the floor for a speech.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have no purpose of inflicting a speech on the Senator. I say that, while I am not a lawyer, I can understand how very grave and serious complications might ensue from the purchase of the ships of a belligerent; but there are many other sources from which we can purchase ships. As I said the other day in the Senate, Norway and Sweden present a most inviting opportunity, and then, thank God, we have shipyards and there are perhaps a million men who would like to engage in the construction of ships.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I presume the Senator in making the statement was asking my opinion of that proposition. I want to say that if we are going to buy ships of Norway and Sweden when they are earning more than they have probably earned at any one time for a long period, if not for all time, we we are going to pay very exorbitant prices for them.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I will say in answer to that particular suggestion——

Mr. WEEKS. I do not ask the Senator to answer it.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I merely want to answer that suggestion, if the Senator will permit me. A gentleman, a Norwegian, of large interests and very signal ability, stated to me that notwithstanding the fact that they were quite busy Norway had vessels entirely adequate for the service, which they would be very happy to sell us at reasonable prices.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I think the Senator's friend will be a philanthropist of an international character if, when his shipping is earning 25 or 30 or 40 per cent, he would sell it for the price that he would be willing to sell it for if it were laid up half the time for want of cargo.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. KENYON. It seems to me that the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts to the effect that options had been secured on boats which might be purchased by the Government, while not a charge, is sufficient to arouse a great deal of interest in a man's mind on this proposition.

I confess I should like to support a shipping bill to relieve the present emergency, but if there is any truth in the statement which has been bandied around the Senate, that ulterior forces are at work and that options are being secured on boats which are to be turned over to the Government at unwarranted prices, I do not want to vote for anything that is going to get us in that situation. Does not the Senator feel that there is some way of getting at the facts, either through a committee or in some other way, and does he not feel that the Senate ought really to know whether or not the statement is true?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the Senator is well aware that I did not make the statement and that I did not ask the question. I was reading from an editorial in the Chicago Tribune. The Senator is as familiar as I am with the methods of procedure to obtain facts of that character. If anybody has any such facts he might very properly be called before the committee, together with experts and others, and given an opportunity to explain to the committee whether or not there is anything in the allegation.

Mr. KENYON. I think the Senator indicated that he had heard such rumors in the city of New York and in other places.

Mr. WEEKS. I have heard them in the city of Washington.

Mr. KENYON. In the city of Washington.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I do not care to interrupt the Senator——

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Florida for a question.

Mr. FLETCHER. But while on that point, it might be well to ask, if the Senator thinks it would be worth while to inquire into the suggestion that there are influences behind those who favor the bill, what influences there are behind those who oppose the bill, and to inquire whether there is truth in the statement made to me by a person who seems to understand the situation precisely, to the effect that—

> The opposition to the shipping bill comes chiefly from two sources, namely, the steamship interests and the so-called Wall Street interests.
>
> The steamship interests are opposed to the bill because they do not want additional competition, either governmental or private.
>
> Wall Street interests are opposed to the bill for two reasons: First, because of the steamship interests which they own or control; second, because they fear that the success of this Government enterprise—and a great success it is bound to be—may result in Government ownership of telegraph, telephone, railroad, and other public-service corporations.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I do not know from what the Senator was reading. I wish he would state from what he was reading.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have read from a letter written to me by a gentleman in New York, and I will have occasion to refer in some detail later on to the contents of that letter. The gentleman is of high standing and character; he evidently possesses excellent ability and is thoroughly informed on this subject.

Mr. WEEKS. It sounds like Mr. Samuel Untermyer.

Mr. FLETCHER. His name is Mr. Phillip Manson, and his address is 290 Broadway, New York.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I do not know of my own knowledge anything about pressure for this bill, but I know that pressure against the bill is all pervading; it comes from every conceivable source. It is one of the stocks in trade of the Democratic Party whenever they have a bad cause to say that Wall Street is opposing it. There are some members of the Democratic Party who have had some pretty intimate associations in Wall Street in recent years, and it might properly be asked, if that question were going to be pressed, whether those particular members were influenced by their Wall Street connections or otherwise?

Mr. President, another evidence against this bill comes from the Boston Marine Society, an organization of very high standing and one which has been in existence for many years. A statement made by it in New England would carry weight, and I think it should do so here. I have received the following letter from that society:

> BOSTON MARINE SOCIETY,
> SECRETARY'S DEPARTMENT,
> Boston, Mass., January 13, 1915.
>
> Hon. JOHN W. WEEKS,
> Washington, D. C.
>
> DEAR SIR: At a meeting of the board of trustees of the Boston Marine Society, of Boston, Mass., held on the 12th instant, a quorum being present, it was unanimously voted:
>
> "That this board protests against the passage of bill H. R. 18666, now before Congress, and that the secretary is hereby instructed to so notify our State Senators and Representatives in Congress."
>
> A true copy—attest:
>
> ABERDEEN H. CHILD, Secretary.

The Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin is one of the leading papers which has had to do with mercantile-marine matters for many years—perhaps for a hundred years, for it is a very old paper. Its information is carefully scrutinized by those who are interested in nautical matters, and it is an authority in a general way on such subjects. I quote an editorial from that journal headed "Stupid shipping legislation," as follows:

> [From the Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin.]
>
> STUPID SHIPPING LEGISLATION.
>
> War has caused a sharp awakening to the deplorable situation of our mercantile marine. According to a statement carefully prepared by this paper, not less than 5,800,000 gross tons of ocean-going ships have been withdrawn from service since the war began. About 3,500,000 tons represent German and Austrian shipping, and 1,700,000 tons British vessels chartered by that Government. In addition, over 600,000 tons are known to have been destroyed or captured. This sudden withdrawal of such a vast amount of tonnage approximating 13 per cent of the world's total, has created a temporary ocean freight famine. This is one of the exigencies of war that can not be avoided, and would have occurred even had we already possessed a respectable merchant marine. The difficulty, though temporary, is a real one, and warrants any rational and effective means of relief that can be devised.
>
> One of the most puerile proposals that has yet been offered is that of Government ownership. A bill has been introduced at Washington which the administration is expected to support, authorizing the creation of a $10,000,000 shipping corporation, of which the Government shall own a controlling interest. The Government is also authorized to issue bonds to the extent of $30,000,000, making a total available capital of about $40,000,000.
>
> How much relief would a plan of this sort afford? There is good reason for estimating the cost of building a 10,000-ton ship in the United States at about $425,000, compared with $325,000 in an English shipyard. At present the cost of building in a British yard ranges from $45 to $75 per ton. If we take $50 per ton as the cost of a good freighter, this would allow investment in about 800,000 tons, or about 23 per cent of the amount already withdrawn. But where are these 800,000 tons of ocean vessels to be procured? It would be sheer folly to attempt to build such a fleet, even in part, because the war would probably be over before such ships could be put into commission, and they would enter the market at a time when transportation would be depressed by exhaustion from the war and when the supply of tonnage would already be excessive. In other words, if the Government built such ships it could not provide the relief immediately needed, but would only aggravate a bad situation later on, not to speak of incurring a heavy loss to the Government. The only means of relief possible would be for the Government to purchase foreign vessels now lying idle in various portions of the world. This involves grave risks; risks that private capital is not willing to undertake, and that if assumed by the Government might easily involve us in serious international disputes. Besides, the German ships are probably not for sale. The whole proposal of Government ownership in ships is so visionary, inadequate, and dangerous as to be utterly unworthy of an intelligent administration. The situation does not warrant such paternalistic and socialistic methods. As a precedent, it is highly dangerous, and as a cure for a bad situation it can only be classed as stupid.
>
> There is still a lamentable amount of ignorance about American shipping. The urgent necessity for its revival is beyond question; and when Congress repeals the laws which deny American shipowners a fair chance and prevent them from entering the business under the same terms and conditions as their rivals, then we may expect a genuine and permanent restoration of our prestige on the seas, and not before.

Nobody can charge that the New York Times, a great newspaper, has been unfriendly to the present administration or anything which has been indorsed as a part of the policies of the President. On the contrary, that paper has been a staunch supporter of the administration, I think, in most of its activities during the past two years. This is an editorial under date of January 6, 1915:

> The administration's ship-purchase bill has been put upon the Senate's calendar of unfinished business. That is the best place for it, next to the discard. As unfinished business it will give Senators opportunities to talk, to wave the flag, and promise the Treasury to the next on the national bread line, to worry the President, and particularly to obstruct the other legislation which the country is to get without asking for it. It will serve these purposes better than even the "pork bills," and it will thus accomplish the only good it ever will do. The reason is too simple to mention were it not that so many overlook it for reasons more elaborate but not more convincing. Whatever else is promised for the bill it is not promised that it will add a single vessel to the world's cargo boats. The utmost within the possibilities of the case is that the intervention of Government will divert existing tonnage from the uses to which it is put upon commercial considerations. Any such diversion must be detrimental, since commerce manages itself better than it can be managed by those unfamiliar with it and managing it for other than business reasons not commercial. A proposal so uneconomic must be justified on other than commercial grounds, if at all. But uneconomic considerations are suspect and should be examined with care.
>
> Senators support the bill on the theory that we lack trade because we lack shipping, and that the provision of shipping will supply the trade. As a matter of fact, trade follows profit, not the flag, and shipping follows trade. The supply of shipping will not supply profits, except by Treasury disbursements. Trade at the expense of the taxpayers is not the kind they want. The fate of the bill might well be allowed to rest upon a comparison of the lists of those who oppose the bill or who would be more hurt than helped by it with those who are asking for it. There are some who would be glad to unload shipping made idle by the war and others who would be glad to get from the Government even more than they now are getting by trade. All these classes together are not numerous or influential.
>
> On the other hand, the list of those opposing the bill is impressive. Senator BURTON is a host in himself. Supporting him are Republicans like ROOT and LODGE, who give him the best of Democratic reasons for opposing the bill upon principle. There are Governments which give subsidies, but none which run shipping lines. There are Governments that run various monopolies, because they are such by nature, and therefore are suitable for Government operation in the common interest. There are other Governments which take over some forms of private enterprise in order to substitute profits for taxes. In such cases the service is generally bad and dear, and in no case is this done for shipping. The reason lies on the surface. The carriage of goods on the sea is open to all with moderate capital, and Government can not compete on terms of equality with private operation. If the Government is to make a place for its shipping venture it must take a monopoly by law or it must underbid. If the terms are fair, the Government's line can not succeed, as appears from the fact that even private operation has failed in this line of effort. It has failed because the Government has enacted uneconomic conditions of operation, and now proposes to operate itself because it has made private profits impossible. Such reasoning is irritating. If there is a debit on the balance sheet of American shipping, the remedy is not to create a balance with Treasury funds, but to reduce costs sufficiently to allow a profit. That would not be acceptable to those supporting this bill. They would create other costs and would balance the business by larger takings from the Treasury. If there were any prospect that the venture would be confined to placing a $30,000,000 mortgage upon another Government enterprise itself unprofitable commercially—that is, by issuing Panama Canal bonds for supplying shipping—little harm might be done. But there would be other greedy applicants for easy money. And the threat of Government competition would extend far beyond the immediate direct effects. It would blight private enterprise in the same manner that unfair Government competition has robbed the express companies and the mails for the benefit of the parcel post. The manner in which the Government has earned profits in the domestic carrying trade is worthy only of the requisition of a pirate. And it is proposed now for the open seas by the party traditionally devoted to the principle that that government is best which governs least.

Next, Mr. President, I submit to the Senate a letter from the National Metal Trades Association written by its secretary:

NATIONAL METAL TRADES ASSOCIATION,
Boston, January 11, 1915.

Hon. JOHN W. WEEKS,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: You probably will be interested to know that the Boston branch of the National Metal Trades Association is unqualifiedly opposed to H. R. 18666, the so-called Alexander bill, and I sincerely trust that you may see your way clear to use all legitimate means to oppose the passage of this bill.

If there is any way that you can suggest that the members of this branch can be of assistance in preventing this legislation, I shall take great pleasure in presenting to them any suggestion that you might offer.

I have written Senator LODGE a letter along similar lines, a copy of which you will please find inclosed.

Yours, very truly, W. W. POOLE, Secretary.

This is an editorial on Government-owned ships from the periodical called American Industries—the manufacturers' magazine:

Judged by the standards of sound business the proposed Government-owned line of merchant ships is foredoomed to failure. There is no pressing demand for ships to carry American cargoes to justify the entry of the United States Government into the marine carrying trade, as President Wilson urges in his recent message to Congress. A sincere policy of economy in national affairs would dictate caution in investing the money of the people in an enterprise which is so very uncertain in its results that private capital, proverbial in its wise timidity, hesitates to enter it under present laws. And if the bill now pending in the Senate is passed and a line of Government-owned ships established, it is certain, in the light of past experience, that they will only add unnecessarily to the increasing cost of government with no adequate compensation to the taxpayers for the expenditure.

After reviewing the trade conditions occasioned by the war, President Wilson, in urging the passage of the shipping bill, premises his demands upon the assumption that there is a dearth of bottoms available for the transportation of American products to foreign lands, and that this dearth must immediately be removed if the United States is not to be outstripped in the race for foreign trade. He said:

"How are we to carry our goods to the empty markets of which I have spoken if we have not the ships? How are we to build up a great trade if we have not the certain and constant means of transportation upon which all profitable and useful commerce depends? And how are we to get the ships if we wait for the trade to develop them? To correct the many mistakes by which we have discouraged and all but destroyed the merchant marine of the country; to retrace the steps by which we have, it seems almost deliberately, withdrawn our flag from the seas, except where here and there a ship of war is bidden to carry it or some wandering yacht displays it, would take a long time and involve many detailed items of legislation, and the trade which we ought immediately to handle would disappear or find other channels while we debate the items."

The President has evidently been misinformed as to the bottoms available for the transport of American goods. In war times freights are always unusually high, and despite the 5,000,000 tons of belligerent shipping now idle, the high rates of which shippers complain have attracted many small craft to American waters which are anxious but unable to obtain charters.

The Boston Maritime Association reports that there are tied up in Boston four steel steamships for which cargoes can not be found, and the association has a list of 200,000 tons of shipping available at rates high enough to warrant a round trip. It is reported that a French line is sending 18 small boats to American harbors for grain cargoes, because these boats can not operate on their usual routes abroad. A great number of Scandinavian tramps have been attracted to our neutral ports, and shippers experience little difficulty in obtaining ships at prevailing rates.

Obviously the Government could not profitably cut the prevailing freight rates. It would be forced to compete with private shipowners on an equal footing or literally throw into the sea the money of the taxpayers. If President Wilson desires to establish a permanent American merchant marine to compete with the ships of other nations, let him urge the repeal of those laws which in his message he admits have driven our flag from the seas.

It should be written as the first axiom of economics that no business will thrive unless it be profitable. It matters not whether that business be conducted by the Government or by private individuals, unless it be profitable it will die. If the pernicious labor laws with regard to American ships are repealed and that business freed from Government restrictions, aided instead of oppressed, the American flag will again be restored to the seas. Other expedients are useless.

Other reasons are not wanting to argue against the President's proposition, and among them, as we have said before, is that out-and-out socialism has no place in our national life.

I am going to try to demonstrate before I finish, Mr. President, that in every instance the general statements made in that article from American Industries of this month can be substantiated by showing the results of Government operation in competition with privately conducted corporations in substantially every country in the world.

It has been suggested by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] that there may be some question about the motives or the reason for opposing this legislation. That, I assume, means that somebody is interested in shipping and does not want additional competition, or that somebody is financially interested in transportation lines and is afraid of Government ownership. I do not know anyone who has investigated the question of Government ownership, and who has any regard for the financial integrity of the results obtained, who is not afraid of it. I am; and I am frank to confess that the more I investigate it the more fearful I am of any attempt on the part of the Government to conduct any business. The Government was organized not for conducting business operations but for those particular purposes which are inherent in government organization. The minute you stray from that, I do not care in what direction, you are going to increase operating expenses, you are going to decrease the returns which come on account of pressure, and you are going to make the net returns negligible if not absolutely a minus quantity. That is the result of all, or substantially all, Government operations which I have examined, and I am going to consider them in great detail before I complete my remarks.

To indicate that there is no section which is not antagonistic to the pending measure, I want to read into the RECORD the resolutions adopted by the New Orleans Association of Commerce:

Resolution adopted by the merchant-marine committee of the New Orleans Association of Commerce and approved by the board of directors of the New Orleans Association of Commerce at a meeting held on January 6, 1915.

That it be the sense of this committee that they recommend to the board of directors of the New Orleans Association of Commerce that they go on record as being opposed to the Government ownership or participation in the ownership of steamship lines to engage in the foreign trade of the United States, for the reason that we do not consider such action necessary, but, on the contrary, unnecessary; and, on the other hand, such ownership and operation of vessels by the Government will create unfair competition with its own citizens.

This committee therefore requests the Association of Commerce, through its board of directors, to oppose the Alexander bill, known as H. R. 18666, amended by Senate bill 6856, which action, the committee is informed, has been taken by a special committee of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, who have considered this proposed legislation and the restoration of the American merchant marine.

It is the further sense of this committee that the New Orleans Association of Commerce inform the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the chairman of the Senate Committee on Commerce, the chairman of the Merchant Marine Committee of the House of Representatives, the Senators and Representatives from Louisiana in Congress, and the United States Chamber of Commerce of the action taken in this matter.

THOMAS J. FREEMAN,
President New Orleans Association of Commerce.

Attest:

WALTER PARKER, General Manager.

Here is a canvass that was recently taken of American exporters. It would be presumed that if any class of citizens were in favor of increasing the capacity of our merchant marine under the conditions which prevail, it would be the exporters of the country, those who are directly involved in the business which must be completed through the facilities offered by a merchant marine; so a canvass has been made of these exporters by the organ—I presume, of an association—called the American Exporter:

As a result of a canvass just completed by the American Exporter of 2,447 leading exporters of the country, 559 replies were received, of which 85 expressed approval of the Government ship-purchase bill—

I think, very likely, many of those approved it because they had no hope of obtaining anything else—

20 were in favor under certain conditions, 229 were opposed, while the balance who answered excused themselves from expressing an opinion because of unfamiliarity with the bill, a desire not to go on record, or because their export shipping is handled for them by others.

That clause, "a desire not to go on record," attracts my eye. We have been passing the kind of legislation here, and particularly the legislation that passed the Senate last summer under the title of the Trade Commission bill, which has put the business man of this country in such a position that he does not want to face the possible antagonism of a Government bureau by expressing disapproval of the administration which may be in power. We have exactly the same condition under our banking laws to-day, and exactly the same result. Except under pressure, you can not get a national banker or a member of the Federal reserve association to express any public opinion regarding the Federal reserve law or anything pertaining to Government operations. It should be kept in mind at all times that a large percentage of the business men of this country under present conditions, with the possibility of having a Government bureau placing in their path restrictions and obstacles which will imperil or at least injure their business operations, will not express opinions that are unfriendly to the administration. I propose at some time, when I have the time, to put into the RECORD some of the activities of the comptroller's office in connection with certain banking interests during the last year's time, and in my judgment it will astonish the American people to see the extent to which bureaucracy is trespassing on the reasonable and proper rights of business organizations. Why, the Comptroller of the Currency has even gone so far as to recommend in his annual message this year that an infringement upon the regulations of that bureau by any citizen engaged in the banking business shall subject the offender to a fine, to be imposed by the comptroller himself—and this under a mere regulation, not a law at all.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me inquire of the Senator if, in his opinion, the administrative policies to which he refers—of the comptroller's office and of the Federal Reserve Board—are not very similar to the administrative policies of the Czar of Russia, and just as tyrannical and unreasonable and undemocratic in their methods?

Mr. WEEKS. I think they are more so, Mr. President. I regard the Czar of Russia as a mollycoddle compared with them. [Laughter.]

I ask permission, Mr. President, to insert in the RECORD the rest of the article from which I was quoting, as part of my remarks, without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The canvass was made by mail beginning December 17 and ending January 4, thus being completed before the debate on the measure began in the Senate. Those asked to express their views were 1,196 manufacturers known to be engaged in or seeking export trade, and 1,257 export commission houses, manufacturers' export agents, New York buying offices for foreign firms and corporations, and foreign freight forwarders, and included all members of the American Manufacturers' Export Association, the American Exporters and Importers' Association, and a large portion of the Merchants' Association. It included firms in practically every State of the Union, and among manufacturers makers of everything from toothpicks to locomotives.

None of those invited to express their views were shipowners. The terms "shipping" and "exporting" are often confused in discussing over-sea trade, hence emphasis is laid on the fact that the views gathered are those of the men who pay the freight and depend on the shipping facilities offered and not those of the owners or agents of ships. Those who were asked to give their views were the very people who would supposedly benefit from the operation of the bill, and their indifference and actual opposition by a vote of more than two to one is considered significant.

Five questions were asked in an endeavor to learn whether exporters consider shipping facilities to Latin America have been inadequate or not, as in the opinion of the administration they have been, and whether exporters in general approved of the bill.

As the vote shows, the experience of shippers is that the 13 lines to South America and the numerous lines to Central America have provided and do provide ample facilities. Nevertheless, many who testify to that fact state that they are in favor of the bill. In addition to those who favored the bill, there were those who gave qualified approval to Government ownership.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the paper of largest circulation in New England is the Boston Post, which has been a Democratic paper for 50 years—I think since it was established. It has one of the largest circulations in the United States. I do not recall any instance when it has even moderately criticized a great policy of a Democratic administration; and yet this is an editorial from the Boston Post under date of January 9:

THE SHIP BILL.

As evidences multiply that the administration leaders in Congress are determined to push for the passage of the ship-purchase bill, so do the outspoken protests of many Democratic newspapers against the measure. The Post has felt compelled to range itself with those who oppose the bill, and it has as yet seen no arguments sufficient to change its opinion that the plan is inadvisable and would not do what it is intended to do.

In the first place, the Government would have to spend a good many million dollars in the purchase of ships in order to have the movement amount to anything. Does anybody need any argument to convince him that the national finances are in no condition to launch forth into any expense that is not absolutely necessary?

I am going to take the time a little later, Mr. President, to indicate the condition of the national finances. I am not an alarmist, but the deficiency tax, known as the war tax, which is intended to provide $100,000,000, is not going to be sufficient to provide this Government with revenues to carry out the purposes and the appropriations which have already been undertaken. We will have another deficiency tax of some kind within one year, or else the condition of the Treasury will be such that it will cause universal alarm.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the Senator know whether any material portion of the $35,000,000 appropriated for the Alaskan railway has been withdrawn from the Treasury yet, so as to be added to the expenditures?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I understand that practically nothing has been done yet, so that that appropriation does not affect the Treasury balances as they now stand.

Mr. SHERMAN. May I inquire, further, whether that $35,000,000 is not a continuing liability, to be drawn against any existing receipts?

Mr. WEEKS. It is a continuing liability, Mr. President, as far as the $35,000,000 is concerned, and then it will be a continuing liability after it is spent. I never heard of a business man who knows the loose way in which that appropriation was made and in which it is to be expended who would give fifty cents on the dollar for the investment that is going to be made in the Alaskan railway. If the railroad is ever started, if it is ever in operation, it is going to lose money from the day it commences to operate, and that will make it a continuing liability on the Treasury.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield for a question?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask the Senator in that connection—that is, in connection with the expenditure of the $35,000,000, which is a continuing liability and the probability of a renewal of the war tax of $100,000,000—whether or not he has taken into consideration the fact that in 1916 there will go into operation the provision of the tariff bill which we passed a year ago which entirely repeals the sugar tax and which will result in a net loss to the Treasury of upward of $50,000,000?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, at our present rate of expenditure, without some other source of revenue, there will be no balance in the Treasury by 1916, if we take into account the loss on account of the sugar tax to which the Senator has just referred.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does not the Senator think that in view of that fact, instead of there being a mere renewal of the war tax, there will be more likely a tax to raise $200,000,000?

Mr. WEEKS. There is not any question but that it will have to be increased.

To continue the reading of this editorial from the Boston Post:

Our customs receipts from imports have dropped almost to nothing. We are taxing various articles and documents to make up for this loss. Are we ready to place on the taxpayers the burden of establishing a huge fleet of commercial steamships in the foreign trade, which, it is admitted by the President, would probably not earn its expenses soon, if at all?

Further than this, however, and more significant, we think, is the truth that a Government-owned merchant marine would be the most discouraging thing to American carrying industry that could possibly be devised. Private interest could not stand Federal competition, and would not try to. The business would be killed in short order and nobody would be the gainer.

Lastly, it has not been shown that there is any shortage of ships when there are cargoes to fill them. When trade increases we shall need more; but the immutable law of meeting demand with supply will provide the carriers. It is not Uncle Sam's business and he ought to keep out of it.

That, as I said, is from the Democratic Boston Post; but Democratic papers in New England are not the only Democratic papers that are saying things of a similar character about this bill. Here is the Lexington (Ky.) Herald, edited by a cousin of the present Assistant Secretary of War, a member of the well-known Breckinridge family. The title of the editorial is:

THE MISGUIDED, BLIND, AND IGNORANT REQUEST LEADERSHIP, LIGHT, AND INFORMATION.

In the striking speech delivered by President Wilson at Indianapolis on Jackson Day, which is well worth perusal by those who wish to become acquainted with the thoughts of the President and to understand his purposes, he states: "Many of those who are fighting the ship-purchase bill now before Congress are misguided; others are blind, but most of them are ignorant."

There is an old story that a man away from home received a telegram saying, "Your mother-in-law is dead. Shall we embalm, cremate, or bury?" Promptly answered the living son-in-law, "Take no chances. Do all three."

We feel somewhat as did that son-in-law. We know the President, as always, is accurate in his statement that those who oppose the ship-purchase bill are misguided, blind, or ignorant, and our opposition to that bill is so strong that we plead guilty to being all three—misguided in our belief that it is in violation of every Democratic principle and tenet, blind in our inability to see how it will benefit American commerce, ignorant of the purposes of those who advocate such a bill instead of frankly advocating subsidies, from which greater benefits would come.

We have been utterly misguided in our study of history if such a bill is in accord with any principle enunciated by a Democratic platform or approved heretofore by a Democratic President or a Democratic Congress.

We know of nothing in any handbook of Democratic principles that justifies the Government entering into competition with private capital. We are unable to understand or to appreciate that conception of Democratic policy that thinks it proper to blaze the way for the Government to enter into business in competition with private enterprise, and that, too, in a business that requires expert knowledge and long training.

We are blind, utterly blind, to the advantages that will come from this bill. No reasonable man can advocate the use of Government-owned ships in European trade. No man who appreciates the temper of the American people can contemplate the possibility of the seizure of a Government-owned ship by the warships of a foreign nation without realizing the imminent danger of involving us in war with the country making the seizure.

The President saw fit to protest to England, which is in fact a protest to all of the allies, against the seizure, examination, and detention of ships carrying goods to neutral countries. In the papers of Sunday, the day after the publication of the President's speech, there were accounts that the allies would probably seize a ship that after the declaration of war had been purchased and transferred to American register, upon the ground that the purchase was not bona fide.

Is the United States Government to purchase ships that are now interned and pay to the citizens of the warring countries millions of dollars without protest from the other countries involved in this war? Are we to use such ships in the European trade with the practical certainty that we will become involved through the seizure, search, and detention of those ships? We do not believe that one even so blind as we admit ourselves to be can face with equanimity such a prospect.

There has been no revelation of a method by which we can promptly use such Government-owned ships for the purpose of developing the South American trade, about which we hear so much, and which will eventually be of so great value, but which must be developed along the lines that have been laid through the centuries by the prejudices and the customs of the residents of South America.

There is no intimation of the plan of the Government to secure warehouses and docking privileges in the South American Republics. The bagatelle of $30,000,000 proposed in the bill, which is but a fraction of the ultimate amount that would be required, for the ostensible purpose of creating a navy of merchant ships, would not in any appreciable way relieve conditions as they now exist.

Admitting, as we frankly do, and always shall, that the President is accurate and just in branding those who disagree with him as misguided and blind, we admit also that we are ignorant and plead with all earnestness that we be enlightened. From whom are the ships to be purchased? What plans have been made for the purchase of ships? To the citizens of what country is the money for the purchase to be paid? What is the plan for the handling of the ships? How are we to secure warehouse and docking privileges? Why does the bill provide that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be the virtual dictator of the purchase, management, and operation of these Government-owned ships? Why is it that the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Commerce, under one or the other of which surely such a traffic should be operated, are overlooked and the Secretary of the Treasury is chosen as the one to operate a commercial enterprise?

There are many other questions about which we are ignorant, but we at present are intensely anxious to be enlightened as to these. And with all the deference possible we suggest most humbly that the President would be more apt to win the approval of the country by giving reasons than by uttering denunciation of those who disapprove this bill and question the plan that has been proposed.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. WEEKS. I will yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I shall not delay the Senator's discussion. I have no desire to deprive the Senator of any rights. I think he quoted from the Boston Globe a moment since, and he referred to the Journal of Commerce.

Mr. WEEKS. I did not quote from the Boston Globe. I quoted from the Boston Post.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Well, it was a Boston paper, anyhow. I have here the Journal of Commerce of to-day, and it says:

TAKE VESSELS FROM PACIFIC FOR COTTON—SHIPPERS CHARTER WESTERN STEAMERS FOR THIS TRADE—AVAILABLE SUPPLY ON ATLANTIC COAST HAS BEEN EXHAUSTED—REGULAR LINES CAN NOT SPARE MORE BOATS—"MATANZAS" AND "NECHES" RECHARTERED—UNDERWRITERS KEPT BUSY.

The whole line of the Senator's argument was that there was much available material or bottoms in which to ship from here. The Journal of Commerce for to-day says:

Finding the Atlantic coast depleted of available and suitable tonnage, attention has been turned to the chartering of steamers on the Pacific coast. It is understood that Pacific coast steamers will receive slightly higher compensation than the Atlantic steamers, in view of the fact that many of these steamers will have to sail some 3,000 miles without cargo before reaching the loading port on the Atlantic.

SEVERAL PACIFIC STEAMERS ALREADY.

Having exhausted the supply of available vessels on the Atlantic coast for the transportation of cotton to Germany, shippers are turning their attention to American steamers on the Pacific coast, and according to information secured yesterday several Pacific coast vessels have already been chartered to come to Galveston to take cargoes of cotton to Germany.

There is other matter here that I will not read. Then it says——

Mr. WEEKS. I am assuming that this does not take me from the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly not.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have no thought of doing that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. If so, I would cease instanter. This article says:

Prospective shippers of cotton to Germany are negotiating for the use of any American steamer that will meet with the approval of the insurance underwriters, who have been kept busy during the past five weeks in passing on applications for permission to use vessels hitherto employed in the coastwise trade for trans-Atlantic voyages.

It is estimated that fully 25 Atlantic coast steamers have already been chartered by German cotton shippers, and when the fact is taken into consideration that nearly all of these vessels are in normal times employed in regular services, it can readily be seen that the coastwise American lines are unable to spare any more of their vessels, in spite of the attractive chartering rates that are being offered.

This and other matter in the Journal of Commerce, the great trade journal of the great metropolis of this country, proves conclusively that the statements of the Senator from Massachusetts, unfortunately, are incorrect and that there is not an available supply, and hence they are seeking the Pacific coast.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I hope that will all be included in the RECORD. That is a question which I am glad to discuss. The Senator from Massachusetts has not made the statement that there is not a dearth of tonnage at some points for some purposes. That would be the height of folly, because everyone knows that there is. What the Senator from Massachusetts has said, if it can be construed along that line in any sense, is that there is no dearth of shipping at some points; and I made the statement earlier in the day, which is referred to in the Journal of Commerce, that there were said to be 20 ships belonging to the Pacific Co. on the Pacific coast, for which there was no business, and that those ships could be or would be brought around to this coast for that purpose. But I demonstrated conclusively that the great demand in the northern ports to-day is for cargo carriers to transport our grain to European markets; that we have shipped since the harvesting of the grain crop last fall, up to and including the 15th of this month, 54,000,000 bushels more wheat than we did in the corresponding period last year; that we have but 75,000,000 bushels more to export; that that is the limit of our possibilities; and that that 75,000,000, with the shipping that is now available for the purpose, will be entirely transported by the middle of March. So, even if this bill were passed to-day and it were possible to buy ships and have them transferred to the Government service without any delay whatever, we could not get any ship in operation before the urgency for the grain-carrying purposes would have terminated. That is not entirely true as applied to cotton, but it is absolutely true and final as applied to grain.

I will say this for the benefit of my friend from New Jersey, that if he will have patience for three or four months after the urgency has expired for carrying grain and cotton to European markets he will find a large oversupply of ocean-carrying shipping. Any number of ships, in my judgment, will be ready for that kind of business just as those ships on the Pacific coast are ready now because there is no business there for them to carry on. Why is there not business there just as on this coast? Because we are transporting the grain and cotton which we have produced, and substantially that covers the unusual demand. There is a greater demand for both those products than heretofore, but there is a limit to those products, and when they have been transported there will be no further demand until next November or next December, when the next crop is harvested.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask the Senator if he thinks that the going out of commission of the German and Austrian ships withdraws nothing from the tonnage of the world?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; I think that they withdraw something from the tonnage of the world, but I think the ocean-carrying trade is reduced to a greater amount than the withdrawal of tonnage which has come as a result of the war to those two nations.

Mr. FLETCHER. But the withdrawal of the tonnage of belligerent nations, the requisitioning and taking out of commerce, utilizing as transports, and so forth, of English vessels heretofore engaged as merchant vessels, does undoubtedly cut quite a figure in the way of reducing the tonnage. Then the experience in all the past, I believe the Senator will admit, is that after a war like the one pending, or any war in fact between two great countries, ceases commerce has been augmented, that trade has increased following the cessation of hostilities. So we need not look for any falling off of trade, even after the war is over.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I do not think it is very profitable to attempt to prophesy, but if my judgment is worth anything, when this war is over there is going to be a great falling off in the trade of the world. My judgment is that the buying power of the world is going to be crippled and that we are going to feel the results of the war for the next 25 years. The buying power, especially of European countries, is going to be crippled to such a degree that we will be the dumping ground of everything that they can produce or which they have to sell. I do not expect to see any great business resulting from this war, but I expect to see depression and the crippling of industries. But, as I said, prophesying on such matters may not be borne out by the future.

Now, Mr. President, a few more quotations from newspapers entirely friendly to the administration, located in the sections of the country where there can be no possibility that there is any prejudice against the administration or against any of its undertakings. This is from the Charleston News and Courier, Charleston, S. C.:

President Wilson's Indianapolis address was especially disappointing in what it did not say with reference to the pending ship-purchase bill. He was exceedingly scornful of those who have declared themselves in opposition to the measure. But the only thing which he himself said in its favor was to point to the soaring ocean freight rates, with the declaration that "The merchants and the farmers of this country must have ships to carry their goods, and just at the present moment there is no other way of getting them than through the instrumentality that is suggested in that shipping bill."

Then, the Charleston News and Courier goes on to comment:

We are satisfied the country is predisposed to support the President in this business as in most others. But as matters now stand the confidence of those who do so is subjected to a very severe strain.

This is from the Ohio State Journal:

We note very little support for President Wilson's ship-purchasing scheme in the newspapers, and they no doubt represent the business opinion upon the subject. There are two objections to the proposition: (1) It launches the Government into a private business, with all the unpleasant and perilous vicissitudes attending such a venture; and (2) there is plenty of shipping capacity already at command for all needs of our export trade.

I commend that to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

This is from the Richmond News-Leader, Richmond, Va.:

As the News-Leader has shown in previous discussion of the subject, the proposition that the Government go into the ship owning and operating business involves the rankest sort of ship subsidy in disguise. The disguise is a specious and confusing provision that the business shall be conducted by a corporation controlled by the Government, thus by indirection levying a ship-subsidy tax on the people in lieu of a direct one in the shape of a flat, open ship-subsidy congressional appropriation.

The roundabout and the straight way are equally obnoxious to a time-honored and oft-iterated Democratic principle. They amount to the same thing in the end, with the balance in favor of the latter, if a Democratic Congress is to repudiate or abjure that principle. Democratic support of the proposition is no less support of ship subsidy because it is given under cover and the result sought to be attained is veneered with the plea of emergency.

I submit that to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE]. I hope when he gets the floor in his own time he will comment on Democratic principles and how they are being violated in this legislation.

This is from the Seattle Post-Intelligencer:

Some most singular and illogical arguments are advanced by the supporters of the administration's grotesque plan for the appropriation of some thirty or forty millions of public money for the purchase of merchant ships to compete with privately owned ships in the carrying trade of the country.

These advocates of the public ownership of ships, to be operated without regard to the necessity of earning expenses, as a means for reviving American shipping, are now busily engaged in pointing out the alleged shortage of tonnage for the carrying trade and the alleged high rates which are being charged for the carrying as arguments for the Government to enter the shipping business.

It does not seem to have occurred to those who bring forward these arguments that the passage of the proposed bill will not add one single ship to those now afloat and available for the carrying trade.

The Boston Globe is a good old-time Democratic paper. It has been Democratic in its politics, I think, for a hundred years. It very seldom strays from the straight and narrow path, but here is what it says about the shipping bill. I think it is now sticking to Democratic principles a good deal closer than the supporters of the measure.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I will say that the Boston Globe——

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The Boston Globe can not rival the Senator from New Jersey in sticking to that which will inure and accrue to the benefit of the people of America. I do not care whether you call it Democratic, Republican, or Progressive, I will stand for that which I think will lighten the burdens and bring benefits on humanity.

Mr. WEEKS. I think the Senator intends to do that, but I suspect that once in a while he is mistaken.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Oh, I may be mistaken at times.

Mr. WEEKS. This is the title of the editorial to which I have just referred in the Boston Daily Globe of Wednesday, January 6:

NOT THE TIME NOW FOR GOVERNMENT-OWNED MERCHANT MARINE.

The "Government"—

Government is in quotations—

has its teeth so firmly set in the idea that it should own and operate merchant ships that it will not let go.

One of the first effects of the war in this country was to bring home to the American people as years of agitation on the platform and in the press have not brought home the vitalness of our merchant-marine problem.

The public knew in a general way that our foreign shipping had been falling behind year after year until only a very small fraction of the American foreign trade was carried in American bottoms. Just what this meant in practice it did not understand, and as there appeared to be plenty of foreign ships for our imports and exports it did not much care.

Still less did the public understand the reason for the decline of our shipping, though the prevalent idea was that our strict navigation laws and the high cost of shipbuilding in this country were to blame.

With the outbreak of the war, however, the problem became acute. The shipping of England's foes was driven from the seas, and a large part of British shipping was summoned to the service of the Government. Needed imports did not come to port; goods for export piled up on docks and in warehouses.

Then arose a loud cry for relief, especially in the form of admitting foreign ships to American registry. That, it was confidently believed, would save the day, since foreign owners must be only too glad to put their endangered or useless vessels under the safe American flag.

A long step toward free ships had been made in the Panama Canal act of 1912, and last August this act was enlarged to admit to registry for the foreign trade foreign-built ships without distinction of age. They were, moreover, exempted from compliance with American measurement and inspection laws and from the requirement that the officers should be Americans.

But as the first act had had no results, so the new one had very little. No real increase was made in our foreign shipping, and nearly all the ships that were brought under the American flag had been previously owned by American corporations. The proposed wholesale purchase of German liners found vigorous opposition from Germany's foes.

Yet still the need of more ships and better service continued, and a new expedient was proposed—that the Government should control and operate steamship companies, leaving a minority interest for private investment. Since the Government could not induce its citizens to become shipowners, it would become a shipowner itself for the public good.

It can not be denied that some good results could be secured in this way. There undoubtedly would be new American ships, possibly new trade routes and better service for exporters. There would be the needed auxiliary fleet in time of war.

The real question, however, problems of constitutionality aside, is whether the gain would be worth the cost and whether that method of attaining the desired end is the best. American capital, estimated at from $100,000,000 to $200,000,000, is invested in the ocean trade under foreign flags, where a reasonable profit can be counted on. It has not been invested in American ocean trade evidently because it is not profitable.

The reasons are the higher wage level, certain restrictions imposed by our laws, and the fact that American shipping must compete against the subsidies and aids granted by foreign Governments to their liners.

Where private business can not make a profit, the Government certainly could not do so. When the Government enters business it is to render services which the public requires and can not otherwise get, and to render them whatever the cost. Nobody expects Government operations to be economical; if they result in a deficit, as with the post office, the public accepts it because the public benefits by the service.

It is highly probable that Government ships, if they were able to get the trade, would handle it only at a loss. But it would not be for a service rendered to the whole people, but to the exporters and importers; in practice it would be taxing the whole people for the good of a part.

I refer that to the Senator from New Jersey—

In practice it would be taxing the whole people for the good of a part.

More than this, it would force private enterprise out of foreign shipping instead of drawing it in, and so would defeat its own ends. The outcome would be a Government merchant marine, uneconomically managed, and nothing else. From any viewpoint the question of Government ownership of ships could not be fairly tested at this time.

Better than this now is an open policy of Government subsidy. Better still a tariff discrimination in favor of American-carried goods. Either or both, coupled with free ships, should see a speedy growth in our shipping. And, if less speedy than the acquisition of a Government fleet, it would be of more enduring value.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. THOMAS. If my memory serves me right, the Senator voted for the marine war-insurance bill. I should like to ask him if he does not regard that as using a part of the money raised by general taxation for the benefit of a few?

Mr. WEEKS. But, Mr. President, I took no particular unction to myself on account of the theory which was being advanced by the Boston Globe. I think in many instances we do use money raised by taxation which directly or indirectly benefits a few at the expense of all the taxpayers. I have voted for the legislation to which the Senator refers, and other legislation since the serious troubles which now embroil the world, not entirely because I approved of it or because I thought it would be as effective as its sponsors hoped, but because I wanted to put myself in a position where it could not be charged that I was doing anything whatever to embarrass the administration in trying to carry out policies which it seemed best to the administration to propose.

Mr. POMERENE and Mr. THOMAS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. WEEKS. I will yield further to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not wish to be understood as criticizing the Senator for his vote upon that bill and upon similar measures. I think the fact that he supported it is to his credit; but I do not believe the argument as to the use of a part of the public fund in a particular direction not for the general benefit of all is in itself an argument or even a statement that should be considered seriously as a reason why we should not proceed with a given line of legislation.

Mr. WEEKS. The Senator knows——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WEEKS. Just one word first. The Senator from Colorado knows perfectly well that Democratic platforms and Democratic orators without end have declared against taxing the many for the benefit of the few. I was reading the editorial to indicate that in this matter the Democratic Party was once more departing from its platform pledges.

Mr. THOMAS. I think that that principle is a sound one, generally speaking, but I do not think it is applicable to measures like this, where it is intended that the Government of the people, a great public agency, shall itself be the medium through which these benefits are to be sought.

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] for a question.

Mr. POMERENE. Is it not the Senator's opinion that the establishment of the merchant-marine insurance bureau helped very greatly to reduce the rates of insurance?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think it had any material effect upon the rates, but I think that it has had some indirect benefit; and I am rather inclined to think that the benefits could be increased by liberalizing methods in the manner which I indicated earlier in the day. I am not criticizing that legislation. I voted for it.

Mr. POMERENE. My information is that it has very greatly helped to keep down the insurance rates.

Now, then, let me ask another question along that line. Assuming that this bill is passed and we do make this investment in a line of vessels, and so forth, could we not expect reasonably that it would have a good deal of influence in keeping freight rates on the ocean at a reasonable mark?

Mr. WEEKS. The amount of shipping that would be provided under this bill is so small compared with the total amount of shipping on the ocean that it is impossible that it could have any material effect on ocean freight rates.

I was reading an editorial in a Democratic newspaper taking the Democrats to task for violating the traditional policies of the Democratic Party, and, in addition, trying to foist on the country a proposition which was economically unsound. It was simply a quotation from the paper.

Now, Mr. President, I have a few more extracts here which I wish to read into the RECORD. I am sorry I can not use all I have, but if I used every source of criticism of the bill which I have at my disposal here it would take until the 4th of March to complete my remarks.

This is from the Providence Journal, an active supporter, generally, of the administration:

It is no argument to say, as the President does say, of the critics of the administration: "Some of them are misguided, some of them are blind, most of them are ignorant." He "would rather pray for them than abuse them," he tells us. Why doesn't he, then?

The whole speech gives the impression of Executive irritation and impatience. Mr. Wilson has lately been pictured as impervious to criticism, but this Indianapolis utterance is an indication quite to the contrary. One can not help wondering how it looks to him in cold type.

From the New Haven Journal-Courier—an independent paper, I think—I read an editorial entitled "Leaves Friends Wriggling." It is as follows:

"LEAVES FRIENDS WRIGGLING."

In his announcement that he intends to be the captain of the team absolutely and in his sharp raps at the Republican Party it is doubtful if he made as many friends as he lost. And yet such results were to have been expected. His attitude on the shipping bill could not be called convincing; in the white light of facts unadorned it is doubtful if his remarks in that direction would get him anywhere worth arriving. His pronouncements concerning the future of Mexico left him open to criticism and put his friends in the position of having to exercise their imagination in explaining his real position on the Mexican situation and the motives from which his conclusions proceed. Finally, the Jackson Day speech of the President leaves an impression of partisanship and egoism which is the food upon which his political enemies thrive and which leaves his friends wriggling a bit in their seats.

Not the only opponents of this project are the Democratic newspapers from which I have quoted, the trade journals, which know more about this question than do any others—the people who are directly interested in the shipping business—but all classes of people are opposed to it. In the Journal of Commerce of January 7 I find a long statement. The headlines are:

Exporters oppose Federal ship bill—Favor $50,000,000 marine credit plan instead—Foreign trade factors unanimous in declaring that Federal owned and operated steamship line is a step in wrong direction toward reviving our merchant marine—Say law of supply and demand is responsible for prevailing high rates—Offer substitute plan.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he will explain to the Senate what is that $50,000,000 credit scheme that the article from which he is reading says the shippers prefer to the pending bill? I am not familiar with that $50,000,000 credit scheme that the shippers are so much in favor of. If the Senator has any information in regard to it, I should be glad if he would give it to the Senate.

Mr. WEEKS. The only information I have on that subject, Mr. President, is the information I have already put into the RECORD to-day in a report, with recommendations by the Boston Chamber of Commerce. As it is in the RECORD, I think I will not repeat it; but that is the only evidence I have on that particular subject.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is that the proposition that the Government shall issue bonds to that extent and loan it to shipping companies to enable them to buy ships?

Mr. WEEKS. That was the proposition—that, under certain proper restrictions and regulations, on a certain percentage of the value of the property the Government should make loans.

Mr. SIMMONS. The shipping interests of the country are in favor of the Government doing that, but the shipping interests do not think that the Government in issuing $50,000,000 in bonds and loaning it to them to buy ships will be in any way infringing upon the legitimate functions of government. They say they think if the Government buys some ships and owns them itself, instead of buying them and presenting them to the shipping interests, that it will be traveling upon untried and new and revolutionary grounds.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I am not entirely in sympathy with the suggestion made in the recommendation; I think it has very doubtful value; and yet, when the merchants of this country see the Democratic Party appropriating $35,000,000 for building a railroad in Alaska and proposing to go into business in other directions, I think it must be admitted that the suggestion which they make in the recommendation is ultraconservative. They do at least provide in that suggestion that these vessels shall be available for naval purposes in time of need, and they do provide that the Government shall not be the entire stakeholder, but shall hold the first mortgage on the property, and that the vessels themselves shall have the benefit of the economies which go with private management rather than with Government management. So from any standpoint, whether one indorses it or not, it is preferable to the plan proposed in the pending bill.

I find in another column of the paper to which I have just referred—the Journal of Commerce, of January 7—this statement:

Experts condemn Government shipping bill—not practical as an emergency or permanent measure.

Of course, it is not practicable as an emergency measure. I expect to see those who are sponsors for this proposed legislation abandon the contention that there is any benefit whatever to come from this legislation as an emergency measure. It is not going to add a ton of shipping to the commerce of the world; and the available shipping that could ordinarily be purchased at reasonable prices, while an emergency is on would cost so much that, in my opinion, it would make it prohibitive. The headline of the article continues:

Creates no new tonnage, while at present all tonnage is being worked to the full limit—B. N. Baker's plan for chartering the Government ships—vessels could not be built in time for the present emergency.

Mr. B. N. Baker is a man who has had very much experience in the conduct of the mercantile marine. He was interested years ago in the International Co., and his judgment should be of considerable value. I understand that in the series of conferences which are being held night after night Mr. Baker's plan for providing for this expenditure of money is being given consideration. It is better than the pending bill; it could not be worse. It is better than the pending bill, because it does not essentially put the Government into the operation of a transportation business. Under its provisions possibly we might avoid that unfortunate contingency.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The Senator views as a calamity the Government going into the transportation business?

Mr. WEEKS. I certainly do.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. For one I can not share the Senator's view. I believe that it would be one of the greatest blessings that ever came to us if we should go into the transportation business.

The same arguments which are now advanced by the Senator were advanced when the parcel post was being advocated. It was said the parcel post was going to ruin the express business; that it would be a total failure; that disaster was sure to come; and many other prophesies of that kind were made. The reverse has been true. I believe that the United States Government is as entirely competent to engage in the transportation business as it was to engage in the post-office business, as it was to undertake the construction of the Panama Canal. I trust to live to see the day when the Government shall control the telegraph, when it shall control the telephone, and all such great public utilities. I realize, and I think the Senator from Massachusetts, coming from his splendid, progressive State and with his magnificent intellect and position there must realize, that the American people move, and that the world, too, is moving. Things which were regarded as heresy 20 or 25 years ago to-day are not only tolerated, but we all delight to engage in them and laud them to the skies.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, if the Senator from New Jersey will honor me with his attention——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have given strict attention to the Senator from Massachusetts, for I am always delighted to listen to him.

Mr. WEEKS. Before I complete this discussion I think I can demonstrate to his satisfaction that government management anywhere, under any circumstances, is the opposite of economical. I believe I can demonstrate to him that in only one or two instances anywhere in the world where there has been government ownership have profits resulted from government management. I will demonstrate, I believe to his satisfaction, that wherever there is government management, in comparison with the same conditions with private management, the private management is invariably more economical than is the government management.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I suppose government management may be carried down even to the result of municipal management, and I can cite many instances to controvert the Senator's proposition. New York, the city of my birth and only 35 or 40 minutes from my home, as I can very well remember, used to have ferryboats across the East River. There was a great howl when it was proposed to build a municipal bridge; but a municipal bridge was built. The suspension bridge across from the city of New York to Brooklyn was a municipal or city owned, or government-owned, if you choose—not owned by the United States Government, but a city-owned bridge. The result was that, though the charge, I think, was at first 5 cents for pedestrians to cross the bridge, in two or three years the pedestrians traveled across it free. We have built a dozen bridges since that time across the Hudson and East Rivers, every one being free to pedestrians. Had such bridges been owned by private corporations, old Tom Platt or the Vanderbilts would up to this time have been charging 15 cents for walking across them. I can cite the Senator from Massachusetts to myriads of instances of that kind.

Mr. WEEKS. I assume that this is a question. [Laughter.] I am very glad that the Senator from New Jersey instances the city of New York and its ferryboats in the suggestion that I might be wrong in the declaration that I have made. I have here before me the report of the department of docks and ferries of New York.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. There is only one ferryboat running there, and that has been quite recently.

Mr. WEEKS. The Senator is wrong in that respect as he is in others.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am not wrong as to that municipal ferry.

Mr. WEEKS. There are two municipal ferries in New York; their reports are before me; and they are the only ferries in New York which are not operated successfully and profitably.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Well, I should like to ask the Senator, Mr. President, what constitutes "successfully and profitably"? It is a horrible thought that everything must be measured in dollars. I can imagine profit to the people without reference to dollars if a service facilitates intercourse and facilitates trade and commerce. Whether it will be productive in dollars and cents appeals to me but little, if the community is made better industrially and happier and if the general welfare is enhanced. I say advisedly that every instance of municipally owned utilities, so far as I know, has resulted in lower rates to the consumer, better wages and shorter hours to the laboring man, and better results in general. The Senator may point me to the case of the gas works in Philadelphia, but that is obnoxious in the eyes of every fair-minded man.

Mr. WEEKS. There is one other thing, Mr. President, that the Senator failed to mention that has resulted from all this, and that is the taxation of the many for the purpose of making up the deficit caused by municipal operation.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. God knows, any such suggestion as that comes with ill grace from a high-protective tariff monger.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I was pleased and somewhat amused to have the Senator refer to the operation of the Post Office Department in connection with this matter. I happen to have here the report of the Postmaster General, a good Democrat himself, and here is what he says about the economical management of the post office. I hope the Senator will listen and bear with me while I read it.

> The importance and value of the Rural Mail Service is unquestioned. It improves the condition of farm life, tends to check the movement of the rural population to the congested urban communities, and is therefore a recognized economic necessity for the best interest and development of the entire country.

We all agree to that.

> The inauguration of this service and its rapid extension have been justified on the ground of public policy. However, I deem it my duty to direct the attention of Congress to the fact that this service is entailing upon the Public Treasury an annual expense of $40,000,000 in excess of the revenues produced by the service.
>
> The methods employed in providing these necessary and desirable facilities have been subjected by me to a rigid examination with a view to ascertaining whether an equally satisfactory rural service can not be provided at a less cost. House-to-house delivery and collection of mail in rural districts is now provided in two ways—first, by letting contracts to the lowest responsible bidders for specified performance over certain routes between post offices, and, second, by employing carriers at salaries fixed by law. The contract method is known as "star-route" service, the other method as Rural Delivery Service. "Star-route" service is designed primarily for the transportation of mail between post offices, and can not under existing law be extended to routes other than those leading from one post office to another or from a post office to a railroad station or steamboat landing; hence the route traveled by the "star-route" carrier is determined not by the density and distribution of population in rural districts, but by the location of post offices. Rural Delivery Service, on the contrary, is designed primarily for the house-to-house delivery and collection of mail and is used only incidentally in some instances for the transportation of mail in closed pouches between post offices. The cost of the service on the "star routes" averages 9.96 cents per mile traveled, compared with 14.77 cents per mile for the Rural Delivery Service, a difference in favor of the "star-route" service of 4.81 cents per mile. Applied to the entire rural service, this would make possible a saving of from $15,000,000 to $20,000,000 annually. Furthermore, as shown elsewhere in this report, the annual cost of Rural Delivery Service is increasing rapidly.

Now, Mr. President, I want to call to the attention of the Senator from New Jersey the fact that that is the invariable result of Government operation.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey rose.

Mr. WEEKS. Just a moment. There is always the pressure for more service, always the pressure for increased pay, always the pressure for a greater number of employees, and invariably the pressure for lower rates to be charged for conducting the traffic, invariably bringing about a deficit in the service, to make up which all the citizens are taxed.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for a question, Mr. President; I do not wish to be taken from the floor.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do not desire to take the Senator from the floor, but I want to know whether the Senator does not believe, even admitting that the Rural Delivery Service entails a cost, as the Senator alleges, of $40,000,000 a year, that it is worth every penny of its cost, and whether the Senator from enlightened Massachusetts would cut off that service even if it cost twice $40,000,000? We have a hundred million people in this country who have been blessed by the parcel post delivery and who have been blessed by the general Postal System of this country, and even though rural delivery may cost $40,000,000, I would vote to-day to decrease the postage rate, if possible, to 1 cent instead of keeping it at 2 cents. I believe the greatest civilizer, the greatest machine for the advancement of the well-being of every man, woman, and child in this country is the opportunity through mail facilities of free communication, whether in the shape of printed matter or that which may be written. I am familiar with the proposition leading up to the suggestion of the Postmaster General in regard to a contract system, but I can not agree with him. He has given the question very great study, but I do not believe that it would be wise or that it would be advantageous. For many years I have been in favor of municipal, State, and Government control, and every instance that I have seen of such control has resulted in the betterment of the people. The question narrowed down to dollars is hateful to me.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, it may be hateful to the Senator, but that does not remove the fact that economy in management is a necessity, or bankruptcy will follow the conduct of governmental affairs.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I agree to that.

Mr. WEEKS. We are near enough serious trouble with our revenues to indicate to the Senator from New Jersey and to every other responsible man that the time has come when we must look to the side of economy as well as to that of development.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am thoroughly appreciative of that fact, and I will use every reasonable means to economize, provided the economy is not to the detriment of the welfare of the people.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the Postmaster General, representing this administration, tells the Senator that he can get more service for $20,000,000 less than it is now costing. What is he going to do about that?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. It depends upon the channels through which he proposes to get this service. I would not permit the United States Government, if I could help it, to get that service $20,000,000 cheaper by adopting a method that would result in making the official letter carriers of the United States advertising agents for any private corporation.

Mr. WEEKS. Now, Mr. President, I will resume reading some of the clippings in criticism of the pending bill that I have here from newspapers friendly to the administration. This is from the Brooklyn Eagle, of Brooklyn, N. Y., a Democratic paper:

EASY ENOUGH TO ANSWER.

With what may be called his customary inflexibility, the President will push his merchant marine bill. And with even more than his customary warmth, not to say heat, he assails those who are opposing it. He asks who commissioned them to stand in the way. Charging them with defying the Nation, he warns them that their credentials will be badly discredited, if they succeed. Contemptuously, he dismisses them as the self-styled friends of business.

Answers to this vigorous bombardment will not long be delayed. Part of the answers will or should be that Senators who object to the bill hold unimpeachable credentials or commissions. Another part of it will or should be that their right to believe the merchant marine measure to be harmful, to be detrimental to the interests of the country, and to say so, is as indisputable as that of the President to fight for its passage. It does not follow that Government ownership and operation is wise because the President declared it to be so.

From the New York Evening Post I desire to read a brief extract. The matter I am reading is from selected papers, which are not indulging in invective but in argument; and I believe I may say with confidence that it will add to the knowledge of any Senator to listen to what I am trying to lay before the Senate. This, as I have said, is from the New York Evening Post, a paper which has heretofore been a supporter of the administration since it came into power:

SPEAKING WITHOUT KNOWLEDGE.

With reference to the shipping bill we feel bound to say that, both in tone and substance, the President's remarks—

Referring to his address at Indianapolis—were utterly unbefitting the issue with which he was dealing. It may be that if the shipping bill could be submitted to the decision of the American people they would show themselves to be in favor of it, but to speak of the men who in the Senate are opposing the passage of this bill as a minority which dares "to defy the Nation" is to speak without the warrant of knowledge and to attempt to exercise a kind of pressure which those gentlemen would be thoroughly justified in resenting. As for the situation which Mr. Wilson alleges to exist, and to justify the rushing through of the bill as an emergency measure, what could be more fantastic than his description of it on the very day when the price of wheat at Chicago was passing the $1.40 mark and beating all records for a generation? If the farmers are not getting any profit out of wheat at present prices it must be from taking in each other's washing that they are earning the money with which to buy their automobiles and grand pianos.

From the New York Sun I read the following:

HIS FIRST ESSAY IN BUSINESS.

In his speech at Indianapolis, President Wilson said:

"I want to ask the business men here present if this is not the first January in their recollection that did not bring a money stringency for the time being because of the necessity of paying out great sums of money by way of dividends and the other settlements which come at the first of the year?"

Mr. President, that is one of the most remarkable statements that ever was made by a public man. Why there should be rejoicing by anyone or an intimation of rejoicing because the returns on capital in the great corporate interests in this country were lower this year than in some other year is beyond the comprehension, I believe, of anyone.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. SHIVELY. What is there about that statement to justify the Senator in placing any such construction upon it as he has seen fit to place?

Mr. WEEKS. I read the statement which is a quotation of what the President said.

Mr. SHIVELY. That is just what makes it appear astonishing that the Senator should put that construction on the President's words.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not mean to say that the President rejoices, but that he should cite a lessening of the prosperity of the country as a reason for getting over what has ordinarily been a critical period borders on the grotesque, in my opinion.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, I do not care to interrupt the Senator further, if he does not care to be interrupted.

Mr. WEEKS. I am quite willing to be interrupted for a question.

Mr. SHIVELY. The President's statement was quite the reverse; that theretofore there had been stringency, harmful stringency, at a certain time of the year when these settlements were made——

Mr. WEEKS. Due to the fact that large dividends were being paid.

Mr. SHIVELY. Not due to the fact that large dividends were being paid, but due to the fact that dividends were being paid; that that was the time of the year when certain financial transactions had to take place; and that it was a matter of rejoicing if it were true that the same embarrassment was not felt at that time of the year because of the changed financial system and not because of the changed or depressed conditions.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will take the trouble to read that paragraph and I think he will come to the conclusion which I have indicated.

Mr. SHIVELY. I have read it.

Mr. WEEKS. This editorial from the New York Sun goes on to say:

Does the President recollect any January in many years when there was so little need of money to pay dividends because there were so few and such scant dividends to pay?

The President reiterates in plain speech what he once turned into a neat epigram:

"There is nothing the matter with American business except a state of mind."

Psychology, of course. It is the President's contribution to the relief of the situation. By the way, in the next breath he added:

"I never was in business."

He is manifestly in business now, and means business in 1916.

Mr. President, I want to refer briefly to the report of the committee on American merchant marine in the foreign trade of the New York Chamber of Commerce. I happen to know a majority of the members of that committee, and I know they are thoroughly qualified experts on the subject of foreign trade and the merchant marine. They are the kind of men who, if the Senate Committee on Commerce had seen fit to summon them, could have been brought to Washington and would have given the committee a good deal of useful information which could be employed in this debate and which, in my judgment, would have brought about a better bill than the one we are now considering. I want to refer very briefly to two or three of the contentions which they make in their report.

To the Chamber of Commerce:

The war in Europe has centered attention in this country upon our lack of a merchant marine. The problem, while present in the public mind to some extent for years, had not been brought home forcibly to all parts of the country as has been done by the partial tying up of the commerce of the world, and the consequent inability of this country to find neutral tonnage to carry its products to foreign markets. This sudden shortage of vessel tonnage resulted in an abrupt advance in freight rates, making it possible for the first time in years for American vessels to engage profitably in foreign trade.

The conditions to-day are recognized by all to be abnormal, and to some extent unsafe, as a permanent basis for the reestablishment of our merchant marine; but they are certain to continue, so long as a state of war exists in Europe, and probably, because of the wastage of vessel property during the conflict, for several years after it ends.

The return to normal conditions in Europe must be gradual. Industries, to-day prostrate, must be reconstructed. Cities which have been laid waste must be rebuilt. The products of Europe will not equal the demands of that Continent; and the cost of shipbuilding which has already advanced 20 per cent in England, will continue for some time upon a higher level than has been normal in the past. It seems, therefore, that the immediate future affords an opportunity that ought to be availed of to reestablish our foreign merchant marine and the shipbuilding industry of this country.

The problem under the most favorable conditions is difficult; but it is rendered less difficult by the unusual conditions which now exist. That a merchant marine is to-day desired by the American people can not be denied. There are some who, while recognizing all of the difficulties, believe that our shipping should be reestablished by Government aid, no matter what the cost may be. There are others who think that the industry should be left to work out its own future and be reestablished only if it can be done without Government aid. A third element, representing perhaps the greater part of the people of the country, believe that reasonable Government aid should be extended to reestablish so important an industry, and are willing that substantial Government assistance be extended during the development period, if a wise method can be suggested.

Your committee, while sharing to the fullest extent the desire of all citizens to see the American flag and American shipping again upon the high seas, recognizes that the problem is one of business; and that an American merchant marine to be permanent must justify itself in competition with ships of foreign nations. Your committee believes that American shipping can justify itself upon this basis, once the development period has been passed, and feels that advantage should be taken of the present exceptional opportunity to place American vessels in competition for the commerce of the world.

Before proceeding to a discussion of the methods which seem practicable, we desire to place ourselves on record as opposed to Government ownership and Government operation of vessels. We do not base our opposition to this principle upon the ground that a Government department can not operate vessel property as cheaply as private owners, although we have grave doubt of the ability of the Government to meet the economic standards of successful private enterprise. We base our objections on the much more fundamental principle in this instance that Government competition in this field of industrial effort will, in our belief, defeat the ends which it is sought to attain.

The American people desire not only to see the American flag upon the high seas, but to see American commerce restored to a position of supremacy. England alone has over 4,000 steamers engaged in foreign trade, and to meet, and ultimately outdistance, competition of this character, will require an enormous investment of American capital and energy. It is impossible to conceive that Government ownership and operation can be successfully extended to cover so vast a field; and the moment it is invaded by the competition of public capital, American private capital and energy, so essential to the successful restoration of our merchant marine on any adequate scale, will decline to enter the field. We have in New York City an example of the operation of this principle. The municipality has begun the construction of wharves and piers, for the accommodation of freight vessels. Private enterprise has refused to meet the competition of public capital and untaxed property, and the construction of wharf property through private effort has ceased. The city has been unable to keep pace with the demands of shipping, and commerce is already beginning to suffer from a shortage of pier property.

That is one matter which I have indirectly called to the attention of those in charge of this bill—that one of the first and most essential requirements in establishing shipping lines is either to own the piers at either end of the route of transportation or to control them for a long period of years. It would be extremely hazardous to undertake to establish a business without either ownership or an extremely long lease, and yet these members of the New York Chamber of Commerce are saying that it is extremely difficult to get pier locations within the district which would naturally be served by shipping engaged in foreign commerce.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I trust the Senator from Massachusetts is not unmindful of the fact that the municipality of New York have built the most superb dock system, known as the Chelsea Docks, at Twenty-third Street and thereabouts that there is in existence in this country or elsewhere. Of course, the whole water front of New York has not been encompassed at once; but that which has been done, a very considerable amount of it, is the most superb that has been created, and it is a success so far as merchandise and transportation are concerned.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I have not seen the financial statement——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. O Lord, money! [Laughter.] I do not know what it may have cost, but it is there, a monument, and will prove a blessing to the trade and commerce of the great city of New York.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I shall take occasion, before I resume my remarks at another date, to look over in detail the statement of the dock system. I did look at the figures somewhat casually. I have them before me. I should exceedingly dislike to see any community in which I am interested engage in an enterprise which showed such material losses as a result of operation as does the department of docks and ferries of New York City.

To continue my reading:

The present administration has suggested that $30,000,000 be invested in Government-owned vessels. If this be done, a small fleet will be created; but the feeling that the Government may from time to time add to this fleet and enter more extensively into competition for the ocean-carrying trade will prevent the participation of private enterprise in solving this problem.

Your committee submits that the same sum, if set aside as a guarantee fund and invested in Government bonds or other income-bearing securities, to be administered by a central board, having the same fostering relationship to the building up of our commerce and shipping as the Federal Reserve Board has to our finance and banking, will accomplish infinitely greater results. This guaranty fund could be administered along lines which have been in successful operation in a different field for a hundred years, namely, in relation to mortgages upon real estate. The Credit Foncier in France and other companies which guarantee mortgages upon property in the Argentine, Canada, and elsewhere, are well known; but the best illustrations for local purposes are the various mortgage-guaranty companies of this country. A loan is perhaps made at 5 per cent. The mortgage is guaranteed by the company and sold upon a 4½ per cent basis, the guaranteeing company making one-half of 1 per cent annually upon each mortgage as a compensation for its guarantee and its services. Its services consist in collecting the interest, seeing that taxes and assessments are paid, and that the insurance is maintained.

An example of the successful operation of such a company is the Bond & Mortgage Guarantee Co. of this city. That company began its operations 22 years ago with $1,000,000 capital and a small surplus. It has guaranteed within that period about $750,000,000 of mortgages, many of which have, of course, been paid off. It has outstanding approximately $250,000,000 of guaranteed mortgages. Its present capital is $5,000,000 and the combined capital and surplus exceeds $10,000,000.

That is not entirely along the same lines as a suggestion in the report of the Boston Chamber of Commerce, to which I have referred. I do not entirely indorse it. I do not know that I would indorse it at all if I had thoroughly investigated it; but that shows the folly of attempting legislation of this kind, or even of substituting suggestions made by others for what is now pending, without the fullest investigation, based on the authority of those men who have had experience with its operation and can give us expert testimony.

Among other items which should receive its consideration is the maintenance of standards for the personnel of the officers and men of the merchant marine. The school ships maintained by Massachusetts and New York are educating officers for the merchant marine. They are doing a most useful and necessary work. Thousands of young men throughout the country are ready for the call of the sea, and are animated by the same spirit which filled the forecastle and quarterdecks of the American vessels 50 years ago. Other ships of this character should be established and the course of training amplified to make the graduates fit both for the merchant marine and the Navy. There are discharged from the Navy each year about 4,000 young men who have enlisted from all parts of the country. These men have had a most valuable training in the Navy, and should be encouraged to go into the merchant marine service. Many foreign nations encourage the creation of such a naval reserve by paying a small additional wage to men honorably discharged from the Navy, who continue a seafaring life and hold themselves in readiness as naval reservists. This practice is worthy of serious consideration.

The second step in reestablishing our shipping consists in creating conditions which will attract steamship men to make use of the credit machinery thus established and to create the vessel property so urgently desired. This again divides itself into two parts—regular lines carrying passengers and mails, and freight steamers.

It goes on, Mr. President, discussing the various phases of the two steps to be taken relating to those different classes of transportation facilities. I think, without reading more, I shall ask permission to insert the balance of this report in my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

We will discuss the regular lines. Public attention seems centered at the moment upon trade with South America, and we will, therefore, take lines to that part of the world as a type for consideration, although a similar service may be established to many other countries with the same class of vessel.

We desire first to point out that there has been a general misunderstanding of the added cost of operating American vessels as compared with the same vessel under a foreign flag. It has been frequently stated and generally accepted that the operation under the American flag will cost from 40 to 50 per cent more. We believe this percentage should be applied to wages alone, for the cost of fuel, supplies, insurance, and upkeep is substantially equal for the same vessel in the same trade, regardless of flag.

On passenger ships, where the wage item may be a larger percentage of the total operating cost, the difference in favor of foreign vessels is somewhat greater, but with strictly freight carriers your committee is informed that the disadvantage under which American tonnage must labor is 5 and 10 per cent of the total operating cost. Even in passenger vessels of a type suitable for South American trade, the disadvantage probably does not greatly exceed 10 per cent. These estimates take no account of the difference in interest, if the American vessels be constructed in this country, for that subject will be treated under a separate heading.

This difference in operating cost, while less important than has been generally understood, is still sufficient to discourage the operation of American ships, and is frequently the margin between profit and loss. Your committee, therefore, is of the opinion that it is idle to expect that American lines, of passenger and mail steamers, can be established, even though credit machinery, to make easy their financing, be created, without some measure of Government aid. It must be borne in mind that the new lines must enter into immediate competition with long-established foreign-owned lines, with experienced agents at ports of call, and with contracts which can not be easily disturbed. The new lines must fight their way into the trade.

It seems desirable that as few changes in existing laws be made as is possible. The present ocean mail act permits the payment of $4 per mile to mail vessels of 20-knot speed. A speed of 20 knots is in excess of any yet established in the South American trade, and beyond present reasonable requirements. The cost of maintaining such speed upon long voyages is to-day prohibitive. A vessel capable of making 16 knots, and running regularly at 15, will meet all requirements and be slightly better than competing lines under foreign flags. In services of this character it is not so much extreme speed which is required but regularity of service.

We therefore suggest that the requirements be reduced to a trial speed of 16 knots and the compensation be left as at present. There are many countries to which an even less speed will answer all purposes, and we suggest that the speed requirements for vessels of the second class be reduced from 16 knots to 12 knots and the subvention of $2 per mile left in force. It must be remembered that these subventions are not payable to all vessels, but only to lines operating under contract, a service asked for by the Government. We have been assured by steamship men of experience and standing that if this be done, there can be no doubt that advantage will be taken of the credit machinery before outlined and a number of lines established.

A reason for the extreme speed heretofore provided for has been the desire of those connected with the Navy to see constructed vessels of sufficient speed to be of use as commerce destroyers in time of war. Your committee would point out that if such vessels are necessary, it is not a sound economic policy to operate them in a trade for which they are not suited at a large annual loss. They should be either constructed for trans-Atlantic service, where such speed is necessary, or built and maintained by the Government for naval uses. Your committee expresses no opinion as to the necessity for such vessels, for it is not considered a part of the economic question under consideration. We desire to point out, however, that there is only one line of American mail steamers between this country and Europe. These steamers are approximately 20 years old and are rapidly wearing out. The time is not far off when the service must be discontinued or new vessels provided. If commerce destroyers are a necessity, it may be desirable to arrange for new vessels for a trans-Atlantic service. If this be done, your committee sees no other method to adopt than to provide for the payment of a sufficient subsidy to maintain in service such vessels as the Government may require. The construction of such vessels would assure the Government an American mail service to Europe, gratify national pride, and meet naval requirements. They are not, we repeat, a necessary part of the present problem.

In making these suggestions we are not unmindful of the apparently deeply rooted objection in the minds of many of the citizens of this country to the payment of subsidies. It is a practice susceptible of such abuse that we suggest, rather than recommend, the only method which seems to promise the immediate construction of passenger and mail steamers and at the same time conform to economic standards.

Your committee desires to make clear that it has endeavored to avoid the pitfalls of recommending radical legislation. It recognizes that there is a wide difference of opinion as to the best method to be employed to reestablish our merchant marine. It has given consideration to all methods which have been suggested, and the creation of preferential duties, under which our merchant marine flourished during the first half of the nineteenth century, has been carefully discussed. A preferential duty of 5 per cent has been authorized by Congress, and the question of the legality of the measure is now before the Supreme Court of the United States. In due course a decision will be rendered, and it seems useless to discuss such a measure until such decision has been handed down. We have also given earnest consideration to the arguments of those in favor of the Alexander bill as it now stands—January 1. We recognize that this bill is considered an administration measure and has been approved by President Wilson. For this reason we have endeavored to convince ourselves of its merit, but have been unable to agree that a sufficient crisis exists to warrant the enactment of a law which departs from established economic standards and may do grave injustice to those citizens who already own vessel property. It is stated that the people of this country are against taxing themselves in order to provide subsidies for steamship lines, and it is suggested that they tax themselves to operate Government-owned lines admittedly at a loss. We fail to see the difference, except that the latter plan carries with it evils far worse than a lack of American ships on the sea.

Government ownership of ocean lines can not bring to our aid a single vessel, except by building. Every steamship in the world is working to-day, except those interned in neutral ports. If these can be transferred to our flag without international complications, there will be no difficulty in financing the transfer of those suitable for freight carrying, for their earnings will justify the purchase. If they can not be transferred without trouble with England and France, it is certain we do not wish the United States to become their owner.

The construction of vessels designed to carry freight only is, we believe, attended with less difficulty than the establishment of regular passenger and mail lines. As we have pointed out, the item of wages on vessels of this character represents a smaller percentage of the total operating cost, and the disadvantage under which American vessels labor is in the neighborhood of 5 per cent of the total operating cost. Under conditions existing in the past even this difference would prevent the engaging in foreign trade of American tonnage, but it is the conviction of your committee that conditions will not again be normal for a number of years, and that if credit machinery be created to enable the steamship men to finance American steamship enterprise, sufficient inducements will exist to assure the construction of a substantial tonnage of freight vessels without the payment of subsidy.

In any event it is the opinion of your committee that it is not necessary at the present time to provide subsidies for freight vessels. Their earning power, so long as the war continues, will be more than ample, and the slight disadvantage in operating cost is at least partially offset by economies in interest made possible through an application of our plan to guarantee steamship bonds. There is, of course, a wide divergence of opinion as to how long the war will last and of the probable condition of foreign shipping at its close. A large tonnage has already been destroyed, and it is the opinion of some experienced steamship men that the operating cost of foreign vessels will be higher than it has been in the past for years to come.

Your committee has been advised of plans for the establishment of certain freight lines, which are already under consideration without subsidy. The difficulties which lie in the way of the immediate carrying out of these plans are two-fold: First, fear of Government competition, and, second, the difficulty in interesting American investors in the securities. If these two difficulties are removed, we feel confident a beginning will be made and the consideration of any subsidy for freight vessels may be safely postponed for a year at least, when the matter can be again taken up and judged from the standpoint of conditions existing at that time.

You will note that no reference has been made as to whether the proposed tonnage should be constructed in American or foreign yards. Discussion of this matter has been omitted for two reasons: First, amendments have already been made in shipping laws permitting the acquisition of foreign-built tonnage for a limited period, and, second, it is quite possible that a condition may arise in the near future which will make competition for vessel construction by the yards of this country much less difficult. If a substantial tonnage is to be created, it is idle to suggest that it be entirely constructed in this country, for the facilities do not exist for the work. The building up of a shipbuilding industry, like the construction of a fleet, will require time. If a large tonnage built abroad is placed under the American flag, the necessary repair work will be an important aid in establishing American yards upon a basis where they can compete with foreign shipbuilders. The inability of the American shipbuilder in the past to compete with foreign yards has been partially due to the fact that there has been but a limited demand, and only for vessels of special construction.

The American manufacturer in many fields of industry has shown his ability to compete and outdistance the foreign manufacturer of any article which can be standardized and produced largely by machinery. The automobile industry is a recent illustration of this principle. The raw materials needed for ship construction are all available, and it is the opinion of your committee that if a demand arises for the construction of a large number of freight vessels more or less of the same general type, and therefore standardized in character, the American shipbuilder will have less difficulty in competing for ship construction, the foreign cost of which, as we have already pointed out, is 20 per cent higher than at the beginning of the war.

Your committee is not unmindful of the fact that this view may be unduly optimistic, but in view of all the circumstances surrounding the present situation we are inclined to recommend that the specific provision that part of the tonnage to be operated under the American flag be constructed in American yards be deferred until the immediate future can be more clearly foreseen and we approach the time limit set by the recent amendments permitting the acquirement of foreign-built tonnage.

Many other phases of this question have also been considered and discussed by the committee, but we have kept always in mind our desire to present only practical suggestions for taking a substantial step forward.

Your committee moves the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York approves these recommendations and authorizes the special committee on the American merchant marine in the foreign trade to urge upon Congress the enactment of legislation in accordance with the principles and methods outlined in the foregoing report.

IRVING T. BUSH,
WILLIAM HARRIS DOUGLAS,
GEORGE S. DEARBORN,
JACOB W. MILLER,
J. TEMPLE GWATHMEY,
Special Committee on the American Merchant Marine in the Foreign Trade.

NEW YORK, January 4, 1915.

Mr. WEEKS. Now I wish to discuss some phases of Government ownership and operation.

We have a distinct and definite policy in regard to our conduct relating to corporations—that of regulation and supervision—a policy which is not peculiar to our General Government, because it is found in many of our States and in most foreign countries, especially those where government ownership has not become a dominating policy.

In one department we do conduct a service which is commercial in many respects—the Post Office Department. But that is common to all countries of the world, the reason in all cases primarily having been the carrying of the Government's mail, and this has been extended from time to time to cover letter mail, newspapers, books, and other reading matter. Latterly we have increased the fourth-class service which heretofore we have given by adopting a general parcel-post law similar to the methods which have been followed by other countries, but there has always been the excuse in these extensions that we had established a service which was not being worked to its fullest capacity and that private companies operating in the same field produced a duplication which did not conform to general economy, although even in this case it should be noted that we have used the transportation facilities furnished by public-service corporations for transporting the article, the Government simply furnishing the employees and the methods for distribution.

Now it is suggested in this bill that we go into a transportation business, not in a field which we can control, but to enter a field where the competition in the past has been so keen that under the laws for which Congress is responsible we have been unable to effect a foothold, or possibly to go into competition with our coastwise shipping, a field which is now dominated by our own people and where a reasonably good service is furnished at reasonable rates. No other country, with a few exceptions like the river steamers on the Danube, which are controlled by one of the Balkan States, has attempted any such action, leaving this field to private capital, assisted by the Government either through subsidies, mail subventions, preferential rates, or in one case a direct loan to a company to build equipment; but in all of these cases of assistance the Government has based the reason for giving it not only on its desire to maintain such an industry as one of the industrial features of the country, but because it has given it a call on vessels which could be used for auxiliary cruisers, and thereby become efficient aids to the navies of their respective countries.

I propose to treat this question from the general standpoint of the propriety of a government engaging in business, which I deny, and to illustrate the failures in this respect, which failures would be tremendously emphasized in this country on account of our form of government. If it is desirable for us to engage as a Government in the shipping industry, it may be argued with some force that a similar course might wisely be taken in the case of railroads and other public-service corporations, which, in my judgment, would produce a condition coming near to the destruction of personal initiative in business, and which would even shake our governmental system to its foundation. It would be the height of folly to undertake such a revolutionary course unless it has been completely demonstrated that the present methods of ownership of public utilities have failed, producing results which do not meet the transportation needs of our people.

Assuming that that can be demonstrated, then we should turn to the results of Government ownership in other countries, apply the conditions found there to our facilities, and try to determine whether such a change under those conditions would be a success. Have the rates of public-service corporations in the United States been higher than those abroad, other conditions being equal? Are there better methods for rate making in the cases of Government ownership than those which prevail in the United States. Are the wages of labor in other countries higher than our own? Is the cost of supplies greater than our own? Are railroad corporations in other countries maintained at a higher state of efficiency in their physical properties than ours? Do railroads in other countries provide and maintain a higher class of equipment? Do they pay the State higher or lower taxes? Is the interest on the indebtedness incurred in building the road at a higher or lower rate? These are all questions which must be taken into account in determining what course we should take, and not only these but many others, and especially one, which has been brought prominently to our attention in recent days—that is, the fixing of rates by the Interstate Commerce Commission, which will enable corporations to maintain their physical and financial integrity in periods of depression. Then, we must necessarily deal with the relative qualities of Government and corporation labor.

It must be apparent to all of us that the maximum wages in the Government are very much lower than those obtained in private employment, while the minimum wage in the Government employ is very much higher than that obtained in private employment. For example, there are many competent and industrious men in the Government service in Washington who, in my judgment, if they had the courage to cut loose from it, would be able to earn more money in private employment—of course, without the certainty of continual employment that they find with the Government, but in many cases a very large increase would result. Some of the highest-paid officials in the United States to-day are men who at one time had been in the Government service. That condition makes for a constant trend of the competent to pass from Government into private enterprise, while it makes a fixture of the mediocre, who either have not the initiative or the courage to take the step; then, it must be equally apparent to everyone that the longer such men remain in the Government service the more inclined they are to become fixtures, losing all of their initiative and developing an official inertia which is destructive to every element of individual enterprise. The civil service does not remove the bad features of this condition; in fact, it accentuates them, because it gives a permanency and certainty which was not found under the old spoils system, and there is therefore not the inducement for a Government employee to bring out the best there is in him which existed when his tenure in office depended on his activity and personal enterprise.

Then again, whenever we add to the permanent Government employment we add an element which is going to confound and, if followed sufficiently, is going to perplex our whole governmental operations. We see to-day the political pressure brought by any organization of Government employees sufficiently numerous to be found in many sections of the country. This is apparent in the case of governmental industries, like arsenals and navy yards, in the effect which it has on the action of those directly representing such institutions. However, it is more pronounced in the Post Office Service than in any other, because there are a greater number of employees, and one of the best illustrations that can be advanced, and one which it seems to me negatives very largely the force of the recommendations made by the President in this case, is that of the Rural Delivery Service. It was contended by those active in establishing this service and those who wished to limit the methods of its operation that there would be a constant pressure for higher salaries, and I recall that the chairman of the Post Office Committee of the House even held out as an argument against a general adoption of salaries rather than the contract system the fear that some day the employees in this service would be paid as high as $1,000 a year. Yet, in 15 years we have seen the salaries advanced from a very moderate and insufficient initial salary of $400 to $1,200 a year, and the desire, which is natural, I think, for even a higher salary than that is sufficiently pronounced so that Congress will have to meet that proposition in the near future. And to-day, Mr. President, the Postmaster General is telling Congress that if this service were contracted instead of being operated by the Government there would be a saving of more than $18,000,000 a year, or substantially 40 per cent of the entire cost of that service. Although he is recommending a change in the method of conducting the service, and he belongs to the dominant party, having a very large control of both branches of Congress, his suggestion has and will have substantially no support, because the whole weight of the influence of the organized body of rural-delivery carriers, numbering some 45,000, is opposed to it, and Representatives and Senators will not imperil their political future by taking action which they know will be likely to mean their retirement from political life.

If that is true in the case of comparatively a few bodies of men, what would be the result if we took over the railroads of the United States with their 1,700,000 employees and thoroughly organized? It goes without saying that there would be constant pressure on the part of everybody holding important office for increases in salaries, changes in location and operation, for better conditions here and there and everywhere, and the Representative who did not respond favorably to this demand, opposed by the demagogue willing to promise anything to get political position, without any regard to the integrity of the Government's operations or Treasury balances, would be almost certain to be succeeded by such a man, although the employees of our railroads are among the best types of our citizens. Personal gain or personal advantage, the hope of obtaining some reward from the Government does not stay the hand or the action of any class of citizens, except in individual instances, and the pressure in such cases would be such as to destroy not only the financial integrity of the operations of such a public-service corporation as a railroad, but would measurably affect the efficiency of the Government itself.

But even if this were not true, is there any probability that Government officials can be found to take the important places in managing large affairs at the moderate salaries which could be paid or will be able to solve any kind of a transportation problem better than the better paid private individuals who have spent a lifetime in such attempts? They must go to the same source of information for their knowledge; they have not and will have no peculiar or unusual facilities for obtaining it, and the problem of obtaining effective service would not be simplified, but, in fact, would be complicated, and the possibility of efficiency would be lessened by such change. As a general proposition, how would it affect the mercantile community, which is influenced by variations in business and by inflexible rates? It is necessary in governmental operations to prevent shortages, to make rules imposing conditions outside of which Government employees can not go. This very fact creates a system of red tape which means inflexibility, which in itself is destructive to the best business results.

Even in the systems of State railroads which have been most successful, notably in the case of Prussia, great pains have been taken to produce a system of boards in executive and advisory capacities, bringing to bear all of the varied knowledge of different classes of men in different occupations in order to make a flexible railroad rate which will bring about the best industrial results. I intend to point out in some detail the methods employed in this Prussian system and will endeavor to show from it not only the necessity of providing such combinations of boards but the impossibility of obtaining efficient results unless it is done and how nearly impossible it would be to develop such conditions under our system of government.

I use the Prussian railroad system because, in my judgment, it is the most effective Government owned and operated system in the world and is substantially the only one that shows results, either in the development of the country for the benefit of the people or in the financial results, which are in any degree satisfactory.

If the recent rate decision and the time it has taken the Interstate Commerce Commission to reach it is any criterion of what we might expect under similar conditions, how would it be possible to adjust rates to local needs under the varied conditions which we find? There has been no effective way of building up local industries or new and developing communities without establishing rates which would develop both the industry and the community. That has been done to a measurable extent in the United States with success, but under our present system of rate making any such policy is greatly hampered, and if the Government were alone responsible for making the rates I believe it would be impossible, as a practical measure, to maintain a rate which would be beneficial to one community and apparently antagonistic to another; and I am not in favor of it, either.

We have removed many of the unfair methods employed in the operation of railroads, such as rebates, and yet to successfully operate the railway system of the United States so as to best conserve and build up the interests of the whole country it would be necessary to make rates which would apply to local conditions not only in normal but in abnormal times. For example, if there was a great failure of the crops in the section southwest of Kansas City, it would be desirable to provide a modified rate not only to take material into that section but to transport people from it who might temporarily desire to find employment elsewhere. That general policy has been carried out in some instances where there has been Government ownership, but it has invariably been done in countries where the military system of government has been its vital feature.

If under conditions which exist to-day a shipper objects to the rates charged or the methods employed he has an opportunity to make an appeal to some kind of governmental action, and in time he can obtain redress if he has a reasonably good case; but if there were Government ownership, he would be appealing directly to the maker of the conditions or rate against which he is protesting, and the difficulty of his obtaining satisfaction would be greatly increased. Under present conditions it is perhaps within reason to state there is sufficient prejudice against corporations so that an aggrieved shipper, other things being equal, is given all the satisfaction which his case warrants; but if he were appealing to a Government department, certainly nothing but the merits of his case would have any influence, and in many instances he would find that relief which he can obtain now would be denied him if the situation were changed.

Furthermore, he may find a condition where the department fails to take immediate or even early action. There are quantities of instances in our governmental service now in which obtaining a decision from a department is a long-delayed and difficult process. A decision which will be made by a responsible person in private employment in the course of a week or two weeks' time has been frequently held up for as many months and sometimes for a much longer period. There is not a Senator of experience on this floor who has not been appealed to, and frequently appealed to, by constituents to aid them in getting one of the departments not only to act but to act promply.

Could there be any better illustration of this condition than that found in Alaska, where there has been absolute stagnation of enterprise and upbuilding because of the hard and fixed rules which the Government has imposed? Men have gone there in good faith to develop mines and other industries, have invested their money, only to find their whole enterprise held up, if not destroyed by the policies of the Government, and frequently they have been unable to get a decision even on the merits of their cases until they have lost patience and much money in besieging the department directly interested for a final decision.

Suppose, for example, that a railroad had been badly located and on account of the rates imposed became insolvent or a burden on the community by the imposition of abnormally high rates. In order to keep it in operation under the system which has prevailed heretofore we have been able in such cases to reorganize the property—a drastic step, which has been exceedingly burdensome on the individual stockholder or bondholder, but which has been necessary for the public interest. There are innumerable such cases in our history. What would be the action in such an instance if the Government were the owner instead of the individual? Would all the people who owned the property be willing to have their interests scaled to a basis which would make the property self-supporting and of benefit to those living contiguous or tributary to it, who thereby would be able to get a lower rate and a more efficient service? The possibility of bringing about any such action seems to me would be a deterrent to governmental ownership.

Furthermore, in private management an attempt is made to obtain a fair and correct result, while if transportation facilities were turned over to the Government there would necessarily be a large number of laws passed to restrict and control the methods of operation, financing, and other matters connected with these properties. It is well known that many laws result from compromises, and that even as finally passed they are not satisfactory to any of the elements interested, and are not even right from the standpoint of anyone; yet they are the best results that can be obtained. Even that condition would be an element to be given consideration if such a step as the contemplated one is undertaken.

Any such step means a necessary increase in the machinery of government, the creation of new bureaus, and adding to the number of Government employees. There is pretty nearly a revolt in this country at this time against bureaucracy and the methods which always accompany it. It will necessarily increase our national debt; and if the policy is to extend to the railroads of the country, it will create a national debt aggregating billions, which would remove all possibility of obtaining Government credit on the low basis which now obtains and would mean substantially an equal interest charge to that now required. Furthermore, it would greatly embarrass the Government in financing itself in case of war. Then, again, there would be the possibility of quadrennial change in the higher officers connected with the operation of railroads similar to that found in all of our Government operations to-day, a condition which would mean in the end inefficiency and maladministration.

The fault found under present conditions with Government supervision is that its machinery is cumbersome and that the results obtained from it are much slower than those through private channels. If this is true in the case of supervision and regulation, how much more certain would it be to follow in the case of ownership?

The country which has made the greatest success of State railroads, taking everything into consideration, is Prussia. I do not mean Germany as a whole, because many of the smaller States have not been equally successful as Prussia. In Prussia the operation of State railroads commenced about 1850, and has been increased by purchase and construction until now there are about 22,000 miles of State-owned roads, while the private-owned roads are less than 2,000 miles, and these are generally short lines.

The military system which dominates every activity in Germany has had much to do with the successful development of the Prussian State railroads, and, while many changes have taken place in the manner of organization and conduct of these roads, they have now reached a basis which makes them probably as successful as it is possible for roads to be under such ownership and management. Their administration is primarily under the control of the Imperial Government, but directly under the control of the Prussian minister of public works, the royal railway directories, assisted by advisory councils—a system which has been in operation since 1895. There are 21 royal directories located at prominent points in Prussia. Each directory is a board of directors, having under its control the railway mileage in the district regulated by it. The fixing of rates, both passenger and freight, and administration questions of a general character are in the hands of the directories. Subordinate to each board of directors there is a traffic manager, an operating manager, a manager in charge of technical matters, and a manager in charge of machine shops.

There are, in addition to these organizations, a large number of men connected with the advisory councils and other administrative bodies. There are also general matters in charge of particular directories. For example, one of these will have charge of all car distribution in Prussia, another rolling stock, another the purchase of materials, another the workshop supplies, another all technical questions connected with railroading, like block signals, and so forth. Of the advisory councils there are nine. These councils are made up of representatives of the chambers of commerce, boards of trade, and other industrial organizations, supposedly having intimate knowledge of the particular trade with which they are connected.

There is a national council as well as the circuit councils. It has nine circuit councils. The national council consists of 40 members. In addition to the bodies to which I have referred, there is a general conference of German railroads, composed of members representing all the railways in the German Empire. There are more than 300 members in this council. It is a voluntary advisory body, and has to do with the railroads of the German Empire what the national council has in Prussia. In a word, the Prussian system is under the direct management of advisory councils, directories, and the minister of public works.

On April 1, 1905, there were 400,000 workmen and officials employed on the Prussian State railways. When we stop to consider that there were at that time less than 22,000 miles of road in operation, we find that that would mean about 18 men to a mile, which would mean, if there were the same number of employees on American railways, substantially 4,500,000 men, instead of the 1,700,000 now employed. The capitalization of the Prussian system was, in 1905, $2,225,000,000, or about $106,000 per mile. The net profits in the previous year were 7.12 per cent and in 1905 7.17 per cent on the capitalization. The earnings are distributed as follows: First, pay the interest on the railway debt; second, a small sum may be used to meet any deficit in the ordinary State budget; third, three-fourths of 1 per cent of the total railway debt for a sinking fund; fourth, any balance may be invested in new lines or paid to the Government for general expenses. From 1881 to 1899, $350,000,000 was turned over to the Government, and for the year 1905 this amounted to $158,000,000.

I have here a table showing the plan of operation of the Prussian railway system, which I think is of sufficient interest to ask that it be included in my remarks without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered, without objection.

The table referred to is as follows:

OUTLINE OF PRUSSIAN RAILWAY ADMINISTRATION.

1. Minister of public works, an under-secretary, and staff.	1. 21 royal directories, each directory having 4 departments.	(a) Traffic. (b) Operating. (c) Technical. (d) Machine shop.
	2. Construction in the hands of special construction departments appointed by the minister and usually under the control of the directory.
	3. Certain directories have entire charge of special work for the whole system—car distribution, purchase of rails and ties, accounting, purchase of rolling stock, appointing minor officials, etc.
2. National advisory council.	9 circuit councils, composed of representatives of commercial bodies, which make recommendations to directories.	A standing committee of the council prepares matter for its consideration.
3. Imperial and international advisory bodies.	1. General conference of German railways considers interstate matters with the help of its—	(a) Tariff commission. (b) Committee of shippers.
	2. Society of German railway managements considers international traffic questions, under Berne treaty.
4. Imperial railway office at Berlin.	Has general supervision over foregoing bodies as far as they affect the German Empire as a whole.

Mr. WEEKS. There are fundamental differences between the conditions which prevail in Prussia and in the United States. For example, the average length of haul in Prussia is 71 miles, in the United States 244 miles. The average shipment in the United States is larger than in Prussia. Wages, building material, and all other material used in operating the roads command substantially different prices in the two countries. While the passenger traffic is much denser in Prussia and averages a lower grade, it consists of three classes, and it is therefore difficult to make comparisons. The first-class fare is about twice as high as in the United States, the second class somewhat higher, while the third is materially lower; but before any comparison can be made which is in any sense reasonable we must take into account the difference in the political conditions which prevail in the two countries.

I ought to say of the average passenger rate in Prussia, taking everything into consideration and making the comparisons as nearly equitable as possible—that is to say, including the price paid for a ticket for going into a Prussian railroad station to see a friend or a member of the family off, taking into consideration the charge for carrying baggage on passenger trains, and many other differences which exist in the method of management—the average Prussian railroad passenger rate is about nine-tenths what it is in the United States. On the other hand, the freight rate is almost twice as high as it is in the United States. My investigations, which are somewhat complete along that line, which I intend to submit as an argument against the operation of transportation companies by governments, indicate that this is invariably the result of such operation. It does not make any difference whether it is in republican France or in autocratic Russia, the results are always the same. When the Government operates a system it always means an increased number of employees. It always means increased wages to employees. It always means in European countries a greatly increased sick list, where the rate of pay is maintained when the person is on the sick roll, and it invariably means a reduction in the passenger-traffic rate—not in the freight-traffic rate, because there are comparatively few people involved in that, but everyone is involved in the passenger-rate charge. In every case I have investigated there has been a resulting decrease in the passenger rate whenever the Government has undertaken the operation of the system.

The net result is that with the exception of the Prussian system to which I am referring, and possibly one or two railroad systems in Japan, I can not find a single instance of large operations by governments which are profitable under the conditions which are imposed. In most cases they impose a heavy tax on the people. As an example of that I will instance France, where there are seven main railway lines. Five of them are privately owned and two of them are owned by the Government and operated by the Government. In the case of the Government operation, at one time there were more than 40 per cent of the employees on the sick list receiving full pay. In the case of the Western Railroad, taken over by the Government, the operating expenses were about 65 per cent while under private operation; the operating expenses jumped to 88 per cent of the gross revenue in three years after the Government took control. Last year the Republic of France had to appropriate $16,000,000 to make up for the deficit on account of the operation of those two railroad systems, while every privately owned railroad system in France was reasonably successful and profitable.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator seems to have made a careful study of the Prussian system, but he is——

Mr. WEEKS. I have not finished. I am going on to discuss it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; but I wanted to ask him this question: Is he not, however, at fault in drawing the conclusion that the freight rates are higher because it is a Government-owned institution? Is it not a fact that the freight haul is much shorter in Prussia than in the United States—less than one-half the length—and that the terminal charges in each case must inevitably be just as great? Is it not also a fact that the earnings of the Prussian roads constitute a part of the revenue of the Government and that the net earnings are therefore permitted to be larger than the net earnings of railroads in the United States? Is not that an answer to the statement that freight rates are higher?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the Senator's question has merit in it. There are features of that kind which must be taken into consideration before any fair comparison can be made.

The territory surrounding the section of the country in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware is not different in most of its characteristics from Prussia in density of population and in other qualities. If a comparison were made of the railroads in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware with the Prussian system it would be found that the Prussian rates were something like 50 per cent higher. What I wanted to point out particularly was that where the interests of a large number of people were involved there was invariably pressure so that the rates were reduced, and in the question of labor conditions the number of employees and wages paid were materially increased. So the Government operation, especially in a country like ours, would mean all the political pressure with which the Senator from Nebraska is familiar, and which, in my judgment, when a great body of employees became involved, could not be resisted.

The great advance which Prussia has made over other countries where there are State railroads is in arriving at a method of flexibility in making freight rates. The Prussian system is not materially simpler than our own; in fact, it does not seem to me to be as simple in many respects. There is a great variety of schedules, many of them special schedules; in fact, two-thirds of the freight rates in Prussia are based on special conditions which have to do with the industrial development of the Empire. These are arranged with the purpose of regulating industry and commerce through the agency of freight rates, and in many cases these rates are much lower than those prevailing in other countries, because they are intended as an encouragement to specified industry, such as protecting German railroads against foreign competition, to modify the severity of unusual emergencies or calamities, build up German shipping and seaports, as far as possible encourage and promote German foreign trade, and to discourage the importations of articles which are produced in Germany. Instead of giving a direct subsidy to many of their steamship lines, the railroads of Germany are used as an encourager of traffic, furnishing a rate to interior points so much lower than that given to ocean lines of other countries, that the method followed amounts to a very large subsidy compared with which probably no other country has ever contemplated.

Not only is this preferential rate given in the case of general locations to build up an industry like shipbuilding, but it is used in transporting raw materials to points where they are most needed, both to aid agriculture and manufacturing, and they are extended in an attempt to promote particular districts—to carry coal, for instance, from the point of production to certain definite ports. To carry a product from a point where it might be under normal rates sent to market by way of foreign railroads and through foreign ports, a rate so low that this can not be done is furnished in order to transport it over German railroads and through a German port. This method of counteracting ordinary conditions is used in the case of a crop failure or any other similar calamity.

"The building up of the German merchant marine and German harbors has been one of the marvels of the last quarter of a century. All German States have granted preferential rates to German ports, such as Hamburg and Bremen, at the expense of ports in all other parts of Europe. Preferential rates from the interior sections of Germany on many products, both imported and exported, are very common, and an attempt has been made especially in this way to build up the German northeast harbors and to take business away from the harbors of other countries, not only on the North Sea but on the Black and Adriatic Seas. A similar course has been followed in developing the German foreign possessions, very much lower rates being given on products from the interior of Germany to German possessions, however distant, than those charged by any competing transportation line. The rates charged for transporting to the interior of Germany foreign agricultural products are very materially higher than those charged for transporting agriculture products within the German Empire or to any other German Province, the whole scheme of conducting the German State railroads being to develop the industrial and agricultural activities of that Empire, to create and make profitable ocean steamship lines, and to build up the harbors of Germany.

There are four classes of passenger service for ordinary passenger trains and three for express trains, the fares ranging from three-fourths of a cent a mile to 3 cents a mile, with special rates on return tickets, and an especially low rate for workmen's tickets. Various groups and classes of people are given special rates, like Sunday travelers, visitors to educational institutions and bathing establishments, invalids who have been in war, German soldiers, the sick and blind, deaf and dumb, and those connected with orphan asylums, special provision being made for all such classes.

While it is difficult, and indeed practically impossible, to make a comparison between Prussian freight rates and those of other countries, in a comparison made in 1902 it was found that the charge per ton-mile in Prussia was 1.24 cents; in France, 1.33 cents; in Austria, 1.26 cents; in Hungary, 1.24 cents; and for the same year the charge per ton-mile in the United States was 0.76 cent. Yet even this is not a fair comparison, on account of the longer distances freight is hauled in the United States and its more bulky character; but it can not be denied that the average American freight rate is materially lower than the German rate. On the other hand, the American passenger rate is materially higher than the Prussian rate. In the United States it is almost exactly 2 cents a mile, while in Prussia it is about ninety-three hundredths of 1 cent a mile. But, as I have stated, taking all of the elements into consideration, it is about nine-tenths as high in Prussia as it is in the United States. This is undoubtedly due, however, to the fact that about fifteen-sixteenths of the Prussian travel is in the lower classes and is influenced by the great number of special fares that are given in Prussia and to the fact that much of the suburban travel in Prussian cities is carried on steam roads, while in the United States this travel very largely uses trolleys.

Financially the Prussian railways have been successful. In 1905 the passenger service yielded a gross income of 1,618,000,000 marks. The operating expenses were 983,000,000 marks, leaving a surplus of 634,000,000 marks, or about $150,000,000. After charging off interest, special funds, and other items in accordance with the arrangements made, there was a net profit to the State that year of $120,000,000. The railways of Prussia are still inferior to those of the United States in steel cars, terminal facilities, and many other technical improvements, but compared with other European railroads they are showing a distinct improvement from year to year.

The recommendation of the Postmaster General for the Government to purchase telegraph and telephone lines naturally leads us to turn to some other country where such a policy has been in operation for a considerable time to see what the results have been and if the conditions correspond relatively to conditions in this country. Telegraph and telephone systems would more nearly compare with those of other countries of equal density of population than would the railroads or other public-service corporations.

In the case of telephones it is impossible to make a comparison at this time, because the National Telephone Co.'s plant of Great Britain has so recently been taken over by the Government, at a cost of sixty-two and a half million dollars that the results of its operation, compared with its operation under a private company in this country, can not be made; but it is significant that already the Government has undertaken the expenditure of $2,000,000 to be spent in providing additional facilities, including material additions to underground and overhead wires; in other words, extending the service. That is one of the faults which may be charged to a governmental system in every case; and the disposition to extend the service to localities where it is not profitable is much more pronounced in the case of government than in the case of private service. If it were possible to earn reasonable returns on an extension of one-sixth of the service, it would seem reasonable to assume that the corporation which owned this company would have made the extension long ago. The probabilities are that the extensions will not be profitable and the service will have to be carried by earnings from some other source.

In the case of the telegraph systems, however, comparisons may be made. In the year 1912–13 the receipts from the telegraph system of Great Britain amounted to £3,113,894, to which should be added £53,516, the estimated value of the service to other departments of the Government. On the other side of the ledger, the salaries, wages, and so forth, paid amounted to £2,781,000, the percentage of salaries to total revenue being 87.82 per cent. This percentage of salaries to total revenue compares with 82.43 per cent five years ago, with 67.75 in 1900, with 61.30 in 1890, with 44.02 in 1880, and 39.13 in 1870. In the meantime superannuations and noneffective charges have increased from £19,000 in 1880 to £184,000 last year. Maintenance charges have, on the other hand, not increased materially, being £292,000 in 1880, £440,000 in 1890, £691,000 in 1900, and only £392,000 last year, the percentage of maintenance to total revenue being at the lowest point last year—12.38 per cent—since 1880, when it was 17.88 per cent. The total expenditures for all purposes last year were £4,124,000, showing a deficit of £957,566, without allowing any interest on the cost of the establishment. I want particularly to call attention to the figures. There was a loss of $5,000,000 in the operation of the system, because the operating expenses had increased from 39 per cent in 1870 to 87 per cent last year. Incidentally it may be remarked that there has been a deficit during the last five years of an average over a million pounds a year, and that the system has not shown a surplus in its operation since 1880 without, as I have said, figuring any interest on the original cost of the system.

Is there not almost a certainty that the proportional part of the labor cost of maintaining any public operation in a country like ours is sure to increase quite as rapidly as in the case of Great Britain, and does it not mean that we would be doing what is being done in Great Britain—that is, paying a large subsidy to those who send telegraph messages?—for the service shows a large deficit, as I have stated.

Mr. President, I now want to consider for a moment a few comparisons in this country between municipal and corporation organization ownership and management. I can not undertake very many of these to-day, but I will give a few instances.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. SHERMAN. In the account of the public ownership of the utility last mentioned is there anything written off for the depreciation of physical property or set aside for improvements, so as to keep the property in sound operating condition?

Mr. WEEKS. I have just stated that the maintenance charge, which would include what was intended for depreciation charges, was the lowest last year that it has been since 1880. It has been constantly decreasing, while the operating charge has been constantly increasing. In not a single year since 1880 has there been any net revenue from the system, without figuring any interest whatever on the cost of the investment. That is the result of the operation of the Government-owned English telegraph.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, may I inquire further, is there a privately owned system of like proportions successfully managed on the basis given in this public undertaking? Does the Senator from Massachusetts know of any such?

Mr. WEEKS. I think that the telegraph system and the telephone system of the United States would both be comparable. In both instances they are operated at rates which compare favorably with the foreign rates and have always earned some reasonable return on the capital invested. That matter I intend to go into in some detail later on to show the advantage of private ownership over public ownership. Incidentally, I think everybody admits that in this country the railroad service, the telegraph service, and the telephone service are better than is the service in European countries. I do not recall a single person who is familiar with the general service conducted under Government operation in Europe who does not come to that conclusion; I think it is universal.

We have in the city of Boston a privately owned ferry system, and parallel to it and running from practically the same wharf a municipally owned system. The municipally owned system is shorter than that of the private company, being about half the length, but the two systems are parallel in their operations and serve the same classes of people. Their conduct would naturally be along the same general lines. The private company has been in operation since colonial days and has never failed to earn a dividend until the year 1910. The reason it has not earned a dividend since is because the city of Boston has constructed a tunnel, which has affected alike the privately owned and the municipally owned ferry; but up to 1910, for practically 150 years, it had always earned dividends on the capital invested.

The municipally owned ferry was purchased in 1870, and since then has been conducted by the municipality. It has never earned any return on the money. During the 44 years it has been so operated by the city it has cost almost twice as much as has been received from transportation revenues, including in that the cost of the original enterprise and a reasonable rate of interest on the money. It has never paid operating expenses.

The reasons are largely because of the methods of operation. For example, a crew on the municipal ferryboat consists of nine men, while a crew on the privately operated ferry consists of five men, the ferryboats being almost exactly of the same size. The executive officers in the municipal department outnumber private-company officers five to one. Expenses for employees, for overhead charges, and for every other purpose connected with the municipal ferry have been from 50 per cent greater to five times greater, as in the case of the administrative officers, and the tolls, in proportion to the distance run, have been greater on the municipal ferry than they have been on the privately owned ferry; and yet the statement which I have made relating to the comparative earnings is greatly in favor of the privately owned company.

The same general conditions apply as to the ferries in New York. There are two municipally operated ferries in New York City, one from the Battery to Staten Island and the other from Thirty-ninth Street to South Brooklyn. According to the statement made by the department of ferries of New York City last year the operating expenses of the municipal ferries were $1,360,266, while the receipts were $1,096,415; and for a long term of years the results have been substantially what they were last year.

In every case, as far as I can tell from the reports which I have in hand—and I shall ask at some time to put in the RECORD the tables involved—there has been a deficit in operation. In New York there are a considerable number of privately operated or corporation-operated ferries, some of them connected with the railroads, or in one or two instances operated independently of the railroads. Until the tubes were constructed in New York I understand all privately operated ferries were successful. Since the tubes have been constructed ferries operated in competition with them have not been successful, because they have lost very largely in passenger traffic; but they have carried the vehicle traffic as before, and it has been necessary to continue their operations substantially as was done before. I have here, however, two or three instances showing the comparisons which should be used in arriving at the economies resulting from Government operation. They show, almost exactly as they do in the case of Boston, a very much larger number of men employed on a ferryboat, a very much larger overhead charge, and somewhat lower rates in the case of the New York privately owned ferryboats than in the case of the municipally owned ferryboats; but in every instance that I have, while the municipal ferries have been operated unprofitably, the privately owned ferries parallel to them or operating in the same general field have resulted in financial success.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what the rates of fare, respectively, are in the two cases, the municipally owned and the privately owned ferries?

Mr. WEEKS. It would be impossible to make an exact comparison in the case of the Staten Island ferry, because it is much longer.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Yes; it is a longer ferry.

Mr. WEEKS. In proportion to the mileage, the fares on the privately owned ferries are lower than they are on the municipally owned ferries, but——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. There is a difference in length, of course.

Mr. WEEKS. There is a difference in length, but the comparison is better in the case of the Thirty-ninth Street and South Brooklyn Ferry, which is a municipally owned ferry. In that location, where 9 men are employed on a privately owned ferryboat, 12 men are employed on a municipally owned ferryboat. I do not undertake to say that in one case the number is too great or that in the other too few men are employed, but I do undertake to say that I can not find a single instance where, in comparison, the number of men employed is not greater on the municipally owned ferry than on the privately owned ferry.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator has stated the greater number of men employed in the case of the municipally owned ferry as being a reason for additional cost of operation. I should like to ask the Senator if he has any showing with reference to the wages paid in either case and as to whether that has made a difference in the operating expenses?

Mr. WEEKS. I have not an exact comparison in either one of these cases, but, substantially speaking, the wages paid are somewhat higher on the municipally owned ferries than they are on the privately owned ferries. On the French railroads, for instance, in the case of the Government-owned roads, the wages are higher than they are on the privately owned and operated roads, and the number of employees is very much greater.

One of the most striking cases of change in that respect comes in the case of the Western Railroad, which was taken over in 1907. In three years' time the operating expenses jumped from 62 per cent to 88 per cent of the gross earnings, and almost entirely on account of the employment of more men. For instance, there were 97,000 men employed on the Western Railroad the year it was taken over. Three years after there were 138,000 men employed, and of those 138,000 men more than 40 per cent were on the sick list and receiving full pay. As I have stated before, the French Government, operating two of the seven systems in France, last year had to make up by general taxation a deficit in operation of $16,000,000.

Mr. STERLING. I will ask the Senator, then, if it follows that the public generally were benefited by the higher wages paid or the greater number of men employed under Government operation?

Mr. WEEKS. I think the universal testimony is that the operation is not beneficial to the public; that the public does not get better service as a result of this. It is beneficial to the men directly employed. I think there is no doubt about that.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, is the Senator sure about that? I ask the Senator whether he does not leave out of consideration the demoralizing effect upon the men themselves of securing their positions through political influence and pressure, instead of securing their opportunities to make their living as the great body of their countrymen do? Is it of benefit to the men who get their places and hold their places in that way?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I did not intend to take into consideration the moral results, the depletion of the moral fiber of the population as the result of such a system. I understood that the question of the Senator from South Dakota meant: "Does anybody receive any direct and immediate benefit in a pecuniary way?" I say that the employees, without any question, do receive some benefit, and that invariably a great many more people are employed.

During the delivery of Mr. WEEKS's speech,

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me to submit a conference report, not to take him off the floor?

Mr. WEEKS. I will yield to the Senator to submit the report, provided I am not taken off the floor.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is very important that the conference report should be agreed to. There is no objection to it, I think.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will take it by unanimous consent that the Senator from Massachusetts is not taken off the floor.

Mr. BRISTOW. May I inquire what is the conference report?

Mr. OVERMAN. It is on the urgent deficiency appropriation bill. I will state to the Senator the reason why I want to have it disposed of is because the farmers are complaining that they are not getting their money for the killing of their cattle infected with the foot-and-mouth disease. That is the principal item. Of course there are several other items, but they do not amount to much.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. OVERMAN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20241) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1915 and prior years, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 3.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1 and 5, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$100,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amended paragraph insert the following:

"For the emergency caused by the infectious nature and continued spread of the destructive disease of citrous trees known as citrus canker, by conducting such investigations of the nature and means of communication of the disease, and by applying such methods of eradication or control of the disease as in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture may be necessary, $35,000; and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to pay such expense and employ such persons and means, and to cooperate with such authorities of the States concerned, organizations of growers, or individuals as he may deem necessary to accomplish such purpose."

And the Senate agree to the same.

LEE S. OVERMAN,
N. P. BRYAN,
REED SMOOT,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
C. L. BARTLETT,
F. H. GILLETT,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am much obliged to the Senator from Massachusetts.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2337) to create the coast guard by combining therein the existing Life-Saving Service and Revenue-Cutter Service, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also requested the Senate to furnish the House with a duplicate engrossed copy of the bill (S. 2334) for the relief of S. W. Langhorne and the legal representatives of H. S. Howell, the bill having been lost or destroyed since its reference to the Committee on Claims of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills:

S. 4012. An act to increase the limit of cost of the United States public building at Grand Junction, Colo.; and

S. 6309. An act to establish the Rocky Mountain National Park, in the State of Colorado, and for other purposes.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KERN presented a petition of Typographical Union No. 266, of Elkhart, Ind., praying for the enactment of legislation to regulate the interstate commerce of convict-made goods, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the congregation of the Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church, of Elkhart, Ind., and a petition of the congregation of the Trinity Lutheran Church, of Elkhart, Ind., praying for the Federal censorship of moving-picture films, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Columbus, Ind., praying for the repeal of the present migratory bird law, which was referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game.

He also presented a petition of Local Union No. 1243, United Mine Workers of America, of Boonville, Ind., praying for a further extension of the work of Bureau of Mines, which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. NELSON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Minnesota, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Minnesota, praying that anti-Catholic publications be excluded from the mail, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of the faculty of Macalester College, St. Paul, Minn., remonstrating against any increase of armament by the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ROOT presented petitions of sundry citizens of Rochester, Wainscott, Brooklyn, Saratoga Springs, Troy, Buffalo, Albany, Cohocton, Syracuse, Kingston, and Schenectady, all in the State of New York, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented petitions of Rev. H. F. Lange and sundry other citizens of Walla Walla; of A. Mierow and sundry other citizens of Tacoma; and of John O'Neil and sundry other citizens of Spokane, all in the State of Washington, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions of the Harford Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Tacoma and of various organizations representing 500 people of Tweedie, all in the State of Washington, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

A bill (S. 7351) granting an increase of pension to David Parker (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. OLIVER:

A bill (S. 7352) granting an increase of pension to Frederick Ickley (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. STONE:

A bill (S. 7353) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Brewer; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BURLEIGH:

A bill (S. 7354) granting an increase of pension to Roscoe B. Smith; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. O'GORMAN:

A bill (S. 7355) granting an increase of pension to Louisa Smith Fletcher (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 7356) granting an increase of pension to Samuel H. Bingham;

A bill (S. 7357) granting an increase of pension to Peter S. McIntosh; and

A bill (S. 7358) granting an increase of pension to James H. Gallup; to the Committee on Pensions.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted five amendments intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill (H. R. 20189), which were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 6856) to authorize the United States, acting through a shipping board, to subscribe to the capital stock of a corporation to be organized under the laws of the United States or of a State thereof or of the District of Columbia to purchase, construct, equip, maintain, and operate merchant vessels in the foreign trade of the United States, and for other purposes.

After the conclusion of Mr. WEEKS's speech,

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Owen	Stone
Brady	Hollis	Page	Sutherland
Bristow	Hughes	Pittman	Swanson
Bryan	James	Pomerene	Thomas
Burton	Johnson	Ransdell	Thornton
Catron	Jones	Reed	Tillman
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Robinson	Townsend
Clapp	Kern	Root	Walsh
Colt	Lee, Md.	Sheppard	Warren
Cummins	Lodge	Shively	Weeks
Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Simmons	White
Gallinger	Nelson	Smith, Md.	Williams
Gore	Norris	Smoot	Works
Gronna	Oliver	Sterling

Mr. THORNTON. I was requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the remainder of the day.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah has moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SMOOT. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). Has the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. DU PONT. I will withhold my vote, as I am paired with that Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], who seems to be absent, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH].

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). Has the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with that Senator, and in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. As he is absent from the Senate, I am compelled to refrain from voting.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TILLMAN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (after having voted in the negative). I notice that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], with whom I am paired, is not here. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and let my vote stand.

Mr. WALSH. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] to the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. HOLLIS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "nay."

Mr. DU PONT. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (after having voted in the negative). I am just advised that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD], with whom I am paired, is absent. I therefore withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 44, as follows:

YEAS—25.

Brady	du Pont	Perkins	Townsend
Bristow	Gronna	Root	Warren
Burton	Jones	Sherman	Weeks
Catron	Lodge	Smith, Mich.	Works
Clark, Wyo.	Nelson	Smoot
Colt	Oliver	Sterling
Cummins	Page	Sutherland

NAYS—44.

Ashurst	Kern	Ransdell	Smith, Md.
Bryan	La Follette	Reed	Stone
Camden	Lane	Robinson	Swanson
Chamberlain	Lee, Md.	Saulsbury	Thomas
Clapp	Martin, Va.	Shafroth	Thompson
Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard	Thornton
Gore	Overman	Shields	Tillman
Hollis	Owen	Shively	Vardaman
Hughes	Pittman	Simmons	Walsh
James	Poindexter	Smith, Ariz.	White
Johnson	Pomerene	Smith, Ga.	Williams

NOT VOTING—27.

Bankhead	Culberson	Kenyon	Newlands
Borah	Dillingham	Lee, Tenn.	Norris
Brandegee	Fall	Lewis	O'Gorman
Burleigh	Gallinger	Lippitt	Penrose
Chilton	Goff	McCumber	Smith, S. C.
Clarke, Ark.	Hardwick	McLean	Stephenson
Crawford	Hitchcock	Myers

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

COAST GUARD.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill S. 2337, entitled "An act to create the coast guard by combining therein the existing Life-Saving Service and Revenue-Cutter Service," which were, on page 2, line 3, strike out "as a part of" and insert "by"; on page 2, line 3, after "Department," insert ": Provided, That no provision of this act shall be construed as giving any officer of either the coast guard or the Navy military or other control at any time over any vessel, officer, or man of the other service except by direction of the President"; on page 3, line 2, strike out "one from each service"; on page 3, line 18, after "organizations," insert "The provisions of the act entitled 'An act to regulate enlistments and punishments in the United States Revenue-Cutter Service,' approved May 26, 1906, shall apply to and govern the coast guard"; on page 4, line 5, after "affecting," insert "rank"; on page 4, lines 5 and 6, strike out "allowance" and insert "allowances"; on page 4, line 19, strike out "providing" and insert "in so far as they provide"; on page 4, line 24, strike out "may"; on page 4, line 25, after "application," insert "and as to commissioned officers upon approval by the Secretary of the Treasury, may"; on page 5, line 11, after "service," insert "for any purpose"; on page 6, line 12, after "districts," insert ", subject to the authority of the captain commandant"; on page 6, after line 24, insert "SEC. 6. That any person using any vessel in the coast guard service for private purposes in violation of law shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined $1,000"; and on page 7, line 1, strike out "SEC. 6" and insert "SEC. 7."

Mr. RANSDELL. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SMOOT. I notice from the bill and the amendments made by the House that there are more provisions proposed as amendments than there were in the original Senate bill. I do not believe the Senate ought to pass a measure of this kind without some kind of an examination. I ask the Senator from Louisiana if he will not allow the amendments to be printed and go over until to-morrow morning, so that we may see what they are?

Mr. RANSDELL. Certainly; I have no objection. I think the amendments will be found satisfactory, but I have not the slightest objection to having them go over.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the bill be printed with the House amendments numbered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered. The amendments can only be taken up by unanimous consent, anyway.

ORDER FOR RECESS.

Mr. KERN. I move that at not later than 6 o'clock this evening the Senate shall take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 6856) to authorize the United States, acting through a shipping board, to subscribe to the capital stock of a corporation to be organized under the laws of the United States or of a State thereof or of the District of Columbia, to purchase, construct, equip, maintain, and operate merchant vessels in the foreign trade of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that if I am fortunate enough to secure the recognition of the Chair to-morrow I shall address the Senate on the amendment which I presented to the ship-purchase bill yesterday with regard to the ships to be purchased under the act.

Mr. GALLINGER. I present a proposed amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill, which I ask to have printed and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a number of reports here——

Mr. SMOOT. I did not hear what was the last request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was a proposed amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill which the Senator from New Hampshire asked might be printed and referred to the committee, and the Chair said, without objection, that that action would be taken. Is there any objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I object to any kind of routine business being transacted unless we have a morning hour. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he will not withdraw the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have an impression that under the rule I can pass up the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will examine the rule.

Mr. GALLINGER. However, I will withdraw it for the present.

Mr. ROOT obtained the floor.

Mr. SHIVELY. Let me inquire of the Senator from Utah whether he will object to my putting in a favorable report from the Committee on Pensions?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York has been recognized.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I hope I will be permitted to accomplish the purpose for which I rose. I rose for the purpose of giving notice that on the morning of Saturday the 23d, immediately after the conclusion of the routine morning business, or if the present oppressive and unjustifiable fiction of continuing the legislative day of Friday the 15th of January be continued over until the 23d of January, then as soon after the convening of the session as I can obtain recognition I shall make some observations upon the ship-purchase bill.

Mr. SHIVELY. I ask unanimous consent to present a favorable report from the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ROOT, Mr. SMOOT, and Mr. LODGE. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to Senate bill 6856.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move to take up for present consideration Senate bill 392, known as the bill to create in the War Department and Navy Department, respectively, a volunteer officers' retired list.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Regular order!

Mr. TOWNSEND. Upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. OVERMAN. Regular order!

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). In the absence of the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], with whom I have a general pair, I will withhold my vote. If I were free to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I will again announce my pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] and withhold my vote.

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH], as before, to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I transfer my pair as previously stated and vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Again transferring my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON], I vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. He being absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement made upon the last roll call, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DU PONT. I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD], and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] to the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 37, as follows:

YEAS—29.

Brady	Cummins	Page	Sutherland
Bristow	du Pont	Perkins	Townsend
Burton	Gallinger	Poindexter	Warren
Catron	Gronna	Root	Weeks
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Sherman	Works
Clapp	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Mich.
Clark, Wyo.	Nelson	Smoot
Colt	Oliver	Sterling

NAYS—37.

Ashurst	Lee, Md.	Saulsbury	Swanson
Bryan	Lewis	Shafroth	Thompson
Camden	Martin, Va.	Sheppard	Thornton
Fletcher	Overman	Shields	Vardaman
Gore	Owen	Shively	Walsh
Hollis	Pittman	Simmons	White
Hughes	Pomerene	Smith, Ariz.	Williams
James	Ransdell	Smith, Ga.
Johnson	Reed	Smith, Md.
Kern	Robinson	Stone

NOT VOTING—30.

Bankhead	Dillingham	Lea, Tenn.	O'Gorman
Borah	Fall	Lippitt	Penrose
Brandegee	Goff	Lodge	Smith, S. C.
Burleigh	Hardwick	McCumber	Stephenson
Chilton	Hitchcock	McLean	Thomas
Clarke, Ark.	Jones	Myers	Tillman
Crawford	La Follette	Newlands
Culberson	Lane	Norris

So Mr. TOWNSEND's motion was rejected.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I made the motion to take up the Volunteer officers' bill for the reason that during all of to-day and all of yesterday the majority Members of the Senate have manifested absolutely no interest in the ship-purchase bill, so that for most of the time there were not to exceed two Democratic Senators in the Chamber, notwithstanding the fact that one of the most important bills that has been before the Senate in years was being discussed by some of the most distinguished and best-informed Senators in this body. Senators who spoke upon the question with the authority of ability and understanding. The majority Members can not in good faith declare that there has been an effort by the minority to filibuster during the discussion up to date, because the RECORD will disclose that nothing has been said that ought not to have been said in the hearing of Senators who are supposed to be deliberating upon this great new scheme which the President proposes to make the policy of the United States.

To me it seems strange and unwarranted that Democratic Senators should declare that a filibuster is being prosecuted by the minority, when the fact is that the filibuster lies with the majority. Before the debate is fairly open, before the real bill is in the Senate, Democratic Senators enter into an agreement that they will neither discuss the measure nor listen to its discussion. The Chair in obedience to the wish of the majority announces the monstrous doctrine that if a Senator who discovers that less than a half dozen Senators are in the Chamber and demands that a quorum be present, such demand shall terminate the speech of the Senator having the floor. Why, sir, the strength of the Senate is its powers of deliberation. Here in the past arguments for and against measures proposed for legislation have been presented without restriction, and the result has been of highest good to the country. But from now on arguments will be presented not for the purpose of winning a cause, not to produce conviction in the minds of Senators, but to empty seats, and bills must be defeated not by the conquest of reason but by the triumph of physical endurance.

Mr. President, I feel that this is a most serious question that is now before the United States Senate. I would have been pleased to have had the proponents of the measure present their arguments, rather than have them rely upon a speech of a Cabinet officer printed in the RECORD as their reason for its passage. Certainly there ought to be some reasons for enacting this legislation, and Senators who advocate it should stand up and present them to the Senate and to the country; but, Mr. President, it has been declared that the majority side have votes enough to pass the bill; and if rumor is correct, they do not propose to occupy any time of Congress in explaining it or in giving reasons for its passage.

There is another matter that I am going to present to the Senate now and upon which I am going to ask for a vote.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRYAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield for a question.

Mr. BRISTOW. Before the Senator from Michigan proceeds I should like to inquire what, in his opinion, can be the reason why Senators who are apparently in favor of this legislation refuse to give any reasons why it should be enacted into law?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. We do not need to do so.

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; you act without reason.

Mr. President, I do not care to speculate on the reasons or lack of reasons which actuate Senators, but I think I am safe in saying—what, I believe, everybody knows—that not many of the Senators on the other side of the Chamber believe that this proposition is just or wise or that it will be of advantage to the country.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. The only reason, therefore, that I can find for it is that the Executive has ordered that the bill shall be passed

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield for a question.

Mr. FLETCHER. I should like to ask the Senator if he has taken, or if he can ascertain whether the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] has taken, the trouble to read the report of the committee on this bill, Report No. 841, giving reasons why the bill should be enacted?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, that report means nothing; the committee itself was not satisfied with it, for after the bill had been reported a substitute was presented to the Senate and was read to the Senate for the first time at the request of a Republican Senator. Oh, the reasons! You do not dare to argue this bill. You have no reasons of your own. Your better judgment condemns the measure. You are supporting it without reason of your own, and silence is evidently less embarrassing than speech.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask the Senator from Michigan whether or not he thinks that one of the reasons for the majority side declining to debate this bill is that the bill upon which we are finally to vote is not yet before the Senate? I also ask the Senator whether or not he has seen in the public press a statement that the bill which is finally to be brought before us is now being formulated in the Democratic caucus?

Mr. GALLINGER. Incubated.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am so informed; and I think no one will deny it. The bill itself, as the coercive action of the caucus shall finally determine, has not yet been decided upon. The majority do not know exactly what the President wants. They hope to find out later. They have, however, presented a bill; and yet, while it is being discussed by those who know why it should not be passed, Democratic Senators who assume responsibility for legislation refuse to listen.

But, Mr. President, I wish to present another matter to the Senate. I have been receiving letters from the constituents of certain Democratic Senators, stating that I am reported as standing in the way of the so-called war-claims bill. Nobody has asked that that bill be considered. A similar bill was passed in the last Congress by a Republican Senate, although it was largely for the benefit of the South. The House passed a different measure. A conference on the two bills was had, but the Democratic House refused to agree to the Senate bill and its death was the result. I have been receiving letters, as I have said, in which the writers state that their Senators and Representatives have written them that that bill could not be considered because of Republican opposition, and especially because of the objection of the junior Senator from Michigan.

Mr. President, the war-claims bill passed the House in December, 1913. It was placed upon the calendar of the Senate on the 20th day of March, 1914. There has been plenty of opportunity to take up that measure and consider it on its merits, but no effort has been made to pass it. I have not objected to it; I was one of the conferees on the bill in the last Congress and urged its passage. I have not objected to it since. It is a bill which, like the Volunteer officers' bill, to which you have refused consideration, represents the honor of the Government. Both are efforts to compel the Nation to pay its honest debts. Not gratuity, but justice, is demanded. Every claim in the bill which I shall propose has been favorably acted upon by the Court of Claims. They are just claims, just accounts against the Government, and in order that Senators may have an opportunity to vote for this measure, in order that their constituents may know that the junior Senator from Michigan does not stand in the way of its passage, I am going to ask for its consideration now. You can pass it if you wish. We shall see who stands in its way.

Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 8846, Calendar No. 298, its title being "An act making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, and under the provisions of section No. 151 of the act approved March 3, 1911, commonly known as the Judicial Code."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan to proceed to the consideration of the bill, the title of which he has just stated.

Mr. TOWNSEND. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, there is a right to debate that motion, is there not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion having been made after 2 o'clock, it is subject to debate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan has just displayed, in a manner beyond any other recent illustration of the fact, the Republican contempt for the Democratic intellect. He expects us to be gudgeons to bite at artificial flies. He thinks he can appeal to this side of the House upon a purely sectional question—or one that he, at any rate, says is for the major part sectional—to lay aside an agreed program of business. Nothing could explain the Senator's conduct except the arrogant supposition on the part of the average Republican, unconsciously oozing out of him, that the average Democrat is a fool.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I call attention to the rule. I do not think the Senator has a right to say that we on this side are arrogant.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, Mr. President, if I have not, then I have no right to refer to any historical fact at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; the Senator has a right to keep in order in his discussion and to observe the rule.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, I am observing the rule; I have mentioned no particular Senator's name. I can refer to the Republican Party as being arrogant, of course.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. You people always refer to the Democrats as being fools. I think the game is about equal.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator has shifted his ground.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no; just emphasized it. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] in a solemn, if not a funereal, tone of voice and in a most dignified manner has said that "up to this moment the majority can not declare that any filibuster has been going on upon this side." This falls from the Senator's lips after one man on that side has spoken nine hours and was nearly exhausted; after another one has spoken seven hours and was almost as badly off; after three or four Senators on that side were reported in the newspapers, and have never denied it, to have held a conference in which they said they would debate this matter until the 4th of March; after we have learned—whether it be true or not I do not know—that there was a conference held last night in which you on that side said that there should not be a vote upon this matter until the 4th of March.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield, and I should like to know whether any such conferences have been held by any Members upon the other side?

Mr. GALLINGER. No conference whatever was held by the Members on this side of the Chamber last evening, nor has any declaration ever been made that the bill would be debated until the 4th of March.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not ask whether any declaration had been made publicly. I asked whether any such agreement had been made.

Mr. GALLINGER. It has not been reached at all at any conference.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then it seems that the newspapers, somehow or other, have gotten things wrong; and it seems that, so far as any conference or any agreement is concerned, there has been none; because if the Senator from New Hampshire says there has been none, that settles it, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire did not say that no conference had been held this afternoon. A hurried conference was held this afternoon and several questions were discussed, and that conference reached the conclusion that this bill—I mean, the unfinished business—would be debated at length.

Mr. WILLIAMS. At length?

Mr. GALLINGER. At length.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But was there any specific definition of what the indefinite term "at length" meant?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that we will decide for ourselves when we get to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course you will, and I can not deprive you of that right. I am merely calling attention to the indefinite and unspecified length of promised debate—to the fact—and I want the country to understand the fact. Now I ask the Senator from New Hampshire what he means by "at length."

Mr. GALLINGER. I mean that the Senators opposed to this bill will discuss it in their own way until they have satisfied themselves that the country understands it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ah!

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the Senator's pardon; I have not yielded.

Mr. OLIVER. I am making a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania rises to a point of order, which he will please state.

Mr. OLIVER. My point of order is this: I wish to ask the Chair whether, under the rulings which have of late prevailed in the Senate, the Senator from Mississippi has not already spoken more than twice upon the question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. He has not spoken at all upon this bill.

Mr. OLIVER. Perhaps it is a voice and nothing more.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If so, it is only one voice and in one speech. Moreover, this is not the ship-purchase bill at all upon which I am now speaking. This is upon a motion made by the Senator from Michigan to take up the omnibus claims bill.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, my parliamentary inquiry is, The Senator from Mississippi having asked the Senator from New Hampshire two or three times to answer certain questions, and having been answered, whether each one of those interruptions did not constitute taking him from the floor. I believe that is the ruling that has prevailed in the Senate for the last two or three days. Under that ruling the Senator from Mississippi is no longer entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the Senator from Mississippi is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was about to state why. When the Senator from New Hampshire interrupted me I consented that he should do so, and no other Senator objected. The Senator from New Hampshire could not have interrupted me without unanimous consent of the Senate, and the unanimous consent was given by the fact that nobody objected. The next time the Senator from New Hampshire desires to interrupt me, if the Senator from Pennsylvania will object to his doing so, then that will constitute something in line with the precedent.

Having begun this interrogation I should like to proceed with it a little bit further.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, a question of order. The position of the Senator, I submit, is not accurate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not yield to interruption, unless the Senator is making a point of order.

Mr. OLIVER. I am submitting a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania raises a point of order, which he will please state.

Mr. OLIVER. The position, as I understand it, is not as represented by the Senator from Mississippi. The Senator from Mississippi asked the Senator from New Hampshire repeated questions, to which answers were given by the Senator from New Hampshire. Under the ruling of the Vice President, as I understand it, when a Senator who is on the floor asks another Senator to respond to a question, and that Senator responds, it constitutes the termination of his speech. Under that ruling, I submit that the Senator from Mississippi has already spoken twice upon the subject now before the Senate and is not now entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the trouble is that the Senator from Pennsylvania has not got his facts right. [Laughter.] That is frequently a trouble with Republicans. The Senator from New Hampshire interrupted me, and in reply to his interrogation I asked him some questions.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes; exactly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And the Socratian method—the method which Socrates pursued of answering a question by asking a question—evidently is new to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The point of order is not debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair does not believe anything has taken place during the time the Senator from Mississippi has been speaking that deprives him of the floor. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I shall be very careful not to ask the Senator from New Hampshire further questions, even when he is on his feet and interrogating me, because I do not want to hurt the sensitive feelings of the Senator from Pennsylvania; but without asking the Senator from New Hampshire a question I will say that I have heard, I have read, that there was an agreement upon that side "to make 17 speeches"; and if each one of them were to be nine hours in length like the speech of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], or if each one were to be seven hours in length like the speech of the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], they would take quite a long time. I shall not ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether that is true or not, but if the Senator from New Hampshire wishes to interrupt me, either to confess it or deny it, I shall not object. Unless some other Member of the Senate does object, he may ask the question.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from New Hampshire denies most emphatically that there has been any agreement that 17 speeches shall be made on this side of the Chamber on the unfinished business.

Mr. KERN. Eighteen, then. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. Or any other number.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The denial may mean that 18 or 19 or 20 speeches are to be made, or it may mean that only 10 or 12 are to be made; but, at any rate, the denial as to 17 has been duly entered, and, of course, like every other statement of fact made to me—at any rate, by the Senator from New Hampshire—I accept it. I now disclaim positively that the definite number of 17 has been agreed upon, and I shall proceed with the discussion of the question.

Mr. President, the next thing said by the Senator from Michigan, in that peculiar revival tone of voice of his, as if men were being called up to the mourners' bench or a few sad words were being said at the bier of a friend who had become a corpse, was that we Democrats "had shown no interest in the subject matter." Great Heavens, Mr. President! We are showing so much interest in the subject matter that we are trying to get a vote on it. Does the Senator imagine because a man does not show an interest in a long-winded, nine-hour speech, absolutely without a new thing in it, or because a man does not show an interest in a long-winded, seven-hour speech, that therefore he is not interested in the subject matter? Does he not know that life is short?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Wait one moment. If I wanted to make a speech upon George Washington, and wanted to hire a public hall and talk nine hours, would the fact that the Senator from Michigan declined to attend and listen to me while I was talking about George Washington for nine hours show that he had no interest in George Washington? [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator has stated that he has so much interest in it that he is waiting anxiously to vote. Has the Senator been ready to vote on this bill at any time, or is he ready to vote to-night on this bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi will test the sincerity of the Senator from Michigan in a few minutes by asking a unanimous-consent agreement; and by testing it he will answer the question just propounded.

The Senator says that a ruling of the Chair has violated an old rule of the Senate—to use his own language, "That a majority shall be present to listen to what a man says"—a rule of the Senate that a majority shall be present to listen to what a man says, regardless of what he says; regardless of whether or not what he says is worth listening to; regardless of the motive behind what he says; regardless of whether he is sincerely discussing the question or merely trying to take up time. Think of that proposition, now, ye that can think! The Senator does not mean that. Nobody means that. No man has a right to have a majority of this or any other body listen to him unless he speaks with sufficient interest and sincerity and information or novelty to justify the presence of a majority. There is no Senator in this body who has not spoken time after time to less than a majority, and that, too, very frequently, when the Senator was speaking sincerely and making an earnest argument and not merely occupying the floor to the detriment of his health and to the detriment of his own intellect. Where has the Vice President been guilty of any sort of tyranny in the ruling?

Why, the only good thing about belonging to the Senate, except the conspicuousness and the celebrity and the salary, is that we are not obliged to listen to one another when we are uttering nonsense or when we are merely consuming time or when we are merely reading something or when somebody is merely interrupting us to rest us and when we sit down and throw our legs over the chair while we rest during the interruption.

The Senator tells me that he would "like to have a better argument on this side than the speech of a Cabinet officer." Without denying the assertion that there has been no argument upon this side except the speech of a Cabinet officer—a denial easily made and established by the RECORD—I will call his attention to the old, time-honored proverb that "Enough is as good as a feast." The speech of the Cabinet officer is absolutely conclusive upon this point, is absolutely unanswerable, has not been answered, can not be answered, and will not be answered by anybody upon that side. It is in the RECORD for the people themselves to read.

Mr. President, a very distinguished man in this country said the other day that the Republican Party had not had a new idea in 30 years. [Laughter.] I think he was wrong as to the time—and time is not of the essence of the charge—but certainly the Republican Party has not had a new idea since the year of our Lord 1912. It positively has not had a new idea since the nomination or election of Woodrow Wilson as President. Why, even all this funereal speech, in solemn tones and deep utterance, looking as if calling mourners to the bench, just pronounced by the Senator from Michigan, is not new. All of us have gone through that performance every now and then when we were filibustering. It is an old thing. I have heard Senators upon this side go through with it even in better form and with greater success and with the possibility of making a greater impression of being in dead earnest about it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the Senator, provided the Senator from Pennsylvania does not object. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to ask my good friend the Senator from Mississippi, who is always so interesting and so courteous, if he does not think the Republican Party had an idea at the election in November last?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why, no. Mr. President, when we went in in 1912 we went in as a mere plurality minority party, as Abraham Lincoln did.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. When we carried the House last time we carried it as a majority party. Now, the Republican Party may have had a new idea that did not fruit. The idea was that they were going to carry the House, but they did not. When I say they have not had a new idea since July, 1912, I mean they have not had a new idea that fruited; they have not had a conception that was consummated, so far as I know, or one recognized by anybody else as being real.

Mr. President, when there is a real condition confronting a parliamentary body, and when there is a real condition confronting the people, all the solemnity of voice in the world can not make it nonexistent and create a fictitious condition. The Senator from Michigan might talk here until he was black in the face, he might talk here until it was his own funeral oration that he had just ceased to pronounce, but he can not convince a man in the United States with ordinary common sense, who has taken even a cursory view of the RECORD very lately, that the Senators who have spoken upon that side were not deliberately consuming time; and they themselves, upon their honors, will not deny it, because I know them both. They are not the sort of men who will deny a fact. I have served with both of them in other bodies than this as well as here. I know their honor, I know their integrity, I know their sincerity, and neither one of them will say that a part of the time used by him was not used solely for the purpose of consuming time.

Mr. President, I am reminded by a Democratic Senator of the fact that we have a program, and perhaps I myself am interfering with it to some extent. A few more sentences, then, and I shall conclude.

The responsibility of the government of this country at this time is upon us. You had it resting on you for twenty-odd years. You never showed us any great courtesy—I mean, in a parliamentary sense. Personally, we have all shown one another every courtesy. There never was a time when you wanted to put through a party program that you did not call attention to the fact that we were filibustering when we were, and sometimes we were. Whether men want to be honest with the people or not, that is one thing in a free Republic that they must be—they have got to be honest with them in the long run.

Now, one truth is, and the country ought to know it, that you have made up your minds and virtually agreed, many of you, to defeat this bill, if you have to talk until the 4th of March. Let the country know it. The other truth is that we have made up our minds to carry this bill through, even though we let you talk, and to save time make you do all the talking, until the 4th of March; and meanwhile we are going to try to stop you talking whenever under the rules we can.

Let us be honest with one another, and let us be honest with the country. What are you going to do? You are going to force every great supply bill over to an extra session, because you will not let the American Senate do what? Vote on this bill—vote; that is all. And now, to prove it, I ask unanimous consent that this day a week hence, so that you will have ample time for all serious and honest argument, there shall be a vote upon the pending bill and upon all pending amendments. I ask that unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the roll be called, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 6 o'clock having arrived——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will renew the request in the morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will stand in recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Thereupon (at 6 o'clock p. m. Thursday, January 21, 1915) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, January 22, 1915, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 21, 1915.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, be Thou our Shepherd, and lead us into green pastures and by the side of still waters. Restore our souls, and lead us into the paths of righteousness, that we may be profitable servants; not slothful in business; fervent in spirit, serving the Lord; rejoicing in hope, patient in tribulation; continuing instant in prayer; that we be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good; in the name of Him who taught us patience, forbearance, love, peace, and good will. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

FEDERAL AID TO POST ROADS (H. DOC. NO. 1510).

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I present the report of the Joint Committee on Federal Aid in the Construction of Post Roads, and ask that it be filed and printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois presents a report on the subject of aid in the construction of post roads, and asks that it be filed and printed. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is that printed automatically under the law?

Mr. MADDEN. I think it is.

Mr. MANN. Printed as a House document.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. What does it carry with it—maps?

Mr. MADDEN. Maps and recommendations and data, covering all the information that we could obtain, from all over the world.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is this a privileged proposition?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I understand, this is the report of the commission that was heretofore appointed by Congress to investigate roads.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS NIAGARA RIVER, LEWISTON, N. Y.

Mr. GITTINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill (S. 6121) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Niagara River, in the town of Lewiston, in the county of Niagara and State of New York, be laid before the House. It is identical with a House bill reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which is on the calendar.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 6121) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Niagara River, in the town of Lewiston, in the county of Niagara and State New York.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Ontario-Niagara Connecting Bridge Co., a corporation created by the laws of the State of New York, being chapter 420 of the laws of 1914, is hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and necessary approaches thereto across the Niagara River at a point suitable to public interests in the town of Lewiston, in the county of Niagara, State of New York, south of the southern boundary of the bridge and property of the Lewiston Connecting Bridge Co., to some point in Canada, on the west bank of said river, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906: Provided, That the offices of the Fine Arts Commission shall be obtained in connection with the consideration of the plans of said bridge, and that all power cables shall be permitted to cross the said bridge under equal rates for the privilege: And provided further, That the Ontario-Niagara Connecting Bridge Co., or its successors or assigns, shall at its own expense make such changes and install such accessories as may be necessary to cross any navigation canal which the United States may construct in that vicinity, and which may interfere with the approaches of the bridge.

SEC. 2. That this act shall become and be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced before the 31st day of December, in the year 1919, and completed within five years thereafter.

SEC. 3. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. ADAMSON. There can not be any objection. It is privileged.

Mr. STAFFORD. I should like to have the gentleman yield to me at least. When the House bill that I assume is identical in terms was on the Unanimous Consent Calendar some weeks ago, I understood that there was some opposition to it on the part of one of the gentleman's colleagues [Mr. SMITH of New York].

Mr. GITTINS. Yes; I was absent on unanimous-consent day, and because of my absence my colleague asked that the bill go over.

Mr. STAFFORD. I inferred from his statement that he was not only raising an objection in order to accommodate the gentleman from New York [Mr. GITTINS], but also that he had objections to the consideration of the bill; and, as I recall, the report in this case there is serious objection to the putting of another bridge across the Niagara River at this place, it being represented that there are adequate bridge facilities at present for the carriage of power transmission cables, which it is intended that this bridge shall accommodate. Am I right in that understanding?

Mr. GITTINS. No; I think the gentleman is wrong. At the point where it is expected that this bridge will be located there are power-transmission wires strung across the Niagara River from great towers on each side. The War Department has suggested that if these wires are taken down and carried underneath the bridge, other wires of other power companies be carried also under the same bridge on the same terms as the wires of this company, and that provision is in the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. And that no other wires be placed overhead?

Mr. GITTINS. There is no provision in the bill that other wires shall not be placed overhead, but one of the purposes of the bill is to save stringing these wires out in the open, because they are by no means an ornament to the landscape.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether there is not some opposition to the passage of this bill in its present form?

Mr. GITTINS. Not that I have ever heard.

Mr. STAFFORD. From local interests?

Mr. GITTINS. No; not that I have ever heard.

Mr. ADAMSON. The only suggestion was with reference to preserving the scenic beauty, and we are quite satisfied about that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the gentleman quite assured that his colleague [Mr. SMITH of New York] has not some constituents who are opposed to the construction of this bridge?

Mr. GITTINS. He has never said so to me, and I have not had a letter in opposition to the bill from any source.

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill in its present form, as I recall it, provides that they may begin operations within seven years.

Mr. GITTINS. No; they must begin before 1919.

Mr. ADAMSON. Four years.

Mr. STAFFORD. And complete it when?

Mr. GITTINS. Within five years after beginning.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the idea of giving them the right at the present time to construct this bridge at this very desirable point when they are not to begin operations for so many years?

Mr. GITTINS. It is a big project. They should be given a reasonable time.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the opinion of some of the engineers who reported on this bill they are given an unusually long time, and I think it was their opinion that this is merely a promoter's scheme to obtain a very valuable privilege to cross an important stream.

Mr. GITTINS. There is nothing of the kind about this bill. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. This project is backed by the biggest men in western New York. There is absolutely no opposition to it that I have heard of. The committee investigated it thoroughly, and it has been extensively published in the papers.

Mr. STAFFORD. If it is backed by the big men of western New York, I should not think they would wish to wait four or five years before beginning operations, as this bill provides.

Mr. ADAMSON. Before they begin construction.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. GITTINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

By unanimous consent the corresponding House bill (No. 16640) was ordered to lie on the table.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 20347) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and, pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to eight hours to be divided equally—the gentleman from California to control one half of the time and I to control the other half.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Army appropriation bill, and, pending that, asks unanimous consent that debate be limited to eight hours—one half to be controlled by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and the other half by himself. Is there objection?

Mr. TAVENNER. I object to the unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I understand there has been some agreement between the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] and the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] in reference to the time for general debate. Objection is made. Is it the intention of the gentleman from Virginia to allow general debate to run for that length of time, and then, when we go into committee again, to move that general debate be closed?

Mr. HAY. My purpose is to go into Committee of the Whole, and after five minutes move that the committee rise.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can move to close debate when we go into Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. HAY. But my purpose is to get through with the general debate to-day.

Mr. MANN. I understand.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I understand it is the intention of the gentleman from Virginia to be liberal in the discussion of the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. TAVENNER. I want to say that I want an hour, because——

Mr. HAY. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20347) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. BRYAN. Reserving the right to object, I want to say that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TAVENNER] wants time, and I understand he can not get the time.

Mr. HAY. I call for the regular order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TAVENNER] has notified several that he is anxious to have an hour's time, and several Members are anxious that he shall have it, even to the extent of going on the floor and either get the time or make trouble. [Cries of "Oh!" "Oh!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Whether the gentleman can get time or not will depend upon the committee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Washington, and all concerned, that objecting to a motion to dispense with the first reading of a long bill is not a very good way to get time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia to dispense with the first reading of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TAVENNER] requested an hour's time. I told him that we were only to have four hours on a side, and that a good many members of the Committee on Military Affairs desired to speak, and that I had cut their time down to 20 minutes; but I would put him on the same plane as the members of the committee and give him 20 minutes. I say that because I want the House to understand that I have no disposition to cut any gentleman off. But there are 435 Members of this House.

Mr. TAVENNER. I have spent considerable time investigating this subject. My information is of a different character than will be presented by the members of the committee and I desire an opportunity to present it to the House. I will take the chances of its being worth the amount of time I am requesting.

Mr. HAY. I have no doubt the gentleman has burned midnight oil and has a great deal of information, as have other Members; but we can not always, particularly in the short session of Congress, get all the time we want.

Now, Mr. Chairman, all I want to say for the present is that on page 1760 of the RECORD there is a table printed in an article which I wrote and which was published in the Sunday Magazine. There is a mistake in that table, and I am informed by the gentleman who got the table up in the War Department that it was a clerical error. I ask unanimous consent to print a table furnished me by the War Department which corrects that error.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. GARDNER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I take it that the gentleman is correcting an error on artillery ammunition and raising it to 1,700,000, in accordance with what I pointed out to the gentleman.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Is it not true that the table is not prepared by the War Department, but by Gen. Crozier?

Mr. HAY. It was furnished me by Gen. Crozier.

Mr. GARDNER. It is not the War Department's table, but Gen. Crozier's?

Mr. HAY. Field Artillery.

Mr. GARDNER. It is his own table and not the table of the War Department. The War Department a week ago Monday got a resolution——

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield for a speech.

Mr. GARDNER. I am reserving my right to object; the gentleman has not the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the table:

	On hand.	Additional provided for by appropriation.	Total provided for.	Total in project.	Required to complete project.	Remarks.
Rifles	1,037,000	36,749	1,073,749	600,000		Of these, 347,000 are United States rifles, model of 1898 (Krag); the remainder are model of 1903.
Pistols and revolvers	140,392	31,622	172,014	172,378	75,702	Of these, 75,358 are Colt's revolvers, to be replaced.
Sabers	68,763	5,000	73,763	41,006	11,006	Of these, 43,763 are old model, curved sabers, to be replaced.
Ball cartridges, caliber .30, models of 1906 and 1898	[1] 196,000,000	[2] 45,000,000	241,000,000	196,000,000
Pistol and revolver cartridges	[3] 31,196,227	11,500,000	42,696,227	31,942,600
Personal equipments (sets)	476,161	27,839	504,000	504,000
Horse equipments (sets)	55,122	3,200	58,322	94,349	36,027
Machine guns	1,236	66	1,302	1,633	331	276 in coast defenses are without packs.
Field batteries, complete, 4 guns each	169	46	215	325	110	In addition, there are on hand 20 2.95-inch mountain batteries, to be replaced.
Ammunition trains		3	3	63	60
Harness, wheel (sets)	2,808	527	3,335	7,500	4,165
Harness, lead (sets)	5,412	1,071	6,483	16,000	9,517
Ammunition for Field Artillery (rounds)	177,800	402,200	580,000	1,717,000	1,137,000

[1] 35,000,000 are model of 1898 cartridges. [2] 45,000,000 are used annually. [3] Of these, 19,859,327 are for pistol.

Mr. TAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of no quorum, and the Chair will count.

Mr. TAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, I am going to withdraw the point of order for the time being, but if I do not get an hour's time I am going to make points of order.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 20347, the Army appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Army appropriation bill, and pending that motion I move that general debate shall continue for four hours, two hours to be controlled by the gentleman from California and two hours by myself.

Mr. KAHN. Can not the gentleman make it eight hours?

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I am willing to give all reasonable time for general debate, but we are informed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TAVENNER] that he proposes to filibuster unless he can get one hour's time.

Mr. TAVENNER. I deserve the hour, and that is the reason I ask for it.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman can print his information.

Mr. TAVENNER. I do not propose to print it.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, in order to meet the wishes of gentlemen upon the other side, I move, pending the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, that general debate be confined to seven hours, three hours and a half to be controlled by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and three hours and a half by myself.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman that he can not include in the motion the control of the time.

Mr. HAY. That is true. On that motion to limit debate, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. TAVENNER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to that motion.

The SPEAKER. One moment. The gentleman from Virginia moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Army appropriation bill, and pending that he moves that general debate be limited to seven hours, and on that motion he moves the previous question.

Mr. TAVENNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAVENNER. Mr. Speaker, I should like to know whether I can offer to amend the gentleman's motion by substituting eight hours for seven hours, with the understanding that I am to have one hour?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not. The only way that can be done is to defeat the motion for the previous question.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. [Cries of "Oh, no!"] We want that time, and we are going to fight for it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering a call of the House.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Was there not a question pending when the gentleman from Washington made the point of order of no quorum?

The SPEAKER. The question had not been put. We had not reached that point.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the House was not dividing, and I moved a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. That is correct. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAY. Did not the Speaker put the question on the motion to order the previous question?

Mr. MANN. No; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary situation, as I understand it, is that a call of the House only has been ordered on the point of order that there is no quorum present. There is no question before the House.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I think the Chair put the question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had not put the question. A call of the House has been ordered. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Aiken	Driscoll	Keister	Price
Ainey	Dunn	Kennedy, Conn.	Ragsdale
Avis	Eagan	Kennedy, Iowa	Rainey
Barchfeld	Eagle	Kennedy, R. I.	Reed
Barkley	Edmonds	Kindel	Reilly, Conn.
Bartholdt	Elder	Kinkead, N. J.	Riordan
Bartlett	Faison	Kirkpatrick	Roberts, Nev.
Beall, Tex.	Falconer	Kitchin	Rupley
Bell, Ga.	Finley	Korbly	Russell
Borland	Flood, Va.	Lafferty	Sabath
Bowdle	Francis	Lee, Ga.	Scott
Brown, W. Va.	French	L'Engle	Scully
Bruckner	Garrett, Tex.	Lewis, Md.	Sells
Brumbaugh	George	Lewis, Pa.	Shreve
Buchanan, Ill.	Gill	Lindbergh	Sims
Burke, Pa.	Glass	Lindquist	Sisson
Burke, Wis.	Godwin, N. C.	Lobeck	Slemp
Calder	Gorman	Loft	Stevens, N. H.
Cantor	Goulden	Logue	Stout
Carew	Graham, Pa.	McClellan	Taggart
Carlin	Griest	MacDonald	Talbott, Md.
Carr	Griffin	Mahan	Taylor, N. Y.
Chandler, N. Y.	Hamill	Maher	Townsend
Clark, Fla.	Hamilton, Mich.	Metz	Underhill
Connolly, Iowa	Hardy	Miller	Vare
Conry	Hart	Morgan, La.	Walters
Copley	Helvering	Morin	White
Curry	Henry	O'Brien	Wilson, Fla.
Dale	Hinebaugh	O'Hair	Wilson, N. Y.
Davenport	Hobson	O'Shaunessy	Winslow
Davis	Hoxworth	Page, N. C.	Witherspoon
Decker	Humphreys, Miss.	Paige, Mass.	Woodruff
Difenderfer	Igoe	Palmer
Dooling	Johnson, S. C.	Patton, Pa.
Doremus	Jones	Pou

The SPEAKER. On this call 287 Members, a quorum, answered to their names.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division on that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington demands a division on dispensing with further proceedings under the call.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 183, noes 1.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. The roll call just ascertained shows the presence of a quorum, and there has been no intervening business. [Applause.] The question is on ordering the previous question.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order of no quorum. Now there has been intervening business.

Mr. GARNER. That is dilatory.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion is dilatory. The roll call just had disclosed the presence of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has uniformly refused to rule——

Mr. FOSTER. Upon a vote, I think the gentleman is entitled to know if a quorum is present or not.

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair has always ruled and always will rule. [After counting.] Two hundred and thirty-nine Members are present, a quorum, and the Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] to limit general debate to seven hours.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division. You had just as well get off the lid and let the gentleman from Illinois have his time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to demand a division but no right to make remarks about it.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 218, noes 3.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair just this instant counted a quorum—ayes 218, noes 3. The motion of the gentleman from Virginia prevails. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 20347.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, now I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. There can be no question of the presence of a quorum, because it has been ascertained three times in the last 10 minutes. The ayes have it and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] will take the chair.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Did the Speaker rule that my point of no quorum is out of order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does, because it has been less than 10 minutes since we had a roll call disclosing a quorum, and then by actual count, and the last time not less than 3 minutes ago, there was a quorum here. [Applause.] The gentleman from Tennessee will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 20347, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 20347, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20347) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAY. I am recognized for one hour, I take it?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for one hour.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] and reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, the war now going on in Europe has revived the agitation of our so-called unpreparedness for war. I have never regarded this question as a partisan question. I do not believe that the question of the national defense should be treated as a partisan question. If, as a matter of fact, we are so utterly unprepared for war as some of the agitators upon this subject now tell us, then it must be admitted that the responsibility rests with the Republican Party, with its long lease of power. [Applause on the Democratic side.] However, as a Democrat—aye, Mr. Chairman, as a partisan Democrat—I am unwilling to lay any such charge at the door of the Republican Party. My experience on the Committee on Military Affairs for nearly three terms of Congress, under both Republican and Democratic control, convinces me that the committee has been fair, even to the point of generosity, in order to build up an army according to American ideals. In 1901 a law was passed limiting the strength of the Army to 100,000 men. The Hospital Corps and the Quartermaster Corps are exempt from this limitation. That law has been in operation now for nearly 14 years, and let us see what are the facts.

According to the report of The Adjutant General's Office, it appears that between February, 1901, and June 30, 1914, the largest number of enlisted men in the Army, including all branches, line and staff, at the end of any one month—and the returns are only taken at the end of the month—was 92,877 men on the 30th day of June of last year. The largest Army we have ever had was on the 30th day of last June. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The lowest number was 57,522, on September 30, 1907, and the average number during that period was 74,314 men. It is also shown by the records of this office that the largest number of enlisted men of the line of the Army, including the Philippine Scouts, in service at the end of any one month included in this period was 82,142, on May 31, 1914. The lowest number was 51,561, on September 30, 1907; and the average number was 67,903. Now, Mr. Chairman, I call attention to these figures for the purpose of showing that, notwithstanding the fact that 14 years ago Congress increased the authorized strength of the Army to 100,000 men, at no period during that time has the authorized strength of the Army been reached. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I call attention to the further significant fact that during this period no Chief Executive, neither President Roosevelt nor President Taft nor President Wilson, has ever asked for the full quota authorized by law. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I call attention to the further fact that even the quota asked for has never been filled.

Whence, then, Mr. Chairman, comes this cry for a tremendous army in this country? Certainly not from the young manhood of this country, who are seeking to enter the Army at the rate of pay of $15 a month and a loss to a large extent of their personal liberty.

If, Mr. Chairman, we propose to create a tremendous army in this country, we must do something to invite the private to enter into its service. In order to do this we must either increase the pay to, say, $50 or $100 a month, or we must conscript the young men of this country in time of peace. The expense of the one plan would be enormous, while the policy of the other would be odious. [Applause.]

We are told that for the last quarter of a century the nations of Europe engaged in war, including grief-stricken Italy, have spent $40,000,000,000 preparing for war. This, Mr. Chairman, is about the value of all the farms in the United States. But who is it, upon reflection, laying aside the question of expense, that is willing to see an army of one million or one-half of a million men in this country awaiting in idleness some imaginary conflict? [Applause.]

Ah, but we are told and often reminded of the old adage, "In time of peace prepare for war." I do not know, Mr. Chairman, who was the originator of that idea. Some claim it was the Roman author, Horace, while others assert it was originated by the Father of his Country; but whoever was its author, the fact is that he never left any specific legacy to any nation by which it could determine exactly what preparedness means.

After nearly six months of war in Europe it is apparent to all that neither England, nor France, nor Russia, nor even Germany, understood the problem. What shall we prepare for, for instance? Shall we prepare for a war with England, or a war with Germany, or a war with Japan? Shall we prepare to fight Germany in the event her arms are successful in the pending European conflict, or shall we prepare to fight the allies in the event of their success? Shall we prepare to invade Japan or shall we prepare against an invasion by Japan? These questions, Mr. Chairman, answer themselves to the effect that no one who talks of unpreparedness has ever yet given us any concrete idea upon the subject. [Applause.]

Why, it has been supposed that our isolation was of great value to us. But now it is even suggested that this is a matter of small consequence. Let us see what are the facts. From Liverpool to New York it is a distance of more than 3,500 miles; from Havre it is a distance of more than 3,100 miles; from Bremen the distance is more than 4,200 miles; and from Yokohama to San Francisco it is a distance of more than 4,100 miles. At the rate of 15 miles an hour, which is very much faster than any transport can travel even unmolested, it would take 10 days to go from Liverpool to New York, 9 days from Havre to New York, 12 days from Bremen to New York, and 12 days from Yokohama to San Francisco. The fact must not be overlooked, Mr. Chairman, that in order to prepare these transports, in order to equip them for travel, in order to provide a convoy of war vessels, in order to make all the necessary preparations, it would require weeks and months of effort.

Now, I have not been able to obtain, although I am investigating the subject, the number of transports owned by the great nations of the world. But we do know—and I have the data here before me—how long it took us to transport troops to the Philippine Islands after we had been successful in our war with Spain, and when the sea was absolutely open to us. What are those facts? I read from a letter to me from the Chief of the Quartermaster's Department, Gen. Aleshire:

The largest number of troops shipped from the United States to the Philippine Islands in any one day was 3,089, on November 20, 1899. The largest number of troops shipped to the Philippine Islands for any two consecutive days was 4,537, on November 3 and 4, 1899. The largest number of troops shipped to the Philippine Islands for any four consecutive days was 5,327, on November 20, 21, 22, and 23 of that year. The largest number of troops shipped to the Philippine Islands on any eight consecutive days was 8,281, on November 14 to 21, inclusive, 1899. The largest number of troops shipped in any one month was 14,730, in November, 1899, while the largest number of troops shipped for any three consecutive months was 30,804, in September, October, and November, 1899.

Now, I noticed some time ago that the English Government used 40 transports in order to convey 28,000 troops from Australia during this war. I call attention to the fact that it required 31 transports to convey 33,000 troops from Canada since this war in Europe began. So it is a fair statement, I believe, to make that one transport will average not exceeding 1,000 officers and men. It would then take, Mr. Chairman, 100 transports to bring into this country 100,000 soldiers, which is practically the strength of our Army, to say nothing of the 120,000 of trained militia that we have. Why, Mr. Chairman, those who talk about our unpreparedness speak as if this country is likely to be invaded as by a thief in the night [applause], while our very isolation itself is proof against burglary on the part of any nation.

Mr. HOBSON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield to his colleague [Mr. HOBSON]?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. HOBSON. Would the gentleman, for our information, kindly tell us how many United States troops could be concentrated at any one point at this time?

Mr. DENT. Why, Mr. Chairman, the question is not appropriate to the subject which I was discussing. I understand, from the report of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff, that possibly we could not concentrate at any one particular point more than 25,000 or 30,000. I am not sure about that as I have not gone into these figures. But we do not need to concentrate any large army in this country; and what is the necessity for concentrating any larger army than that? [Applause.] There might arise some internal trouble which would necessitate the concentration of a considerable force, but our Army is sufficient for that purpose. I am speaking now, however, Mr. Chairman, and I am directing my thoughts at this particular time, against the necessity for a large Army to prevent a foreign invasion. [Applause.] And I think it is absolutely demonstrated by the facts that any larger Army is now unnecessary.

Now, I want to say right here, just to digress for a moment, on account of the question asked by my distinguished colleague from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON], that I met the other day an Army officer, a man whom I regard as one of the ablest men in the Engineer Corps. I was talking to him about the resolution offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], and which the Military Committee adopted and reported favorably to the House the other day, relative to the range of the guns on the English ships and the range of the guns on our coast. This officer said that he happened to be dining with an admiral of the Navy, and he said, "Why, that is the most absurd proposition on earth, because no ship will stand off 18 miles in order to shoot at a target that it can not see."

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the Secretary of War has appointed a board to determine that very question?

Mr. DENT. That may be true; but I am simply giving the experience of an admiral in the Navy, and he said the ship would be below the horizon, and unless somebody believes that the world is flat there is no use in shooting from that distance. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARDNER. And does not the admiral know that a great deal of firing is now done when you can not see the object? Of course it is below the horizon. But what was the name of the admiral?

Mr. DENT. This was a personal conversation that I had, not with an admiral, but with an Army officer.

Mr. GARDNER. What is the name of the Army officer?

Mr. DENT. It was Lieut. Col. Judson.

Mr. GARDNER. Former commissioner here?

Mr. DENT. Yes; former District Commissioner here. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I want to repeat that I believe the Army has been constantly and gradually improved for many, many years past. I am not so sure that there should not be some other changes made. So far as I am concerned, ever since I have been a member of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House I have advocated and voted for a militia pay bill, and I believe it is only a question of time when that law will have to be adopted by Congress. [Applause.] But I do not believe that it is necessary to make any radical changes in our regular military establishment at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. DENT. I would like to have three minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I have not been among that number who believe that there is any nation on earth willing to precipitate a quarrel with us. On the contrary, I believe that every nation in the world is anxious to seek and obtain our good will. [Applause.] I want to call attention to a fact which I believe those in authority in the balance of the world recognize—that there is a tremendous latent power in this country. We not only have an Army of ninety-odd thousand men and a militia of 120,000 men, but there are 16,000,000 stalwart men between the ages of 18 and 45 in this country as a reserve militia, many of whom now already know how to shoot and how to ride. [Applause.] And if this latent power is once aroused it will never stop short of punishing with the severest penalty any enemy that attacks it. [Applause.]

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the time is likely to come—I am sure it is not impossible; yea, I believe it is highly probable—that the time will come when the good offices of this country, through its present Chief Magistrate, will be called upon to bring about peace in Europe and thereby grant to the world the greatest of human blessings. [Applause.] That the heart and the head of the present Chief Executive of the Nation is sensitive to and capable of affording this benefaction, I believe both friend and foe alike will admit. [Applause.] And may the great God of the universe, who presides over the destinies of men and of nations, speed the day when this consummation so earnestly desired will be happily realized. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman yields back the remainder of his time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back three minutes. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] is recognized for an hour.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] and reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California yields 20 minutes and reserves 40.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, this discussion is prompted by several considerations:

First. A friendly interest in the person involved.

Second. Character of our courts-martial as exemplified in this alleged typical and regularly conducted case.

Third. A statement recently published and attributed to the Secretary of War in which he says:

> What we need now is a thousand new officers; with intelligent and efficient officers much can be done.

Fourth. Yesterday's European dispatches quote the leading military authority of one of the great belligerent powers as saying:

> The * * * are good fighters, but an army without the necessary officers and noncommissioned officers is scarcely an army.

This great military appropriation bill for the fiscal year of 1916 involves one hundred and one millions of the Treasury funds. That sum provides for thousands of purposes, including the necessities, wants, comforts, and luxuries of our national military establishment. For the soldier it includes items for comfort, equipment, discipline, and protection. Hidden away somewhere within its terms an expert might find some small appropriation for the administration of justice before the courts of war, where it has been said "justice is meted out against the unfortunate officer or soldier upon whom a charge is laid."

The relatively meager available records of the war-court trials is a tribute to the discipline of the respondents, or, mayhap, their resignation to the inevitable. There have been but few reviews brought home to the public of these adjudications, which mean loss of rank, sometimes good name, and often means of livelihood.

The case I shall discuss having run the full course from original investigation to the tribunal of final resort and having been directed from Washington and approved throughout by the Department of War, may properly be considered as a fair exemplification of military jurisprudence. We are told it was entirely regular.

A little more than a year ago Fort Terry, lying at the east end of Long Island, with its smart soldiery and frowning guns, one of the points of our national defense, was under the command of Maj. Benjamin M. Koehler. Continued peace had some time before this relaxed rigid discipline; so the standard of fortress life, work, and morals were not par excellence.

Maj. Koehler, with a record which was the fair outcome of a youthful ambition to serve his country, a full course at West Point, service in many capacities in the United States, and actual service under fire in the Philippines, was selected to command this fort. It was expected that his ability, courage, tact, and experience would improve its condition and elevate its tone.

Suffice to say that during the period of his command the landscape was cleared and beautified, buildings cleaned and brightened, the home arrangements of the officers bettered, and the conduct and appearance of the soldiers improved.

That these changes would not meet universal approval among those whom it personally affected was not to be expected, nor did it occur. He was a devotee to discipline, which he exacted of all, and with almost religious devotion submitted to it himself. His work was not accomplished without admonition, rebuke, and punishment, which, in their effects, extended to the friends of the delinquents. Soldiers and officers in periods of peace have much time on their hands to consider fancied wrongs.

Pleased with the progress of his work, reassured by the commendations of his superior, and secure in the apparent devotion of the vast majority of his officers and men, he was in a paradise of noninformation as to his personal danger when, like a thunderbolt from a clear sky, one day upon his return to the fort, after seeing his brother, Maj. Lewis Koehler, off for his command in Porto Rico, he was arrested, deprived of his side arms, and held to a trial by court-martial. This was his first intimation that any person held or believed that he had committed a wrong or had been guilty of an indiscretion. Maj. Koehler was stunned by the charges presented. With characteristic devotion to duty and implicit reliance on the supposed justice and fairness of those who were to prosecute, and as he thought had been taught to preserve his rights, showed the absurdity of certain charges and the means of absolute defense which he had at hand. These frank statements were made use of by the prosecution to correct its case and, of course, weaken the major's defense.

The trial was had in the form such proceedings usually take. There was a general charge in the following language:

> Charge 1. Conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman in violation of the sixty-first Article of War.

Under this there were 17 distinct and separate specifications of fact. Each of these specifications, if established beyond reasonable doubt, would constitute a basis for the charge, which under the military law is a mere legal conclusion.

No two of the specifications where guilt was found had anything legally in common with each other, or with any other, either in point of time, circumstances, or parties involved.

Of these 17 specifications let me state no charge is made of any vile or criminal act consummated on the part of Maj. Koehler. Nor yet was there any charge that any proposition for any such act or attempt was made by the accused. Still further, there was no evidence whatever submitted to support a vile or criminal act consummated or attempted.

The charge contains no allegation of accused being a pervert or of improper habits or propensities.

The specifications related largely and generally to incidental conversations had with officers or men and certain acts, many of which, if clearly established, would and could bear either a harmless or an improper construction. Of course if the malign construction were placed on them it would establish the charge of conduct "unbecoming an officer and a gentleman."

In six of these specifications the evidence was so grossly inadequate and flagrantly false that failure to try the accusing witnesses for their perjury and other forms of mendacity is sufficient warrant for Maj. Koehler's complaint and to apprise him of the brand of injustice he received. In these he was acquitted.

My interest in this case arose from the fact that I knew him from the time he took a competitive examination to obtain our Congressman's nomination for West Point; learned of his exemplary conduct at the academy; heard of his creditable graduation; was pleased with his brilliant and gallant career in the Philippines, where he attracted the notice and received the warm commendation of Gen. Lawton. Later his service earned him rapid distinction and promotion. He is one of nine brothers, all of whom are clean, upright, successful men—manufacturers, bankers, grain men, ranchmen—one is my neighbor; three entered the United States military service; one other is a West Point graduate, now with his regiment on the Texas frontier. Another brother, Edgar C. Koehler, a lieutenant in the Philippines, yielded his life in an engagement to an insurrecto's bullet; he lies at Arlington; his grave is a part of that great national shrine where patriots visit and statesmen delight to be heard.

A civil jury imbued with the sole duty of trying the case, after hearing the accuser's testimony, would have placed an innocent construction on the language and acts of the accused and acquitted him as to many of the specifications, even though the major had not denied them or had not submitted testimony in his own defense. But the major's defense had no such precarious foundation. Every allegation of accusing fact was met squarely by his denial, supported in every specification by clear and strong corroborating testimony, or circumstances, or both.

Out of the 17 specifications he was acquitted on 6, namely, 2, 3, 4, 6, 8, and 10. It should be remembered that each of these specifications, if established, constituted a sufficient basis for finding of guilty under the main charge. The consequence of this finding was dismissal from the Army—disgrace, degradation, and loss of means of livelihood.

Each of these specifications charge that which, in civil life, would when measured, not by its gravity but by its consequences, amount to a felony, because banished and excluded from the service is considered by an officer of rank in the Army as equivalent to incarceration of a civilian in the penitentiary. In this the term of punishment is for life. The accused had a right, therefore, morally and legally, to demand that each specification stand upon its own merits and proof. The prosecution certainly had a right to say though it should absolutely fail in proof in 16 of the 17 specifications because of lack of testimony, apparent prejudice, or interested testimony or downright perjury, yet if in the seventeenth two honorable witnesses contradicted the accused, or one corroborated by strong circumstances contradicted him, the prosecution would not fail. This view was right for the prosecution, it was right for the accused, and is in accord with the decisions and practices of all reputable American courts. The view taken by the prosecution reverses this. While the acquittal on several specifications did not aid the accused in weakening the other specifications, conviction on some specifications were held to uphold convictions on other specifications, although the specifications were not connected or related by time, circumstances, or identity of other parties involved.

Thinking that my friendship for the accused might prejudice me in weighing the evidence and reaching a conclusion there was submitted the several specifications upon which guilt was found to Members of this House or the Senate for consideration and opinion, one to each. I shall quote therefrom.

The opinions which I shall quote and my own were based upon the record made at the court-martial and after it had been certified to Washington.

Specification No. 1 charges accused with grasping Capt. Philip H. Worcester in an improper manner.

The evidence revealed that the time and place of the alleged act was in the immediate presence of about 25 persons; yet there was no corroboration from these persons of the testimony of Worcester. Capt. Worcester and Lieut. Smith were both vulgarly dressed as females and dancing the sensuous "hoochi-koochi." They were in like manner rebuked by Maj. Koehler. The major's act was construed by Worcester as improper; was construed by Maj. Koehler and Lieut. Smith as a properly intended rebuke. Similar acts were construed by Lieut. Frick as improper, and on these two specifications where Frick was involved the major was acquitted. Worcester had twice been reprimanded by Maj. Koehler.

Congressman BORLAND, a Member of long service from Missouri, and a lawyer of successful practice, and a law lecturer in one of our universities, examined the evidence submitted under this specification and said:

> The sole witness to this charge is Capt. Worcester. His testimony is absolutely uncorroborated except to the extent that the accused was at the party at the time and place named. Under the rules of law this is not corroboration at all, as it shows no more opportunity to commit the crime than is equally consistent with either guilt or innocence. On the other hand, the captain's testimony is specifically denied by the accused as to the main fact. The testimony of the accusing witness is weakened by the circumstances under which the act is alleged to have taken place. One act is said to have been in the supper room, in which there were possibly 25 persons within sight and hearing. The other act is alleged to have taken place in a small room adjoining, in which there were possibly 2 other persons and into which at any moment any one of the 25 persons in the adjoining room might have entered. * * * As to these charges, it seems clear that the finding should be set aside. No affirmance of the conviction can be made on this charge.

Specification No. 5 charges impropriety on the part of the accused in touch and language toward Sergt. Elvin Byers.

Alleged acts and language were said by Byers to have occurred in a small garden adjacent to Maj. Koehler's residence. It was in full view of anyone looking from part of the residence or anyone coming to visit the major and was in actual view of one Pvt. Lones. Accused absolutely denied every condemning statement of Byers. Lones corroborated accused in every particular to which he was cognizant, he being within full view, though not being close enough to hear what was being said. Accused was further corroborated on important circumstances by Emma Jones. Byers was not supported in any important particular by any witness. Yet Byers was proven and admitted to have spoken to Pvt. Zephy, who was friendly to Koehler, that if he would modify the statement which he had made to Col. Mills, he (Zephy) would be able to obtain a furlough, which he had sought from Capt. Ellis and been refused. Capt. Ellis had told Zephy when the furlough was requested, in substance, he had no use for him because he did not tell the colonel all he knew. These conversations were overheard by Corpl. Towler and not denied. Yet the unsupported word of Byers was accepted as establishing beyond a reasonable doubt the allegations of this specification.

Examination of this specification and all the evidence relating thereto was made by my colleague, Hon. M. P. KINKAID, of Nebraska. Congressman KINKAID was for more than 12 years on the district bench of Nebraska, to which he was elevated from the position of one of the leading practitioners in that part of the State. He has been for 12 years an able and honored Member of this body. I quote briefly from his opinion, rendered after examining the evidence:

> Instead of reasonable corroboration, the record furnishes strong contradictions of the testimony of Byers. He is squarely contradicted on every material fact in issue. Not only does the accused make positive denial of the essential parts, but the testimony of both Lones and Emma Jones squarely contradict him as to material, as well as immaterial, circumstances. * * * The testimony has irresistibly made me believe that the conviction has been produced largely by hearsay and suspicion rather than by proper evidence. On the whole, I respectfully submit the evidence falls far short of warranting a conviction on specification No. 5.

Specification 7 related to the improper language and improper acts said to have occurred in the cabin of a boat. Sergt. Moody was proven to have talked with Sergt. Byers, who was concerned in specification No. 5, and in which talk Sergt. Moody said to Byers: "You have got to stick to what we have said; we have got to stick tight." This Moody testified to improper language and acts on the part of the accused in the officers' cabin of a boat within a foot of the captain. The captain neither saw nor heard any of the alleged remarks or acts. The accused denied in detail the statements of Moody, and there was no corroboration whatever of Moody.

This specification and evidence were submitted to the Hon. JOSEPH TAGGART, of Kansas, a Member of this House, and long a leading lawyer in his State before becoming a Member. His examination called forth the following from him:

> Mrs. Kate Ewing states positively that she heard Sergt. Byers and Sergt. Moody in conversation, in which Byers expressed regret that he had anything to do with the matter, but urged and encouraged by Sergt. Moody to "stick to what we have said" and "we have got to stick tight" (p. 459). This woman testifies to the lewd conduct of both these sergeants (p. 462). The place charged was a public place, with the door open at all times. The testimony of Mrs. Ewing was not impeached, and, as far as I have read, was not even rebutted. The sergeant to whom the language was addressed neither resented it nor complained of it at the time. It would seem that this might tend to show that he did not regard it has having any sinister meaning.
>
> The conviction on this charge seems to be by the separate, uncorroborated testimony of the witness; but one witness testifies to the shocking language imputed to the major in the last sentence of the specification, and this witness is branded as a lewd and lascivious character by uncontradicted testimony.

That a conviction upon this specification was had passes the comprehension of any lawyer or judge who ever examined a charge and weighed the evidence.

Specification No. 9 relates to alleged improprieties at quartermaster's stable during September, 1913. One Pvt. John W. Barrett testified that the accused committed improprieties in act and language in and about the quartermaster's stables. The testimony of this witness, both as to probability and certainty, is unsatisfactory, and carries little probative force. General and special denial is made by Maj. Koehler, and shows that the acts did not and could not have occurred. This is shown not only by his testimony but by the testimony of a Mr. Fuller and First Lieut. John P. Smith, who contradict the statements of Barrett and are themselves uncontradicted. Sergt. Barrett had been reprimanded by accused in presence of First Lieut. Thomas O. Humphrey. First Lieut. Steese stated that Barrett had been removed as provost sergeant at his, Steese's request. The open, public character of the place itself would make improbable the story of Barrett. He had been removed from position by Maj. Koehler, refused appointment in another case, and reprimanded. Barrett had also been court-martialed and reduced to ranks for gambling with privates under his jurisdiction.

That the testimony of this witness was accepted as a basis for finding of guilty against Maj. Koehler is shocking to the intelligence of any man whoever considered a charge and weighed evidence in support of or against it.

Congressman GEORGE C. SCOTT, of Iowa, a Member of this House, a legal practitioner of long standing, and for several terms a public prosecutor, after examining this specification and evidence, said:

Generally observing witness Barrett, he appears to be a man who has been in the service 9 or 10 years; that he has held rank of sergeant and corporal; that he has been reduced on account of drunkenness and reduced in rank for gambling; that he has been relieved of his position for inefficiency, and again for deceitfulness to his superior. There is also considerable testimony indicating that his reputation for truthfulness and veracity is bad. At one point Barrett testifies that on being requested by the attendant he gave up the moving-picture show seat and left. He is squarely contradicted in this by Lieut. Humphreys. Upon a fair consideration it would seem that Lieut. Humphreys's testimony is the most credible and in all probability true. So, concluding, it is evident that Barrett deliberately lied at this point in his testimony.

Barrett's record taken as a whole, the type of man considered, it is evident that he is not such a man as would fairly appreciate the gravity of the accusations that he makes against Maj. Koehler. * * *

After more than 25 years' active practice of the law and observing courts and the considerations which have moved and controlled them, I have no hesitancy in expressing the opinion that ordinarily the testimony of the prosecution upon this specification when weighed against the evidence in opposition thereto would not be considered sufficiently weighty to justify the conviction before a magistrate of one of the minor offenses.

Specification 11 relates to an alleged episode of impropriety at what was to the fort practically a public telephone station.

The statement of the place, and the time being in or near the middle of the day, would suggest its improbability. The allegation is supported by L. R. Davis, a discharged man. This man said when first consulted by the prosecution that the occurrence was in August, 1912. The specification was based upon that statement. The accused, in his simplicity and with the belief that the facts were sought to be discovered rather than a prosecution conducted, immediately showed to the prosecuting officer that it could not have been at that time, as he was away at a distance from the fort. Then Davis was induced by some cause or person to change the year. It was then fixed at a time when the accused could not so clearly establish his continuous and precise whereabouts. Davis was not corroborated by anyone, save that some time after he had mentioned the fact to Brown, an electrician. Here the court, in direct contravention of all established rules of proper procedure, allowed Brown to relate the story told by Davis. This procedure was forced by a law officer from the Judge Advocate General's office when it would not have been permitted in any civil court in this land. The fact of immediate complaint, of course, would have been proper if the same had been made, but that was not the case here.

Davis was contradicted in full and in detail by Maj. Koehler. He further contradicted himself as to time. He was flatly contradicted by Lieut. Gorham as to time, and Gorham's presence at station, testified to by Davis, was circumstantially contradicted by Sergts. McDonald and Hess, Maj. McAndrew, and Pvt. Keene.

In addition to the impeachment of Davis by witnesses upon important facts, he was directly impeached as to reputation for veracity. Corpl. Dougherty said his reputation for veracity was bad and he would not pay his debts. Lieut. Steese said Davis's reputation for veracity was not good. It was shown by the evidence that he was a slanderer of the reputation of good women.

Davis's reputation was not defended by anybody. The prosecution recognized that he was indefensible.

The judge advocate, in his argument to the jury, said that he did not regard him as a very good soldier, but that his "story and the circumstances seem to indicate that he told the truth in this." Can it be that this is the measure of proof necessary to secure conviction of an act the penalty for which would be the same as for a heinous crime? Is this what is necessary to overcome the presumption of innocence which the law raises in every man's favor and which certainly attaches to a record of gallantry, truthfulness, and faithful service such as has been earned by the accused? Does conviction follow "mere indication"? If so, then the fundamental basis for personal security has been destroyed; the wisdom of centuries set aside without a precedent, authority, or reason.

Senator GEORGE W. NORRIS, of Nebraska, 10 years a Member of this House, many years a judge upon the Nebraska bench, and a prosecuting attorney before that, after examining this specification and evidence supporting it, said:

I am very much surprised that any tribunal could, on the evidence in support of specification No. 11, find Maj. Koehler guilty of the charge therein contained, and I do not see how any reviewing tribunal could review this evidence without being firmly impressed with the grave injustice of finding an officer of the United States Army guilty of such a charge upon the evidence submitted. There is very little evidence, if any, that tends to sustain this charge except the testimony of L. R. Davis; and his testimony is not only absolutely denied by the positive testimony of Maj. Koehler, but all the established circumstances tend very strongly to disprove every damaging statement that Davis has made. In addition to this, the character witnesses have, it seems to me, practically demonstrated that Davis was absolutely unworthy of belief, and common, ordinary decency and justice should not permit any conviction founded upon his uncorroborated testimony to be sustained.

Specification 12 relates to an alleged act of mild impropriety of the accused in the after cabin of the boat Nathaniel Greene, which boat plied between New London and Fort Terry. It was a most public place. Wilson was a deck hand. He says he had never seen accused before. What occurred made no serious impression on his mind, and he never told anyone about it until about the time of investigation. He made many conflicting statements as to the time. At one time alleged by Wilson Koehler was able to show absolutely he had not made the trip at all. As to the other, Koehler was corroborated by Sergt. Herbst, who was in a position to know. In the second statement it could not have been, because the date was subsequent to Wilson's discharge from the service of the Nathaniel Greene. Koehler in his complete and detailed denial was supported by the captain of the boat, who said Koehler had always ridden with him in the pilot house; and, further, that Wilson's reputation for veracity was bad. There was no evidence submitted to show how guilt could be predicated upon the evidence in this case. Congressman SCOTT, of Iowa, following his examination of this specification and the evidence thereunder, said:

The witness impresses one who examines his testimony as being one of those individuals who responds easily to suggestions, but lacks entirely that frankness and energy of statement which indicates that the witness speaks truthfully with respect to matters concerning which he has personal knowledge or recollection.

It is submitted that such testimony of such a witness utterly fails to support the charge against the accused by the degree of proof required under the law and the procedure of the court in question. It surely can not be possible that such a preposterous story and such a witness uncorroborated will overcome the testimony of the accused and the reasonable circumstances which he relates.

Specification 13 was certainly a maximum of accusation and was followed by a minimum of proof. The statement of Campbell the witness, after reciting events, was to the effect that the accused had always conducted himself as a gentleman toward him. Campbell placed no bad construction on the words and acts of the accused. Acts themselves were denied in full and detail by the accused and Campbell was not corroborated.

Congressman STEPHENS of Nebraska, after examining specification and evidence, said:

The evidence, therefore, upon which specification No. 13 must rest, even if accepted, seems to me to be ridiculous as a basis for a charge involving the discharge of an Army officer with an honorable service record.

But this charge is not supported by the evidence of any other witness, and is positively denied by the defendant, Maj. Benjamin M. Koehler. * * *

If the other specifications are no better supported by evidence of misconduct than is this one, I am constrained to believe that those responsible for this proceeding could have been better employed in some other service in behalf of the Army.

The same specification and evidence were submitted to the brilliant Senator T. J. WALSH, of Montana, long recognized as one of the ablest lawyers of the West. He said:

The testimony of the witness Campbell concerning the overt act charged is found on page 314 in answer to the question, "Did Maj. Koehler, etc.?" No right-minded person can attach any importance to the first part of the answer, and it is quite apparent that the witness did not. It is to be noted that touching the other acts the witness says "I believe." It seems scarcely credible that if the acts charged ever did take place and they had the significance attached to them in the charge the witness would find his recollection of the occurrence so feeble that he would be required to qualify what he had to say about the matter with the expression "I believe." So it will be noted by the testimony at the bottom of page 318 that he is not quite sure whether at the time he was standing up or sitting down. His answer is qualified in the same way—"Standing up, I believe." So it appears likewise from the testimony given at the bottom of page 317 and the top of page 318 that even the witness himself is not prepared to assert that the acts, on the occurrence of which he casts some doubt by the language in which he tells of them, had the detestable character or significance assigned to them by the charge. It seems unnecessary to canvass the testimony further. It would not support the charge in any court exercising civil jurisdiction, and ought not to be deemed sufficient for conviction in any tribunal, however constituted.

Specification No. 14 alleges an impropriety with Sergt. James T. Ward. This is a case where Ward makes a statement which was flatly contradicted by the accused. Ward is in no wise corroborated either by other witnesses or circumstantially. It is established by the evidence of Harry Reubens, civilian, that because Ward did not obtain a position which he desired the accused to aid him in securing, that he would "get even" with Maj. Koehler, and which from the tone of Ward's statement, Reubens regarded his threat as serious and fraught with intention to injure the major. Reubens and Ward were together a great deal, occupying the same apartment; that Ward selected as a basis of his charge a time when Reubens was not present. Ward complained to Lieut. Humphreys about Maj. Koehler keeping him out of a job and in that connection using improper language, bordering upon insubordination and disrespect.

Corpl. Hall testified that Ward stated to him that he had enlisted as a single man, and he was in fact married. When Ward was asked on the witness stand as to whether or not he was married when he enlisted, he claimed that to answer would incriminate or degrade him. Ward was in that delicate position where he would be constrained to testify as would please those above him and who had the power to punish.

Ward was discredited by his own conduct upon the stand and his statements made to other witnesses. His enmity was shown by the statements of his associates and superior officer. His story is incredible and unreasonable. The evidence under this specification would not be sufficient to convict a Mississippi negro charged with chicken stealing.

This specification was submitted to a distinguished jurist Senator, who stated, after examining the evidence, there was no basis for the finding of guilt. His written opinion is not at present available.

Specification 15 alleged certain obscene language and familiar acts on the part of the accused. Precisely the same testimony was given to language as was given to familiar acts, yet the finding was not guilty as to the charge of obscene language, but guilty as to the act.

Witness Fairey asserted and Koehler denied. Koehler's denial was supported by direct contradictory evidence and testimony of First Lieut. Smith and Civilian Fuller. If they, or either of them, told the truth, Fairey was a liar. Both of these men were of good reputation. Fairey had importuned Koehler for promotion and was denied. Fairey was a stableman under Barrett, of Specification No. 9. There was the connection with specification 10, in which Pvt. Ensley testified that he also was a stableman under Barrett, and his testimony was so sensational and improbable that a finding of no guilt was entered. The finding of guilt in this specification was without any basic reason or probability, to say nothing of being supported by that evidence which was of so much force that it removed all reasonable doubt of guilt.

On this specification and evidence thereunder, I quote from Congressman ANTHONY, lawyer and editor and of long service in this House, as follows:

I have carefully examined the record of this court-martial and beg leave herewith to submit to you a brief summary of my conclusions thereon, and particularly upon specification No. 15. * * *

After such examination I am convinced that no civil jury in the United States would ever convict a man of such an offense upon the evidence submitted. There appears to be an entire lack of conclusive evidence tending to show the commission of any overt act. There also seems to be an entire absence of any corroborative evidence on any of the specifications. After reading the case the only explanation that I can arrive at as having actuated the court in reaching their verdict was that they were undoubtedly carried away with the atmosphere of guilt which was built up by the large number of specifications. Where a man is charged with an act of this kind the tongue of slander and gossip as it travels invariably increases and magnifies everything until to many otherwise innocent actions there is attributed questionable motives.

This is unquestionably the case in specification No. 15. In analyzing the evidence of Pvt. Fairey—and it is absolutely unsubstantiated and flatly contradicted by the accused—it is seen that it is purely a question of putting a construction upon an action and language which, even if true, would, in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred, be unsusceptible of a meaning which the court evidently placed upon it. * * *

The court undoubtedly was not warranted in making any finding whatsoever against the accused on the charge and the evidence in specification No. 15, and the fact that the court did so find is evidence to my mind that it permitted itself to be carried away under the influence of the general atmosphere of guilt and suspicion which the prosecuting officers of the Government endeavored to build up around the accused. * * *

In my opinion, the motive which unquestionably governed Pvt. Fairey in testifying against the accused was the disappointment caused by the failure of the accused to appoint him a sergeant, for which position the soldier had asked. * * *

All through this case there seems to run a motive, manifested by a majority of the witnesses, to conspire against the accused for revenge for real or fancied wrongs. Testimony from such witnesses should have been more carefully weighed by the court.

Another point that impresses me in a review of this case is that the trial of the case was undoubtedly prejudiced by the unusual publicity which was given it in the metropolitan newspapers, and from the further fact that newspaper interviews from high military authority undoubtedly tended to influence or prejudice the members of the court. * * *

It would seem to me that one in authority should require absolute proof and absolute evidence in order to convict a man of the offense with which the accused was charged. The moment the accused was ordered to trial he was damned, and therefore in reviewing the proceedings of this court-martial it would occur to me that the fact that not a single one of the specifications has been proven beyond a reasonable doubt, as would be required in any court of law with which I am familiar, should have great weight.

Congressman BARTON, of Nebraska, auditor of state for Nebraska for two terms, a man of business and affairs, after examining the specification and evidence, said as follows:

I have read the evidence of the witness Fairey, and noted what he said the accused had done, and also the conduct of the witness following that time up to the time he communicated with Capt. Mayes. The clear and explicit denial of the accused that he did the improper act alleged by Pvt. Fairey to my mind brought a distinct issue and demanded before conviction could be had corroboration of the testimony of Fairey. This is entirely lacking, and, on the contrary, I find First Lieut. Smith corroborating the statement of the accused. * * * The accused is further corroborated by John W. Fuller, a civilian. * * *

I claim no credit for ability for nice legal distinctions, but having had a great deal to do with public and legal affairs generally, and understanding that the military law as well as the criminal law require that the accused be found to have committed the alleged act beyond a reasonable doubt, I am at an entire loss to understand how a finding of guilty under the evidence in specification No. 15 could be made.

If an officer of the rank of major is to be at the absolute mercy of the word of any private, wholly uncorroborated and unsupported, I can not understand how any officer would be safe in his position or would dare exert any discipline.

Specification 16. This specification charges accused with improper familiarity with Sergt. Byers. This is a case where two majors and a sergeant were in a small room together transacting the business of the Government. Each within a few feet from and in full view of each other. Byers affirms acts by accused. Both Maj. Koehler and Maj. Moses positively deny statements, yet the jury found accused guilty. There was no complaint by Byers to anyone, and he was corroborated by no one or by any important circumstance.

Conviction on this count shows how regardless of the rights of the defense the court must have been as measured outside of a court-martial. It further demonstrates how helpless, however innocent the accused was before that body of men, who seemed to lust for his downfall and the destruction of his prospects and honor rather than to find and preserve justice.

This specification I submitted to the senior Senator from Iowa. He is known throughout the United States as one of the leading lawyers in that great body at the other end of the Capitol which has attracted to its membership great lawyers ever since the organization of the Government. Senator CUMMINS, after reading this specification and the evidence submitted in its support and after sketching the testimony of Sergt. Byers, said:

Against this testimony Maj. Koehler describes in a very clear and logical way the entire progress of the work, denying absolutely the charges of Sergt. Byers. Corroborating Maj. Koehler and squarely contradicting Sergt. Byers, Maj. Moses testifies that when they began the work he sat down at the desk with his list; that Maj. Koehler stood near him and in his plain view the entire time * * * that they both examined each and every article jointly, inspecting and passing judgment upon them; that Maj. Koehler was within his view and range of vision the entire time; that he stood up all of that time, and that nothing of the nature testified to by Sergt. Byers occurred. * * *

It is impossible to reconcile the testimony of Sergt. Byers and that of Maj. Koehler and Maj. Moses as to the method pursued in performing the work referred to. It is also impossible to reconcile the testimony of Sergt. Byers and Maj. Moses upon the issue as to whether Maj. Koehler squatted down with the sergeant over by the pile and practically performing the entire work of inspection, or as to whether he stood all the time by the desk and performed the work jointly with Maj. Moses.

An examination of all the evidence offered in support of this specification would suggest that one of three hypotheses must be true, either Sergt. Byers speaks the truth or he has willfully falsified the situation or has taken as a basis some slight and trivial act and designedly enlarged upon it until he has developed an entirely false situation.

Upon all of the testimony the problem is presented, Is the testimony of this witness sufficient when judged in accordance with the rules governing judicial tribunals to sustain the charge excluding all reasonable doubt?

It seems to me that the record of testimony is entirely insufficient to sustain this charge. In the first place the circumstances related by Sergt. Byers do not present rational conduct. It was broad day; there were three men together, each in plain sight of the others; these men were there for a specific purpose, to do work which was to be accomplished within a few minutes time. The sergeant was a practical stranger to Maj. Koehler. The conduct to which Sergt. Byers testifies, under the circumstances, is utterly irreconcilable with a rational mind.

Second, the testimony of Sergt. Byers is in irreconcilable conflict with that of the other two men, not only with respect to the act charged, but with respect to the method of the progress of the work.

It is a fundamental principle governing all trials involving charges of moral turpitude that the accused is presumed to be innocent; that that presumption continues until the close of the trial; and that the evidence must be such as, when weighed against the evidence offered in opposition thereto, to establish guilt beyond every reasonable doubt.

To convict an officer of the Army of this revolting conduct upon the evidence submitted under specification No. 16 would reverse all rules of law and shock the civilized sense of justice.

Specification No. 17. In this there is charged only improper conversation by the accused with Master Gunner King.

The only improper language related by King was a remark made by accused about King's furlough, then just ending. King in his testimony insisted upon placing an improper significance on the words used, and which was wholly unrelated to the usual and natural use of the words. Moreover, he said he and Koehler rode from New York to New London in a day-coach smoker. Koehler denies this absolutely. He said his only trip was made April 12, 1912, and not May 23, 1912, as testified to by King. That he, Koehler, rode home in a Pullman and King was not with him any part of the trip. He obtained his luncheon on the diner. In this he was corroborated by his sister, who prepared no lunch for him, as she knew he had come home on a train having a diner and it was their custom to take their luncheon on that diner when making such trip; she, therefore, did not prepare any lunch for him and none was asked for. This certainly would have been done if he had not lunched in the diner.

King admitted that Koehler had denied him a personal letter of indorsement which King wanted very much. Further, Koehler had twice reprimanded him.

If the testimony of King had been established or admitted to be true, it would have been a most trivial basis for the specification. But under the rules of evidence it would not support a charge before an examining magistrate, if uncontradicted, to say nothing about establishing guilt before an impartial jury beyond a reasonable doubt. Congressman J. M. C. SMITH, of Michigan, now three times elected Member of this body, a legal practitioner for more than a quarter of a century, and for four years a public prosecutor, after examining this specification and the evidence thereunder, said:

> It will please be observed that, standing alone, this testimony is of the most trivial character. * * *
>
> The specification is supported by one witness alone, who had twice been reprimanded by respondent, a sufficient motive if one is sought. * * * The material testimony of complainant is specifically denied by respondent, corroborated by the circumstances. * * *
>
> That the good character of a respondent stands with him to the end. That respondent must be considered innocent until proven guilty not only by a preponderance of the evidence, but beyond a fair and reasonable doubt. That the testimony must be considered in the light of his innocence and he is not to prove himself not guilty before he is proven guilty. That the burden of proof rests with the prosecution. That the respondent can not be convicted on the unsupported testimony of one witness's position. Innocence instead of guilt must be inferred or denied when the construction of the language admits of two interpretations. That charges against superior officers must be clearly proven. * * *
>
> May I only add that my honest conviction is that the respondent is not guilty; that this charge or specification is not proven by the preponderating proof, let alone beyond a reasonable doubt; that frequently a man's character is his sole defense; that justice, morality, and good order will best be subserved by an acquittal on this specification; that the complainant shifted the date and so weakened his testimony. Complainant admitted he was twice disciplined by respondent; that there is reason to infer that the charge is founded upon an old grudge; that the respondent is not proven guilty by a preponderance of the proof, while the proof should be clear and convincing and beyond a fair and reasonable doubt.

Maj. Koehler was a necessary and proper witness under each of the 17 specifications. True, his interest in the result of the case must be considered in weighing his testimony. It should be said in his behalf that he was selected as a young man of clean morals, high ideals, physical perfection, and high mental endowment. That he had the opportunities which our great Military Academy, with its history and traditions hanging over it, with its faculty and equipment for its present conduct, with that emulation which arises among cadets, with 17 years' service in the Army, in barracks, fort, field, and battle, under all of which men are made better, stronger, more reliable, and hence more truthful. Especially is this last true where advancement has been gained for honorable service and for special bravery and gallantry where life has been in hazard. It has been well said that for fearless truth, even though to the witness's own hurt, "conduct me to a ripened soldier, with a successful career behind him, with honorable promotion before him." All of these can be said of Maj. Koehler, and no one has attempted to gainsay any of them, either in part or degree.

Into the scale for the determination of each of these specifications Maj. Koehler has thrown the weight of his good name, attested by good, brave, pure men who knew him throughout his career. These men knew the reputation he enjoyed. Moreover a number of them had lived with him and knew his conduct and every-day life. Some of them for years, and among them all some knew him all of his time in the Army. These were men who valued their own reputations and the reputation of the Army as they did their stainless swords.

Lieut. Terry, executive officer at the post, said he knew the accused intimately, officially, and socially, and that he was always gentlemanly, dignified, efficient, and refined. A firm disciplinarian.

Lieut. Smith knew the accused intimately during his whole service at the fort, never saw an ungentlemanly act, never heard him utter an improper or ungentlemanly word.

Lieut. Lee lived in the same tent with him; stated his conduct was always that of a gentleman.

Capt. Patton, next in seniority to Maj. Koehler in the post since 1911, who had been with the accused on distant trips, and occupied adjoining connected rooms, testified as to his constant propriety both in act and language.

Lieut. Humphreys, at the fort from 1909 to 1912, knew accused intimately. Never saw or heard an ungentlemanly or improper act or word by accused.

First Lieut. Steese was with the accused five days in the week for periods of from five minutes to several hours a day and never saw or heard an improper word or act by the accused.

Corpl. James E. Hall served with the accused in the Philippines and was with him in the battles in the island campaigns. The accused was fearless and painstaking and careful of his men; never heard the accused utter a vulgar or obscene word nor conduct himself unbecoming a gentleman.

Pvt. George Kronchonoskie was orderly for the accused at Fort Terry for 17 months, in constant attendance upon him, and found him always a gentleman.

Sergt. John Cashman had just completed 30 years' service and had been stationed for 4 months with accused, examining recruits numbering from 30 to 50 a day, and accused never used an improper word or act in all that experience with its opportunities.

Sergt. William T. Williams had known accused for two and one-half years, and his duties brought him into frequent association with accused at different places, and no word or act of impropriety occurred in his presence.

Sergt. William H. Williams, with special opportunities for meeting or seeing the accused, never saw an improper act or heard a vulgar or obscene word from the accused.

Capt. Proctor, master of the Nathaniel Greene, and in whose pilot house the accused had always ridden, had never heard a vile word or saw an improper act on part of the accused.

Sergt. Hoffman, on duty as provost sergeant, saw accused alone every day for a long time; never heard an improper word or saw an act of impropriety by the accused.

Sergt. Hess, for six years color sergeant at Fort Terry, alone with the accused for more than one hundred times, never heard him say anything of a vulgar nature.

Sergt. McDonald, for two years acting sergeant major, at headquarters for a year, was alone with the accused every day and never heard him use vulgar or obscene language or do an ungentlemanly act.

Second Lieut. Gorham, at Fort Terry since August 11 and many times alone with the accused at his office and home, never heard improper language or saw an improper act on his part.

Maj. McAndrew knew accused before he came to the post. Frequently at his home played golf with him; never heard or saw an ungentlemanly word or act.

Maj. Moses knew the accused for 20 years; never knew him to tell an improper story or anything suggesting vulgarity.

Col. Davis, in command of the post, has known the accused since he was a cadet in the Military Academy, had expressed his appreciation of the excellence of the work of the accused at Fort Terry, and attested to his professional efficiency, manliness, courage, and conduct becoming an officer and gentleman.

Col. H. L. Hawthorne has known the accused since 1898; was associated with him intimately; and slept by his side for three months in the Philippines. Never saw the slightest evidence of anything but that of a gentleman and officer of the highest ideals.

Lieut. Col. Peyton C. Marsh has known the accused since 1898; saw him every day while under the command in the Astor battery until December, 1898. Said accused was courteous, free from vulgarity, well disciplined as a soldier, and unquestionably a gentleman.

Lieut. Col. W. L. Kenly has known the accused since June, 1899; was associated with him 3½ years in New York City; during this time lived with him 9 months in an apartment, breakfasted daily, frequently dining together, used a common bathroom. During 15 years of acquaintance never saw a single symptom of anything that was not manly or anything that could not be said of a man of the highest type—a normal manly man, a gentleman in all respects always.

The prosecution in its investigation inquired of about 125 persons in or near Fort Terry. Out of this number it relied upon and presented 16 witnesses upon which the records of this case warrant absolutely the following classification—there were a few other minor witnesses heard, but the testimony of whom was unimportant:

Five witnesses whose reputations for veracity were proven to be "bad," namely, Lieut. Austin G. Frick, Sergt. Edison Kirkman, Pvt. Ensley, Pvt. L. R. Davis, Deck Hand Harry C. Wilson.

Three proven to have testified falsely by at least two contradicting witnesses: Sergt. C. Byers, Sergt. John W. Barrett, Pvt. H. C. Fairey.

Three had been reprimanded by Maj. Koehler—Capt. Phillip Worcester, Lieut. Frick, Gunner Harry E. King.

Two had been court-martialed or reduced in rank at instance of Maj. Koehler, namely, Sergt. John W. Barrett and Corpl. I. W. Spears.

Five were refused favors strongly solicited: Sergt. James T. Ward, Gunner Harry King, Pvt. H. C. Fairey, Corpl. I. N. Spears, and Sergt. Barrett.

Five specially interested in case or at enmity to Maj. Koehler, Capt. Worster, Lieut. Frick, Sergt. Elvin Byers, Sergt. Moody, and Sergt. Ward.

Witness convicted of gambling, John W. Barrett.

Witness in service, under statement of fact, the truth or falsity of which refused to say, as it might degrade or incriminate him, James T. Ward.

Two witnesses, defamers of good women, Lieut. Frick and L. R. Davis.

Witness intoxicated at time of alleged occurrence in specification, Isaac N. Spears.

NOTE.—Of the 16 witnesses in the above classification two remain:

First. Harvey Kernan testified as to the eighth specification, upon which Maj. Koehler was acquitted.

Second. Jacob Campbell was wholly uncorroborated and was trivial throughout.

Perhaps no more severe comment could be made than the fact that upon testimony of the foregoing witnesses conviction was had, and that these witnesses remain at Fort Terry in the service of the Government, to receive the advancement to which they are eligible; and, further, that none of them, so far as I am informed, have been tried for the part they took in this affair.

What an unwitting tribute this war court pays to the courage and discipline of Maj. Koehler in that his alleged indiscretions were with those whom he had refused favor, those whom he had reprimanded, those whom he had punished, and those unfriendly to him.

Further, Maj. Koehler interposed a stainless, brave, and gallant record, with the commendations of his superiors and the praise of his old commander, Gen. Lawton, the American fighting lion of the Philippines, while against him there was practically none who had faced an enemy in battle or been under the baptism of fire.

With this record, the question naturally arises, How was a conviction secured? There was sent from the War Department at Washington a special prosecutor, Capt. Mayes. To the tribunal which tried Maj. Koehler he represented the wish of Washington and centered in his person and dropped from his lips the supposed desires of those in authority. Further, his statement of the law was given weight beyond its deserts.

Further, there is an un-American feature of the court-martial procedure which should be reformed. After the evidence is all in, the accused must assume the burden of the opening argument and discover at haphazard what the important contentions of the prosecution are. The defense has not the advantage of having the issue fairly made by an opening argument of the prosecution, so that it can fairly meet and properly combat the statements of the prosecution both as to analysis of fact and declaration as to the law. After the defense has made its argument the prosecution then makes the closing speech, analyzing the facts and stating the law from its point of view, without opportunity, expectation, or fear of being contradicted. In this the Judge Advocate has the united power and prestige of prosecutor and judge.

Listen, lawyers, how this judge advocate used that privilege and power. He told the jury that one witness was enough to prove an act of the kind charged. He left it as if that was the generally accepted proposition of law. Every one of you know that the rule is to require corroboration of the evidence of the other party. That it is only in exceptional cases where corroboration may be dispensed with in the interest of justice, as where the other party were one of tender years or the place of such seclusion that corroborating evidence would become impossible, or other kindred special circumstances which might relax the rule.

Again, the judge advocate declared that one witness was sufficient in this case, because of the secret nature of the transactions. The record distinctly shows that the only specifications where the facts even partook of secrecy among the 17 were those in which the accused was acquitted; that in the other specifications where the guilt was found the place and time and circumstances marked them as either public or semipublic, with other persons present or within easy access whose appearances would be unheralded. Yet of all the 11 specifications where guilt was found the prosecution did not present two sets of eyes or two sets of ears which saw or heard any act or any word complained of.

Again, the judge advocate said:

When offenses are committed the liability of the person to commit that offense may be established by proof of commission of other offenses.

Every lawyer knows that is an incorrect statement of the law. The scope of this discussion will not permit of extended brief of the law. I submit the following as a statement of the general text:

Subject to certain general exceptions, evidence of other offenses than those involved in the indictment is inadmissible. (See Cyc. 22, p. 450.)

Again, among inferences which, except under certain conditions, the law will not permit to be drawn is that a person has done a certain act because he has done a similar act at another time. (Cyc., 17–279.)

In the case of Fields against The Territory of Wyoming the court held:

Evidence of a distinct substantive offense can not be admitted to aid in proving the commission of another offense.

The exceptions are only where two acts are related as between the same persons consecutively or closely related in point of time, neither of which obtain in this case. This, you will recall, was in the closing argument of the prosecution. There was no opportunity for contradiction or correction. The law seems to have been stated by the judge advocate following the motto of Aaron Burr, who is said to have defined the law as "that which can be boldly asserted and plausibly maintained."

But, even to grant the correctness of the statement, it would not apply to this case, because it would require an established case to aid in the proof of one that was under debate, and none of these specifications had been established.

In vain this young man early conceived an ambition to attend West Point, and fitted himself therefor, making an exemplary record in that great institution, where boys are molded into heroic men with purest ideals and loftiest ambitions. To no purpose was his soldierly and effective conduct in fort, at recruiting station, through drill and discipline of years. It mattered not that he deserved and had the good opinion of every officer whose good opinion was worth having, down through the years of service, and received the uniform commendation from his superiors. No advantage to him in the day of his trial was his career in the Philippines under fire and in council where, young as he was, he attracted the attention of the great fighting Lawton, of whom all Americans are proud. Gen. Lawton never did mere lip service, and his pen was not always used in praise. Gen. Lawton, on November 14, 1899, said:

Young and his cavalry, Ballance and his infantry, and Koehler with his mountain battery are deserving of all that can be said of them.

To Americans generally that tribute to Maj. Koehler had but one meaning. It seems by this tribunal to have been given a different construction. The language of Lawton is construed to be oracular. Most men, if the terse statement of Lawton was to be construed, would say "deserving of all that can be said of them" meant "deserving of all the best that can be said of them by the best of them." Maj. Koehler, before that tribunal, was subjected to the reverse construction, "deserving of all the worst that can be said of them by the worst of them."

In the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill which has recently passed this House there was appropriated $40,000,000, of which $1,500,000 was set aside for the judiciary. That is for the enforcement of justice among the people affected under national law. I doubt if one-hundredth as much proportionately in this bill is to be used in the cause of justice among our military men. Yet the day will come when justice among our defenders will be given more and better consideration than it has heretofore. This bill provides for protection to our great cities, our private property, and the integrity of our national boundaries. Some of it should be used for the protection of our protectors.

Other bright, clean men are in the Army. If their duty has been performed, delinquents have been refused favors, given reprimands, and have suffered punishment. Other fortress riffraff may have been conspiring against honorable officers and, by reason of their numbers and organization, attempted to pave their way to ease and preferment. I hope that no dollar of that which we vote in this bill may be used to aid such a purpose. If some attention is paid hereafter to this branch of our service, the use of this time to-day may not have been in vain, or the cruel and unjust sacrifice of Maj. Koehler have been to the country a total loss.

But justice may not forever sleep. The time may come when this House will be the forum to rectify this manifest wrong.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20241) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1915 and prior years, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

On January 12, 1915:

S. J. Res. 58. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to present the bell of the late U. S. S. Princeton to the borough of Princeton, N. J.

(To correct list of January 14, 1914, giving January 11 as date of approval.)

On January 15, 1915:

S. J. Res. 218. Joint resolution to provide for the detail of an officer of the Army for duty with the Panama-California Exposition, San Diego, Cal.

On January 16, 1915:

S. 6039. An act for the coinage of certain gold and silver coins in commemoration of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition, and for other purposes.

On January 20, 1915:

S. 5168. An act for the relief of the King Theological Hall, and authorizing the conveyance of real estate to the Howard University and other grantees.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] 25 minutes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I speak on this appropriation bill now before the House. My topic is that we should provide for the national defense and perform the duty imposed upon us by the Constitution by enlarged appropriations. Many propositions have been made which involve change of law, but such change takes time and discussion as to the kind of change that should be made. I urge upon this House action which is already provided for by law and appropriations that will enable us to perform an express injunction of the Constitution.

The Constitution says of Congress in another clause that we must provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia. And the Constitution meant by militia the whole able-bodied free male population of the United States. It did not mean a select militia or national guard, as we now understand the word; it meant what we call the reserve militia of 16,000,000 men who are still enumerated as belonging to that reserve militia and who would have to be the final defense of this country as volunteers in time of war. I urge that arms should be provided which would be at their service if they be called out. It is undisputed that enough of such arms and necessary material is not now on hand and is not pretended to be on hand.

At the outbreak of the War with Spain I was on the Military Affairs Committee, and I asked a gentleman from the Ordnance Department how many rifles we had. He whispered to me as a secret that we had some 300,000 of the old Springfields. It is unnecessary to regard this as a secret now. We know that we have not the old Springfield breech-loading, black-powder rifles with which our volunteers went to Cuba. We know that there were then no Krags on hand except for a small force of some tens of thousands of Regulars. We know that all the better rifles, the magazine rifles, that we have now are those that have been made since then. All this is public knowledge. We tell no secrets and we ask none.

There has been about $20,300,000 appropriated since that time for the manufacture of magazine small arms.

(Here as in all other places any extension of Mr. PARKER'S remarks is printed in small type.)

The appropriation of 1898 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, contained a provision that it shall be applicable to the manufacture of magazine arms recommended for trial by the board recently in session and approved by the Secretary of War. The appropriations for the various years, made in each case for the following fiscal year, were as follows:

1898	$400,000
1899	800,000
1899 (urgent deficiency)	200,000
1900	1,100,000
1901	1,100,000
1902	1,700,000
1903	1,700,000
1904	1,700,000
1905	1,700,000
1906	1,700,000
1907	1,700,000
1908	1,778,158
1909	1,700,000
1910	1,000,000
1911	750,000
1912	700,000
1913	600,000
Total	20,328,158

A rifle cost $17 in 1899 and it now costs about $15, so that these appropriations provided about 1,330,000 rifles. If we suppose that in 17 years some 300,000 have been worn out, there would be 1,000,000 left. We manufactured Krags for one-fourth of the time, and we manufactured Springfields for the rest of the time, and any foreigner that looks upon our appropriations knows that we have about 350,000 Krags and 650,000 of the others.

I saw in a statement that was made by the chairman of this committee, and printed on page 1760 of the RECORD, that my estimate was within 37,000 of the actual amount we have on hand—1,037,000 rifles. Gen. Crozier says that they have 343,000 Krags which are part of those on hand.

What is the use of secrecy? The world knows we have only about a million rifles. I think it would make for peace and harmony and the defense of this country that the whole world should know that instead of having arms for about one-sixteenth of the able-bodied population of the United States we had arms for every man. It only costs $15 a man, and we can spread it over 10 years at $1.50 a year.

Silence is good as to secret and new weapons, whether ships of sea or air or of the depths or fort or siege guns. We can not keep an army of a million men at a cost of one thousand million a year. The ultimate strength of our Nation is in the 16,000,000 reserve.

We may well wish the world knew that we had a rifle for every man and artillery to go with them; that our schoolboys were taught to use the rifle; and that larger military schools like West Point were filling our community with educated officers in civil life.

I mention this because I helped the situation somewhat in 1899, and I am sorry to say that I was to blame in not seeing that the improvement was kept up. When I found that we had so few rifles, I induced the Committee on Military Affairs to report $800,000 instead of $400,000 for the manufacture of arms, and some laughed and said that the House would never stand for an appropriation above the estimate. Mr. Chairman, we got our $800,000, and it gave courage to the War Department; they asked for more, and we gradually worked that appropriation up to $1,700,000, which gave us 100,000 rifles a year. This was kept up for 10 years, but since the year 1909 the amount has been gradually reduced, until instead of $1,700,000 this bill carries only $250,000, which will give us only 15,000 rifles, or enough to take care of what go out of commission every year, perhaps hardly enough. Certainly this is not providing for the common defense, and if men ask why we should provide more than our military experts request, I may say in all frankness that when a department finds that it can only have a certain amount of money, and there are men all over that department who depend for their living upon Army organization, that money will be expended preferentially, without looking ahead, in keeping up that organization. It costs on the average a thousand dollars a year a man to keep up the Army.

Mr. Chairman, with that thousand dollars a year we can purchase in 10 years equipment and arms for 100 men, and in addition provide for military schools whose graduates in civil life will be fit officers on a call for volunteers.

The very cheapest way to provide for war is to provide arms and equipment. They are so cheap that the first law passed under the Constitution to provide for arming the militia enacted that every man between 18 and 45 years of age should appear within six months with his own musket or firelock his own belt and bayonet, cartridges (not less than 24), cartridge box, and knapsack, or if he had a rifle, he could bring instead of a cartridge box and cartridges balls and powder. That put upon every man an expense of $20 or so. Of course this did not prove a wise requirement, because all men could not afford to comply; the poor did not do so, and only the better off did so. As a result the militia law of 1792 was not very successful. I can not go more into detail, because my time has been cut from 40 minutes to 25 minutes, but during all of the years from 1790 to 1797 the Father of his Country in almost every message was urging that the Congress should provide for arming the militia, and by that he meant every able-bodied freeman in this whole country. He was urging that we should establish manufactures of arms. In two separate messages he said that the best security for the preservation of peace was to be prepared for war. He urged the establishment of the academy at West Point to give us officers. Mr. Adams repeated the same statement about preparation for war; but, nevertheless, little was done. In 1798 an act was passed nominally to provide arms for the States, but it gave only 30,000 stand of arms for the militia. Then came the administration of Thomas Jefferson—he was a Democrat, remember—and when Thomas Jefferson came into the White House as President he said in the first message: "Nor should we now or at any time separate until we can say that we have done everything for the militia which we would do if an enemy were at our door."

Through his messages he urges this course. It is interesting to compare our present condition with that in which the United States found itself during the Napoleonic wars. Year after year our commerce was attacked, our ships were taken, our peace was threatened. Mr. Jefferson, in 1807, said that the moment our peace was threatened he deemed it indispensable to secure a greater provision of those articles of military stores with which our magazines were not furnished. He could not wait for a law. He did not hesitate to authorize engagements adequate to the emergencies. In March, 1808, he advised enlargement of the academy at West Point. In April, 1808, that great Democrat, John Randolph, of Roanoke, offered a bill which provided an annual appropriation to provide arms for the whole body of the militia. It had a blank for the amount to be appropriated annually. It contained a second section allowing the Government to put up manufactories and a third section allowing the arms to be distributed to the States to arm the militia; but when the bill came to be passed the Congress was very careful of its appropriations, and gave only $200,000. Mr. Randolph said that the bill was useless with $200,000; that that would not provide for the growth of the militia from year to year by birth, whereas he expected to have at least a million dollars a year in order to arm them all.

But in order to give you the view which should prevail when people talk of peace I will read from one message of Thomas Jefferson. All through these times reference was made to conditions which are like ours, and Mr. Jefferson, on November 8, 1808, said that, considering the extraordinary character of the times in which we live, our attention should unremittingly be fixed on the safety of our country; that for a people who are free and who mean to remain so a well-organized and armed militia is their best security, and that it is therefore incumbent upon us at every meeting to revise the condition of the militia and to ask ourselves if it is prepared to repel a powerful enemy at every point of our territory exposed to invasion. He continued, that under the acts of that year respecting arms the difficulty of procuring them from abroad during the present situation and dispositions of Europe induced him to direct his whole efforts to the means of internal supply; that the public factories have therefore been enlarged, additional machineries have been erected, and in proportion as artificers can be found or formed their effect, already more than doubled, may be increased so as to keep pace with the yearly increase of the militia; that the annual sums appropriated by the latter act have been directed to the encouragement of private factories of arms, and contracts have been entered into with individual undertakers to nearly the amount of the first year's appropriation.

Do we need arms now? Washington needed powder and shot in the Revolution and had to send for them to Pennsylvania and New Jersey, where the shot was cast in the New Jersey hills and sent across the Hudson at West Point up to Massachusetts. When the Mexican War took place we did better, because then in proportion to the population we had more graduates of West Point in civil life. When the Civil War came those who remember it, as I do, will remember how our troops had to go forward in batches, armed some with the Henry carbine, some with the Spencer, some with the Remington, some with this, and some with that, mostly old muzzle-loaders, and how we finally had to make enough Springfield muzzle-loaders for the Army. We could not afford to wait to do that now. There was the same trouble on both sides of the line at that time——

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Only for a short question; my time is limited.

Mr. McKENZIE. How many rifles does the gentleman think we ought to have?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I will tell the gentleman in a moment. I think we ought to have 5,000,000. Really, we ought to have 16,000,000. I will deal now with your question, because I am afraid I will be out of time if I do not. There are other things I want to speak about, but I will now come to that. We once appropriated for 100,000 rifles a year. We can make on two shifts in our Government factories 1,500 a day, or 500,000 a year, and we could make from 750,000 to 820,000 with three shifts working every Sunday. I have the figures here, but I state it in that general way.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I do.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman is speaking of Field Artillery?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Only of the arms, of rifles, nothing more.

Mr. GARDNER. Rifle ammunition?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Of rifles. I said rifles; that these small arms can be made for 500,000 men in our present factories, and we could thus in 10 years get 5,000,000. I do not know what we can do as to ammunition. We ought to have ammunition for these rifles. The cost, as I say, of 500,000 rifles will be $7,500,000 a year. We ought to have the same amount for ammunition. Every military man states that modern magazine rifles use ammunition very fast. They want 100 rounds in the belt, 120 right by in the combat train, 120 in the ammunition supply train—that makes 340; and they want a like amount in reserve, so it makes 680 rounds. If we supply 600, at a cost of 2½ cents apiece, then for the 500,000 rifles we would have to appropriate $7,500,000. We need artillery. The reports of the War Department congratulate themselves that they have artillery for 350,000 men. I think that right, Mr. GARDNER, that the Secretary of War, or, rather, the War Department, congratulate themselves that they have field guns now for about 350,000 men.

Mr. GARDNER. Well, on the basis of 3.16 field guns for 1,000 men.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I understand; it may not be enough——

Mr. GARDNER. But according to the last estimate they have not.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. We ought to have manufactured every year enough field guns for at least 500,000 men until we get enough for the Army, and they can not be made in a hurry. If you allow four guns to 1,000 men, or a battery, that battery will cost $70,000 fully equipped. I think that the tenders and the harness, and so forth, could largely be left to be made during an emergency. The cost of the gun and its carriage for a battery of four guns is estimated at $20,000, and if for the 500,000 men there will be $10,000,000 more to be provided every year for field artillery. The cost of the ammunition is large. I understand the provision should be 1,800 rounds per gun. If guns are to be fired all the while the men are in the trenches, the guns being fired over their heads, to keep up an artillery duel the Army is obliged to have ammunition, which can not be made in a hurry. It is a question whether we have sufficient factories to make it. It is certain that the cost of that amount of ammunition amounts to somewhere near $36,000,000 for 500,000 men.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. If the gentleman will not take up too much of my time.

Mr. GARDNER. Only a moment. Eighteen hundred rounds for the 3-inch guns is the estimate before the war; the estimate since the war of the Chief of Staff is 5,000 rounds for each gun.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Perhaps, however, all of that artillery is not likely to be fighting from the beginning. If we have sufficient factories, we might get along with smaller stores on hand. Ammunition may spoil in keeping, and I do not know about that; but if we appropriate $20,000,000 for ammunition, the total of the figures I have given is far below $50,000,000. With that $50,000,000, if we try to enlarge the present Army, we would only get 50,000 men, while that sum would arm 5,000,000 men at the end of 10 years. Is it not cheaper to provide arms and ammunition for 500,000 a year and in 10 years have arms and ammunition for 5,000,000 volunteers, which would be needed if they were called into a war? We have no right to refuse it. Are we to be governed in Congress by the views of those who look out for their organization, without thinking of what may come? It is our business to know what the dangers of the country are. It is our business to know what provisions should be made for the millions who would be called upon in case of war.

It is our business to make provision, and I implore this House at least to go back to the provisions that we had in 1909, long after the Spanish War. We then appropriated $1,200,000 a year for small-arms ammunition. They have reduced the estimate in this bill to $100,000. We then appropriated $1,700,000 a year for small arms and their manufacture, and they have reduced that amount to $250,000.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I have only a minute or two more, but I will yield if I can.

We then appropritaed less for field guns. They have $3,000,000 for field guns. It is not one-seventh enough for the field guns needed for the increase of the Army, and which we would have to have in time of war. As to the ammunition, which ought to be $36,000,000, or at least $20,000,000, they are appropriating $2,000,000 for field-gun ammunition.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McKENZIE. I wish to ask the gentleman if he does not think it would be better policy to construct more plants for the manufacture of ammunition than to spend it all in ammunition?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I agree with the gentleman; but that can not be done under this bill.

Mr. McKENZIE. I understand that.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. We are practical men. You know how hard it would be to pass any amendment to the military laws through this House or through the Senate. We have our opportunity to make some provision in the law to the best of our ability for what we can manufacture. Some might be bought outside.

Mr. DONOHOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I will.

Mr. DONOHOE. The gentleman is aware that we have some Government workshops where we do manufacture ammunition?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I am; but I do not think we have enough.

Mr. DONOHOE. What does the gentleman think of a policy of so hampering these workshops that they are obliged to work in times of peace three shifts a day?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I would have them work three shifts a day until we could build more. We need ammunition.

Now, I am only going to say that everybody who has studied the subject agrees——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I only want to say that Mr. Taft and Mr. Root and President Hibben, of Princeton, and others from all quarters, call attention to our danger. [Applause.]

Under the leave to extend his remarks, Mr. PARKER of New Jersey adds the following:

EXTRACTS FROM MESSAGES, DEBATES, ETC.—OPINIONS OF WILLIAM H. TAFT AND THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

By the Constitution Congress was to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia.

Hamilton wished to discipline a select part of the militia severely. As to the rest he says:

[Federalist, XXIX, Hamilton.]

Little more can properly be aimed at with respect to the people at large than to have them properly armed and equipped, and to see that this be not neglected it will be necessary to assemble them once or twice in the course of the year.

—

[Washington, January 8, 1790.]

Among the many interesting objects which will engage your attention, that of providing for the common defense will merit particular regard. To be prepared for war is one of the most effectual means of preserving peace.

A free people ought not only to be armed but disciplined, to which end a uniform and well-digested plan is requisite; and their safety and interest require that they should promote such manufactories as tend to render them independent on others for essential, particularly military, supplies.

—

[Washington, December 8, 1790.]

The disturbed situation of Europe, and particularly the critical posture of the great maritime powers, while it ought to make us the more thankful for the general peace and security enjoyed by the United States, reminds us at the same time of the circumspection with which it becomes us to preserve these blessings. * * *

The establishment of the militia, of a mint, of standards of weights and measures, of the post office and post roads, are subjects which I presume you will resume, of course, and which are abundantly urged by their own importance.

—

[Washington, October 25, 1791.]

The first [militia] is certainly an object of primary importance, whether viewed in reference to the national security, to the satisfaction of the community, or to the preservation of order. In connection with this, the establishment of competent magazines and arsenals and the fortification of such places as are peculiarly important and vulnerable naturally present themselves to consideration. The safety of the United States, under divine protection, ought to rest on the basis of systematic and solid arrangements, exposed as little as possible to the hazards of fortuitous circumstances.

—

[Washington, December 3, 1793.]

I can not recommend to your notice measures for the fulfillment of our duties to the rest of the world without again pressing upon you the necessity of placing ourselves in a condition of complete defense and of exacting from them the fulfillment of their duties toward us. The United States ought not to indulge a persuasion that, contrary to the order of human events, they will forever keep at a distance those painful appeals to arms with which the history of every other nation abounds. There is a rank due to the United States among nations, which will be withheld, if not absolutely lost, by the reputation of weakness. If we desire to avoid insult, we must be able to repel it. If we desire to secure peace, one of the most powerful instruments of our rising prosperity, it must be known that we are at all times ready for war. The documents which will be presented to you will show the amount and kinds of arms and military stores now in our magazines and arsenals; and yet an eddition, even to those supplies, can not, with prudence, be neglected, as it would leave nothing to the uncertainty of procuring a warlike apparatus in the moment of public danger.

Nor can such arrangements, with such objects, be exposed to the censure or jealousy of the warmest friends of republican government. They are incapable of abuse in the hands of the militia, who ought to possess a pride in being the depository of the force of the Republic and may be trained to a degree of energy equal to every military exigency of the United States. But it is an inquiry which can not be too solemnly pursued, whether the act "more effectually to provide for the national defenses by establishing a uniform militia throughout the United States" has organized them so as to produce their full effect; whether your own experience in the several States has not detected some imperfections in the scheme; and whether a material feature in an improvement of it ought not to be to afford an opportunity for the study of those branches of the military art which can scarcely ever be attained by practice alone.

—

[Washington, November 19, 1794.]

In the arrangements to which the possibility of a similar contingency will naturally draw your attention, it ought not to be forgotten that the militia laws have exhibited such striking defects as could not have been supplied but by the zeal of our citizens. Besides the extraordinary expense and waste, which are not the least of the defects, every appeal to those laws is attended with a doubt on its success.

The devising and establishing of a well-regulated militia would be a genuine source of legislative honor and a perfect title to public gratitude. I therefore entertain a hope that the present session will not pass without carrying to its full energy the power of organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and thus providing, in the language of the Constitution, for calling them forth to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.

—

[Washington, December 8, 1795.]

With the review of our Army establishment is naturally connected that of the militia. It will merit inquiry, what imperfections in the existing plan further experience may have unfolded. The subject is of so much moment in my estimation as to excite a constant solicitude that the consideration of it may be renewed, until the greatest attainable perfection shall be accomplished. Time is wearing away some advantages for forwarding the object, while none better deserves the persevering attention of the public councils.

—

[Washington, December 7, 1796.]

Congress have repeatedly, and not without success, directed their attention to the encouragement of manufactures. The object is of the much consequence not to insure a continuance of their efforts in every way which shall appear eligible. As a general rule, manufactures on the public account are inexpedient, but where the state of things in a country leaves little hope that certain branches of manufacture will for a great length of time obtain, when these are of a nature essential to the furnishing and equipping of the public force in time of war, are not establishments for procuring them on public account, to the extent of the ordinary demand for the public service, recommended by strong considerations of national policy as an exception to the general rule? Ought our country to remain in such cases dependent on foreign supply, precarious because liable to be interrupted? If the necessary article should in this mode cost more in time of peace, will not the security and independence thence arising form an ample compensation? Establishments of this sort, commensurate only with the calls of the public service in time of peace, will in time of war easily be extended in proportion to the exigencies of the Government, and may even perhaps be made to yield a surplus for the supply of our citizens at large, so as to mitigate the privations from the interruption of their trade. If adopted, the plan ought to exclude all those branches which are already, or likely soon to be, established in the country, in order that there may be no danger of interference with pursuits of individual industry.

—

[Washington, December 7, 1796.]

The institution of a military academy is also recommended by cogent reasons. However pacific the general policy of a nation may be, it ought never to be without an adequate stock of military knowledge for emergencies. The first would impair the energy of its character, but both would hazard its safety or expose it to greater evils when war could not be avoided: besides, that war might often not depend upon its own choice. In proportion as the observance of pacific maxims might exempt a nation from the necessity of practicing the rules of the military art ought to be its care in preserving and transmitting by proper establishments the knowledge of that art. Whatever argument may be drawn from particular examples, superficially viewed, a thorough examination of the subject will evince that the art of war is at once comprehensive and complicated, that it demands much previous study, and that the possession of it in its most improved and perfect state is always of great moment to the security of a nation. This, therefore, ought to be a serious care of every government, and for this purpose an academy, where a regular course of instruction is given, is an obvious expedient which different nations have successfully employed.

—

[Washington, September 17, 1796.]

Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

—

[Adams, May 16, 1797.]

With the same view and as a measure which, even in time of universal peace, ought not to be neglected, I recommend to your consideration a revision of the laws for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia to render that natural and safe defense of the country efficacious.

—

[Adams, March 19, 1798.]

Under these circumstances I can not forbear to reiterate the recommendations which have been formerly made, and to exhort you to adopt, with promptitude, decision, and unanimity, such measures as the ample resources of the country afford for the protection of our seafaring and commercial citizens; for the defense of any exposed portions of our territory; for replenishing our arsenals and establishing foundries and military manufactories; and to provide such efficient revenue as will be necessary to defray extraordinary expenses, and supply the deficiencies which may be occasioned by depredations on our commerce.

[Adams, December 8, 1798.]

After reciting the captures of our ships by France and the refusal to make redress, Mr. Adams continued:

But in demonstrating by our conduct that we do not fear war in the necessary protection of our rights and honor, we shall give no room to infer that we abandon the desires of peace. An efficient preparation for war can alone insure peace.

—

[Adams, December 3, 1799.]

At a period like the present, when momentous changes are occurring and every hour is preparing new and great events in the political world, when a spirit of war is prevalent in almost every nation with whose affairs the interest of the United States have any connection, unsafe and precarious would be our situation were we to neglect the means of maintaining our just rights. The result of the mission to France is uncertain; but however it may terminate, a steady perseverance in a system of national defense commensurate with our resources and the situation of our country is an obvious dictate of wisdom. For remotely as we are placed from the belligerent nations, and desirous as we are, by doing justice to all, to avoid offense to any, nothing short of the power of repelling aggressions will secure to our country a rational prospect of escaping the calamities of war or national degradation. As to myself, it is my anxious desire to so execute the trust reposed in me as to render the people of the United States prosperous and happy. I rely with entire confidence on your cooperation in objects equally your care, and that our mutual labors will serve to increase and confirm union among our fellow citizens and an unshaken attachment to our Government.

—

[Adams, November 22, 1800.]

While our best endeavors for the preservation of harmony with all nations will continue to be used, the experience of the world, our own experience, admonishes us of the insecurity of trusting too confidently to their success. We can not, without committing dangerous imprudence, abandon those measures of self-protection which were adapted to our situation, and to which, notwithstanding our pacific policy, the violence and injustice of others may again compel us to resort. * * *

The manufacture of arms within the United States still invites the attention of the National Legislature. At a considerable expense to the public this manufacture has been brought to such a state of maturity as, with continued encouragement, will supersede the necessity of future importations from foreign countries.

—

[Jefferson, December 8, 1801.]

Nor should we now or at any time separate, until we can say we have done everything for the militia which we could do were an enemy at our door.

—

[Jefferson, December 3, 1805.]

In the meantime you will consider whether it would not be expedient, for a state of peace as well as of war, so to organize or class the militia as would enable us, on a sudden emergency, to call for the services of the younger portions, unencumbered with the old and those having families. Upward of 300,000 able-bodied men, between the ages of 18 and 26 years, which the last census shows we may now count within our limits, will furnish a competent number for offense in any point where they may be wanted, and will give time for raising regular forces after the necessity of them shall become certain; and the reducing to the early period of life all its active service can not but be desirable to our younger citizens of the present as well as future times, inasmuch as it engages to them in more advanced age a quiet and undisturbed repose in the bosom of their families. I can not, then, but earnestly recommend to your early consideration the expediency of so modifying our militia system as, by separation of the more active part from that which is less so, we may draw from it, when necessary, an efficient corps fit for real and active service, and to be called to it in regular rotation. * * * An immediate prohibition of the exportation of arms and ammunition is also submitted to your determination.

—

[Jefferson, October 27, 1807.]

The moment our peace was threatened I deemed it indispensible to secure a greater provision of those articles of military stores with which our magazines were not sufficiently furnished. To have awaited a previous special sanction by law would have lost occasions which might not be retrieved. I did not hesitate, therefore, to authorize engagements for such supplements to our existing stock as would render it adequate to the emergencies threatening us; and I trust that the legislature, feeling the same anxiety for the safety of our country, so materially advanced by this precaution, will approve, when done, what they would have seen so important to be done if then assembled.

—

In February, 1808 (Annals 1881), Mr. Burwell offered a resolution as to the expediency of authorizing the President to procure arms. He suggested that it would be useful to arm the militia; that every man must be impressed with our situation; our commerce attacked in every part of the globe, our peace menaced by the most powerful nations of the world; that, if attacked, arms will be indispensable, necessary to enable us to defend the country, but that if this country is possessed of a sufficient number of arms, we will be perfectly safe against the world.

Mr. Dawson, of the Committee on Military and Naval Establishments, found that the United States then had 130,000 stand of arms, and thought it not necessary to inquire into the means of procuring an additional supply.

Mr. Marion said arms could not be bought except from foreign nations.

Mr. Ely (1582) said 130,000 was not half what the United States ought to possess.

April 2, 1808. Congress authorized the President to sell arms to the United States, and Mr. John Randolph of Roanoke proposed a bill which made provision for arming and equipping the whole body of the militia, either by purchase or manufacture, authorized the President to build additional arsenals and manufactories of arms, and provided that all arms be distributed to the several States in proportion to their effective militia.

Mr. Randolph wished $1,000,000 appropriated, saying that if the militia were armed, it would be a perfect guaranty of free government (2175–2176).

Mr. Ely (2178) thought that we could not spend so much this year. Mr. Lloyd (2179) said the manufacture might be increased. Mr. Macon thought poor men ought not to be forced to provide their own arms. It is said no arms can be got. For God's sake, let us make the attempt ourselves, when we see the whole world is in arms against us.

After several speeches, Mr. Randolph said the way to obtain a supply was to create a demand. You authorized the raising of 6,000 men to be clad, fed, and paid for rusting in idleness, and incapacitated yourself from arming the militia. You have laid out your money in gold lace hats for the one, and you will not give the other bread. You have expended your treasure in gewgaws and military parade, and can not buy arms for the militia.

Mr. Nicholas (2186) said that if arms could be had, he pledged himself to vote money to arm the whole Nation. No people on earth have so much to defend. He thought we could not spend over $200,000.

Mr. Randolph (2186) was astonished. This sum was as one to ten to the sum voted to the Regulars, while the militia was in proportionate value to that army as one hundred to one.

Five hundred thousand dollars was negatived by a small majority, also four hundred and fifty thousand, four hundred thousand, and three hundred thousand, and two hundred thousand was agreed to.

Mr. Randolph said the bill's efficiency had been destroyed; that it was proposed to arm the whole body of the militia with a sum incompetent to keep pace with the annual increase of the militia, which would be as far from being armed in 20 years as they are now, and that $200,000 for arms a year would hardly make up for wear and tear.

The act was passed April 23, 1808. (See U. S. Stat., C. 65, Laws 1808.)

—

[Jefferson, March 18, 1808.]

The scale on which the Military Academy at West Point was originally established is become too limited to furnish the number of well-instructed subjects in the different branches of artillery and engineering which the public service calls for. The want of such characters is already sensibly felt and will be increased with the enlargement of our plans of military preparation. The Chief Engineer having been instructed to consider the subject and to propose an augmentation which might render the establishment commensurate with the present circumstances of our country has made the report I now transmit for consideration of Congress.

The idea suggested by him of removing the institution to this place is also worthy of attention. Besides, the advantage of placing it under the immediate eye of the Government, it may render its benefits common to the naval department, and will furnish opportunities of selecting on better information the characters most qualified to fulfill the duties which the public service may call for.

—

[Jefferson, November 8, 1808.]

Considering the extraordinary character of the times in which we live, our attention should unremittingly be fixed on the safety of our country. For a people who are free, and who mean to remain so, a well-organized and armed militia is their best security. It is, therefore, incumbent on us at every meeting to revise the condition of the militia and to ask ourselves if it is prepared to repel a powerful enemy at every point of our territories exposed to invasion. Some of the States have paid a laudable attention to this object; but every degree of neglect is to be found among others. Congress alone have power to produce a uniform state of preparation in this great organ of defense; the interests which they so deeply feel in their own and their country's security will present this as among the most important objects of their deliberation.

Under the acts of March 11 and April 23, respecting arms, the difficulty of procuring them from abroad during the present situation and dispositions of Europe induced us to direct our whole efforts to the means of internal supply. The public factories have, therefore, been enlarged, additional machineries erected, and in proportion as artificers can be found or formed, their effect, already more than doubled, may be increased so as to keep pace with the yearly increase of the militia. The annual sums appropriated by the latter act have been directed to the encouragement of private factories of arms, and contracts have been entered into with individual undertakers to nearly the amount of the first year's appropriation.

—

[Madison, December 5, 1810.]

The improvements in quality and quantity made in the manufacture of cannon and small arms, both at the public armories and private factories, warrant additional confidence in the competency of these resources for supplying the public exigencies. * * *

The Corps of Engineers, with the Military Academy, are entitled to the early attention of Congress. The buildings at the seat fixed by law for the present acadamy are so far in decay as not to afford the necessary accommodations. But a revision of the law is recommended, principally with a view to a more enlarged cultivation and diffusion of the advantages of such institutions, by providing professorships for all the necessary branches of military instruction and by the establishment of an additional academy at the seat of government or elsewhere. The means by which wars, as well for defense as for offense, are now carried on render these schools of the more scientific operations an indispensable part of every adequate system. Even among nations whose large standing armies and frequent wars afford every other opportunity of instruction these establishments are found to be indispensable for the due attainment of the branches of military science which require a regular course of study and experiment. In a government happily without the other opportunities seminaries where the elementary principles of the art of war can be taught without actual war, and without the expense of extensive and standing armies, have the previous advantage of uniting an essential preparation against external danger with a scrupulous regard to internal safety. In no other way, probably, can a provision of equal efficiency for the public defense be made at so little expense or more consistently with the public liberty.

—

[Madison, November 5, 1811.]

The manufacture of cannon and small arms has proceeded with due success and the stock and resources of all the necessary munitions are adequate to emergencies. It will not be inexpedient, however, for Congress to authorize an enlargement of them.

MODERN STATESMEN CONCUR.

[From the Washington Post, Saturday, January 9, 1915.]

William H. Taft says:

"We should have an efficient navy and an efficient coast defense. We should have sufficient ammunition, sufficient artillery, and adequate small-arms equipment.

"All of these things were recommended long ago, and we should see that the recommendation is carried out. We have a big ocean to the east of us and a big ocean to the west, and we should make it our duty to see that the integrity of our isolated position is preserved.

"The agitation in Congress at this time is an excellent thing, for it will undoubtedly result in placing the United States on a normal war basis. Nobody cares about appropriations for ammunition and small arms in times of peace, yet that is just the time when we ought to attend to such matters."

—

[Everybody's, January, 1915, p. 127.]

Theodore Roosevelt says:

"But this is not enough. There should be at least ten times the number of rifles and the quantity of ammunition in the country that there are now. In our high schools and colleges a system of military training, like that which obtains in Switzerland and Australia, should be given. Furthermore, all our young men should be trained in actual field service under war conditions, preferably on the Swiss, but if not the Swiss, then on the Argentinean or Chilean model.

"The Swiss model would probably be better for our people. It would necessitate only four or six months' service shortly after graduation from high school or college, and thereafter only about eight days a year. No man can buy or substitute; no man would be excepted because of his wealth; all would serve in the ranks on precisely the same terms, side by side.

"Under this system the young men would be trained to shoot, to march, to take care of themselves in the open, and to learn those habits of self-reliance and law-abiding obedience which are not only essential to the efficiency of a citizen soldiery, but are no less essential to the efficient performance of civic duties in a free democracy. My own firm belief is that this system would help us in civil quite as much as in military matters. It would increase our social and industrial efficiency. It would help us to habits of order and respect for law.

"This proposal does not represent anything more than carrying out the purpose of the second amendment to the Federal Constitution, which declares that a well-regulated militia is necessary to the security of a free nation. The Swiss Army is a well-regulated militia; and therefore it is utterly different from any militia we have ever had. The system of compulsory training and universal service has worked admirably in Switzerland. It has saved the Swiss from war. It has developed their efficiency in peace."

—

[From the London Spectator, reprinted in the Washington Post, December 18, 1914.]

At least, then, let America set her arms and munition factories to work, so that she may feel that if the need were to come she would not be faced with the worst tragedy that a great and strong nation could be faced with—that of having millions of men at her disposal, but all useless because they have no arms. We shall be accused, no doubt, of talking as if armed mobs made an army. We are fully alive to the fact that they do not. But we will say this: There is one thing essential to the soldier, and that is his rifle. If the rifles are not forthcoming, it is not worth while even to try to make an army. Any nation, however, that has rifles may, at any rate, attempt to defend itself, and who knows that it would not succeed, as Grant and Sherman and Sheridan succeeded, in hammering an army into shape as the war proceeded? Therefore, once again, we would warn the President of the United States and Congress not to trust to a chapter of accidents, but to see to it that if America is to defend herself she shall be in a position to do the work.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman reserves 14 minutes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be interrupted at the end of 30 minutes.

So much has been said by a great many persons and newspapers in our country about our unpreparedness for trouble that I want to talk to the Members of the House to-day for a very short time about our preparedness for war. I want to deal as largely as possible with facts and figures as they have appeared in the hearings taken before the Committee on Military Affairs. I want to say in all frankness that I am not one of those who believe that our country ought not to be perfectly defended. I have voted for two battleships for our Navy whenever the opportunity arose. I have voted to keep our Army in good condition at all times. It can not be said that I am at all opposed to the establishments as we now have them. But I want to appeal to the good sense of this House at the present time. I want to say that I do not believe that we should at this time go out of our way to appropriate unusual sums for either our Military or Naval Establishments, and the reason I say that is this: That according to my judgment there never was a time in our history when there was so little likelihood of trouble with any foreign foe. And why do I say that? It is because all of the principal nations of the world are now engaged in troubles of their own, which are occupying all their time, and even if we wanted to go to war the worst kind, where would we pick the nation with which to do it? We would have difficulty, we would have a considerable difficulty, in finding a nation at this time to go to war with us. Germany, France, England, Russia, and Japan are the only countries that could possibly hope to enter into a contest with us under any circumstances. They are now engaged in the greatest war of any time, in the greatest war of all history. Their resources are being exhausted. Their national finances are being strained to the uttermost in their own fights. Their industries are being destroyed; they are being crippled commercially, industrially, and agriculturally. Why, there is not a chance of our getting into trouble for the next few years, because it takes money to carry on great wars, and any nation that gets into trouble with us will have a great war on its hands, as we all know. Now, they are spending money to-day, these great nations, at the rate of about $60,000,000 a day. Where are they going to get the money with which to finance a war with us within the next few years? They can not do it, and will not do it.

I mention these facts to show you the improbability of war and the utter lack of reason for our becoming excited at such a time about the danger of a foreign war. But it is claimed that, on the principle that all things are possible, we have no defenses. Now, let us see what some of these people who are afraid of war claim. Let us examine what their claims really are. The first claim is that we have no Navy; that we might be wiped off the face of the earth because our Navy is relatively small; that it is not well equipped; that our coast defenses are not in good condition; that our small arms and reserve ammunition therefor are not sufficient; that our field artillery is not sufficient; and that, lastly, we have neither the necessary officers nor men.

I want to take those questions up in order, but before doing it I want to make one or two suggestions that occur to me about where we are going to get an enemy to attack us. Assume that this proposed war is imminent and that Germany should wish to get into trouble with us; do you not think she would have a great deal of trouble in landing an army on these shores? In the first place, our Navy has got to be wiped off the face of the seas in order to permit Germany to get her navy over here; and she has to come over here to fight us. Then she has got to take her navy to act as an escort to the transports that bring her soldiers over here to attack us—first destroy our Navy and then take her navy away from home, because she would not want to allow those troops to come over here without being protected.

Now, what would happen? Have you any doubt but that almost every other nation in Europe would jump upon Germany 15 minutes after she got her navy out of her own waters?

Mr. DONOHOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. McKELLAR. Not now. First she has to destroy our Navy, and then she has to destroy our mines, and then she has to destroy our coast defenses. Now, let us see what sort of trouble, in the first place, she would have with our Navy.

Mr. DONOHOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Not now. I regret I can not. In 1897, gentlemen, we had a Navy on which we expended $33,000,000 annually. In the following year—1898—the year of the War with Spain, we expended $148,000,000 on our Navy. A great deal of that money went into the purchase of ships and transports.

Mr. DONOHOE. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Not now. They say we are not prepared. We gave a fairly good account of ourselves in the war of 1898. Our Navy seems to have been able to protect our country fairly well.

Mr. KEATING rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield in a few moments.

Mr. KEATING. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KEATING. I think the speech of the gentleman is very interesting, and we ought to have a quorum here to hear it. I therefore make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-six gentlemen are present—not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Adamson	Bartlett	Brumbaugh	Callaway
Ainey	Beall, Tex.	Burgess	Candler, Miss.
Austin	Bell, Ga.	Burke, Pa.	Cantor
Avis	Borland	Butler	Carr
Barchfeld	Bowdle	Byrnes, S. C.	Cary
Bartholdt	Bruckner	Calder	Clancy

Clark, Fla.	Goldfogle	Lewis, Pa.	Rucker
Claypool	Gorman	Lindquist	Rupley
Connelly, Kans.	Goulden	Lloyd	Russell
Conry	Graham, Pa.	Lobeck	Sabath
Copley	Griest	Logue	Scott
Cramton	Griffin	McGuire, Okla.	Scully
Crosser	Hamill	MacDonald	Seldomridge
Dale	Hamilton, Mich.	Madden	Sells
Davenport	Hart	Mahan	Shreve
Davis	Hayden	Maher	Small
Dickinson	Hayes	Metz	Smith, Md.
Difenderfer	Henry	Miller	Sparkman
Dooling	Hinebaugh	Morgan, La.	Stanley
Doremus	Hobson	Morin	Stevens, N. H.
Dunn	Hoxworth	Neeley, Kans.	Stout
Elder	Hughes, W. Va.	O'Brien	Taggart
Estopinal	Johnson, S. C.	Oglesby	Talbott, Md.
Faison	Keister	O'Shaunessy	Taylor, Colo.
Falconer	Kennedy, Conn.	Page, N. C.	Taylor, N. Y.
Ferris	Kennedy, Iowa	Paige, Mass.	Townsend
Fitzgerald	Kennedy, R. I.	Patton, Pa.	Tuttle
FitzHenry	Kent	Peters	Watkins
Flood, Va.	Kiess, Pa.	Peterson	Whitacre
Frear	Kinkead, N. J.	Plumley	Wilson, Fla.
French	Kitchin	Post	Wilson, N. Y.
Gardner	Knowland, J. R.	Price	Winslow
Garrett, Tex.	Korbly	Reed	Witherspoon
George	Lee, Ga.	Reilly, Conn.	Woodruff
Gerry	L'Engle	Riordan	Young, Tex.
Glass	Lever	Roberts, Nev.
Godwin, N. C.	Lewis, Md.	Rothermel

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having under consideration the Army appropriation bill (H. R. 20347), finding itself without a quorum, he caused the roll to be called, whereupon 278 Members answered to their names, and he presented the names of the absentees to be printed in the Journal and RECORD.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The committee will resume its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] has the floor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield to me one moment?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I merely desire to state to the committee that it is the desire and expectation of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to conclude this debate to-day. It could have been concluded by 7 o'clock if the roll calls had not intervened.

It is absolutely necessary that we push these supply bills as fast as possible, and one day of general debate for a bill of this kind is all that we can afford to give to it and attend to the other business of the House. I hope the Members of the House are prepared to stay here to-night and finish this bill. The hour at which we will get away to-night will depend upon whether or not we will have to spend the afternoon in calling the roll to get a quorum or allow the general debate to continue. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I quite agree with what the gentleman from Alabama has said. I hope the committee will stay in session until it is able to conclude the general debate, although I do not know whether I shall be able to be here this evening myself. If I am not, I think I am entitled to a short leave of absence.

If we are going to avoid the necessity of an extra session of Congress, it is necessary that we do the business of the House and the country before the 4th of March. It is always to be expected that there will be some gentlemen in the House who, as the short session draws to a close, will, for personal advantage to themselves, attempt to hold up the rest of the House, and the House must meet that situation. I do not criticize the gentlemen who do that, but it is the duty of the rest of the House to do the business, and to stay long enough to do it, and I hope we shall be able to get through the appropriation bills—I know we will if we stay here and attend to business—so that no one can charge the House with having delayed business in order to cause an extra session of Congress. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. TAVENNER. I would like to make a short statement, if I may.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Illinois for that purpose?

Mr. McKELLAR. Let the gentleman wait a few moments. I will yield to him later on.

Mr. Chairman, when I was interrupted awhile ago I was discussing the preparedness of our Navy to protect our country.

Mr. DONOHOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DONOHOE. Mr. Chairman, I have been very much interested in the picture that the gentleman has been drawing of the difficulties and disasters that Germany would experience in case she should attack our shores. Will the gentleman picture to us what might possibly happen in case Great Britain or Japan or both in alliance should attack us?

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be glad to do that in just one moment.

As I stated before, the appropriations for our entire Navy in 1897 amounted to $33,000,000. We fought a war, and a very successful one, and that department cost us during that war, including all the ships and auxiliaries that we bought, only $148,000,000. From that day down to the present good hour we have been constantly increasing the size and efficiency of our Navy, and properly so in my judgment. Why, we now appropriate annually about $150,000,000 for our Navy, just ordinarily, and as much as we spent on our Navy the year of the Spanish War. Since 1899 we have spent for our Navy the enormous sum of over $1,800,000,000. And since the recent war has destroyed a number of German ships, I think I can say without fear of successful contradiction that the United States Navy is the second largest navy on the seas to-day. [Applause.] And if this country ever comes to a war with any nation, England or any other, our Navy will not only be able to protect our own country but will remove every other Navy from the face of all the seas. [Applause.] Such is my confidence in the ability and the efficiency of our Navy to-day. Under these circumstances it seems to me idle to talk about a foreign foe invading our shores or to talk about our not having a proper naval defense.

I have discussed the possible German effort to invade us. What about the only other two nations that might undertake it? Great Britain, of course, has a larger navy than we have. She has a larger use for a navy than we have. She has possessions all over the world to protect and look after. She has enemies all over the world. She has enemies at her own doors, and I venture to say that even with the enormous navy that England has, were she to get into a war with this country she could not remove enough of that navy to American waters to cope successfully with the American Navy. She would not dare remove all or even any great portion of her navy away from European waters.

But what could she do? She could not land any forces on American soil. She would have to undertake to bring them through Canada. And I want to call your attention to the fact that in ordinary times of peace England is in the same condition that we are. She has no compulsory military service. She has no immense standing army. Her army and her military service are along the same lines that we have ours. My recollection is that in times of peace she ordinarily has about 150,000 men, even with all of her colonies to police and look after and defend, while the United States has about 85,000. Our commercial interests and our racial kinship are so interwoven with England that it is almost impossible to conceive that we would ever get into a war with that country; and right here I want to predict that if ever England undertakes to engage in a war with us, there can be but one result, and that is that she will lose every vestige of her property on the American Continent. She will lose Canada just as certainly as she undertakes it, and nobody knows it any better than England, and England is not going to undertake it.

But what are we going to do with Japan, say the militarists? Well, it is true that Japan offers the only possibility of a war. She is 8,000 miles away. When we had a war over there it took us three months to convoy 30,000 troops to the Philippine Islands. How long would it take Japan to land a hostile force on our soil? Where would the great American Navy—much larger than that of Japan—be while she was doing it? Where would she get a naval base? Where would she plant her troops? Where would she have a line of communication? Why, gentlemen, when you come to look at it in the light of reason, there is not a particle of chance, there is not the remotest possibility of Japan undertaking to fight that war. Oh, they say, she may take the Philippine Islands. I want to say that I earnestly hope that the present bill for the independence of the Philippine Islands will soon pass, and in a few years we may stand by our cherished ideals with the fixed purpose that has always actuated our people to grant to those islands absolute and perfect independence. [Applause.] I want to say, further, that when they do it, we have absolutely obliterated every possibility of war with Japan, because no nation will undertake to bring an army 8,000 miles across the sea.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. Of course the gentleman is placing Japan twice as far away from the mainland as Japan really is.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am talking about our continent.

Mr. KAHN. It is only about 6,000 miles from here to the Philippines and about 4,000 miles to Japan. But that is a matter of geography. Does the gentleman recall the fact that in 1898 this country became involved in war with an apparently decadent country, and that it was that country that declared war upon us. She handed the American minister his passports.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand that; and when that war was declared we were not within 500—no; not within 1,000—per cent as well prepared for war as we are to-day.

Mr. KAHN. Does not that fact convince my friend that we ought to be prepared for any emergency that may confront us?

Mr. McKELLAR. The fact convinces me that the policy the United States insists on to-day is a rational, reasonable, excellent policy of slowly building up our defenses without any undue excitement in the light of reason, and it is the very best policy, and I am going to stand by it.

I will say to the gentleman that the mere fact that other nations are at war is no reason why we should be thrown off our base; no reason why we should become hysterical and undertake, as some gentlemen would do, to fasten an immense standing army on our people without any reasonable expectation of having a use for that army.

Now, I want to read, if the gentleman will permit me, to show you how far this hysteria has gone, what a recent Chief of Staff of our Army has recommended. A more remarkable recommendation I have never seen, in view of the facts. Listen to this:

> Careful consideration of our needs would indicate the advisability and necessity to have at all times available at home, and in addition to the necessities in our foreign possessions, in the first line of our Military Establishment, a mobile force of at least 500,000 thoroughly trained and thoroughly equipped fighting men, with adequate supplies for the operation of this force for a period of six months.

And he continues:

> This is the conclusion that seems to have been reached by all those who have given careful consideration to this question. It is also agreed that we should have as a second line a thoroughly equipped and trained force of Organized Militia of not less than 300,000 men, properly prepared as to its staff and armament, with stores and supplies for its operation for a like period of six months.

This was put in the report of the Chief of Staff of the Army last fall. Eight hundred thousand men, 700,000 additional men, with supplies for six months! To do what? In the name of God, where could we find an enemy for that kind of an army to fight to-day?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will be glad to.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is to assure us of our safety, to protect us against any nation. Will the gentleman translate into dollars and cents what that force would cost?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am coming to that. The average cost is a million dollars per thousand men, and the very lowest cost of increased taxation to the people of this country, if that recommendation of the Chief of Staff was carried out, would be $700,000,000.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Then the idea of our military guardians is that, in order that the country may be reasonably safe, our military budget should carry $700,000,000 a year and that we can not get safety short of that?

Mr. McKELLAR. According to the Chief of Staff, and possibly some scared ones will agree with him, that the only way we can get adequate military protection is for the immediate establishment of an additional 700,000 men and supplies for six months.

When I read that I wondered who we were going to fight and what country the Chief of Staff was afraid of. Is he afraid of Mexico? Is he afraid of Haiti—or what nation is he afraid of? All the great nations are at war. But he wants not only 700,000 additional men, but also six months' provisions for an additional 700,000 men. What does he want them for? I can not imagine. I do not believe there is a man in this House, whatever views he might have about the Army or the Navy, would give his consent to such a proposition as that.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Does not the gentleman think that we ought to have a commission of lunacy on that officer?

Mr. McKELLAR. This report, which is so large a part of the support of our friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] for his insistences, is not concurred in by our Secretary of War, Mr. Garrison. Secretary Garrison makes no such recommendations, and he is, in my judgment, one of the greatest Secretaries of War we have ever had. The difference in the recommendations of the then Chief of Staff and that of this distinguished, able, and alert Secretary of War is just 675,000 men. Such a difference is a mammoth condemnation of Gen. Wotherspoon's recommendation on this subject and robs it of any effect it should have.

Oh, I would not say anything unkind about any officer of our Army; but I do say, with all frankness and candor and without any ill feeling against any person on earth, that there ought to be a provision in the law somewhere where such foolish statements might be required to be censored and kept out of the public prints.

I might say here that my idea of an army is that it should be well trained, well governed, well equipped, and that there should be the strictest discipline. I have no sympathy with those Army officers who hunt the public press and give out these inaccurate and misleading statements to the newspapers.

I do not believe that any other well-informed officer in the Army has any such views. Certainly, no others—not even Gen. Wood—have gone half so far.

What our then Chief of Staff would do with these men after he got them I do not know. He does not impart in his communication the secret of what nation he is going to fight. Of course, it could not be one of the great nations, because they are already engaged in war, and I have a suspicion that they would not agree to fight us at this time. This establishment, if adopted by Congress at this time, would cost the American Government over a thousand million of dollars and probably two thousand millions of dollars. I have read the recommendations of this Chief of Staff and am a little in doubt about what he really means. It is perfectly apparent that he was very badly scared when he wrote it. There ought to be some regulation prohibiting the publication of these kinds of reports. I do not mean that any man's fancies should be suppressed, but there ought to be some board or other power constituted in the Army that should censor such articles and not inflict them on a suffering public.

The Chief of Staff who held that position when I first came here was constantly insisting upon a larger Army and the building up of reserves which would give us a military strength of about 450,000 men. He also wanted 1,292 pieces of field artillery and more ammunition. We are rapidly getting these field guns and ammunition, but we have not yet agreed to the increase in the Army. The fact that such an army would cost several hundred millions of dollars seems not to have been taken into account by our then Chief of Staff. But that Chief of Staff was modest in his demands in comparison with his immediate successor. And when the rule is transgressed to the extent that some of them have transgressed it recently there ought to be a way of disciplining such officers and dismissing them from the service without honor. There is nothing about our Army that authorizes such beliefs as those expressed by our late Chief of Staff.

I come now to our second defense. The statement was made by one of these militarists—and I do not remember whether they are officers or not—that Germany, France, or England could send an army over here, land on our shores, and take New York, Boston, and all the coast cities at any time. I do not know whether you gentlemen are familiar with our Coast Artillery service. We have a great number of forts up and down our coasts. We have 19,000 men properly officered in charge of that military service. Gen. Weaver, a capable and, as it appears to me, a most sensible officer, who knows what he is talking about, appeared before the committee, and his testimony has been taken on all of these subjects. I want to tell you what he said about our Coast Artillery service. He said that our forts are in a condition to defend our country. He said that a hostile force could not come into any of our harbors. He was asked especially about New York. He said that a hostile ship could never get by Sandy Hook or Fort Hamilton or Fort Wadsworth, that such a thing would be a physical impossibility. Then some gentleman came at him with this proposition, which has been heralded a great deal in the newspapers lately, and asked him whether or not the coast guns were not of shorter range than the great guns of the dreadnoughts of Great Britain. He said they were, but by a simple elevation of the aim of the guns from 15 degrees to 25 degrees that could be cured, and was going to be cured, and that the reach would be the same. Then he went on to explain that our shore guns are an absolute protection against the guns of any ship, for this reason: Ships are not made for the purpose of firing against forts, and no commander of a naval vessel is permitted to do so under the rules of naval warfare. Why? Because the forts, by reason of greater ability to get aim, will have the ships at a disadvantage. Gen. Weaver went on further to explain that there is no possibility of our forts being attacked by ships at sea. Gentlemen all know that a ship at sea is a perfect target for a land force. On the other hand, it is almost impossible for those on the ship to take aim at a fort so as to do the fort any damage. In the words of Gen. Weaver, "If you went down the Potomac River to the sea, along which river we have a number of forts, and even if you knew where they were and you were looking for them, you could never find them."

I want here to quote Gen. Weaver and Gen. Crozier on this subject. Gen. Weaver testified as follows:

Therefore guns afloat, caliber for caliber, higher powered guns than those in our fortifications. But there is this to be said, the projectiles we use are heavier than the projectiles used on board warships. And it should also be said that our range-finding system is very much more accurate. If a little more elevation could be given by our carriages to our guns, we would get ranges equal to those of guns afloat, and, in my opinion, we would be able to meet a naval enemy in a shore and ship combat on fairly equal terms, our accurate range-finding system and better system of fire control offsetting the flatter trajectories of their guns. It therefore reduces to the question of our ability to give a little greater elevation to our guns; this is a mechanical detail which I believe the ordnance experts can accomplish satisfactorily. * * * I will explain what I mean about that. The guns aboard battleships have a maximum angle of fire of about 12° to 15°. With this elevation their high powered guns have a certain range. At present our carriages give our fort guns about the same elevation; that is, from 12° to 15°. If we could increase the elevation of our guns to, say, 25°, that would offset the advantage in range they now have in their favor. (Hearings, p. 615.)

In this connection I could not do better than to quote the evidence of Gen. Crozier on this subject as follows:

Mr. AVIS. Would not such guns, with such a range as that, less than the range of the guns on shipboard, be absolutely ineffective against any ships which might be attacking our coast?

Gen. CROZIER. No; I think not. You must remember that the coast gun has several very distinct advantages. In the first place, a ship is a very plain target. It is right out there on the water and you can see it very distinctly. The coast gun is behind fortifications, and with a very little art a fortification can be quite well concealed, so that it is impossible to pick it out. For instance, there are a lot of them on the river below Washington, and as you go down the river on a boat I do not think you can find them at all, even if you knew where to look for them. Not only that, but the fortification itself is not a vulnerable target as the ship is out on the water. It does not do a ship much good unless it can hit the gun itself or hit the interior crest of the parapet right under the gun, where some dangerous fragments might be sent down to the emplacement. There are one or two other points of advantage as between guns ashore and guns afloat. With regard to the effectiveness of the firing, the field firing, the coast firing, the naval firing, and all other kinds—the most troublesome sort of inaccuracy is through misjudgment of the range. On shore we have very accurate methods of determining the range of a ship or object on the water which we can plainly see. We use methods very similar to the surveyor's methods. Those methods involve a base line of considerable length. On board ship they can not use those methods, because the longest base line they can get is the length of the ship, and the length of the ship is not always presented at the target, so that they are driven to a much more inaccurate method of getting the range.

Then the ship itself is a vulnerable target almost anywhere. You are likely to damage it if you hit it almost anywhere. But if you hit a fortification anywhere, if you hit any part of the fortification, except the gun itself, or the parts I have already indicated, you do not do much damage.

Take these things together, the instructions always given to naval officers are that they must not put their guns up against fortifications. Their ships are built to fight one another; they are not built to fight fortifications, and therefore with a range greater than the range of our guns they would have only the slightest chance of hitting them.

Mr. AVIS. What I had more particularly in mind is this: Suppose a fleet attempted to bombard New York, what protection could our guns with a much less range give the city of New York as against vessels of a greater range?

Gen. CROZIER. We have the outlying fortifications at Sandy Hook, which is 17 miles from the Battery, and it would be impossible for anybody to get by Sandy Hook without encountering the fire of the guns of those fortifications.

Mr. AVIS. Is there any way in which they can bombard New York and be beyond the range of the fortifications?

Gen. CROZIER. If they could get by Sandy Hook they would then come in conflict with the fire of the guns of Fort Wadsworth and Fort Hamilton. There is a place near Rockaway Beach, where there is fairly deep water close to the shore, and I think vessels might get in there, and thus they would be out of the range of everything, except our mortars at Sandy Hook, which would cover the water and make it untenable. And even if that were not the case, the only thing they could do would be to throw projectiles into the outskirts of Brooklyn.

Mr. AVIS. Is that the case with any other city in the United States?

Gen. CROZIER. No; I think that San Francisco is even better protected than New York, and at Boston they have some fortified outlying island, so that they have very good protection there.

Gen. Weaver was asked about the ammunition, and a great hue and cry had been made that we have not enough ammunition for this purpose to last an hour, but Gen. Weaver made no request for additional reserve ammunition. Mr. Chairman, there is an army board that fixes the amount of ammunition that these guns should have in reserve, and they have fixed in continental United States upon the amount that they should have, which is enough to shoot all of the guns for one hour. The reason for that is this: That in continental United States they can move their ammunition from one fort to another. It is absolutely ridiculous, according to their views—and they are experts and know what they are talking about—to think that all of our forts would be attacked at one time, and that the guns would all have to be fired at one time. In our island possessions the amount of reserve ammunition is for two hours' firing. This is because of greater difficulty in transporting it from one fort to another.

When we look at this statement in the newspapers that our guns have just enough reserve ammunition to be fired for one hour, it seems very peculiar; but when you apply the reason of the experts, these men who know their business, it is perfectly apparent the experts are right. Gen. Weaver was asked about every feature of his system of coast defenses, and he said they were all right and that there was nothing necessary except to have a few more officers and a few more men, even in time of war. Under those circumstances are not these scare headlines which we see in the newspapers about our unpreparedness for war ridiculous? Bear in mind that to deliver a hostile force over here you have to obliterate the Navy of the United States, and I believe it to be the best Navy in the world, and you have to pass by our submarines and our mines planted in every harbor, and then have to pass by our coast defenses, which in the minds of the experts are the best in the world. Do any of you have any fears? Look down in your hearts and see if any of you have any fears that we are going to be attacked by a hostile force when we are in that shape. He was asked about San Francisco Harbor, and he said it was even better defended than New York City, and our Pacific coast as well as our Atlantic coast.

But they come back and say, We have not even enough rifles. Let us see what we have to say about that. We had experts testify upon that subject. These gentlemen know their business. Their testimony was taken down. We have in all 1,100,000 rifles, and my friend from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] said that our rifle factory was not running full time, and that we ought to fix it so that it would run full time. If my friend had examined the hearings, it would have been perfectly apparent to him why they are not running full time. It is because they have already gotten all of the reserve rifles that they want, and they are just adding about 30,000 a year, a nominal number, in order to keep this Government plant going. There is no necessity for any more. We have rifles for over a million men, and we have an Army of over 85,000, with 120,000 of militia.

What about the small-arms ammunition? We have the full amount of small-arms ammunition required by our expert Army board. I should have said also that we have all of the pistols necessary and that our pistol factories are running in the same way, and we have all of the sabers and other kinds of equipment that are necessary. We have the full amount of ammunition for small arms, 195,000,000 rounds, as much as the board has estimated, but we are still running our ammunition factory along these lines.

That brings us to one other matter that I want to talk about, because there has been a great deal said about it. Great stress has been laid by gentlemen upon the fact that we have not enough field artillery. Did you gentlemen ever stop to think how much we have expended for field artillery? I think the Committee on Military Affairs spent about $3,000,000 last year, and we have $2,900,000 for this year—all that they can possibly use. Other committees also appropriate for this purpose. They could not make any more if we were to spend more money. The department has reduced the amount required for this year by $100,000 because we can not use the money. What is the use of appropriating money for this purpose if we can not use it? I want to say to you that a former Chief of Staff recommended it was necessary for us to have 1,292 pieces of field artillery. Well, we have been building it up regularly, and I say to you that I have never seen a more patriotic body of men on either side of this House than the gentlemen who compose the Committee on Military Affairs, irrespective of party. Now, I want to say further that we have appropriated practically everything for this purpose that has been asked; and, by the way, we have not been slow about it. Twelve hundred and ninety-two pieces now that our board says is necessary, and when this appropriation is through we will have 860 pieces already of field artillery——

Mr. SHERWOOD. Of what caliber?

Mr. McKELLAR. They are 6-inch for the most part, and, by the way——

Mr. KAHN. Three-inch guns. Some of the howitzers are 6-inch.

Mr. McKELLAR. I made a mistake there. By the way, that question arose whether we ought not to have 16-inch field guns, like those new ones they have in the German Army. Why, says Gen. Crozier, what could you do with them? What forts have we got to hammer down? He said the others we have got are manufactured to fit our needs and our necessities; that there are no forts in Canada, none in Mexico, that we have got to break down in order to get in there, and that they are wholly unnecessary. And if you will read the testimony you will find that what he said is actually so. Now, they say we have not got enough ammunition for the field artillery. We have been appropriating for the ammunition for the field artillery in the same way we have been appropriating for the field artillery itself. We have already an accumulation of 50 per cent, and that is rapidly accumulating every day, every year, right straight along. Why this fright on the part of some citizens——

Mr. SHERWOOD. What amount of money has been appropriated for this useless ammunition up to this time?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not figured it out independently, but it is simply an enormous sum, but we have done what our experts have told us and we are gradually building up, and in a period of six years we will have every particle of the ammunition, all of the field guns, all of the equipment that our experts say that we ought to have.

I want to say another thing about our Army appropriations. In 1897 we appropriated for our Army $25,000,000. In 1899, one year after the war, we appropriated about $100,000,000, and we have been appropriating about $100,000,000 ever since. We have appropriated in the last 10 years over a thousand million dollars for our Army alone for the purpose of our defense. Under those circumstances how can it be truthfully said by anybody having knowledge of the facts that this country is not prepared to defend herself against any foe? Well, they say we ought to have a larger standing army. You heard what I read from the report of the Chief of Staff a few moments ago. Now, gentlemen, let us see what we are going to draw on. We first have a well-trained standing army of 85,000 men. About 50,000 of those men constitute the mobile army. Nineteen thousand constitute the Coast Artillery. We have 9,000 men in the Philippines. We have 2,000 men at Panama. We have about 8,000 men in Hawaii. We have some men at the Military College. We have some men stationed here and there and we have a mobile army well seasoned, well trained, and well drilled of about 50,000. In addition to that we have a splendid militia of about 120,000 men. After 1915 there will be an annual number who go out of the service and who can be called into service at any time—trained soldiers—of about 15,000 men. There will be about 18,000 men who go out annually from the militia service, showing what a large reserve we have from these sources. In addition to that we have about 26,000 graduates from military institutions in this country every year, and this will give you an idea of what our military resources are and what we have to depend on in the event of trouble with any foreign foe.

I want to say one further word, if you will permit me, and it shows that I am no enemy of a proper army. There is one trouble we have always had in time of war, and that is in reference to officers. We have never had a list of reserve officers. We are going to remedy that. On yesterday the Committee on Military Affairs of the House reported out a bill that means that we will have a reserve officer corps in this country. It means the establishment, under the general auspices of the State and the Federal Governments, in each State of a military training college out of which 100 students will be graduated every year. It is put under the authority and control of a commission from the Federal Government. That will make it an effective system in which young officers of between 23 and 30 years will be graduated in every State in the Union, and they will be taken from every county in the State.

Now, the two governments take these young men, they give them this course, and the only requirement they have put on them is this, that they have to agree in writing to serve the United States Government whenever they are called upon within a period of seven years. That will be building up in seven years a reserve force of Army officers of about 30,000 men when these colleges are in operation. Our experts say that in the event of war we would not need over about 22,000 to 25,000 of these officers. So from these institutions, at a comparatively small cost, less than it costs to increase our standing army by 4,000 men, a comparatively small amount, we will have a body of well-trained reserve officers which will give us protection along that line.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. CLINE. I understand the gentleman counts on 26,000 men released from the private military schools of the country?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLINE. Is there any relationship existing between those and the Federal Government that they can be counted on as a reserve force?

Mr. McKELLAR. None whatever; but we have recently passed in this House and in this Congress one of the most effective volunteer bills that has ever been enacted into law in this country, and they are all subject to duty, every one of them.

Mr. CLINE. The gentleman is depending upon them as part of the resources to be gotten into the Army?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; and, remember, there are 26,000 of them graduated every year, and when these 48 training schools are established in each State in the Union we will have not a reserve of 33,000 merely, but in 14 years that will be doubled and in 20 years it will be tripled, and within the best age they can serve their country under the volunteer law which we have.

Mr. Chairman, if there ever was a time and if there ever was a nation that should not lose its head over an imaginative war situation, now is the time and America is the Nation. When nearly all of the civilized world is at war, with practically all of the great nations at each other's throats in a death struggle, now of all times the United States should throw its every energy not into building up unusual war armaments, but into the building up of its commerce, extending its trade, reaching out for new business, and taking to itself the profits of being a peaceful Nation. Untold riches are ours if we but go out and seek them. Instead of appropriating vast sums for larger naval and military establishments, to my mind we should appropriate larger sums for furnishing our country ships whereby our producers and business men can sell their products abroad. We should have a larger number of Government agents in foreign countries to look after our business affairs and aid our merchants in selling their wares in these foreign countries. We should spend our money in advertising in foreign countries and in building up trade alliances. We should establish banking houses wherever we can in foreign countries so as to be better able to serve our citizens doing business abroad. We should be generous in our treatment of foreigners everywhere so that we might, as is our duty, fall heir to the trade and commerce that our European friends are throwing away by reason of their wars upon one another. There never was a time in our history when there was less necessity for greatly enlarging either our Army or our Navy.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. How large an increase of expenditure will that involve?

Mr. McKELLAR. Three million eight hundred and forty thousand dollars a year.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. To start with?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes, sir. And it will educate, outside of the question of giving them a training—it will give to 15,000 boys a year in this country the best educations that can possibly be obtained. Outside of its military features, as an educational measure it has every merit to commend it, in my judgment.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Is it not true that never since the adoption of the Federal Constitution has any country declared war first against the United States?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is entirely true. No country ever has and, in my judgment, never will, if it knows what is good for it.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Do you know of any officer of the Army with as much gray matter in his cerebrum as a gray goose who can see any danger anywhere now?

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, I would not like to put it that way, but I will say I think he must resort to his imagination if under the present existing conditions he can see any trouble ahead for the Nation. I believe that for at least 25 years after this awful European war has been closed America will be absolutely free from any possibility of war made on us by a first-class power. But if it should not, you gentlemen need not have the slightest fear but that with the splendid Army we have, controlled as it is by splendidly trained officers, and with the volunteers upon which we have always relied, we will be amply protected and able to protect ourselves against any foe that comes against us.

Gentlemen, I have already taken up entirely too much time. I thank you very, very much. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields 10 minutes.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] is recognized for one hour. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, all of this discussion and newspaper agitation favoring a great standing army in this country is a matter that ought to concern every Member of Congress.

As a member of the Military Affairs Committee of this House I have given the subject much thought. I was amazed at the speech made on this floor in the early days of this session by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

I know the gentleman is an honest, patriotic man, and for that very reason I was surprised at his utterances touching the unpreparedness of the United States for war.

He seems to think that every other nation of this earth is going to engage in war at the same time against us, and proceeds to say that we are practically defenseless. I can understand why the special interests of this country are having headlines in many of the metropolitan newspapers, endeavoring to frighten the American people and create a false idea that we need a great standing Army in this Republic.

They make profits out of all the equipment for soldiers and war. They make enormous profits out of battleships and all of the necessary equipment. I can understand why the generals and admirals proclaim the necessity for a great army and the greatest lot of battleships the world ever saw.

The more Army and naval officers you have the greater the danger of this country being plunged into war.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know why the gentleman from Massachusetts is so much disturbed that he appeared before the Naval Affairs Committee and the Military Affairs Committee surrounded by newspaper reporters, and told these great committees organized by this body that this Republic is virtually defenseless by both land and sea.

We were all delighted to have our good friend appear before the committee and give us the benefit of his views. He failed to give us any information at all, as the committee was well acquainted with all of the information imparted by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

From my viewpoint all that the gentleman had on his mind was a commission of inquiry to ascertain if we are prepared for war.

It strikes me there is an obsession or hysteria that has overcome some few of our citizens that imaginary foes will invade our country.

Mr. Chairman, I maintain that we have no enemies who would dream of overrunning our land with armed forces, and it would be impossible for any three or four nations combined to successfully invade the United States. We have no enemies, and as long as Uncle Sam attends to his own business we are not likely to be involved with any country where it would be necessary to resort to arms to maintain our national peace, honor, dignity, and commerce. [Applause.]

Surely, I am against a great standing Army. I am unalterably opposed to compulsory military service in this country in time of peace. Gentlemen, this Republic was never intended to be the drill ground of great armies, and you shall never strap a soldier on the back of the farmer and laboring man, and make a military despotism of this Republic, as long as the people keep informed and vote their sentiments at the ballot box. [Applause.]

These farmers, these laboring people, and all other taxpayers of America have the right to know where all of this money goes to that you have been appropriating yearly for the Army and the Navy. Since the day war was declared against Spain in 1898, this country has yearly squandered great sums of money, both on the Army and Navy. Mr. Speaker, in 1897 the Army of the United States was composed of 2,179 officers, 25,353 enlisted men and petty officers, making a total of 27,532; and the sum of $48,950,268 was expended for the entire military establishment in the year 1897.

Unfortunately war was declared against Spain by the United States, and from that fatal day till now the militarists of this country have been reaching their hands deep into the pockets of the people.

In 1897 there were 11,750 petty officers and enlisted men and 62 midshipmen in the United States Navy, and during the year 1897 the sum of $33,661,467.81 was expended on the Naval Establishment.

In the year 1910 the United States Army had 4,273 officers, 70,893 enlisted men and petty officers, making a total of 75,166, and in that year the huge sum of $155,911,706 was expended on the Military Establishment of this country.

In that selfsame year the Navy of the United States had 47,500 petty officers and enlisted men and 292 midshipmen, and officers to the number of 2,896, and there was expended that year—1910—for the Naval Establishment $133,555,552.88.

In the year 1914 the Army of the United States had 4,701 officers and 87,781 enlisted men and petty officers, making a total of 92,482, and for the support of the Army that year there was appropriated $92,076,145.51, and the total amount appropriated for the Military Establishment for 1914 was $165,646,297.77.

In 1914 the United States Navy had 52,667 petty officers and enlisted men, with 3,821 officers, and there was appropriated for the Naval Establishment in the year 1914 the sum of $140,736,536.35.

You see, the aggregate sum for both the Army and Navy last year was $306,382,834.12, a sum of money staggering to the imagination. Gentlemen, this is not all. In that same year of 1910 you paid out of the pockets of the people to veterans, in the form of pensions, the stupendous sum of $159,974,056.08; and last year you appropriated in pensions $172,408,518.29.

For the Military and Naval Establishments and pensions for the year 1914 there was appropriated $478,791,352.41.

From 1901 to 1914, inclusive, there has been expended on the Military Establishment the sum of $1,942,931,915.77, and for the same period there has been expended on the Naval Establishment $1,595,609,107.94.

The aggregate amount expended for both the Army and Naval Establishments for that period is $3,538,541,023.71. What caused the vast increase in the Army and Navy, and the great sums of money spent on each annually? I have given you the figures for 1897 and the figures for 1910.

Can any man in the United States explain why we needed to spend any more for this purpose in 1910 than we spent in 1897? We were then at peace with all of the nations of the world, and still you had this great Army and Navy, the special interests howling for more.

If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] contends that this country is unprepared for war, I ask him in the name of the great hosts of toilers of America what went with the $3,538,541,023.71? What is going to be done with the $146,223,332.07 for 1915, and the $175,962,773.81 for 1916 appropriated for the Military Establishment?

What will become of the $144,417,453.53 appropriated for the Navy for 1915? Do you not think the American people are now taxed to the very limit to maintain the present Army, Navy, and pension rolls? [Applause.] Some say that the pension roll is decreasing. Let us see about that. In the year 1914 you paid in pensions to veterans and their widows of the War of 1812 the sum of $27,532.40; for the Indian wars, $560,247.40; for the Mexican War, $1,060,529.74; for the Civil War, $163,777,551.53; for the Spanish-American War, when you did not have 350 men killed and wounded in battle, the sum of $3,907,509.53; and for the Regular Army Establishment, $3,475,147.69, making a total of $172,408,518.29 actually paid out of the pockets of the people for pensions last year.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Will the gentleman permit a correction?

Mr. QUIN. I will.

Mr. SHERWOOD. The number killed in the Spanish War was 247, according to the official records of the War Office.

Mr. QUIN. I am glad the gentleman has corrected me, because I thought possibly there had been a hundred more than that injured. But since that short war those veterans have drawn over $46,000,000 in pensions from this Government, and they are still hungry at the trough, and there has been an increase of one-quarter of a million dollars since 1913. God pity the people! [Applause.]

Do you not know that this Spanish-American War pension list is going to grow as fast as the other pensions decrease?

What advocate of increased pensions for the veterans of the Civil War 10 years ago, when $132,915,921.30 was paid out for pensions an account of that war, would have dreamed that as late as 1914 the sum of $163,377,551.53 would go out of the Treasury on account of the pensions for that war, which ended 50 years ago?

It is not unreasonable to assume that you will pay Civil War pensions for 120 years after 1865, and the same assumption will follow as to the Spanish-American War.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. I will.

Mr. CLINE. I would like to ask a question for information. How does the gentleman connect the expenses for the Spanish-American War and the Civil War with our unpreparedness? I see that the gentleman is discussing that proposition.

Mr. QUIN. I think that we are prepared to fight the world. I do not believe in going and buckling down and fastening the people of this country with ball and chain. [Applause.] And I tell you that what we are paying out in pensions for Navy and Army purposes is such a burden that it aggregates, lacking a few thousand dollars, one-half a billion dollars annually now; and with some of these alarmists howling for more money for Navy and Army purposes, and as we know that the pensioners are never going to cease to come to the trough, it will be bound to increase. It is a question of the burden that the taxpayers of this country will rebel against that I propose to argue. We know that the Spanish-American War pensions are going to increase, because they have increased every year since the war started up until now, and this year there is an increase over last year.

Mr. CLINE. I take it that the gentleman is not in favor of civil pensions?

Mr. QUIN. I certainly never favor a man getting a pension unless wounded in battle or for disease contracted in the Army service. I do not think this Government owes a pension to a man simply because he followed the flag for a little while. He may be patriotic, but he owes patriotism to his country. Of course if he is distressed by wounds or disease contracted in the Army, his Government should provide for him. But the wealthy, the able-bodied, the strong are grabbing for pensions, and this Congress gives pensions to them.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. Just for a question.

Mr. BRYAN. You have been yielded an hour. Will you agree to yield 20 minutes of your time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TAVENNER]?

Mr. QUIN. I am sorry I can not do it. I promised the chairman to yield back my unused time.

Mr. BRYAN. You will save a lot of time by it.

Mr. QUIN. I can not help that. I never made a contract in my life that I did not stand by.

It has been over 100 years since the War of 1812, and this Government is still paying pensions on account of service in that war, for you know $27,532.40 was paid for that purpose last year.

As long as young women hardly out of their teens will marry old veterans on the brink of the grave there is no chance for the pension rolls to make any appreciable decrease.

As you increase your standing army and navy, so will increase your pension rolls from the Regular Establishment. As proof of this, exercise common sense. But I will cite you actual figures from the report of the Commissioner of Pensions.

In 1904 the sum of $2,287,924.99 was paid out in pensions for the Regular Establishment, and for this identical purpose in the year 1914 the sum of $3,475,147.69 was paid out of the Public Treasury. It follows, as the night follows the day, that as you increase the Army and Navy not only will there be a rapid increase in the expense of maintaining them, but the pension rolls will increase by leaps and bounds.

This Government has pensioners living in every civilized country of the world, and since this imperialistic idea took charge of our statesmen the Philippine Islands, many thousands of miles out in the Pacific Ocean, are a constant drain on the citizens of our country, maintaining a quasi-military government over that swarthy-complexioned people.

It is this same imperialistic and military spirit that is now endeavoring to build up a great standing army in this Republic. They know if they once get it started that it will grow and become a fixture, and could never be overthrown except through the forces of a revolution.

The first excuse that element had for increasing the Army was the Spanish-American War, in 1898, and gradually year by year the Army and Navy have grown in such proportions that they now feel safe in demanding a great increase all at once.

This Government has paid to veterans and their widows of the Civil War alone the stupendous sum of $4,457,974,496, and there is a crowd in Congress now endeavoring to have that roll increased by giving all the officers of the Union Army from 1861 to 1865 the pay of retired officers, which would increase the pension rolls several millions of dollars annually.

The taxpayers have groaned and sweated under this weary burden for a long time. Will they stand the increased burden that must inevitably follow the great increases in the Army and Navy?

There is a proposition on foot to add 25,000 enlisted men and 1,000 officers to the Army in addition to what we already have. There are those who advocate raising the Army to 800,000 men during these times of peace in this Republic.

In the light of all history and in the line of good common sense, what nation of this earth could have any motive or desire to invade this country, and where is the nation that would be fool enough to try it? What are these militarists and alarmists talking so much about? It strikes me that it is worse than foolishness and tommy-rot to try to frighten the American people into the idea that this Government should be run on the plan of a monarchy and build up a military and naval aristocracy, at which the people would rebel when the burden became too heavy to tote.

The alarmists proclaim from the housetops that we will be attacked by Germany, England, Russia, or Japan. Do not these militarists know that the people of the United States are reading for themselves? I submit, Mr. Chairman, there is not a well-informed schoolboy 18 years old in this country but that knows the United States has a Navy second to none, except Great Britain. There is not a man of any degree of intelligence but knows all of the countries now engaged in the European war are exhausting all of their resources, including soldiers and sailors, in the great conflict that is now in progress.

When that war is over some of those nations will have practically no navy, and their armies will be decimated, the treasuries of their Governments and the pockets of their people will be empty, with a great war debt hanging over the people, and the land filled with maimed soldiers, grief-stricken, pauperized widows and orphans, groaning under a great burden of taxation.

Sir, it will be at least 50 years before any of those nations would ever dream of war again. Yet we are told by a few military alarmists and those great interests that make big money out of big armies and navies that the United States is not prepared for war.

I contend this Government is prepared to meet any emergency. Whom should we be prepared to war with? The nations now at war have their hands full and would not court war with this country even if they thought they could overrun the United States.

As long as we have a representative Government there never will be any danger of any nation on this globe catching Uncle Sam unprepared to defend himself.

In order to maintain a representative Government in the United States, we must beware of the militarists and a big standing army.

Sirs, who believes that the present war in Europe would be in progress to-day if it had not been for the big standing armies in those countries? The very fact that some of them were so much overprepared for war, with some of their generals and soldiers impatiently scenting the battle from afar, is the real reason why there is not peace in Europe to-day. It is my prediction that if our people are ever plunged into a war with any other country, it will be done by some general or admiral. [Applause.]

The War with Spain was indeed unfortunate.

Our people are patriotic and courageous, and when they rally to the colors, be it said to their credit, they never ask what the war is about. Volunteers responded in every State of this Union to fight for the flag of the United States in the struggle that kept most of our troops in camp during the Spanish-American War.

A great mistake, in my judgment, was made as a result of that war, and I designate this mistake as the "acquisition of the Philippine Islands by the United States." What a pity that when Admiral Dewey fired his last shot in Manila Bay he did not say good-bye and sail away. [Applause.]

The Government of the United States paid Spain $20,000,000 for that white elephant, and our people are being taxed for many millions of dollars yearly to keep soldiers in those islands and prevent the Filipino people from exercising the rights of a free and independent people.

That unfortunate possession is a millstone around the neck of our Republic, and has been the chief argument of the militarists for a great Navy and a big Army.

May God speed the day when the American Congress will give the Filipino people independence and withdraw from the islands forever. There is too much greed and selfishness in this country. All last summer many Congressmen on the Republican side of the aisle were howling themselves hoarse because President Wilson followed a peace policy in the Mexican trouble.

Those gentlemen and certain interested metropolitan newspapers were criticizing, cartooning, and condemning the President, the Secretary of State, and the Democracy of Congress because war was not declared and an invading army sent by our Government into the Republic of Mexico.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. One was sent there.

Mr. QUIN. I have always thought the President pursued the proper and honorable course in all his dealings with Mexico.

Sirs, the real truth is that those parties who were so anxious to plunge the United States into war with Mexico really wanted our soldiers to come out of that conflict with Mexican soil on their muskets. [Applause.] Woe be unto the man that would throw this country into war for booty, plunder, land, and profits. Is it possible that the Government of the United States is not above that low ideal of barbarism?

A few years ago all of the advocates of big armaments and great standing armies based their excuse for exploiting and plundering the people on the promise that these powerful, expensive agencies of terror, death, and destruction would prevent war and maintain peace. Now, when they see all of the preparedness of Europe is evidence to the world that great navies and big standing armies do not maintain peace but bring on war, with all of its attendant horrors, this crowd must look about for a new argument, a new excuse to fool the people into standing still, to be further robbed by excessive taxation for great armaments and powerful standing armies.

What is the name of the new horse they have jumped on and are now riding with whip and spur to fool us? Unpreparedness for war [applause], when every thinking man knows there is not a nation in all of the world that desires a war with this country, and I hope there is not a man in our Republic that courts war with any other nation.

These alarmists and advocates of the proposition of covering the deep sea with battleships and the land with soldiers at the expense of the people to make big fortunes for a few individuals, trusts, and corporations have been bellowing about the great navies of Germany and Japan.

Every expert knows that Germany is not in the same class as to naval equipment with the United States. Germany, the great hell-roaring demon that these alarmists say is going to come over to these shores and beat hell out of this country! [Laughter.] They all know that poor little Japan is not a menace to us.

These alarmists can not get away with such arguments. I give you the exact sum in dollars spent by both Germany and the United States on their Naval Establishments each year from 1904 to 1913, inclusive:

	United States.	Germany.
1904	$103,633,115.40	$50,544,000
1905	115,420,997.75	49,110,300
1906	104,508,719.83	54,918,000
1907	99,693,298.32	58,344,300

You will notice that the Germans never spend any cents. It is always even money. [Laughter.]

This Government has been expending these enormous sums for the Navy, while the Germans have been spending such relatively small sums, and still they hold up the German Navy as such a great terror to this country!

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. QUIN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Would it not be advisable to put in right there the difference between the pay of the Germans' enlisted men in the navy and the men in the Navy of the United States in order to account for the difference?

Mr. QUIN. I have not the time to do that; but I can not believe, for instance, that if the Germans could spend only $50,544,000 and we should spend $103,000,000 in one year that there could be enough difference in the cost for Germany to have a great navy that is a terror to us unless somebody has been stealing from us. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. But does the gentleman know what the facts are as to the pay received in the German Navy?

Mr. QUIN. I must proceed. I will answer you under the five-minute rule when we get to that. [Laughter.]

Now, how much did we spend in 1908? I say the figures here submitted are exact and authentic:

	United States.	Germany.
1908	$129,974,371.95	$69,133,500
1909	139,216,545.02	80,737,626
1910	133,555,552.88	95,047,820
1911	127,026,100.00	103,302,773
1912	126,405,509.24	107,178,480

And so it runs down until we get just before the war started over there in Germany, and you know they have been preparing for war ever since the Kaiser went on the throne. We know that they are prepared for war all the time. I will show you what they spent when war was right in sight—when they could see the white of the eye of the enemy.

In 1913 we spent $123,151,538.76. Germany spent in 1913, $109,989,096.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague?

Mr. QUIN. I will.

Mr. SISSON. Does the gentleman include in his figures for the German Navy the entire expense of Germany on the naval establishment?

Mr. QUIN. Yes; the entire expense on the navy establishment, taken from Statistik für Staat, published in Berlin. [Laughter.] And I am confident no German would contradict that and no American would deny it.

Mr. SISSON. I would state to the gentleman that I am simply surprised at the comparatively small sums expended by Germany, as compared with the large sums that we have expended for 1913. I wish to ask the gentleman this further question: The difference in the compensation of the German and of the American sailor would not account for that enormous difference, would it?

Mr. QUIN. Oh, no.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman said he did not know what the difference was.

Mr. QUIN. The gentleman from Michigan misquotes me. He evidently does not understand my statement.

Mr. SISSON. With respect to the American figures, I will say that only about one-fourth or one-fifth of the amounts indicated there is included in the pay of officers' and men's salaries in the Navy of the United States; therefore the amount paid by the United States Government and the amount paid by Germany does not account for the great difference, as was suggested by the gentleman on the other side a moment ago.

Mr. QUIN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] is correct; and, if the figures are honest, it would seem that we have expended too much money on the Navy of the United States. Unless our money has been squandered in an illegitimate way, our Navy is bound to be greater than the German Navy. There can not be any such discrepancy in the honest expenditures. Our Navy is bound to be superior to the German Navy, if Uncle Sam has been given a square deal.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. QUIN. Yes.

Mr. CLINE. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Is it not true that the Germans have a conscription law to reinforce their army and their navy, which the alarmists in this country want to see adopted here? It does not cost anything for that volunteer service.

Mr. QUIN. It costs a great deal for these battleships, to put them on the sea. That is what I am talking about. I am not talking about the standing army, where they go out and make slaves of human beings. I am talking about the expenditures for the navy.

Now, Japan's expenditure is so much less that it would be a joke to make the comparison. The experts all know that our Government had a Navy superior to that of Germany even before the Germans lost any of their fleet in the war, and by the time the submarines and little torpedo boats get through their work Great Britain will be second to the United States. All of those countries engaged in war are keeping their dreadnaughts, their big battleships, securely concealed to keep the submarines from destroying them. That war has been waging ever since last August, and you have never yet had the news of any great sea battle.

Mr. Chairman, are battleships built to inspire fear in time of peace and duck into a safe place in time of war? Is it a game of hide and seek with these palaces on the seas?

Every harbor touching the United States could be securely mined by our Government inside of a very few days. We have the best guns in the world in our forts and as fine marksmen as ever drew a bead. We have plenty of factories, both Government and privately owned, to make all the powder and guns we could use.

We have an Army of men and officers of 92,482, besides the Philippine Scouts, and a National Guard of 120,000, and 15,000,000 strong, patriotic, courageous men in private life to answer the call of this Government to arms at any time the flag needs them.

Gentlemen, does this look like we are unprepared for war? If there is a man on this floor that doubts the ability, the endurance, or valor of the volunteer soldier of America, let him stand up right now and give his reason. The record of the volunteer soldiers at Bunker Hill, Ticonderoga, and Brandywine stands as an indisputable argument in behalf of the volunteers.

If you doubt the volunteer, go with me through Andrew Jackson's campaign in the War of 1812 against Great Britain. Watch him as he shatters the flower of the Regular Army of Great Britain in the Battle of New Orleans.

Follow the American Volunteers in the struggle between the Republic of Texas and Mexico in 1836. Watch him suffer martyrdom at the Alamo and Goliad; see him under the leadership of old Sam Houston at San Jacinto slaughter and route the Mexican Army, capture Santa Anna, and scatter Mexican blood and garlic all over Texas. [Laughter and applause.]

Ten years later, in 1846, the Government of the United States was forced to invade Mexico, and as absolute proof that the volunteer who had recently left his plow in the State of Mississippi and elsewhere in this Union was as good a soldier as ever fought on any battlefield; watch him at Buena Vista, where he marched into the very jaws of death and won victory for American arms and glory for the flag of this Republic.

Gentlemen of the House, if you are not satisfied with the record of our volunteer soldiers in those fierce conflicts, go with me to the battlefields of the Civil War, from 1861 to 1865.

Those of the Confederate Government that were fighting in that conflict were all raw, untrained volunteer soldiers, except a few officers. The greater portion of the Army of the Union were untrained volunteers from the vocations of private life. Watch them in every engagement. See them at Franklin, Chickamauga, Atlanta, and Shiloh. Watch them at Vicksburg, Manassas, Bull Run, and Gettysburg, when they could see the white of the eye of the enemy as they fought. Is there a man that doubts the volunteer soldier of this country?

It took all of the North, East, West, and part of the South of this Nation, and a large portion of Europe, four long years to overcome a few hundred thousand volunteers fighting for the Stars and Bars, principle, honor, and fireside. [Applause.]

Do you not believe our citizens are as brawny and courageous now as they were during that conflict? The advocates of the great standing army say we are bound to have trained and seasoned soldiers. Do you not know that the farmers and laboring people of this country are seasoned all the time? [Laughter.] It is nothing for them to work all day in the rain. They are expert marksmen. They can shoot a squirrel out of the top of the tallest tree in the woods, and never fail to bring down the bird on the wing. [Applause.] Surely no man doubts the valor and patriotism of this great class of citizenship that constitutes the real backbone of this Republic. [Applause.]

The farmers and the laboring men have fought all the battles of this country, and they are still ready to defend her against all foes. I am here pleading for them now, for you know they pay the taxes. I know they are taxed till they can not stand any more, and I know they do not want the Army increased.

If there is anything that is more obnoxious than excessive taxation, it is the tread and presence of a great standing army. It does not harmonize with liberty, independence, and free government. Yea; great standing armies have been the undoing of nearly all the nations of the earth. [Applause.]

History proves that whenever military power gets in the ascendancy it overthrows the civil government, establishes an autocracy of tyranny, and oppresses the people.

It is the experience of all the ages that military authorities have contempt for the plain people who toil. Yea; the generals and admirals think the plain working classes of this country stink. They look upon us as cattle.

In this piping time of peace the gentleman from Massachusetts is willing to spend $750,000,000 annually on the Army and Navy. May the Lord God of hosts keep us from the peril and oppression of such a burden as that type of statesmen would impose on the people! [Applause.]

A big, strong army would build up a government of plutocracy. It would impoverish the people and deaden patriotism. Instead of a government of brotherly love and the rights of man, you would have a military despotism.

Compulsory military service would soon be demanded and enforced in times of peace—a consummation devoutly to be despised.

What would the mothers of the boys of this country think of us if they thought we would legislate in such a way that their sons would be compelled to give a term of their best young manhood in the Army? What would the people, the taxpayers, think of us? What will the lovers of high ideals and free government think of us if we go backward and make this Republic the synonym of big armaments and military autocracy?

Mr. Chairman, I shall fight against any increase of the Army in the committee, on the floor of this House, and everywhere else. The special-privilege class and the chauvinistic jingo shall not drive their golden chariot over the plain people of this country. They shall not make of our Government an establishment of tyrannical militarism, bending the backs of our laboring people with the burden of taxation and forcing them to be quasi slaves and devotees at the shrine of the bloody god of war.

Instead of my country's flag standing for oppression, death, and destruction, as some would have it, I pray that this flag shall always be the symbol of peace and good will, bearing this happy sentiment to a free, prosperous, and happy people. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman reserves 15 minutes. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to discuss at length the bill before the House. I do want to say, however, that in my opinion every possible need of the military establishment has been provided for in the measure before us, both for the present and for reasonable future requirements. I do regret, however, that the committee did not undertake to present to the House the question of whether or not we should have an increase in our present Regular Army. As one member of the committee, I believe that such an increase is needed at this time. I do not believe it is needed because of any fear of future war, but I do believe that the present needs of our standing Army, under the present policy of the War Department, require a reasonable increase in the present establishment, in order that our military posts may have proper garrisons, and that the country at large may have a national police force of proper size.

In the last year or two, under the policy of the present administration, as well as under the last one, large forces have been placed in Hawaii and in Panama. It is contemplated to put from 10,000 to 12,000 men ultimately in Hawaii, and from 5,000 to 10,000 in Panama. When this is done—and it will very soon be brought about—it will leave a mobile army in this country of less than 25,000 men, not sufficient for the purposes of providing an adequate mobile army for this country. Therefore I think that now is the time when this House should have considered a reasonable increase in the military establishment. Secretary of War Garrison has asked that it may be increased by 25,000 men. Undoubtedly the other legislative body, when this bill reaches it, will make some provision for such an increase. I believe that increase should be granted, but not in the way in which the Secretary of War asks it. He asks for a flat increase of 25,000 enlisted men and a thousand officers. I believe that increase should be granted, but it should be an increase in organizations as well as an increase in the men.

The theory of our Army is that it should be a small, well-trained body of men in time of peace, with a large number of highly trained, efficient officers, under whom a comparatively small standing army can be expanded easily in time of war to such an army as will meet our requirements. In order to do that, to make it capable of such expansion, we must have the proper organizations already existing. I believe the mobile forces in this country should be increased in this bill by not less than 15 regiments of infantry, 5 regiments of field artillery, and 5 regiments of cavalry, with all necessary officers and equipment.

Now, although an advocate of that reasonable increase in the Army, I want to say to the House that I am in no sense a military alarmist. I have no sympathy whatever with some of the statements that have been made to our committee and to the public as to the necessity of our maintaining an army of half a million men, and I want the House to bear in mind that all of the enormous figures that have been given to the public in regard to the requirements of the Army are based upon what these alarmists claim is the necessity of an army of half a million men in this country. I agree with those who say that they do not believe we will ever be called upon, ever confronted with the necessity of having to put an army of half a million men in the field in this country, especially to oppose a foreign foe. In the first place, that argument for any possibility of an army of half a million men and the necessity for it is predicated upon the probable destruction of our Navy by a foreign foe, which is an improbability; and, in the second place, it is figured upon the theory that we will have to use it to confront an equal number of men who might be landed upon our shores. In my opinion it is a physical impossibility for any foreign foe ever to land such an army upon our shores. A few months ago there was a Chief of Staff of our Army who published a sensational magazine article, in which a statement was made that is typical of some of the wild, sensational statements that have been made and will be made during this debate in regard to the needs of the military establishment. In that magazine article this Chief of Staff made the statement that if our Army should ever go into an engagement with a foreign foe, that all of the ammunition we have on hand would be expended in half an hour's time. Upon analysis, that kind of a statement is utterly ridiculous. He reaches his conclusion on the supposition that every cannon and every soldier we have would all be brought into action at the same time. It is highly improbable that every man we have would ever be brought into one such enormous engagement and highly improbable that every gun and every round of ammunition would be expended in such a time.

Mr. McKELLAR. We would have to be attacked from east and west and in all our island possessions in order for any condition like that to exist, would we not?

Mr. ANTHONY. In order to sustain Gen. Wotherspoon's argument every gun in every coast fortification and every field-piece of every battery of every regiment, wheresoever it might be, would have to be in action all at one time in order to expend that amount of ammunition. So I feel I am perfectly safe in saying that that kind of a statement is absolutely absurd and not worthy of the attention of this House.

I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas yields 55 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. And I reserve that time.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I desire recognition in my own right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for one hour.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, this question of national defense is a most fascinating one to anyone who is a lover of history and who delights to dwell upon the philosophical deductions that may be made from time to time, each in his own way, from the events and lessons of history as he reads them and as he understands them. The temptation to anyone discussing this question to try to delve down into some of these lessons of history and to substantiate the general contention that perhaps in many respects the country is not altogether prepared for war is almost irresistible. But I appreciate the temper of the House and, I hope, in some sense the fitness of the occasion, and I shall ask for your more detailed consideration of some observations I may have to offer if you will do me the kindness to read at your leisure what I may put into the RECORD.

We who think that the country is not altogether prepared—and, mind, I hope you understand I am speaking from the viewpoint of moderation and not as an extremist or an alarmist—those of us who think the country is not altogether quite prepared for war have to face two kinds of arguments, broadly speaking, made by two kinds of people. One is made by people who say that there never will be another war; another is made by people who say that while war may come, if it does it will find us prepared for it.

I think the first of these arguments is the hardest to meet, because, with all respect to the intelligence, the high order of learning that generally characterizes the most prominent proponents of that argument, I do not think they read correctly the lessons of history. If there is any one thing true of the lessons of history as the average man may study them, it is that through the mighty succession of events that have come down the ages the same old thread of self-interest may be discerned always and everywhere in the doings of men and in the doings of nations.

Sometimes that self-interest appears to be enlightened, sometimes it appears to be of a progressive enlightened character, but, with or without the adjective "enlightened," it is always "self-interest."

One of the phases of the argument made by our friends along this line, that we shall never have another war, is predicated on an altogether too optimistic expectation of the millennium. With all honesty of purpose, sincerity, and patriotism, they speculate on the dawn of that happy era when nations shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks. They forget that the nation that has most practically beaten its swords into plowshares and its spears into pruning hooks and has best taken advantage of these new tools to gather up riches for itself has fashioned these plowshares and pruning hooks so that they can be taken at once back to the forge and beaten once more into the old swords and spears in time of need. [Applause.]

There is no such thing as something for nothing. A civilization that is worth living for is worth dying for. But when people arrive at a superior stage of civilization, exemplified externally by social and commercial development which makes for the jealousy of other nations, then if they will not die for their civilization they may rest assured they will die with it. [Applause.]

I think we ought to bear in mind, too, the fact that we are building here in this generation not for ourselves alone. We ought not to pass only superficially on the questions that sometimes possess tremendous potentialities. We are laying the foundations for the future, and we are bequeathing a legacy of some kind or another to our children, whether it may be for good or for evil. Some man who reads the pages of history a few generations from now will be able to see more clearly than we do that what we did in the House to-day perhaps was the reason why our children's children of 75 years from now, it may be, either enjoy the most abundant prosperity or else are plagued with one of the most awful misfortunes ever told.

We are always, consciously or unconsciously, seeking the interest of our children and in just such propositions as that of safeguarding the country in the national defense.

I would not be presumptuous enough to pose before you as in any sense the authorized interpreter of the utterances on this floor of the distinguished leader of the minority, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], but I believe that he had something of that kind in his mind when a few weeks ago in this Chamber in speaking on the measure for Philippine independence he pointed out to us the remarkable strategic position this country had acquired in the Pacific Ocean, and how resolutely and how jealously we should guard the advantage we have secured in that great western sea, because some day our children might rise up and call us blessed because we had secured that advantage for them, or might regret in unspeakable humiliation because this very year we might have given it away.

Those who say we are never to have any more war do not seem to read the lessons of history in a very discerning way, it seems to me. It is easy to talk peace, but in the old and oft-quoted language of Patrick Henry, "Men may cry 'Peace, peace!' but there is no peace." How many men in this last summer anywhere in Christendom who were following at that time the recent unusual demonstrations of our international peace advocates would have dared to foretell the awful war that is now raging in Europe? How many men in July would have dared to venture the prophecy that within a month the most awful war in history would be raging across the sea? No man. How many men to-day, in the light of all that we have read about the war, can agree as to the true cause of it?

That is one of the reasons why it seems to me that while we may talk about peace as an assured proposition of the future—that is, the proposition that nations will beat their swords into plow shares and their spears into pruning hooks—we ought still, as prudent men, to set our house in order lest the millennium do not come after all.

The other argument we have to meet is that, if war does come, we will be prepared for it. That is born of a true instinct of patriotism. It rings true to the good old-fashioned self-possession and ease and confidence that we hope always will in a proper degree distinguish our American people; but I am afraid, if we come to analyze it very closely, we might reasonably suspect it was born of a little bit of overconfidence. Somehow, in this land of ours, we American boys grow up with a good deal of pseudo patriotism that finds its vent now and then in carrying imaginary chips around on our shoulders. We Americans are rather volatile. That is one of the characteristics that people of other lands point out about us. We are inclined to swagger a little bit and bluster a bit. It is harmless and perhaps meaningless, and it grows out of the buoyancy and effervescence of the spirit of a young Nation that never has been whipped, but it breeds an overconfidence. One hundred and thirty-seven years of boyish racket in celebrating one hundred and thirty-seven Fourths of July have somehow got our minds to ringing to the inharmonious tune that we can "lick all creation." We do not stop to analyze it much, but we carry that notion in our minds.

Then, too, in this land of ours, with all respect to the good, old-fashioned, honest, and deep-seated patriotism that does lie in the hearts of all our people, we have a kind of noise that might be termed "music-hall patriotism." We love to cheer the flag in a musical show. We love to make a great ado about standing up in a theater when the national anthem is being played. We do a lot of these pretty, spectacular, picturesque, and rather ostentatious things at these times and satisfy ourselves that they are really the outward and visible signs of an inward and spiritual patriotism. And then, to-morrow, when the sheriff's deputy comes around with a little piece of paper that says he wants us to sit for two hours on a jury in a municipal court, we put up a job on him because it looks as if the fish would bite. [Laughter and applause.] We have a good deal of "music-hall patriotism" in this country, which we must not mistake for the real, the genuine, the very true thing.

The fact is—and this is not said in any spirit of criticism, for we are all counseling together for the same purpose and with the same honest intent, whatever the variance of our notions about it—the fact is that this country has never yet fought a first-class power when that first-class power was in a position to put up a first-class fight. That is a lesson of history I think that some of our friends do not now take the pains closely to study and from which they do not draw the proper conclusions.

I do not believe in militarism any more than the rest of the country does; but when I see some of our friends promoting the idea that anything in the way of unusual preparation for national defense means an armed camp and militarism and conscription and all that kind of thing, I think the gentlemen are only setting up men of straw, to be battered down again with their own logic. Nobody wants to do anything of that kind. I do not believe in militarism [applause], but I do think we ought to take reasonable, sensible, well-considered, well-deliberated, prudent counsel with one another and make all proper preparation for national defense against those countries that apparently still do believe in militarism. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, as I said at the beginning, I would like to dwell on some of the details of this subject that instinctively occur to one who has loved to study this question, but I hope that I may still keep within the limits of prudence and respect your time and patience.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman is a student of history, and he has given us some history in his speech. I suppose the gentleman would like us to be so prepared at least that what happened in 1814, when this Capital was in the hands of the British, might not occur again?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I would, most certainly. I was interested in what a gentleman said on the floor of the House just a few moments ago, when he discussed with the most elegant unconcern—very honestly, but, I think, not with altogether certain preparation about the fact itself—the improbability of our being invaded from Canada. I live in a valley where there have been two invasions of redcoats within a few generations—1777 and 1814. And I know whereof I speak, because a great-granddad of mine lost a part of his hair to a very accommodating Indian on the occasion of one of those excursions that came down from the north.

Mr. MOORE. Does the gentleman know whether we are any better prepared, relatively speaking, down the Chesapeake Bay than we were in 1814?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am not prepared to speak about particular conditions in any locality; but I must also suggest that I have now to "defend" the whole country in 20 minutes, and I will have to be going along.

Much might be said and volumes written about the question of large and small armies, and about munitions of war, and all that kind of thing, but doubtless a great deal of that part of the subject of national defense will be discussed under the five-minute rule. I want to speak to you now, however, with more particularity about another phase of it.

We have heard a great deal about the necessity for building up a large reserve of men trained to some extent in the duties of the soldier that can follow the usual employments of peace in time of peace but that can be instantly available at the call to the colors in time of war. We are told that if we adopt such a policy as a part of our scheme for national defense we will in large measure do away with the necessity for the maintenance of a large standing army, always the very proper nightmare of a people bred to the ideals and the institutions of our republican form of government.

And, in pursuance of that idea, various schemes have been planned, and one is being tried out by the War Department now, in the hope that the period of enlistment in the Regular Army and the terms and conditions of that enlistment may be so adjusted that a great number of young men will be induced to enter the Army for a comparatively short term of service, quickly absorb pretty much all the essentials of military discipline and efficiency needful for the purposes of such a reserve, and then be returned to take up civil employments of various kinds, all the while ready, however, to rejoin the colors as trained soldiers at their country's call.

By this method, we are told, we shall not only escape the burden and the dangers of maintaining anything like a large standing army, with its always accompanying mischievous possibilities of militarism, but we shall escape the necessity for conscription, and will not divert our young men from the paths they should pursue in the normal course of developing themselves in self-supporting industry, in home building, and all the pursuits of peace that make a nation truly great.

There is much to be said for this idea. I have very great doubt, however, as to how much can be said for any plan that has yet been tried under it or is presently proposed for trial. The genius of the American people is decidedly opposed to the military life, the limitations of individual opportunity, the restraint and the constraint that go with it. Our people not only never will serve in the Army in time of peace under compulsion, but they are not anxious, as a rule, to serve in the Regular Army at all. And for the very particular class of young men whom it is hoped to secure for this reserve to be made up of graduates of the Regular Army, the Regular Army itself has few attractions.

Moreover, the various forms of governmental oversight of the individual citizen, the intimate scrutiny by police espionage of the daily walk and conversation of the individual citizen, his comings in and goings out, that are characteristic of some European nations are lacking in this free land of ours. Public sentiment in this country never will consent to such a secret service régime sleuthing for the Government to keep track of the doings of its people. It is, to my mind, therefore, plainly impracticable for the Government ever to be in position to summon and compel the attendance at the colors of any considerable number of men who at one time may have served an enlistment in the Regular Army, under the condition that for a certain period thereafter they were to be enrolled in a reserve and liable at any time to a call to the colors. The country is too large, covers too vast an extent of geography, and our American habits of personal independence in travel and sojourn are too free ever to make it possible to keep chained to the demands of a card-system reserve here in Washington thousands and thousands of men that may be scattered from one end of America to the other, or even in foreign lands.

No American citizen has to show any gendarme any papers of any kind to travel from or to his home town in this country, and no American citizen ever will.

And without some plan equivalent to some degree of police surveillance of this character it is doubtful whether the best-laid scheme for a military reserve of this kind will ever work.

I want to venture the suggestion that the very heart and center of this question of a military reserve in a "trained citizenry" never will be satisfactorily reached until the 48 States of this Union consent to surrender, each for itself, its exclusive jurisdiction over its quota of the so-called National Guard, and what is now in effect a mere localized militia in those States comes under the sole and exclusive authority, control, and support of the United States Government at Washington, just as the Regular Army is to-day. Then, and not until then, will the institution that is now in reality only a collection of localized militia, with widely varying standards of equipment, training, morale, discipline, and personnel—and only one thing in common, and that patriotic, good intentions—become in fact a National Guard. Then, and only then, will this collection of splendid young men, for the time being all too much the victims of misapplied energy, misapplied money, and misapplied State pride, become in truth a National Guard that is all and singly just what its name implies, and is prepared, detail for detail, to do just the kind of service that we are now vainly trying to prepare for through the attempt to organize an Army reserve. [Applause.]

I understand, I think, something of the objections that will be instantly raised to this proposition. Indeed, it is not a new proposition for that matter. It has been discussed for years, in one way or another, among Regular Army men and among militiamen, and among a few civilians in general. But, so far as I know, the proposition, out and out and bald as I have put it here, has not, in recent years at least, been advanced on the floor of this House. And I advance it now, conscious, of course, that nothing that this House can do at this time or is likely to do at this time can be the means of bringing about the turning over to the National Government of the so-called National Guard. The movement, when it begins, must come from the States themselves, because the States themselves now control their own militia under one of the most jealously guarded clauses of the Federal Constitution.

And I believe the States ought to begin the movement at once, because it is manifestly in the interest of their own people so to do, as I shall try to show. It is true that the Federal Government has from time to time, through the passage of helpful laws, found the way to cooperate with the States in the maintenance of this militia force, and has even to a certain extent imposed upon the militia, through the consent of the States, something of its own demands in the way of a standard of military efficiency. But, do the best it may, under any circumstances, with the constitutional conditions as they now exist and the claims and assertions of right made by the States under them, the Federal Government can only work through the States in a vague, indefinite, and indirect way, after all, and must perforce be content with the best it can accomplish for our citizen soldiery under such adverse conditions by what is often only the clumsiest of circumlocution.

To-day the several States in the Union are annually contributing about $6,000,000 and the Federal Government, in round numbers, $7,500,000 for the support of the militia. Who doubts that incalculably better results could be had if this same total could be expended under the supreme control of the National Government according to its own standards of military training?

Now, all of this is not to the discredit of the militia, or National Guard, as it is erroneously called. The splendid young men that to-day make up the rank and file of this organization, or collection of independent organizations—for that is all it actually is when the final reckoning is had—are simply laboring in and under conditions which shaped themselves generations ago, and are for the most part doing the best they can against the many and various obstacles to better results that those conditions imposed. I honestly believe for the most part they would welcome a change in authority that would permit them to fit themselves more capably for a more efficient service than the Constitution will now let them perform, or that they could perform if it did let them.

I served in the National Guard for 12 years, and in the course of that time not only had experience in various capacities from that of a private to responsible command rank, but also had very good opportunities for observing in something like intimate detail the results of National Guard experiences in States other than my own. I am very glad to accept as a general proposition the idea that the rank and file of the various militia organizations throughout the land are composed of an excellent quality of young citizenship, the very kind of men that would be most likely to compose a great part of any volunteer army that could be assembled in time of war. Sprinkled among them are many officers of maturer years, men that have given much of the activities of a lifetime, apart from their private business concerns, to the careful study of the duties of a soldier and of military science in general. Both officers and men, for the most part, perform their service in the militia at a very considerable personal sacrifice of time, energy, and often of money. Many of them, of course, are attracted to the ranks in the first place by the instinctive enthusiasm of a young imagination that is always stirred by a distant view of the soldier's life and experiences. Some of them get tired of the realities of militia experiences and gradually drop out. Others, either from actual love of the experience or often from a deep-seated patriotic impulse to be useful in the real training of a real citizen soldiery as a preparation for national defense, continue in the militia service for years and give the best of their time and talents, properly so to be bestowed, to earnest and zealous endeavor to raise the standard of efficiency of the organization.

When I first went into the National Guard nearly 30 years ago it is true that it was more or less of a military organization in a superficial sense only. In many localities it was maintained as something of an exclusive social institution, lavished money on dandified uniforms that were anything but practical equipment for camp or battle field, devoted its time to acquiring proficiency in fancy drills and evolutions that may be a pretty martial display on times of public ceremonial perhaps, but had little connection with the stern duties of a real soldier in a real war. Such a thing as learning the practical lessons of practical camps, the instruction of the soldier in the details of his duty as a soldier in the field, the encouragement of proficiency in marksmanship, and all the thousand and one things that make military science a science indeed—those things were but slighted if, in many cases, they were even grudgingly attempted. All over the land, as a matter of fact, the animating purpose of the militia was organizing for outdoor pastime at time of parade and muster, or stealing the livery of Mars for the fascination of Venus when the only call to arms was the fiddler's appeal to "Swing partners" and "All hands 'round."

But in the course of a few years all this began to change. The spirit of progress, of a better appreciation of the purpose of a true national guard, began to be felt in the ranks, and here and there officers and men began the laborious task of reorganizing and standardizing the State Militia, groping somewhat clumsily, to be sure, but always honestly and eagerly after the pattern of the Regular Army. At first, as I well remember, and as many men of like experience in other States can testify, these attempts to transform the militia plaything into a practical military institution were stoutly resisted. They were resisted at home, too, by politicians and State influences of one kind and another that either could see no purpose in making the militia a very real military institution or else were loth to see a popular plaything that gave rank and exalted title to a few favorite sons and pleasure to the people transformed into a practical organization that meant business and not pastime.

But the leaven was at work, and it began to leaven the whole lump. Little by little political and social opposition was overcome or withdrawn, little by little the State legislatures were induced to come to the rescue with more sensible laws and more liberal appropriations, and little by little the Federal Government itself was induced to go into partnership with the States in the maintenance of the militia under certain conditions that, it was hoped, might eventually make the militia a veritable national guard in every sense.

This state of change was under way in some parts of the country when the War with Spain broke out. At that time there were already some States in which the standard of the militia had been raised very high, indeed, both in qualifications of men and officers and in equipment and matériel. In others the change was well under way, while in others it is but truth to say the leaven had scarcely begun to work, if at all.

I will not undertake to dwell upon the melancholy experience of the various militia organizations that helped to make up the Volunteer Army in the War with Spain. It would take too long even briefly to sketch them. They are a part of the history of those eventful months, not altogether a very glorious part, to be sure, but a serious part, and a very solemn part to many men that now lie sleeping under the sod and to thousands of others that were returned to the arts of peace broken in health forever. Their experience in the days of '98 was a sad one, for the most part, perhaps a humiliating one in some respects, but it demonstrated once more that "they also serve who only stand and wait." It made a little chapter in American history the real details of which in all their wretched exposé of miserable makeshifts and incompetency, in all their needless sacrifice of the lives and health of brave and loyal young men, have never been fully written, and I for one hope never will be.

In fact, Mr. Chairman, we saw the militia system of this country break down in the War with Spain 17 years ago this spring, just as it had always broken down before in every war this country has ever had with a foreign foe. [Applause.] Recruits representing 48 varying standards and degrees of military efficiency and equipment can not be hastily thrown into one army at one time in time of war and make an effectual fighting unit. The proposition is contrary to every element of common sense, and our history has always proved it so.

But the experience of '98 taught a lesson and sounded a warning. After the war was over and the Volunteer Army was disbanded and the various State militia organizations were under way again in their own proper form and locality the work of reconstituting this force of citizen soldiery was redoubled. State and Federal Governments became more actively interested, more money was appropriated for the purpose, the General Government took an ever-increasing interest in the project and sent more details of Regular Army officers to the various States to conduct courses of instruction for the militiamen, and in one way and another, by the aid of law and example, the militia began to come nearer and nearer its proper status as a true national guard. That movement for the betterment of militia conditions is still under way.

And yet, for all that, I sincerely believe the work has about reached the point where further progress of anything like a substantial character is well-nigh impossible or impracticable until the States themselves consent to turn over to the Federal Government the control of the so-called National Guard.

Under existing conditions some States are able to provide sufficient money for a citizen soldiery that is attaining something like the Regular Army standard of efficiency and equipment, and some are not. In some States conditions, political or otherwise, are heartily in sympathy with the efforts of the militia to develop such a standard, and in others they are not wholly so. In all States it is found that the development of such a standard requires such a character of fitness in the recruit and such expenditure of time and energy on his part as more or less seriously to interfere with his ability to earn a living in his usual employment unless there can be some supplemental recompense in wages from some source. This means that in some States discipline is rigorous, in others lax; in some States the standard of efficiency is already high for a citizen soldiery and always going a little bit higher, and in others it is difficult to show anything like very substantial improvement along most lines.

The whole matter, it seems to me, in this particular sums itself up in the very apparent proposition that, with the control of the National Guard distributed among 48 localized State authorities, there can be no practical standardization of any of the requirements for efficiency in the soldier himself and no standardization of the equipment and material that is designed both to give him an opportunity to learn to be a soldier and fight like a soldier after he is one; and all this notwithstanding the earnest, honest, tireless efforts of a great body of loyal and patriotic officers of the State governments, of truly sympathetic and devoted Regular Army officers, and other men in military and civil authority all over the land. The cause has made progress, but it is reaching its limit, for reasons that I have tried to make plain in this brief sketch, and which have doubtless come under the observation, if not within the actual experience, of many of the gentlemen in this House.

It is not necessary here to go into the history of the militia as an institution of the several States, the causes which brought it into being and made it one time useful to the States themselves. It is sufficient to say, I think, that whatever may have been the justification in need for the militia as a State institution at one time in our history, that need exists no longer, if this Union actually is the kind of a Government that we are to-day teaching our sons and daughters that it is, and if all of us—the people of each and every State—have not now and never shall have again any reason for defending our several States against each other.

The only conceivable need for organizations of armed men in any State to-day is for possible service within its boundaries in the maintenance of law and order, the simple and ordinary functions of a simple and ordinary police force or constabulary, a force that at no time is likely to require any very considerable part of the military training, equipment, or material that is now annually expended upon the militia of the States, which militia, by the way, is rarely used for the maintenance of law and order in the States, for the very simple reason that in all but the most unusual instances the regular police force itself is competent for the task.

Not only do the States themselves stand in no need of the militia as presently constituted as a localized police force, but when the National Government needs an army to support its Regular Establishment in time of war it must call for volunteers, because under the Constitution the militia as such can not serve in all the capacities open to a volunteer army. So that it is rather difficult to show just what public service the so-called National Guard does or can perform under present conditions, except in a desultory and all too haphazard manner to train a few men for commissions or warrants in a possible volunteer army and fit a few more men for creditable service in its ranks; and then have to be mustered out of the militia and into the Volunteer Army in order to perform the service for which it has been training.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that a large part of this problem of providing an efficient military reserve among our people, of providing a citizenry trained in the art of war to a very practical extent, can be solved when the so-called National Guard is a very national guard indeed, because it is no longer an assembly of irregular and unharmonized units emanating from 48 varying conditions and circumstances and limitations in 48 States, but is solely a national force, recruited, maintained, trained, equipped, and disciplined by the United States Government alone under Federal laws and out of the Federal Treasury.

In closing I want to point out very briefly several benefits that are now sought in some kind of a plan for an Army reserve that I believe can be realized or approximated to a very great degree under such a national guard.

I have already suggested the attainment of standardization and uniformity all over the country in all that goes to make a trained citizen soldier and to equip him for his duty.

Let me add that, in my opinion, more men and, in some respects, a larger proportion of very desirable young men will be attracted to the ranks when it is understood that the service is to be Uncle Sam's service in reality and not a State makeshift, when it is a matter of fact that service in such a national guard is actually a service in the Federal reserve Army and carries with it the importance and responsibility of such national service. The certainty of maintenance in the service, the certainty of proper instruction, equipment, care, and consideration in the service, the certainty of a proper allowance of pay for time actually spent in actual military duty, and the elimination forever of all the elements of mere pretense and show, all the caprice of local politics, all the ridiculous make-believe of absurd rank and meaningless titles, will give the young soldier a conscious pride in being a real unit in a real volunteer army that may be called to the defense of his country.

I have said that more men and in some respects a larger proportion of very desirable young men will be attracted to the National Guard by such a change as I have suggested. The test might easily be made. While the States now have exclusive authority over their own militia there is nothing to prevent the Federal Government from establishing its own national guard right alongside a State organization, drawing from the State recruiting source. I do not believe it would be necessary to continue such an experiment very long in order to determine which of the two services proved the most attractive to the young men of that region.

What can be made of the militia when Uncle Sam does have absolute control over it may be seen at any time right here in Washington in the splendidly efficient organization known as the National Guard of the District of Columbia.

Such a national guard as I have outlined would be, in very truth, a volunteer army always in the making from generation to generation, and still always with a considerable nucleus of well-trained and more or less experienced men around which any number of recruits could assemble at any call to war. And being no longer a mere State militia, but an actual Federal reserve army, there would no longer be the necessity that exists to-day and has always existed for raising a separate volunteer army under Federal law in time of war and then permitting the State militia organizations to disband and be mustered into it. We would have but one volunteer organization under one law, and have that ready for business all the time.

Back of all this, Mr. Chairman, we shall be able to get rid of another factor that is now proving to be such a stumbling block in attempting to work out any plan for the formation of an Army reserve under present conditions in this country—the difficulty I spoke of at the beginning of my remarks—the practical improbability of ever getting together again at the call to arms of any considerable part of the men that some years before may have entered the Regular Army with the promise at enlistment that they would rally to the colors at any time after they had passed into the reserve.

A national guard standardized under Federal authority and control, as I have indicated, may still be maintained in its several units in all the various States; that is to say, the Federal Government would raise and maintain its Vermont quota for the national guard in the State of Vermont where the men live and follow their usual employments. Their armories would be in that State, their recruiting done in that State, and as the men that had served through their period of enlistment passed out of the ranks and back to civil life most of them, as a matter of fact, would remain in the very place where they were recruited, and where at immediate call as reservists they could rally again to the colors.

Not only that, but another element would be injected into this reserve army, an element sentimental, to be sure, but a very compelling one for all that. Such a national guard so territorialized, as it would have to be, recruiting its several units from the same source every time and sending its reservists back to the source from which they came, would have stimulated to the highest degree that great asset of the soldier in all countries and in all wars—local pride in the traditions and history of a local military organization—a factor in military discipline and morale that is superior to all laws and higher than all officers. [Applause.]

If the States would ever consent to such a plan for the reorganization of the National Guard, Mr. Chairman, they would have surrendered a constitutional prerogative, to be sure, but a constitutional prerogative that to-day is of doubtful use to them and of very certain well nigh needless expense. But even with such surrender they would be participating just the same in the development of the trained citizenry of the land that is always its bulwark in time of war's emergency. "Each for all and all for each," their brave sons would go out from their own State as of yore, officered in large part by their own kinsmen; their organizations would bear designations and carry flags that told all the world from whence they came and bore witness to the Commonwealth's noble contribution and precious sacrifice to the national defense. And, what is even better than all the best of such motherly pride, every State would have the satisfaction of feeling that her volunteer heroes would go out to war with a training and an equipment and under a skilled oversight by expert officers in command that would, for the first time in the history of the land since the mournful days of Valley Forge, give the militiamen of the United States something like an equal chance with the enemy.

We may talk as we will about preparation for national defense in one form and another, the fact still will remain that as long as we maintain a citizen soldiery organized as State militia, sentiment and pride will send that State militia wholly or in part to the front at every call for volunteers in time of war. And it never yet has been in proper shape to go to war, and it has always had a more or less melancholy experience by reason of its unpreparedness in every war we ever had.

Noble sacrifices of patriotic lives in time of war make glorious pages in a country's history.

Needless and preventable sacrifice of patriotic lives, no matter if victory does finally come limping in, makes pages of heart-breaking regret that no glory can blot out, sorrow that is felt at every fireside in the land where Rachel sits weeping for her children and refusing to be comforted because they are not.

It is this very same militia we have been talking about, Mr. Chairman, that, together with the little standing Army that we have, must take the first shock of a war for national defense, act as a stop-gap, a forlorn hope, and sacrific precious lives for months maybe, until this great American giant awakes, sees that the war his dreams told him would never come has come at last, and begins to make the serious preparation for self-defense that we ought to make to-day. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back 30 minutes. Before the Chair recognizes any other gentleman, the Chair desires to make a statement in regard to time. We are liable to get into some confusion and difficulty here on account of the fact that there is to be seven hours of time, to be divided equally between the two sides. The Chair assumes it is the purpose to have that time equally divided on the two sides. Under the general rules each gentleman who obtains the floor is entitled to recognition for an hour. The Chair simply calls attention to the fact now, in the hope that some agreement can be made and the difficulty obviated. There have been three gentlemen recognized on the majority side and three gentlemen recognized on the minority side, each for an hour. There have been used 2 hours and 5 minutes on the majority side and there have been used 1 hour and 21 minutes on the minority side of the Chamber. That will leave time, but it will be very difficult to divide it equally now unless some arrangement is made.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition. I think I can solve the problem.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield half an hour to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] and half an hour to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, I think I had 10 minutes reserved, and I desire to yield that 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee yields 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY], and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] notified the Chair that he desired to yield his remaining time, 15 minutes, to the gentleman from Virginia. The Chair does not see the gentleman from Mississippi on the floor just now, but without objection, that will be ordered. Also, the gentleman from Virginia has half an hour in his own right. That clears the matter up, and we can now proceed.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 50 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] said one thing this morning that impressed me. He said that of all the people who are talking about unpreparedness for war not one tells us how to be prepared. Of course not, because there are eight different committees in the House and Senate that have jurisdiction of that question. How can they lay out an intelligent program? What I ask for is a commission appointed by the President and the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate to make those very recommendations as to preparedness which no sensible man would undertake to make in default of proper information.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE AND ASIATIC EXCLUSION.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Monroe doctrine stands like a flaming sword notifying Europe that she will not be permitted to colonize South America or Mexico. Do you suppose that that flaming sword is going to be effective against impoverished nations teeming with population unless we have something substantial in the way of military power with which to back it up? You might just as well expect a hungry hyena to respect the defenselessness of an unprotected bone. Moreover, we have looked the proudest nation of Asia square in the eyes and we have said to those fighting Japanese, "We will have none of you here. We don't want you within our borders." The Japanese Government professes friendship for America, you say. True enough; but suppose that some fine day the people of Japan should wake up and say to their Government, "We demand from the people of the United States the same treatment which they give to other nations." The Japanese will never be so unreasonable, you think. Won't they? How do you know? In these days the wisest man can't look very far into the millstone of the future. After all, is it so very unreasonable from the Japanese point of view, I wonder?

We don't know whether or not the Japanese are going to demand the same treatment as other nations for their people who desire to come to this country. But suppose they do make the demand. What is our answer going to be? Shall we let them in as if they were Europeans? Shall we grant them naturalization? Never by my vote, I hope, nor will I arbitrate that question, either; nor will the American people arbitrate that question any more than they will arbitrate the Monroe doctrine. Ask any Member from the Pacific coast whether he will vote to arbitrate the question of Mongolian exclusion. Just ask him and see what he says. As to this philosophy of an international government based on the brotherhood of man, that may come in the sweet by and by, when Californians have learned to intermarry with Chinese and Mississippians have begun to select negresses for their wives.

TWO GENTLEMEN OF VIRGINIA.

Three years ago this Committee on Military Affairs carried through the House of Representatives a bill reducing the Army of the United States; and there stands the gentleman who did it—the chairman of this committee. Fortunately the Senate did not pass that bill. I have not forgotten the gentleman's words; neither have I forgotten the words of a certain other gentleman from Virginia, who once upon a time spoke to another resolution of the same sort. Here is that other resolution:

Resolved, That the Military and Naval Establishments ought to be reduced.

Listen to what that other gentleman from Virginia said:

With respect to war, we have, thank God, in the Atlantic a fosse wide and deep enough to keep off any immediate danger to our territory. The belligerents know as well as we feel that war is out of the question.

A good many of you have been saying exactly that same thing which that other gentleman from Virginia said. Do you know who he was? He was John Randolph, and what I have just read you came from his utterances in this House on March 22, 1810.

Yet two years afterwards the War of 1812 broke out, the impassable fosse was crossed by a hostile army, and before the war was over the British soldiers had applied the torch to the very Chamber where Randolph made his mad appeal to the mad vanity of his countrymen. "We can lick all creation," "Everything ready for the drop of the hat," "Trained citizenry leaping to arms"—all the well-known jargon appears in the annals, including the familiar argument that foreign nations would wear each other out and would have no strength left to challenge us.

Great Britain—

Says the Revolutionary veteran, Potter, in opposing the militia bill on March 20, 1810—

Great Britain has no men to spare to send here to invade our territory; and if she had, she would know better than to do it. And if France was ever so much disposed to send an army into this country, it would be in vain. She could not send them.

ABSOLUTELY UNPREPARED, AS USUAL.

Dawson, of Virginia, on December 13, 1811, arose in his place in this House and solemnly uttered this ghastly folly:

I feel myself authorized to state that we have all the necessaries, all the implements, all the munitions necessary for a three years' close war against any force which any power can send to this continent.

Contrast that with Dolly Madison's account a little later of our rout at Bladensburg and the burning of the White House by Ross, the British general.

Alas—

She wrote—

I can descry only groups of military wandering in all directions, as if there was a lack of arms or of spirit to fight for their own fireside.

Make no mistake, there was nothing the matter with those Pennsylvania and Virginia and Maryland militiamen whom Mistress Dolly saw, except that they had not been trained for war.

Six weeks before war was declared John C. Calhoun on May 6, 1812, told Congress:

So far from being unprepared, sir, I believe that in four weeks from the time that a declaration of war is heard on our frontiers the whole of upper and a part of lower Canada will be in our possession.

History does not record that conquest of Canada; but it records the fact that 100 days after Calhoun spoke Detroit was in the hands of the British, mostly because less than 1,000 of the trained citizenry of Ohio and Michigan sprang to the standard of Gen. Hull. Thomas Jefferson, who had written to Duane that—

The acquisition of Canada so far as Quebec will be a mere matter of marching—conveniently called this disaster "the detestable treason of Hull."

WHY NOT SUMMON GEN. WOTHERSPOON?

Ten weeks ago Maj. Gen. W. W. Wotherspoon, until recently Chief of Staff of the United States Army, wrote a solemn warning to the Secretary of War in which he gave it as his opinion that the United States is short 405,000,000 rounds of rifle ammunition, 11,210,752 rounds of artillery ammunition, and 1,982 field artillery pieces. Even with unlimited appropriations it must take several years to supply that deficiency. Gen. Wotherspoon's estimate is far higher than any ever before made in the United States; but it is founded on a knowledge of facts which the present European war has developed. Why has he not been summoned as a witness before the Military Committee, I make bold to ask? Twice publicly and once by letter I have asked Chairman HAY to summon Gen. Wotherspoon, and three times Chairman HAY has refused. In my opinion it is unmitigated folly to make up this Army bill without questioning the very witness whose testimony would be of the greatest value.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is there any other military expert in the country who has ever agreed to any of the figures given by Gen. Wotherspoon in his report?

Mr. GARDNER. So far as I know, there is only one who has disagreed and that is Gen. Crozier.

THE MEN BEHIND THE GUNS.

Now, some gentleman this morning—I think it was the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT]—said that we did not need a standing army of even half a million, much less a million, men. That is the same man of straw which President Wilson set up. Who has said anything about the necessity of a large standing army? I should like to know. Gen. Wotherspoon based his estimates on a standing army of 205,000 men. Any statement to the contrary is simply the exaggeration of persons who seek to throw dust into the eyes of the public so as to obscure the issue. Gen. Wotherspoon estimated that at the outbreak of hostilities with a great nation we ought to have a foundation of 205,000 Regulars, the total available force to be 800,000 men. His view is that we ought to have in this country about 600,000 trained militiamen or national guardsmen and reservists.

In other words, Gen. Wotherspoon feels that when war breaks out this country must be able to draw at once on 600,000 civilians who have had some military training. Adding this number of civilians to the 205,000 Regulars, we arrive at the general's estimate of an army of about 800,000 men.

Now, based on an army of 800,000 men in the early part of a war—that is, before new troops can be trained—800,000 men of more or less military experience, he estimates that an accumulation of certain kinds of munitions of war is imperatively necessary before war breaks out. On page 12 of his report as Chief of Staff United States Army, you will find Gen. Wotherspoon's figures showing what he thinks we ought to have, and likewise his figures showing what as a matter of fact we actually have got. I shall print a table prepared from his figures in connection with this speech.

RIFLE AMMUNITION.

For instance, he estimates that before war breaks out we ought to accumulate 646,000,000 rounds of rifle ammunition. Now, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] in his table this morning gives 196,000,000 rounds only as the total amount of rifle ammunition which we need to accumulate. Chairman HAY's figures are Gen. Crozier's figures. They are his personal figures, but the other officers in the War Department do not agree with Gen. Crozier. Those are not the War Department figures, never have been the War Department figures, and if Gen. Crozier gave those figures to your chairman and let him believe that they were the War Department figures, he did very wrong.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, in justice to Gen. Crozier I desire to say that he has always stated that those were his figures, and that a great many Army officers did not agree with him.

Mr. GARDNER. Did he not go further than that?

Mr. HAY. He may have gone further.

Mr. GARDNER. If the gentleman will observe his own remarks this morning, he will find that he spoke of those as the War Department figures. However, the gentleman and I agree, and Gen. Crozier admits that those are not the War Department figures. I will tell you directly what the War Department figures are. I want to put this in the RECORD.

I think the committee ought to understand—that most officers think that what we have is not enough. I believe that there are other things that are so much more pressing that I do not feel uneasy about this class of military supplies.

This is the statement of Gen. Crozier during the recent hearings—

That is the only defense for the figures in the table of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY]. The General Staff of the Army has reckoned that we need 513,430,640 rifle cartridges, not to mention some sixty million additional, if our coast-defense force is armed as Infantry. This estimate has been approved by the War Department. Gen. Wotherspoon places the figure at 646,000,000. How much have we actually got? On the 1st of July next we shall have in stock 241,000,000 rounds of rifle ammunition. The testimony of Gen. Crozier is that it would take the entire capacity of the country, public and private, eight months to manufacture 200,000,000. In order to get the proper supply which the General Board believes that we ought to have when war begins we should have to wait pretty nearly a year after war had broken out.

FIELD ARTILLERY.

Now we come down to the next item, field guns. This chart which I exhibit here shows what we have. And, mind you, we have not one single one of those giant guns to our name. You have been reading about the 42-centimeter howitzers, you have been reading about the 315-millimeter guns, and about the 9-inch guns which Gen. French has. How many of those titanic cannon do you suppose we have? Not one single, solitary one. No movable artillery bigger than a 6-inch gun in our entire military establishment and only 32 of those 6-inch howitzers. We are experimenting in drafting plans for two different sizes of bigger guns. My friends, when you look through the hearings you find that we have been doing nothing but experimenting and drafting and estimating and reporting for many a year. This remark applies to submarines and air craft just as much as it does to giant field artillery. Imagine the United States being always in the experimental stage.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I want to ask the gentleman about the quantity of rifle ammunition. How long does Gen. Wotherspoon estimate that the 646,000,000 rounds would last?

Mr. GARDNER. That is the accumulation necessary prior to the outbreak of the war. Now, as to how long it will last, that is a very difficult question to answer. If ammunition is fired at the rate it was fired at El Caney, it will last a long time. If it should be fired at the rate our troops fired in China, it will soon be exhausted. We have not very good estimates as to the length of time it would take to exhaust rifle ammunition.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Have you any estimates at all?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. HAY. Will the gentleman allow me to give him the information that we have accumulated as far as we can?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. HAY. The last great war was the Russo-Japanese. For the first six months of that war the Japanese fired 97 rounds per man, and the Russians fired 56 rounds per man. That information comes from a study of that war by the general staff of the British Army.

Mr. GARDNER. Of course Gen. Wotherspoon does not agree with the gentleman, and neither does the General Staff of the United States Army. In the attack on the Forbidden City in Peking a few years ago our troops emptied their belts in 40 minutes, which means that 100 rounds of rifle ammunition per man were fired away in less than three-quarters of an hour. On the other hand, at El Caney our troops in five hours only used up 16 rounds per man.

I am very glad that the gentleman has brought forward the Russo-Japanese War as a basis for comparison. I myself intend to instance that war for a like purpose in connection with my statements as to artillery and artillery ammunition.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Surely; but I have only a few minutes.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Is that the estimate of cartridges for 650,000 rifles?

Mr. GARDNER. That is the estimate for 642,541 rifles, according to the report of the Chief of Staff.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. On the basis of an Army of 800,000 men?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes; 205,000 Regulars and the rest reserves and militia. I can not give you the exact figures, but I will put them in the RECORD.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. I have only 50 minutes, and I can not yield unless the gentleman has something upon this point.

Mr. HOWARD. I simply want to ask the gentleman how long will it take to fire 240,000,000 rounds?

Mr. GARDNER. I have just answered that question. I said it was impossible to judge; it depends upon whether we meet conditions of warfare where there is a great deal of infantry fire or not.

FIELD ARTILLERY.

Now I come to the Field Artillery. Here is what Gen. Wotherspoon estimates that we need: Two thousands eight hundred and thirty-four artillery pieces. We have on hand and in process of manufacture only 852 pieces of artillery. Gen. Wood testified before the fortifications committee last year that the entire capacity of this country, working night and day, is 500 guns in one year.

Gen. Wotherspoon has estimated that we must accumulate 2,834 guns before war breaks out, while the General Staff of the United States Army puts the figure at 1,292 guns. How does this difference arise? Why is it that the General Staff presents one estimate and the Chief of the General Staff quite another? The reason is that the General Staff made its estimate before the European war, and it calculated about three guns to every thousand men in the field army. The war has demonstrated that European armies count on about five guns to a thousand men. On that basis of five guns to every thousand men and on the basis of an army of 800,000 instead of an army of 500,000, the number of guns requisite is increased from 1,292 to 2,834. Russia, by the way, had 6,000 guns a year ago, Germany 5,000 guns, and France 4,800 guns.

Now let us see about the Russo-Japanese War, of which the chairman spoke. How many guns do you suppose Russia had at the Battle of Mukden on the firing line? Twelve hundred and four guns Russia had on the firing line in that one battle alone. How many guns do you suppose that Japan had at the Battle of Mukden? Nine hundred and ninety-two guns. Twice as many as we can turn out in the course of a year with the Government arsenals running full blast and every other private concern in the country running as well. All these figures can be found in the evidence of Maj. Gen. Leonard Wood, former Chief of Staff, United States Army, on December 4, 1913, before the Military Affairs Committee, and December 9, 1913, before the fortifications committee.

ARTILLERY AMMUNITION.

We come now to the question of field-gun ammunition. Gen. Wotherspoon reports that we ought to accumulate 11,000,000 rounds. That seems a large amount. What is the reason for it? The General Staff before the European war estimated that we ought to accumulate 1,713,240 rounds. We have only got on hand and under manufacture 580,000 rounds. But why did Gen. Wotherspoon estimate our necessity at 11,000,000 rounds? Because of the reports from the European war. We are told that the Germans have as a reserve for each gun as many rounds as the gun will fire before becoming worthless. That amounts to about 5,000 rounds for each field gun. Very likely that is why Gen. Wotherspoon estimates 5,000 rounds for each gun instead of 1,800 rounds, which is the estimate made by the General Staff before the war. However, we should know his reasons more definitely if the committee had not refused to summon him.

Probably another reason why Gen. Wotherspoon raised his estimate to 5,000 rounds is that the report of one of our officers in Europe—Lieut. Hunsaker, I think—shows, so I am told, that a certain French battery whose operations he recently noted fired between 500 and 600 shots per gun for four days in succession. Yet the extreme output possible for the United States arsenals is only 1,800 rounds a day. At the rate of that French battery three or four guns could shoot away ammunition as fast as we could supply it.

But suppose we take Gen. Wood's old estimate before the European war of 200 rounds per day for each gun. Even then do you realize that eight guns could shoot away ammunition as fast as Uncle Sam could turn it out, working night and day? Five hundred and eighty thousand rounds for our Artillery ammunition supply! Why, Russia, in one battle alone, the Battle of Mukden, fired away 250,000 rounds—one-half of all that we have got in the whole country on hand and in the making. Yet orators say that we are prepared for war.

ARE WE BETTER PREPARED THAN EVER BEFORE?

Some of the gentlemen who oppose any expenditure of money on preparations for our national defense console themselves by the comforting thought that we are better prepared than ever before in our history. Better armed? Perhaps. More secure? Certainly not.

It may be true—in fact, it is true—that we have more reserve artillery, more reserve rifles, and more reserve ammunition than formerly; but how does that fact alone dispose of the question of our security?

Our reserves in material of war may be quite sufficient if we never pick a quarrel with any enemy more dangerous than Huerta and if we never fight a battle more bloody than the Battle of Vera Cruz in the Second Mexican War. But suppose we should meet a real enemy. The other great nations have been striding forward by furlongs, while we have been crawling along by inches, so far as military progress is concerned. Do you think that the modest increase in our reserve war material justifies the assertion that we are better prepared than ever before?

When he armed himself with a sharp umbrella Tweedledee was satisfied that he was fitter to fight than at any time of his life. So he was, for up to that time he had used his bare fists, and now he had an umbrella; but meanwhile Tweedledum had gotten himself a sword. "There's only one sword, you know," Tweedledum said to his brother; "but you can have the umbrella; it's quite as sharp." Fortunately for Tweedledee the monstrous crow prevented the battle.

AIR CRAFT.

After all, I am not so sure that we are better armed than we used to be. If a man is going blind, he is not better armed just because he gets a more accurate rifle. That is just what is happening to our Army. It is going blind. It has no eyes with which to see the enemy. "In our present condition of unpreparedness, in contact with any foe possessing a proper air service, our scouting would be blind." So says the General Board of the Navy, and that observation applies to the Army just as much.

Capt. Bristol, head of the air service of the Navy, has compiled some mighty interesting figures which he gave us in his testimony. On July 1, 1914, it appears that France had 1,400 aeroplanes and 22 dirigibles; Russia had 800 aeroplanes and 18 dirigibles, and the other great nations followed suit.

Since the aeroplane was an American invention, perhaps you think that we lead the world in aeroplanes. Well, we do not. We have 11 of them in the Army and 12 in the Navy. None of them are armored. Not more than 2 are of the same type, so it is said.

As to dirigibles, we have not a single solitary specimen, either of the Zeppelin or of any other type. What is more, we are not likely to have any Zeppelins until the American people get upon their hind legs and holler so that the Government deaf-mutes can hear. Zeppelins cost money. Each Zeppelin costs pretty nearly a cool million of dollars, and there is a deal of pretty spending in a million of dollars. Waste it on a gas balloon, indeed! No, thank you; we will be our own gas balloons and we will save that money for increased pay where the votes grow thickest. This bill gives the Army air service the magnificent sum of $300,000 this year. I hope that our airmen will feel duly grateful, but they can not buy half a Zeppelin with the whole of the money.

MORE SOLDIERS FOR THE TRENCHES.

When all is said and done, Mr. Chairman, we finally come down to certain facts: Ammunition and field guns are vital enough, but the first thing to be done is to get more men and a better organization. We do not need a big Regular Army, but we need a Regular Army a good deal bigger than we have now. Gen. Wotherspoon's estimate of 205,000 is worth examining.

I do not say that Gen. Wotherspoon is right in asking for 205,000 men. Very likely he is right, but what we need is a commission to examine into this whole question, a commission which will summon young officers and young enlisted men and say to them, "How long do you think it takes to make a good artilleryman? How long do you think it takes to make a good infantryman?" That is what I want—to find out what the younger men think about things. We ought not to base our views entirely on what these graybeards think. It stands to reason that each one of them is pretty nearly bound to defend his own department. Take, for instance, Gen. Crozier. He has been for 13 years sitting in his chair as the head of the Bureau of Ordnance. I should like to find out what the younger officers of the Bureau of Ordnance think.

THE NAVY FIRST OF ALL.

Our first line of defense, of course, must be the Navy. That stands to reason. If I had $200,000,000 extra to spend to-day on the Nation's defense, I should probably spend about $160,000,000 of it on the Navy.

But the battle fleet may be defeated or it may be engaged in defending the Panama Canal at the very moment when a hostile base is being established 2,000 miles away—that is, supposing the enemy is England, because no other nation is strong enough on the ocean to divide its fleet. If once the enemy lands and establishes a base, nothing can stop him except long lines of infantrymen in trenches.

How long a battle front do you think that our entire field Army, Regulars and Militia, could cover? On the old Civil War basis of 5,000 men to the mile, our men, if all the militia were to turn up, could cover the paltry distance of 30 miles. We have in our militia—or National Guard, as it is called—120,000 men. Of this number last year 23,000 failed to present themselves for annual inspection. Thirty-one thousand absented themselves from the annual encampment, and 44,000 of those armed with rifles—and only 111,000 are armed with rifles—44,000 never appeared on the rifle range from one year's end to the other. Talk about drawing on the citizenry and their leaping to arms! Let me tell you, gentlemen, that 16 of the States of this Union failed to supply their quota of troops in the Spanish War. Some of them only failed by a few men, but 16 of the States of this Union did not supply the entire quota which they were called upon to supply.

Now, do not tell me that an army of 200,000 Regulars is undemocratic and is likely to oppress the people. That is all demagogic rubbish. Two hundred thousand men can not oppress a country of a hundred million population. That would mean that 1 soldier could terrorize 500 people. Why, it is folly to suggest such a thing, even if the rank and file of the United States Army were willing to go into the oppressing business, which would not be the case. If anyone thinks that 1 armed soldier can terrorize 500 Americans—men, women, and children—let him now speak or forever hereafter hold his peace.

THE DOCTRINE OF HUMILITY.

O you preachers of the doctrine of national humility, if any one of you for a moment thinks that the people of this country agree with you that we ought to be undefended, I should be glad to have you accompany me on my speaking tour in March and debate the question with me on the same platform. A few minutes observation of your audiences would convince you of your mistake. I know what I am talking about, for I have already tried several experiments in that line. I am not eloquent. I have not even the sublime gift of the gab. Hitherto I have never been able to make an audience applaud me more than a small fraction of a small second. Hitherto I never in my life felt the glowing consciousness that an audience wanted me to continue. But on this question of the national defense I have got my audiences going as if I were William Jennings Bryan talking prohibition to a convention of patent medicine dealers. Never before in my life have I had applause as if my audience were paid a dollar a clap, and I confess I like the new sensation. So I just give fair warning that if any one of you pacifico Members of Congress wants to challenge me to a joint debate in the month of March before any audience—black, white, yellow, or pink—I am at your service, and you will not have to give me any gate receipts or honorarium or any other of the 57 different varieties of high-brow pickings, either.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

[From the New York Herald, Sunday, January 17, 1915.]

"NO MILLION ARMY IN NIGHT," SAYS SECRETARY GARRISON—WAR SECRETARY REPLIES TO MR. BRYAN WITH POWERFUL PLEA FOR MOBILE FORCE—"NO ALARM, BUT UNPREPAREDNESS IS DANGEROUS," HE TELLS REPUBLICAN CLUB—NEEDS 350,000 MORE MEN FOR FIRST EMERGENCY.

With the assertion that a volunteer army raised in the United States in existing conditions would be nothing more than a rabble and a mob, Lindley M. Garrison, Secretary of War, at a luncheon in the Republican Club yesterday answered the declaration of William J. Bryan, Secretary of State, that if the President called at nightfall for an army of 1,000,000 they would be ready the following morning.

Although Mr. Garrison did not at any time mention the name of the Secretary of State, his earnest plea for the upbuilding of an efficient Army reserve, the extension of military training into the universities, colleges, and military schools of the country, and the maintenance of a Navy that will be nearly as possible unconquerable was accepted by his auditors as a direct answer to Mr. Bryan's address before the Bar Association at Baltimore, Md., on December 8.

The other speakers at the luncheon were Henry L. Stimson, formerly Secretary of War; the Rev. John Haynes Holmes, an advocate of international peace; and Col. William Cary Sanger, formerly Assistant Secretary of War.

"The Army has no business in politics, and politics has no business in the Army," said Mr. Garrison, the subject of whose address was "The military needs of our country." He continued:

"There is no topic that can have a more vital importance to the people of the country than this one. What is it specifically that we should consider? All government of necessity is founded upon force. There was never a time in the history of our country when we were so well situated to sit back and give calm, deliberate consideration to this question.

"PREPAREDNESS A VITAL ISSUE.

"We have now a clear atmosphere in which to study the subject of national preparedness and then quietly, persistently, but very vigorously to carry out the program that could be and should be evolved. It is a subject that goes to the vital core of your national life.

"We Americans are a very proud people, unaggressive, coveting nothing that other people have. We think we are a peaceable people within our own confines, yet the Army of the United States has been used one hundred times putting down insurrection or riot within our own borders.

"This is not militarism that I suggest. I don't think there is a man in the country who could look you straight in the face and term it militarism. But certain things are settled in this country forever. The separation of church and State, for instance, in this country is settled forever. The civil power is forever in this country above the military, except in time of war.

"And it is in these circumstances that I come before you with all the earnestness there is in me to tell you that you must keep on considering this subject gravely and carefully and fully until you have provided for an adequate common defense.

"There is no occasion for alarm. There is no occasion for hysteria. Yet it is true that, after all the provision necessary for the proper defense of our coast line and territorial possessions have been made, there is left in the United States Army less than 25,000 men to form a mobile force, a force that may be sent from place to place to meet an invading force.

"The people are not alone to blame for this. The Federal Government has not done its part in carrying out the program that has been laid down by the Army Board. The Federal Government is from 10,000 to 12,000 men short of the necessity for supplying the required coast defense.

"REGIMENTS NOW ONLY SKELETONS.

"The militia of the country has not done more than 40 per cent of its part in carrying out that program. All of the regiments in the mobile Army of the United States are skeletonized; that is, we have in them 820 men, whereas, under war footing, they should be composed of 1,063 men. What we must understand is that the wastes of war are so great that we must have reserves.

"A great standing army is not necessary unless you are unwise enough to fail to take the other precautions that are absolutely necessary and essential. This is not the time to start some grand new scheme or system that will be investigated and under discussion so long that we will never attain it."

Mr. Garrison outlined his recent recommendations that 25,000 additional men be enlisted for service in the Army, and then continued:

"We need now 1,000 new officers, and they must be efficient officers. We have on paper 118,000 national guardsmen and 9,000 officers. Yet the National Guard is still far from what it should be. The fault is not with the National Guard. The fault is with you who have never given the subject 15 minutes' intelligent thought unless it was forced on you.

"We have not honored the national guardsmen and looked upon them as men doing a patriotic duty, but we have regarded them as men who went into the service to wear a uniform and as much gold lace as they could, and to have the girls look at them. It is time we changed our attitude.

"We have got to have material. We must have infinitely more rifles than we have men; we must have infinitely more artillery than we have, and have to have infinitely more of the other reserves that can not be made overnight.

"MUST ENLIGHTEN THE PUBLIC.

"Back of our Army and the National Guard comes the great uninformed and uninformed public of the United States. They must be taught to look upon the Army and the militia in a different light. Until you realize the Army of the United States is a public servant you have not begun to get the proper conception of the purposes or the accomplishments of the Army.

"We have an idea in this country that when a man becomes an American citizen, either by birth or by adoption, he develops into a sort of superman. You think that things don't happen to him as they happen to other allied peoples over the world. The man is not different. Because we have blundered through four or five wars we seem to think that we are possessed of a God-given inherent knowledge of the subject of war. Well, we are not.

"I believe it would be a wonderful thing if in the United States we could have the truth told in all our schools. Why should we shrink from that? I am not in favor at this time of doing anything compulsory. I don't think we'll have to do anything compulsory. You couldn't compel the American people to do anything unless you got them to thinking about it, and if we get them thinking about it they will do it themselves."

Here Mr. Garrison outlined the establishment of a reserve army after the manner suggested by him in his recent department report, by the utilization of discharged soldiers and Army officers who have resigned from the service for one cause or another. "What I want in this country," he continued, "is to be able to get a specific number of men at a specific place in a specific unit when they are needed.

"There is another thing we want. We want the universities, the colleges, and the military schools to study this subject and teach it, so that we may have, when we want them, men that are trained and are disciplined as they should be. For a first emergency in this country we would want 350,000 men more than there are men in the standing army and the National Guard to-day. When we get them they would be, in present conditions, a rabble and a mob, utterly useless unless we have got enough efficient officers to mold them into an efficient force."

SPEECH CALLS FOR CONGRATULATIONS.

During all of his speech Mr. Garrison was interrupted by applause, and for half an hour after the speaking ended he was forced to remain in the dining room receiving the congratulations of the club members.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
RECORD AND PENSION OFFICE,
Washington City, February 2, 1904.

Hon. AUGUSTUS P. GARDNER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: Referring to your letter of the 28th ultimo, received the 30th, in which you inquire what States or Territories in 1898 failed to furnish their quota of troops under the first call until after the second call was issued; what States or Territories failed to furnish their entire quota under the second call; whether any States or Territories failed to furnish, sooner or later, any part of their quota under the first call; and what were the dates of the two calls, respectively, I am directed by the Secretary of War to advise you as follows:

Under the authority conferred upon him by the joint resolution of April 20 and the act of April 22, 1898, the President issued a proclamation, dated April 23, 1898, calling for volunteers to the number of 125,000 men, to be apportioned, as far as practicable, among the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, according to population.

May 25, 1898, the President issued a proclamation calling for an additional force of 75,000 men.

I inclose herewith a table showing the quotas originally assigned to each of the States and Territories under the two calls for volunteers referred to above, also the total number of officers and men accounted for on the muster-out rolls of organizations from the respective States and Territories in service during the War with Spain.

It is impracticable to determine how many of these men were furnished under the first call and how many were furnished under the second call. Many of the men who were furnished under the later call were assigned to organizations already in service under the first call, and it can not, therefore, be assumed that all the members of a particular organization were furnished under the earlier call because that organization was furnished under that call. The number of men furnished under the second call who served in organizations furnished under the first call can not be definitely determined without an examination of the records of many thousand men.

Very respectfully,

F. C. AINSWORTH,
Chief Record and Pension Office.

Table showing quotas originally assigned to and troops furnished by the several States and Territories during the War with Spain.

States and Territories.	Quotas originally assigned.			Total number accounted for on muster-out rolls.
	Call of April 23, 1898.	Call of May 25, 1898.	Total.
Alabama	2,500	1,500	4,000	4,022
Arkansas	2,025	1,215	3,240	2,836
California	3,237	1,942	5,179	5,819
Colorado	1,324	795	2,119	1,437
Connecticut	1,607	965	2,572	3,251
Delaware	341	204	545	1,028
District of Columbia	449	270	719	990
Florida	750	450	1,200	1,350
Georgia	3,174	1,905	5,079	4,383
Idaho	239	139	378	728
Illinois	8,048	4,829	12,877	13,647
Indiana	4,302	2,581	6,883	7,423
Iowa	3,772	2,264	6,036	5,694
Kansas	2,787	1,672	4,459	5,024
Kentucky	3,408	2,045	5,453	5,614
Louisiana	1,940	1,164	3,104	2,916
Maine	1,256	753	2,009	1,893
Maryland	1,942	1,165	3,107	2,711
Massachusetts	4,721	2,834	7,555	7,113
Michigan	4,369	2,622	6,991	6,841
Minnesota	2,873	1,723	4,596	5,380
Mississippi	2,157	1,295	3,452	3,161
Missouri	5,411	3,246	8,657	8,410
Montana	537	313	850	1,132
Nebraska	2,411	1,448	3,859	4,046
Nevada	141	82	223	522
New Hampshire	752	452	1,204	1,369
New Jersey	2,962	1,778	4,740	5,501
New York	12,514	7,508	20,022	20,864
North Carolina	2,584	1,551	4,135	3,961
North Dakota	473	276	749	719
Ohio	7,248	4,348	11,596	14,255
Oregon	829	498	1,327	1,570
Pennsylvania	10,769	6,462	17,231	17,448
Rhode Island	710	426	1,136	1,654
South Carolina	1,850	1,110	2,960	2,618
South Dakota	766	449	1,215	1,134
Tennessee	3,060	1,836	4,896	6,266
Texas	4,229	2,538	6,767	6,765
Utah	434	255	689	578
Vermont	634	379	1,013	1,044
Virginia	2,787	1,672	4,459	5,223
Washington	1,178	708	1,886	1,854
West Virginia	1,389	834	2,223	2,694
Wisconsin	3,274	1,965	5,239	5,453
Wyoming	235	138	373	476
Arizona, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Indian Territory	858	396	1,254	1,315
Total	125,256	75,000	200,256	[1] 210,137

[1] This does not include general officers and staff and United States Volun teers.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., November 15, 1914.

To the PRESIDENT.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following report of the operations of this department during the past year:

The reports of the Chief of Staff and the Chief of Coast Artillery; the reports of the heads of bureaus of the War Department; the reports of the Superintendent of the Military Academy, of the governor of Porto Rico, of the governor of the Panama Canal, of the commissioners of the four military parks, all of which accompany this report, give in abundant detail all of the transactions and recommendations in their respective spheres. I have reached the conclusion that it is useless repetition to follow the practice of repeating in my report the details so much more fully dealt with in the respective reports above referred to.

In these reports there are certain things of great interest and importance which should be specially noted, among them—

That the health of the Army has been exceptionally good. The last year has afforded the lowest recorded noneffective rate in the history of the Army; a reduction of nearly 20 per cent in noneefficiency from sickness and injury has resulted. There were only four cases of typhoid fever in the Army, including the Philippine Scouts. Two of these were cases of recruits of four and five days' service, respectively, who had not been immunized. Venereal diseases have decreased about 25 per cent. The rate for alcoholism is the lowest since 1873. The health of troops in camps over a long period of time has been extraordinarly good on account of the high efficiency of camp sanitation.

That the system of disciplinary companies which has been established bids fair to be very successful.

That a large part of the Army has been occupied in actual field service at Galveston, Vera Cruz, all along the Mexican border, and in Colorado and Arkansas. The character of this duty in each instance was similar and was of an exceedingly difficult kind, in some respects even more difficult than actual warfare. It called for patience, self-control, discretion, and good judgment under very trying conditions, and required implicit obedience to orders—a prime military necessity. The fact that this duty was everywhere done in an exceptional manner and without untoward incident is gratifying in the highest degree and deserves recognition as difficult service extremely well rendered. Of a somewhat similar character was the work carried on in Europe by the officers sent over to aid the Americans marooned there because of the European war. Their service was done in a manner to reflect credit on themselves and the Army, and it is reckoned as of similar high character to that just mentioned.

The student camps were very successful and bid fair to be more so, and undoubtedly can and should be developed into a most valuable assistance.

At the session of Congress just closed the bill to provide for raising volunteers was passed. It is, of course, possible and probable that in minor details some slight corrections may have to be made therein, but on the whole it is probably the most important piece of military legislation which has been dealt with by Congress for many years past.

I am pleased to note that there has been a decrease in the number and percentage of desertions.

With respect to matters which do not relate to the military establishment as such, certain developments of importance occurred during the past year.

The matter of the proper handling of dams built in navigable streams by private capital, and the regulation of water power developed thereat and also at dams built by the Government itself, received careful and continued consideration at my hands, and, in cooperation with committees of Congress, a bill to deal with this subject was prepared. The House of Representatives passed a bill, and it is understood that the Senate at the coming session intends to take the same up with the determination of completing the legislation. The matter is one of supreme importance and should be speedily settled.

The matter of providing a more autonomous and better balanced government in Porto Rico received like consideration, and a bill for that purpose is being dealt with by the committees of each House.

A bill to extend the scope of self-government in the Philippine Islands was likewise given much consideration by the department, and the House has passed a measure, and it is now before the Senate, and there is every indication that it purposes having it considered by the proper committee with a view to passage at the coming session.

A complete organization of the government of the Panama Canal was prepared and put into effect on the 1st day of April, 1914.

For the purpose of enabling those who are interested to ascertain the various activities of the department I have annexed a table Appendix A, by reference to which it can be immediately learned in what reports a detailed discussion of various subjects can be found.

At the end of this report will be found Appendix B, containing a statement of the expenditures, appropriations, and estimates.

This, then, leaves for consideration the imminent questions of military policy; the considerations which, in my view, should be taken into account in determining the same; and the suggestions which occur to me to be pertinent in the circumstances.

It would be premature to attempt now to draw the ultimate lessons from the war in Europe. It is an imperative duty, however, to heed so much of what it brings home to us as is incontrovertible and not to be changed by any event, leaving for later and more detailed and comprehensive consideration what its later developments and final conclusions may indicate.

For orderly treatment certain preliminary considerations may be usefully adverted to. It is, of course, not necessary to dwell on the blessings of peace and the horrors of war. Everyone desires peace, just as everyone desires health, contentment, affection, sufficient means for comfortable existence, and other similarly beneficent things. But peace and the other states of being just mentioned are not always or even often solely within one's own control. Those who are thoughtful and have courage face the facts of life, take lessons from experience, and strive by wise conduct to attain the desirable things, and by provision and precaution to protect and defend them when obtained. It may truthfully be said that eternal vigilance is the price which must be paid in order to obtain the desirable things of life and to defend them.

In collective affairs the interests of the group are confided to the Government, and it thereupon is charged with the duty to preserve and defend these things. The Government must exercise for the Nation the precautionary, defensive, and preservative measures necessary to that end. All Governments must therefore have force—physical force, i. e., military force—for these purposes. The question for each nation when this matter is under consideration is, How much force should it have and of what should that force consist?

In the early history of our Nation there was a natural, almost inevitable, abhorrence of military force, because it connoted military despotism. Most, if not all, of the early settlers in this country came from nations where a few powerful persons tyrannically imposed their will upon the people by means of military power. The consequence was that the oppressed who fled to this country necessarily connected military force with despotism, and had a dread thereof. Of course all this has long since passed into history. No reasonable person in this country to-day has the slightest shadow of fear of military despotism, nor of any interference whatever by military force in the conduct of civil affairs. The military and the civil are just as completely and permanently separated in this country as the church and the state are; the subjection of the military to the civil is settled and unchangeable. The only reason for adverting to the obsolete condition is to anticipate the action of those who will cite from the works of the founders of the Republic excerpts showing a dread of military ascendancy in our Government. Undoubtedly at the time such sentiments were expressed there was a very real dread. At the present time such expressions are entirely inapplicable and do not furnish even a presentable pretext for opposing proper military preparation.

It also seems proper, in passing, to refer to the frame of mind of those who use the word "militarism" as the embodiment of the doctrine of brute force and loosely apply it to any organized preparation of military force, and therefore deprecate any adequate military preparation because it is a step in the direction of the contemned "militarism." It is perfectly apparent to anyone who approaches the matter with an unprejudiced mind that what constitutes undesirable militarism, as distinguished from a necessary, proper, and adequate preparation of the military resources of the Nation, depends upon the position in which each nation finds itself and varies with every nation and with different conditions in each nation at different times. Every nation must have adequate force to protect itself from domestic insurrections, to enforce its laws, and to repel invasions; that is, every nation that has similar characteristics to those of a self-respecting man. (The Constitution obliges the United States to protect each State against invasion.) If it prepares and maintains more military force than is necessary for the purposes just named, then it is subject to the conviction, in the public opinion of the world, of having embraced "militarism," unless it intends aggression for a cause which the public opinion of the world conceives to be a righteous one. To the extent, however, that it confines its military preparedness to the purposes first mentioned, there is neither warrant nor justification in characterizing such action as "militarism." Those who would thus characterize it do so because they have reached the conclusion that a nation to-day can properly dispense with a prepared military force, and therefore they apply the word to any preparation or organization of the military resources of the nation. Not being able to conceive how a reasonable, prudent, patriotic man can reach such a conclusion, I can not conceive any arguments or statements that would alter such a state of mind. It disregards all known facts, flies in the face of all experience, and must rest upon faith in that which has not yet been made manifest.

Equally useless, in my view, is the discussion frequently indulged in as to whether military preparation tends or does not tend to avoid war. I term such discussion useless, because, so far as we are concerned, whatever conclusion might be reached thereon would not affect our duty. Since it is not in mind to suggest any military preparation of the Nation's resources beyond that absolutely essential under existing conditions, the question of whether more extensive preparation for the purpose of avoiding war would have that effect or not is futile. Unless this Nation has reached the conclusion that it has no need for the preparation of its military resources for the purposes I have above enumerated, then we must earnestly address ourselves to the question of such proper preparation. I have reached no such conclusion, and in fact am of the firm conviction that no reasonable, prudent man who faces facts could reach such a conclusion. Unless and until the Congress of the United States, representing the people of the country, places on record the conclusion of the people to the contrary, my duty is, I think, entirely clear; and that duty is to set forth the facts and the necessities growing out of the facts and suggestions as to the ways and means of fulfilling such necessities.

Whatever the future may hold in the way of agreements between nations, followed by actual disarmament thereof, of international courts of arbitration, and other greatly to be desired measures to lessen or prevent conflict between nation and nation, we all know that at present these conditions are not existing. We can and will eagerly adapt ourselves to each beneficent development along these lines; but to merely enfeeble ourselves in the meantime would, in my view, be unthinkable folly. By neglecting and refusing to provide ourselves with the necessary means of self-protection and self-defense we could not hasten or in any way favorably influence the ultimate results we desire in these respects.

What, then, does this Nation need in the way of military preparedness? Of course I am not attempting to lay down a counsel of perfection—that is, an extensive scheme which is ideal in its completeness. Such a scheme might well be considered and studied and adopted after long study. But to await the result of such a course would be to continue the undesirable situation in which we have so long been. In my view, it is much better to do those things which lie nearest at hand and can be done than to remain as we are, without moving along proper lines until a more comprehensive and perfect scheme can be agreed upon. Nothing done along the lines I am about to suggest will interfere with the carrying out of a more comprehensive and maturely developed plan, but, on the contrary, will fit into it exactly.

Let us approach the question by a brief consideration of certain facts necessary to be considered in reaching a proper conclusion:

In continental United States we have a territory consisting of 3,026,789 square miles, with a population of 98,781,324. In Alaska we have 590,884 square miles, with a population of 64,356. Our other territorial responsibilities which must be considered are: The Panama Canal, where, although the population is small, we have an investment of $400,000,000, and the destruction of which waterway would be an international calamity; Hawaii, with 6,449 square miles and a population of 191,909; Porto Rico, with 3,606 square miles and a population of 1,118,012; the Philippine Islands, with 127,800 square miles and a population of 7,635,426, together with certain other islands not necessary to be considered in this connection.

The Regular Army of the United States on June 30, 1914, consisted of 4,701 officers and 87,781 men (includes Quartermaster Corps, 3,809, and Hospital Corps, 4,055). Of these, 758 officers and 17,901 men belong to the Coast Artillery, and are therefore practically stationary in coast defenses; 1,008 officers and 18,434 men belong to the staff, technical and noncombatant branches of the Army, including recruits and men engaged in recruiting. This leaves the Army which can be moved from place to place—that is, the mobile army, so called—composed of 2,935 officers and 51,446 men.

At that time the various characters of troops were disposed of approximately as follows:

In the Philippines, 3½ regiments Infantry, 2 regiments Cavalry, 1 regiment Field Artillery, 2 companies Engineers, 11 companies Coast Artillery (aggregate strength, 9,572). In the Hawaiian Islands, 3 regiments Infantry, 1 regiment Cavalry, 1 regiment Field Artillery, 1 company Engineers, 8 companies Coast Artillery (aggregate strength, 8,195). In the Canal Zone, 1 regiment Infantry, 3 companies Coast Artillery (aggregate strength, 2,179). In China, 2 battalions Infantry (aggregate strength, 849). In Alaska, 1 regiment Infantry (aggregate strength, 862). In Vera Cruz, 4 regiments Infantry, 2 troops Cavalry, 1 battalion Field Artillery, 1 company Engineers (aggregate strength, 4,090). In Porto Rico, a 2-battalion regiment Infantry (strength, 707). In United States, 17 regiments Infantry, 11½ regiments Cavalry, 3½ regiments Field Artillery, 2 battalions Engineers, 148 companies Coast Artillery (aggregate strength, 64,579). Troops en route and officers at other foreign stations, 1,449.

Practically all these organizations in the United States are on what is known as a peace footing, which means that an Infantry company, which upon a war footing should have 150 men, now has 65 men; a Cavalry troop, which upon a war footing should have 100 men, now has 71 men; an Artillery battery, which upon a war footing should have 190 men, now has 133 men. The Coast Artillery companies are always kept on a war footing of 104 men each.

In addition to work with the troops themselves, the officers of the Army are called upon to do a great variety of work known as detached service. For instance, the Engineers have 66 officers detached for river and harbor work, and the other branches of the Army have 578 officers of the line detached for service in training the Organized Militia of the several States, on duty at schools, recruiting, etc.

As a result, scarcely any unit in the Army ever has its proper complement of officers, and the need for an increase of officers is urgent and imperative. In continental United States we had in the mobile army on June 30, 1914, 1,495 officers and 29,405 men.

We have a reserve—that is, men who have been trained in the Army and under the terms of their enlistment are subject to be called back to the colors in time of war—consisting of 16 men.

The Organized Militia of the various States totals 8,323 officers and 119,087 men. The enlisted men thereof are required, in order to obtain the financial aid which the Congress authorizes the Secretary of War to extend under certain conditions, to attend 24 drills a year and five days annually in the field. If all of the National Guard could be summoned in the event of war and should all respond—an inconceivable result—and if they were all found fairly efficient in the first line—that is, the troops who would be expected to immediately take the field—we could summon a force in this country of Regulars and National Guard amounting to 9,818 officers and 148,492 men.

And this is absolutely all. The only other recourse would then be volunteers; and to equip, organize, train, and make them ready would take, at the smallest possible estimate, six months.

Anyone who takes the slightest trouble to investigate will find that in modern warfare a prepared enemy would progress so far on the way to success in six months, if his antagonist had to wait six months to meet him, that such unprepared antagonist might as well concede defeat without contest.

With respect to reserve matériel, one or two obvious things had perhaps better be stated. This matériel, of course, can not be quickly improvised. It requires long periods of time to produce; it is the absolute essential of modern warfare, and must be kept on hand if emergencies are to be prepared for. We have on hand in reserve sufficient small arms, small-arm ammunition, and equipment, roughly figuring, for the 500,000 men that would have to be called into the field in any large emergency. We have nothing like sufficient artillery and artillery ammunition. This has been urgently presented in all of the recent reports of the head of this department and the Chiefs of Staff, and Congress has from time to time recently increased the appropriations for these purposes. There is universal agreement among all who know that artillery is an essential feature of modern warfare, and that a proper proportion thereof to any army is indispensable if success is to be even hoped for. It is imperative that the manufacture of artillery and artillery ammunition should progress as rapidly as is possible until a proper reserve thereof has been obtained.

In present-day strategy and tactics the Aviation Corps has bid fair to become the eyes of the Army, and a general commanding an army without an adequate flying corps against an army of equal strength in other respects but with an adequate flying corps would be in the position of a blind man contending against a man with sight. The present Congress made a good start toward putting aviation on a substantial basis. This work should be followed up and consistently pressed.

The universal utilization of motor transportation in the present war has vastly increased the mobility of armies. It is necessary that we keep abreast of the times in utilizing motor vehicles for Army transportation. It might be well worth while to devise ways and means of organizing into a volunteer motor transportation reserve the motor vehicles adaptable to military use now in the hands of private citizens.

We now come to the question of what, then, should we presently do, in view of the existing conditions and considerations. That we are below any proper standard or minimum in this respect is conceded. I have adverted briefly, in what I have heretofore said, to our situation in this regard concerning matériel. I have not, of course, burdened this report with the details. The reports of the Chiefs of Staff and of Ordnance go into this matter with particularity.

We will therefore next address ourselves to personnel.

The first question is whether the proper remedy is to so largely increase the standing Army as to constantly have under arms a military force of sufficient size to meet our contemplated needs. What shall be concluded in this respect after the mature and comprehensive study which I have suggested should be made of the subject must, of course, be left for the present. Following the lines that I have laid down for myself, which are to deal now only with those things which clearly should be done now, I do not advocate any such considerable increase as would probably result from the comprehensive study suggested.

For the purpose of information the following table is presented showing the area, population, and military resources on a peace and war footing of other nations in comparison with ours:

	Land forces of various countries.
	Area (square miles).	Population.	Peace strength.	Total trained war strength.
Germany	208,830	64,903,423	620,000	4,000,000
France	207,054	38,961,945	560,000	3,000,000
Russia	8,647,657	160,095,200	1,200,000	4,500,000
Great Britain and colonies	11,467,294	396,294,752	254,500	[1] 800,000
Italy	110,550	32,475,253	275,000	1,200,000
Austria-Hungary	261,035	49,418,596	360,000	2,000,000
Japan	147,655	53,875,390	230,000	1,200,000
Turkey	1,186,874	35,764,876	420,000	1,200,000
Spain	194,783	19,503,008	115,000	300,000
Switzerland	15,976	3,741,971	140,000	275,000
Sweden	172,876	5,476,441	75,000	400,000
Belgium	11,373	7,074,910	42,000	180,000
United States (including Philippine Scouts)	3,026,789	98,781,324	97,760	[2] 225,170

[1] Excluding native army, 160,000.
[2] Including Organized Militia and Philippine Scouts.

Whatever else may properly be drawn from the facts as disclosed, it can not be disputed that it is imperative that we have in this country a very much larger percentage of men who have had proper military training and who are in a position to instantly respond to the call of the Nation. Of the troops that we now have, the numbers and organizations of which are shown above, it will be necessary in the very near future to take from the United States and put in the Philippine Islands 13 companies of Coast Artillery, 1,950 men; in the Hawaiian Islands, 3 regiments of Infantry, 1 battalion of Field Artillery, and 2 companies of Coast Artillery, 6,380 men; and in the Panama Canal Zone, 1 regiment of Infantry, 1 squadron of Cavalry, 1 battalion of Field Artillery, 1 company of Engineers, and 12 companies of Coast

Artillery, 4,774 men. I may say in this connection that I do not consider the Panama Canal Zone garrison sufficient, even when these contemplated additions are made. This will then leave in the United States proper 12,610 Coast Artillery troops and 24,602 of the mobile arm, the latter being then not much more than twice the size of the police force of the city of New York.

My recommendation of what we should immediately do is to fill up the existing organizations which compose the aggregate mobile Army force just mentioned to their full strength. This would require 25,000 men. In addition to the enlisted men just mentioned, we should be authorized to obtain 1,000 more officers. The legislation to accomplish these purposes would be of the very simplest character, being merely authorizations to the department to do these things.

On June 30, 1914, 20.43 per cent of the line officers of the Army were away from their commands. This results in depleting the proper quota of instructors in the Army. The instruction of the Organized Militia suffers woefully from the lack of officers available for service with the militia. Efficient officers, above all things, can not be improvised. Depending, as we are, upon a small regular force, and contemplating a large expansion in time of war, it is essential that we at least should not permit the number of officers to fall below that number which is absolutely requisite for the proper performance of current military duties.

An increase of the enlisted personnel of the Army by 25,000 men would accomplish threefold results. It would, as before mentioned, bring up to full strength the existing units of the mobile Army in continental United States and thus supply a more adequate force. Second, it would afford training for the officers in the command of such units as they must command in time of war and would prevent, as far as the Regular Army is concerned, the crowding of the ranks with raw levies which always disorganize and render inefficient the organizations into which they come. Third, it would be a wise investment from the standpoint of economy, in that no material increase of overhead charges would be necessary, and the addition of these men could be effected at a per capita cost to the Government of about one-third the per capita cost under existing conditions. Since the existing physical plant and the administrative organizaton would not have to be in any way increased to take care of this increased force, the only additional expense would be the clothing, feeding, and paying thereof.

By the time these 25,000 men could be procured the mobile forces in the United States, as hereinbefore pointed out, would number 24,602; so that after the addition the mobile Army in continental United States would consist of 49,602 men.

With the Army thus increased, we would then be able to undertake the next necessity, which is absolutely imperative, and that is the preparation of a reserve. The present legislation with respect to a reserve has proven utterly useless for the purpose, it having produced in 24 months only 16 men, and there is little or no hope that it will ever properly accomplish its purpose. The reasons why it will not do so it is not profitable to discuss.

Again, without attempting to wait until perfection has been reached, it seems to me that it is only the part of wisdom to do that which we know will produce a beneficial result, and one that approximates the best. I am firmly convinced that if we can use the standing Army as a school through which to pass men who come into it, with the knowledge that if they are proficient they can be discharged at any time after a year or 18 months, we will begin at once to build up the necessary reserve, and will, for the first time in the military history of this country, have something approximating a balanced organization. There is unfortunately opposition to this policy. I say "unfortunately" because it is always the part of wisdom, it seems to me, to select the best that is possible, out of what is obtainable, rather than to reject that obtainable best because it is not perfection. Some of the opposition is on economical grounds, and, in my view, should not be determinative if the other considerations that I have noted are true. Other of the opposition is based upon the idea that one year or 18 months is not sufficient to train a soldier. As to this, it is a curious exhibition of mental operations to realize that those who make this argument and who have to acknowledge that without reserves we must depend upon volunteers, are constantly asserting that we can safely rely upon volunteers because they can be thoroughly trained in six months. It is furthermore true that by intensive military training, any young man of good health and average mentality can be made a serviceable soldier in 12 months, and, in fact, has been so made. This has been tried abroad, and I have caused it to be tried under my own administration and inspection. Even if there were doubt about it, it would not cause a different conclusion to be reached by a reasonable man, because we certainly would be better off with a reserve of men who had had one year's training than we are without any reserve at all and having to depend, as we do, upon men who have never had any training whatever. I caused, about a year ago, recruits, as they came in, and without selection, to be organized into a battery of Artillery, a troop of Cavalry, and a company of Infantry; and from my own observation and from the reports of experts, each of these units, well within a year, was found proficient to a very high degree.

I am therefore firmly convinced that we should have immediate legislation dealing with the matter of enlistment and reserve. I am not so much concerned with the length of the enlistment, provided the Secretary of War is given power to discharge into the reserve, at the end of 12 months, those who have shown themselves proficient up to a required standard.

A practically similar provision should exist in every State which maintains an Organized Militia. It is just as essential that the Organized Militia should have a proper reserve to fill up its ranks as it is that the Regular Army should. Of course I have been viewing this in the light of its military necessity. But there is a concomitant advantage which should not be overlooked. Inquiry among those who have employed men who have been discharged with good records from the Army shows that they esteem them as among their very best employees; and there is no doubt that any community would be economically benefited by the presence in it of strong, vigorous young men who have learned, in the only school which really teaches—that is, experience—the qualities of self-control, obedience to discipline, and determination to carry out the task which has been set for one.

I am convinced with equal firmness that we should adopt some one or more of the methods which have been suggested for the training of more civilians to become officers in case of necessity. The potentiality of the student military camps and of the schools and colleges at which military training is obtainable suggests a fruitful source of accomplishing this purpose.

I realize that one of the matters which will be much debated in connection with this whole subject will be the matter of expense. I do not overlook this, but shall not attempt extensively to go into it here. I do think, however, that those who are charged with responsibility on behalf of the public should realize the greatness of that responsibility; should realize the unanswerable indictment that will lie against them if they shrink from incurring expense for what is vital to the Nation. When one has reached the conclusion, as I have, that a minimum of military preparedness is essential, the question of its cost is secondary and can not be permitted to be the determining factor. No citizen will or can properly object to the expenditure of money for vital national purposes.

Comparisons between costs of military establishments here and abroad will not result, as they usually do, in assuming an unwarranted expenditure for those purposes here, if the factors necessary to be considered are kept in mind. Briefly, these factors are: The vast distances in this country; the smallness of the number of our troops, which makes it necessary to move them from place to place when troops are required; the upkeep of numerous posts in various States; and the absolute demand of the American citizen, whether in private or public life, that he should be fed, clothed, and compensated in a manner unexampled in any other country in the world. Money appropriated for military purposes is not diverted therefrom, is not wasted in the sense that it is not expended for purposes for which it is appropriated, and a dollar's worth of value is obtained for a dollar's worth of expenditure. The size of the appropriation is governed by the considerations above mentioned; and so long as the American citizen insists upon living up to a certain standard himself and concedes that his public servants should have the right to live up to that standard, there should be, and I am convinced will be, no grumbling at the necessary expense involved.

It is a pleasure to be able to turn from a consideration of what we need to a realization of what we already have. While our existing organization is of the exceeding small numbers already mentioned, it is unquestionably in as excellent condition as any similar number of men in any other military establishment in the world. Were it not for a desire to avoid invidious comparisons I should say that, man for man, it is better than any similar existing military establishment in the world. I do not believe that anyone will dispute the statement that the Army has never been in better condition than it is to-day, from the most recently enlisted man up to the highest officers. There is an esprit de corps, an eagerness to constantly strive toward perfection, a willingness to undertake and satisfactorily perform any and every duty, that is most commendable and encouraging. If we are authorized to use this exceedingly valuable nucleus to produce the reserve needed, there never was a time when the experiment had so great a chance of success as now. Both the enlisted personnel and the officers furnish a school of unexampled excellence for just such work.

LINDLEY M. GARRISON,
Secretary of War.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I have some hesitancy in speaking in answer, as it were, to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], because I feel that everything he said is based upon an assumption and that he is more or less a victim of dreams and visions which, in my judgment, will never become facts.

It is true, and I have never denied it, nor have I ever claimed, that this country was in such a state of preparedness for war, that if one of the first-class powers of Europe were to land all her forces upon the shores of this country at one time, and immediately after war was declared, we were ready to meet such a condition as that. But that is the condition which the gentleman from Massachusetts talks about, and it is a condition which never can arise. [Applause.]

I say, without fear of contradiction, that we are pursuing a reasonable and prudent course, so far as the Committee on Military Affairs is concerned, in order that this country may be prudently and reasonably prepared for any emergency which may arise. [Applause.] The time has never been since I have been on the Committee on Military Affairs, except for two years, when we have not appropriated money for material of war to put in our reserve, and we have done it upon the advice of the War Department, upon the advice of boards in the War Department, which are responsible, and who know, as far as anybody can know, what we ought reasonably to do in order to be reasonably prepared.

The gentleman from Massachusetts has laid much stress upon the report of Gen. Wotherspoon, the late Chief of Staff, and then he talks about not wanting to take the advice of graybeards, when this man has been retired for age and is no longer on the active list of the United States Army.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I will.

Mr. KAHN. Is it not a fact that it has developed in the European war now going on that all of the great generals are virtually of the age at which we retire our officers?

Mr. HAY. That is true. I want to say in the matter of Gen. Wotherspoon, that he is a bold man to undertake before the European war is ended, before our observers there can be properly informed of the conditions that now exist, before they can report the results of their observations to our War Department and to this Congress, to say how much ammunition we ought to have or how many troops we ought to have in order to meet a supposititious condition which may arise, if we have a war with a first-class European power. Mr. Chairman, there is no prospect of any such thing. To-day the United States is safer from attack than she has ever been in her history. [Applause.]

How people can claim that those great nations which are now at war, which are exhausting themselves financially and physically, as soon as that war is over, are going to turn around and attack the strongest nation on earth, is beyond my comprehension. [Applause.] Why, Mr. Chairman, the United States has a latent power greater than that of any other country or of any other three countries in the civilized world. It is now maintaining peace with all the world. That is the policy of the country—not only of the administration, but of the entire country. Nobody wants war. We are not going to do anything to bring about war, and all this talk of our not being prepared for war, and of conditions having arisen in Europe which make it necessary for us to go into large military expenditures, at the expense of building up the peaceful arts in this country, at the expense of our harbors, of our public buildings, of our roads, and of all the other activities which ought to engage our attention, is, to my mind, a most unfortunate position for gentlemen to take. [Applause.]

I have always been in favor of a reasonable and prudent course in getting ready for any emergency which may possibly arise. But I am utterly opposed to a large standing Army. [Applause.] I am utterly opposed to adding a single man to the standing Army as it now exists. I am not in sympathy with those who want to add 25,000 men and 1,000 officers to the Regular Army now. What would that cost? It would cost $27,000,000 alone, just that, and would add to our military expenditures $27,000,000 a year. There are other ways for building up the national defense than by increasing the Regular Army.

I want to call attention to some statements made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], and made by gentlemen from other quarters, as to how many enlisted men we will have in this country with the Army which we now have.

I have here figures taken from a statement of the Adjutant General, showing the number of enlisted men and where they are stationed. We had on January 5, 1915, exclusive of Philippine Scouts, 91,904 enlisted men. If you will deduct from that number the Hospital and Quartermaster Corps, which are not composed of fighting men, numbering 8,030, you have 83,873 enlisted men. If you will deduct from that number 18,092 in the Coast Artillery Corps, you have in the mobile army 65,781 men.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. HAY. I will.

Mr. GARDNER. Has not the gentleman omitted 9,572 in the Philippines?

Mr. HAY. Just wait a minute until I get to that. The gentleman need not be afraid that I am not going to be frank with the House. We have in the Philippines 9,859 men; in Panama, 3,149; in Hawaii, 7,351; in China, 674; and in Alaska, 488. That is what we have.

I will give you now what the Secretary of War says we ought to have.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HAY. I will.

Mr. GARDNER. The Secretary of War, on page 8 of his report, says in continental United States we had in the mobile army on June 30, 1914, 1,495 officers and 29,405 men. That is on the eighth page of his report, in the fourth line.

Mr. HAY. Well, Mr. Chairman, I am taking a statement of the Adjutant General of the Army on the 5th day of this month, and I am not bound by the report of the Secretary of War or anybody else.

The Secretary of War states that there are in the Philippines now 9,859 men. The Secretary of War in his hearing before the Committee on Military Affairs on December 16, 1913—about a year ago—when asked the question how many men it was necessary to have at Panama and in Hawaii, stated that it was necessary to have at Panama 8,305 men and in Hawaii 15,665; and we have in China 674 and in Alaska 488. And thus we would have out of the country 34,991 men, and we would have for the mobile army in continental United States 30,790 men—5,000 more than we had before the Spanish-American War.

I want to ask gentlemen why do we need any more men than that in continental United States? What are we going to do with them? If we are going to undertake to maintain a standing army of sufficient size to cope with the standing armies of first-class powers in Europe, why, then the army of 100,000 or the 200,000 mentioned by Gen. Wotherspoon amounts to nothing. If you are going to enter upon a policy which will entail upon this country an army large enough to cope with the armies of Europe, you can not maintain here less than 600,000 men, a standing army of that number; and that, gentlemen, will cost this country not less than $700,000,000 a year, unless you go to the system of compulsory military service and compel every man in the United States of military age to give service in the Army, as they do in continental Europe. That is the alternative. There is no middle way between a small standing army and a large standing army.

Now, besides those 30,790 men which we already have, the President, if he saw fit to do so, could authorize 10,729 more men. But the President of the United States did not think it necessary to estimate to this Congress for the full strength of the Army which is authorized by law, which is 100,000 men. He saw fit only to estimate for the figures that I am giving you. He has the power to estimate for 100,000 men. He did not do it. He did not think it necessary to do so.

And so, my friends, I do not see why it is necessary to be alarmed at this situation, when the President does not think it is necessary to estimate even for the Army which the law authorizes him to estimate for.

Now, let us take up the proposition of ammunition, which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] dwelt upon. He has made much of the rounds of small-arms ammunition. We have 196,000,000 in reserve; and I want to call attention to this fact, that when you undertake to have a large amount of ammunition in reserve, like 646,000,000 rounds, as recommended by Gen. Wotherspoon, you forget that half of that ammunition when war came on would be utterly worthless, because it would have been kept so long in stock that it would either not be fit for use or would be so uncertain that we could not safely depend upon it.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I will.

Mr. GARDNER. Would it not be possible to use a large part of that for target practice for our militia?

Mr. HAY. No, sir; it would be utterly impossible to use any large quantity of it for that purpose if we had it in reserve.

Mr. GARDNER. If it was going bad, but before it went bad.

Mr. HAY. Gen. Wotherspoon says we ought to have 646,000,000. That is his opinion. Gen. Crozier thinks we ought to have 196,000,000. That is his opinion, and I am willing to put the opinion of Gen. Crozier against the opinion of Gen. Wotherspoon. That would furnish every rifle in an army of 500,000 men with 340 rounds.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. COX. How soon does that rifle ammunition begin to deteriorate?

Mr. HAY. In about four or five years, although I will not give that as an expert opinion.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. How much time have I consumed, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 15 minutes.

Mr. HAY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARDNER. I call the gentleman's attention to the hearings last year:

The CHAIRMAN—

That is the gentleman now speaking, said to Gen. Crozier—

I remember you said a year ago that you thought you were the only person who thought 180,000,000 was sufficient.

Gen. CROZIER. That is a fact.

Mr. HAY. Very well. I have not denied that. I just said that I was willing to take Gen. Crozier's opinion against Gen. Wotherspoon's opinion. But I was going on to say that 196,000,000 rounds in reserve—and, mind you, this is in reserve—will furnish an army of 450,000 men with 340 rounds per man. I have just stated that in the Russo-Japanese War, in the first six months of that war, when they had about 200,000 men on each side, the Japanese during that six months only fired 97 rounds to a man, and the Russians only fired 56 rounds per man.

But, gentlemen, our capacity for making this small-arms ammunition is very great. The capacity of this country to-day is 1,000,000 rounds per day, and if we were to get into a war that capacity would necessarily be very largely increased. So I think that we are reasonably prepared in small-arms ammunition.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. HAY. I will yield for a question. I will not yield to read from the hearings.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman says our capacity is a million rounds a day. Is not the evidence of Gen. Crozier that you could not begin to get that until two months had gone by, and that it would take six months to duplicate the 196,000,000 rounds?

Mr. HAY. I make the statement upon my own responsibility that to-day the country has a capacity to turn out a million rounds a day.

Mr. GARDNER. Gen. Crozier says otherwise.

Mr. HAY. I do not care what Gen. Crozier says. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I happen to have inquired into this matter, and I find that owing to the European war our manufacturers of small-arms ammunition have increased their capacity, so that to-day we are turning out a million rounds of ammunition a day, or could do it if we desired to do it. Now, that is all about that.

We have on hand 700,000 service rifles of the new model, and we have on hand about 300,000 of the Krag-Jörgensen, making a million rifles on hand. And, gentlemen, when we come to store up these large reserves we must remember that these models change, that they are improved, and that it would be folly for us to lay up too large a reserve; because, take the Krag-Jorgensen, for instance, that was for a while the rifle which the Ordnance Department adopted. Then they found that they could do better with the new service rifle, and they abandoned the manufacture of the Krag-Jörgensen and began the manufacture of the service rifle. If somebody were to come along with a better rifle than the present service rifle, we would be derelict in our duty if we did not accept a better rifle and manufacture that.

In talking about these reserves it is necessary to bear in mind that things become obsolete, and that we ought not to throw away large sums of money upon things which may become obsolete. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We have in reserve 65,000 pistols. We have 1,000 machine guns, and it is said that we ought to have 1,361, so that we have very nearly what the War Department says we ought to have.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Thirteen hundred and sixty-one guns for what size army?

Mr. HAY. An army of 450,000 or 500,000 men. We have field artillery guns, 634, and appropriated for, 226, and in this bill 52 more will be appropriated for, making 912. Gen. Wood, who can not be charged with wishing not to have enough, says that we need 1,292, so that we are within 370 guns for an army of 500,000 men.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Was not that an estimate made before the war?

Mr. HAY. It was; and if the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit, it seems to me that if it was made before the war it would not be as large as it is now.

Mr. GARDNER. What, for artillery?

Mr. HAY. Yes; because there is not as much danger now as there was before the war. [Applause.] The gentleman seems to live in an atmosphere of dreams.

Mr. GARDNER. You might as well have no field artillery at all.

Mr. HAY. It will take, with the appropriations we are making now, six years to complete 1,292 guns. So that we will have the whole of them in six years' time.

We have field ammunition for field artillery in reserve and provided for the guns we need, 38 per cent, and the appropriations in this bill will raise that to 60 per cent.

I want to call attention to the fact that the life of these guns that we are providing the ammunition for depends largely upon the number of times the gun is fired. Therefore, it may be, and probably is, more necessary to have the guns than it is to have a large quantity of reserve ammunition. I want to call attention to the fact that last year and this year we are making larger appropriations for field artillery guns and field artillery ammunition than has ever been made before in the history of our country except in time of war.

As to the estimate that there should be 1,800 rounds for each gun, under the present rate of appropriation, we could in four years get all the ammunition we wanted in reserve at the rate we are now going. I will now state what the powder capacity of the country is: Before the outbreak of the European war the daily capacity of the cannon powder was 36,000 pounds, and the daily capacity of the small-arms powder was 10,000 pounds, which makes in a year 12,940,000 pounds of cannon powder and 3,650,000 pounds of small-arms powder. That was the daily output before the European war. It is estimated that since the European war the capacity has largely increased, and no man can tell exactly what it is to-day.

We are trying, in the Committee on Military Affairs, to follow up, as far as we can and with reasonableness, the recommendations made by the General Staff as to what is necessary to be done, and when it is said that we are making appropriations haphazard, I want to say that that statement is without any foundation in fact.

I might call attention to the personnel of the Army, and the disposition among some to have an Army reserve. I want to say, gentlemen, that I have studied the question of an Army reserve with as much care as anybody could who has been intrusted by the House with these matters.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Before the gentleman concludes, will he be kind enough to tell us what has been done about aeroplanes?

Mr. HAY. I will first finish what I was going to say. It is an extremely complex question. Of course, in countries where they have a compulsory military service it is easy enough to have a reserve. About every country in continental Europe has the compulsory military service, but in England, which has the same voluntary service that we have, they have failed to get a dependable reserve.

They have even gone so far as to pay their reserves, and yet they have not been able to accomplish anything in that line; and, Mr. Chairman, we will never be able to get the citizens of this country to enlist in the Army for a term of years, then go into the reserve for another term of years, and bind themselves to put themselves under the control of the War Department to be called upon whenever the War Department chooses to do it. [Applause.] Therefore I have been unable to reach any conclusion which would enable me to give any opinion as to what is the best way to get a reserve.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. I am very much interested to hear the gentleman's idea on the reserve. As I understand, under our reserve system now we pay a man a bonus if he comes back to the colors, whether he enrolls himself in that reserve or not. Is that true?

Mr. HAY. We have a law on the statute books providing that in time of war if a man who has served in the Regular Army comes back to the colors and enlists for the war he is to be paid a bounty of $300.

Mr. GARDNER. Suppose we repealed that law and had a reserve law where we pay them for being in the reserve, much along the line suggested for the Navy. Does the gentleman think that we would then be able to get a reserve army? I am not arguing with the gentleman, but I want to get his views.

Mr. HAY. I do not think that would be paying them enough. I want to say this about the Army: The enlisted men of the Army are a very different class of men from what they used to be. They are a very good class of people. A great deal of care is taken with enlistments. Of 167,000 men who applied for enlistment last year, only 41,000 were taken. Over 100,000 men were rejected as not being either physically fit or morally fit to go into the United States Army. These men, when they come in and serve a full enlistment of four years, either make the Army a career and stay in it or they go out and go into business and marry and settle down, and those men you can not get for your reserve with a small sum of money, in my judgment.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan asked me about aviation. The amount appropriated for aviation in this bill is $300,000. The amount appropriated last year was $250,000, an increase of $50,000. We have on hand 11 aeroplanes, and we have contracted for 8 under the appropriation of last year. We have 2 training machines, which makes in all 21. The Chief of the Signal Corps says he wishes to accumulate 32 for active service, and that he wants a reserve of 16, so that makes 48 that he wants to get together. The cost of one of these machines is $10,000.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Those 16 are in spare parts, are they not?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. It is only 32 machines and spare parts that make up 16 more.

Mr. HAY. As a reserve. These machines cost $10,000 each, so that under the appropriation which we give them this year they will be able to accumulate the 32 machines and some of the 16, or the parts of the 16.

Something has been said by my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] about Zeppelins. So far as I have been able to read in this war in Europe the Zeppelins have proved to be a failure as an offensive weapon. They have not done anything except kill innocent people, and from a military standpoint they have not been of any service whatever to the countries which have used them. One Zeppelin costs $1,000,000. Should we go into the purchase of Zeppelins until we find out from the experience of this war whether or not it is absolutely necessary to have a machine of that kind in our Army? I do not think we should.

The Aviation Corps has 60 officers allowed, and they now have only, as I understand, 29 officers. They have 260 enlisted men allowed, and according to the report of Gen. Scriven, the Chief Signal Officer, they have 24 officers and 115 enlisted men now in the corps.

Mr. GARDNER. Not in the Aviation Corps—in the whole Signal Corps.

Mr. HAY. No; in the Aviation Corps. I will say to the gentleman that I drew the bill, and that I know I provided in the bill for 60 officers and 260 enlisted men.

Mr. GARDNER. In this bill?

Mr. HAY. No; I mean in the bill creating the Aviation Corps.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. OGLESBY. In regard to the Zeppelin proposition, is it not a fact that the proximity of the countries in Europe where these Zeppelins are used would be more apt to make them of use there than in this country, where you have to go so far before we get to another country?

Mr. HAY. Undoubtedly. I do not think they would come 3,000 miles across the ocean to get here.

Mr. OGLESBY. And they would not be of any use to them.

Mr. HAY. They would not be of any use to us, and they would not be of any harm to us in the possession of other countries.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Are Zeppelins used for scouting purposes at all?

Mr. HAY. Not at all; they are used in offensive warfare.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I will.

Mr. GARDNER. I think the gentleman ought to correct the hearings, then. Gen. Scriven says on page 642:

> We only want to accumulate 32 machines in the first line and a reserve of 50 per cent, because we have under the bill 60 aviator officers, and we are only allowed 12 enlisted men for instruction in flying. The limit, therefore, is 72.

Mr. HAY. I said nothing to the contrary of that. I said they have 60 officers allowed, and that turns out to be true.

Mr. GARDNER. Yes; but——

Mr. HAY. And they had 260 enlisted men in the Aviation Corps. Now, 12 of those men are to be educated as flyers.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman means the others are on the ground?

Mr. HAY. The others are on the ground doing aviation work.

Mr. GARDNER. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I thought the gentleman meant there were 120 flyers. I am very glad to have the explanation, for I think the committee understood that there were that number of enlisted men in the flying business.

Mr. HAY. I do not think they did, because I think they knew what the bill does.

Mr. SMITH of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I do.

Mr. SMITH of New York. In case of a conflict how rapidly could additional aeroplanes be obtained?

Mr. HAY. I think from the evidence in the hearings that they could not be obtained very quickly, because in this country there are only three manufacturers who are now making aeroplanes which can be used for military purposes. Now, of course, if a war came on and we placed very large orders they might manufacture them more quickly, but the aeroplane business does not seem to be a very profitable one and there are few people engaged in it.

I hardly think it necessary, Mr. Chairman, for me to continue these remarks, desultory as they are. I want, however, to call attention to the fact that we are in no danger of a large army landing in this country in a very short time, and that we will have ample time for a great deal of preparation. Why, when Canada sent her first 33,000 troops to England to take part in this war it took 31 transports and 62 war vessels to take them over there; and if any great force is landed in this country you must presuppose that our fleet has been destroyed and our coast defenses leveled to the ground and the people of this country have all taken to the woods. I do not believe that time will ever come. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I believe the result of the dreadful war in Europe will so sicken and disgust the heart of mankind with militarism and everything that pertains to war that enlightened, universal human nature will seek some other means of settling their disputes than going to war. [Applause.] I believe it will clear up the road to the establishment of an international court with an international police to enforce the decrees of that court. However, that is only a hope. Meantime, we must take the world as it is. War is a fact, liable to appear when least expected. Two months before the Spanish War the man who would have suggested war between the United States and Spain would have been deemed wild. Some of the young Spanish bloods over there in Habana, in talking with some young Americans, suggested that Spain could land a force at Key West and march through to the Capitol. The young Americans said that if any Spaniards came over here they had better behave themselves or the police would run them in. [Laughter.] Well, now, the contrary was the fact. I believe at the beginning of the Spanish War a division of well-trained Spanish troops under the command of a leader like Stonewall Jackson or Phil Sheridan landed at Key West could have marched right straight through to the Hudson River without effective opposition. We were very confident; we were wild for the encounter; but we were not prepared for war. The military expedition that we sent over to Cuba was one of the most lamentable affairs. We loaded ships with quinine and with cannon balls, and when they wanted quinine they found cannon balls on top of the medicine. Everything was topsy-turvy; and it was the Regular Army, not the militia, that was responsible for everything. We have learned much since, but any large levy of troops would create the same confusion. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that we are in great danger of war with any powerful military nation; and yet these wars come. Eight months ago no person would have been so rash as to have said that within two months there would be the greatest and most destructive war the world has ever seen; yet war came like a lightning stroke from a clear sky, and nobody is yet wise enough to tell what the underlying cause is. It is only the part of prudence, therefore, to make reasonable preparation for such emergencies as may arise.

I have listened to discussions on this subject before the Military Committee, and I am sure that that committee has given to the subject very earnest attention. I think they are almost as one with the idea that there is at present, with some exceptions, mostly in the aviation field, reasonable preparation. The President of the United States, like all other reasonable men, thinks that there should be "adequate" defense. The only trouble is that we differ as to what "adequate" defense may be. The President thinks that we should depend upon a "citizenry trained to arms." Now, that is something that does not exist, and it seems to me it is to that very point that we should give most earnest attention. It is well known that this country will not stand for a great standing army in time of peace. This needs no discussion. There does not appear to be sufficient reason, even after considering the earnest argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] as to lack of preparation, for a large standing army. It seems to me the scale of preparation that he would insist upon would be that preparation that would be necessary to resist a great invading force.

Mr. GARDNER. Since the gentleman has mentioned my name, will he yield?

Mr. HULINGS. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER. Does not the gentleman know, as he has heard it time and again, that I insist on nothing but an investigation and report from an impartial commission?

Mr. HULINGS. I suppose it would be fair to say that the gentleman has insisted before the committee and also before this House that there should be an investigation by a competent body to see what the preparation should be. Now, it seems to me, gentlemen, that we do not need any great increase, perhaps no increase, in our standing Army beyond the 100,000 men that are now authorized. I do believe that we should have a Navy capable of making it so difficult for an invading force to land, that whilst they were landing here a large army, from whatever source they might come, we could be organizing and training our own troops. A gentleman the other day on the floor suggested that they had enough of squirrel shooters down in Arkansas to pick the eyes out of any invading force that might come here. Well, I suppose he had not thought of shrapnel fire at a range of 6 miles. These forts that we have would not stand in the way of any invading force. I do not suppose that the commander of any invading force would select a fort to go up against with his fleet. His warships would convoy his transports with his troops to any one of one hundred places where they could land without opposition, except from the military force, unless we had a Navy to prevent the landing. And for that reason, Mr. Chairman, I believe the expenditure of money in preparation for defense should be expended largely on the Navy. I do not believe that it is necessary at this time to increase the military force, because a proper and reasonable increase of our naval force would make a foreign invasion so difficult as to be improbable, and thus we would have no use for increased military force, except probably to garrison the Panama Canal.

Mr. Chairman, I have introduced a bill into this House that has been lying in the committee room for some time. I have never been able to get any consideration of that bill there, but I want to take this opportunity to call the attention of the committee to a suggestion that is made in the bill that is just in line with the preparation or the training of citizenry for the national defense. That bill would provide that the President of the United States might enlist a force, to be called the public service corps, the number not named in the bill, of young men from the ages of 16 to 25, who should be drilled and subsisted and disciplined as soldiers, armed and equipped as soldiers in campaign, the private soldiers being paid $30 per month, double the pay of regular soldiers, and that force would be employed in the building of roads or other public works. They would serve one year, not eligible for reenlistment, but the corps would be kept filled with new men; the officers to be appointed by the President. Such a corps—officers and men—would get training in actual military life; the officers especially would get training in the handling of supplies and materials, the handling of large bodies of men, and the administration of subsistence and quartermaster's stores, something that they do not get either in the National Guard or in the Regular Army itself when scattered in a multitude of small posts. That would train officers in actual military life and would fill the country in a few years with a large number of young men who had had actual military training.

I submit this matter to the House as a contribution to a subject that I think is of very great importance, and it seems to me precisely along the lines suggested by President Wilson in his address, suggesting that our defense must be by a "citizenry trained to arms." This corps would not be subject to military duty. It would not be a part of the Army. It would be a body of men employed at useful work under military discipline, providing work for the unemployed at fair wages, and in a few years the country would have a great number of young men trained in military life, who in an emergency would volunteer for the defense of the country.

And I might say that incidentally we would get about two miles of public road built for what we now pay for one. I know there are a lot of fellows in the Army who would say that that would be soldiers' work, and soldiers do not like to work. A good many of them think it is derogatory. The sooner they get that idea out of their heads the better. But, at any rate, there is no room for professional jealousy, because this corps would not be a military force. It would provide in a few years a large body of "citizenry trained to arms," upon which the country could depend in time of need to fill the ranks of the Regular Army and the Organized Militia.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back two minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE].

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the committee I felt perhaps it would be better to allow others to use the time in general debate on this bill. Therefore, I will take only a few minutes in which to make a few observations.

When Gen. Scott, the Chief of Staff of our Army, was before our committee I asked him the following questions:

General, how long have you been connected with the service of the Army?

He answered:

Since 1876.

I asked:

What would you say of the action of the Congress of the United States in the past 20 years in regard to looking after the national defense? Have they been derelict in their duty, or have we been constantly improving our national defenses?

His answer was:

Constantly improving.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the great political party which has been controlling the destinies of this country and taking care of the national defenses for the past 20 years, with the exception of the last two years, is the party to which I am proud to belong, and I would regret very much if that great party had been derelict in its duty along this line. But I think any man who has sat here this afternoon and heard the statistics that have been read into the RECORD will go away feeling that at least ample money has been appropriated in the last 20 years to care for the national defense.

I want to say, further, that if that money has not been properly expended by the men in charge of the defenses of our country, then these men ought to be court-martialed and dismissed from the service. But I want to say that I am satisfied beyond any doubt that not only have sufficient appropriations been made, but that the money has been expended judiciously, not only in building up the coast defenses of our country, but in building up a reserve that will take care of an army of 560,000 men, should occasion require, and it will take only a few years more at the rate we are now appropriating money to have that entire reserve in field artillery, small arms, small-arms ammunition, and field artillery ammunition, as well as ammunition for the coast defenses.

Now, gentlemen, if I had it in my power, I would make some changes in regard to our Army. In the first place, I would limit the term of enlistment to two years; in the second place, I would encourage and aid the militia of the several States, to make it a more efficient body of military men. Another thing I would do would be to make a flat rate of retirement pay for Army officers and prevent the political pulling and boosting that goes on in pushing our Army officers up from captains to colonels, and so on, and retiring them at the highest rate of pay. I think it is no reflection on our Army officers to say that they would do their duty just as well and just as loyally if we took away from them the hope of retiring as a brigadier or a major instead of retiring as a captain or a colonel.

So far as increasing the Army is concerned, I would increase it only by the enlistment of sufficient men to bring it up to the standard authorized by law. The idea that we have to have more officers and more organizations in order to defend our country at this time is, to my mind, absurd. We have power now to enlist all companies up to the full capacity of 150 in each company, and if we need men, let us do that without increasing the heavy overhead expenses by increasing the number of organizations in the Army.

I am called a conservative. I hope I am when it comes to this matter. But I believe in the adequate defense of our country. I believe in reasonable preparation for war, and I think that is being taken care of in the proper way. I know that we are not safe or immune from war so long as the passions of men remain as they are. But if war comes, with the Regular Army that we have, with our Navy and the militia that we have, and relying on the spirit that prevails in the breasts of the patriotic sons of this country, I have no fears of this country of ours being crushed. [Applause.]

There are not enough men, in my judgment, in all Europe to ever make a trail, as Abraham Lincoln said, on the crest of the Allegheny Mountains and one of them get back to the Atlantic coast alive.

When any nation embarks 100,000 men on transports to come across the sea to attack us, that when they have dispelled our Navy from the seas, sunk our battleships beneath the waves, and they come to our coasts and tear down our defenses, I want to assure those gentleman that there will be one of the finest reception committees at the shore to meet them that they have ever met in their lives. [Applause.]

And more than that, if they start anywhere into the interior of our country, the sons not only of one part of our country, but the sons of Georgia, Illinois, Mississippi, and Wisconsin will gather together as one united, mighty force to repel any invader who may dare to touch this soil of ours. [Applause.]

But suppose they destroyed our fleet and got into our country for a distance, we could still live on and on, for we need not the products of foreign lands to support and sustain us in our trial, and we could fight them as long as they desired to continue the conflict. But let us hope that that time will never come. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD]. [Applause.]

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that the time I shall consume necessitates my inflicting myself upon you when you are practically wearied out with the length of this debate, but I have a few observations, as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, that I would like to submit for the consideration of the House.

In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, it is time for Congress to take "stock," as it were, and investigate the present cost of our military establishment and what the cost would amount to if we followed the program laid down by many of the great so-called military experts and unduly excited Senators and Congressmen.

Recently the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] has received much newspaper notice throughout the country on account of his insistent demand for a commission to investigate and report to Congress our unpreparedness for war. We need no such commission. The report of such a commission would be worthless. For unless it was endowed with omniscent powers it could not possibly conclude which of the great nations of the earth we were to engage in war and when the fighting would commerce. But, for the sake of argument, let us take one of the great powers of Europe, Germany, and see what would be the price we would have to pay to prepare to meet her army man for man.

The peace strength of the German Army has been kept at a minimum of 620,000 men. Under the German system of compulsory military service between the ages of 16 and 45 years this army cost Germany in 1913 $248,000,000.

Our Regular Army, according to the last reports of the War Department, is shown to be 4,652 officers and 80,740 enlisted men, a total of 85,392. The appropriations for the upkeep of this Army will cost the American people for the ensuing fiscal year in round figures $130,000,000. So if we must prepare to meet world power with the strength of Germany's Army of 620,000 men, it would cost us about $750,000,000 annually, or a little more than $7.50 per year for each man, woman, and child in the United States.

To state such a proposition is an assurance that the American people would not stand for such tomfoolery.

About two months ago, in a statement to the press, I said that there was but little excuse for us to get excited and nervous. To-day we are more secure from war than we have been at any period in 40 years. Practically the whole world is in a death struggle. Europe is daily expending millions of dollars in money, millions upon millions of dollars worth of property is being destroyed, her hillsides are saturated with and her rivers are crimson with the blood of tens of thousands of the very flower of her manhood.

Mr. Chairman, all America stands appalled at the unprecedented cataclysm in which our friends across the water are now engaged. We hope and pray for the speedy restoration of peace, but if that happy condition were brought about this minute, already the bloodiest, most destructive, and costly war the world has ever witnessed has been fought. It will take years of deprivation and toil to rebuild the destroyed cities, replace the wasted millions expended for the death-dealing instruments of war, and no man can foresee the day when the payment of interest will end upon the bonded indebtedness of these nations.

Surely no one will be bold enough, in the face of recent events, to seriously urge that preparedness for war is the best insurance against war. Germany and France, England and Russia were all well prepared for war—and they are at war. As has been aptly said, "The breeding of bulldogs in no manner promotes peace in the canine family."

Mr. Chairman, many of the great thinkers of the world have proposed plans for universal peace, and in like manner many have planned preparations to protect against war. So far neither have met with success. It seems that no matter how many international peace conferences we have the nations of the world will not agree to lay down their arms forever and dwell upon the earth in "brotherly love." On the other hand, no nation has yet determined when it had enough battleships or enough armed men to say with confidence, "We are secure against attack." My judgment is that we will see universal peace on the earth long before we will ever see the war lords and militarists of the world satisfied with a nation's preparedness for war. It would be a task as impossible as the extinguishment of an erupting volcano with a squirt gun.

If I were called upon to insure this country against invasion by a foreign nation my plan would be along entirely different lines from those of the jingoist. I would prudently and gradually secure my country with the necessary equipment and scatter it through the Nation, and keep our gunlock oiled and our powder dry. When this was done, I would turn my attention to instilling in the hearts and minds of my countrymen the glories of peace and the horrors of a war of conquest. I would educate the youth of the land and equip him for a life of usefulness. I would stimulate our commercial, industrial, and agricultural activities. I would encourage the maintenance of American ideals and make secure the blessing of our country for our native countrymen, and thus inspire a patriotism and a courage that would secure our Nation against a world of hostile foes—for such a nation is worth a thousand nations composed of tax-ridden slaves and a conscripted and unwilling soldiery.

Mr. Chairman, few men would resent an insult against his boarding house; but any man will resent an insult against his home. The reason is obvious. He has no innate love for a boarding house, but a heaven-born love for his home and his fireside. So it is with a nation. A tax-ridden and enslaved people are devoid of patriotism, but the happy and contented home is the very corner stone of a prosperous and secure nation.

This great Nation is the most liberal of any nation in its allowance in pay to the men in the ranks and its officers. We are profligate in the payment of pensions, and we find ourselves 50 years after the only great war in which we were ever engaged, expending about 70 cents out of every dollar we collect in revenue to meet our bills for pensions, Army, Navy, and coast defenses.

So, Mr. Chairman, in view of the insistent demand for a commission to report on our unpreparedness for war, and in view of the clamor of many daily papers of the country for a greater Navy and a greater Army, I have thought it only fair to those who pay the bills and who will really do the fighting, if we are ever involved in war, to let them know what the cost of our present war establishment is and how we expend their money.

The cost per soldier in our Regular Army is now a little over $1,000 per annum. As I said in the beginning, such an expenditure per man is the most costly of any nation's army on earth.

Now, let us give some items of the expenditures going to make up the stupendous sums we are annually spending on the Army, Navy, and pensions. In the year 1914 we expended for—

Army (including rivers and harbors)	$165,646,297.77
Navy	140,736,536.35
Pensions	172,408,518.29
Total	478,791,352.41

Without the least prejudice toward the old veterans of the Union Army who really did the fighting during the Civil War, this pension roll would furnish splendid material for a humorous novel if its consequences did not fall so heavily upon the shoulders of the weary taxpayers of the country. Fighting soldier after soldier has written me agreeing to the outrages committed upon the people in the name of the Union soldier through private pension bills. We all know this is true; but who can stop it? The truth is, it has almost gotten beyond control. Those of us from the States once comprising the Confederate States dare not fight these outrages, for when we do the "bloody shirt" is waved at us and they call it "rebel prejudice." On the other hand, those from the States where these pensioners live dare not oppose them, for it means political annihilation, and the people are between the "devil and the deep blue sea," and we find both contending parties in the North urging their election to Congress largely upon the ability of the candidate to get money out of the Treasury and place more men on the pension roll.

A Mississippi River gallinipper could drink all the blood spilled in the Spanish-American War for its supper and suffer no ill consequences in the process of digestion, and yet out of the 215,000 men who were mustered in the service in that war 1 out of every 7 men in the 15 years past have been able to connect themselves to poor old Uncle Sam for the balance of their lives as pensioners, and thousands of them are hammering at the door for admission to-day.

Essential to a more economical administration of our Army is its divorce from undue political influence in its administrative affairs. The officers of the Army should not be imbued with the idea that great political influence can obtain for them that which they are unwilling to strive for among their brother officers. Promotion should be preceded by a record of efficiency. This will have a tendency to put "ginger" in our officers and bring out their very best qualities. No officer should be promoted over his fellow officer because he is close to the "swivel-chair" brigade or because his daddy-in-law is a Senator or Congressman or a political factor in a State. Nothing is more disgusting to a real Army officer than to see officers promoted 900 numbers, from a captain to a major general, which was done not so long ago by a President of the United States, when, in fact, that officer never commanded a squad in his life. The Secretary of War ought to have plenary power to weed out the inefficient political pets and social katydids of our Army. This should be done at once; the quicker the better. We have many very fine officers in our Army who are to-day silently suffering injustice for this very reason.

Mr. Chairman, it is my judgment—and this is simply my own notion about it—that as we are short of officers all the time and can only partially furnish Regular Army officers for the troops we have, there are too many officers on detached duty in the War Department. Many of them are assigned to purely clerical duty, and these officers could spend their time more profitably with the troops in the field where they belong, and their places be filled with men from civil life under the civil-service rules and regulations. This would save a great deal of money for the taxpayers.

Again, Mr. Chairman, our system of retiring officers is so liberal that it rather encourages the "drone" to seek retirement, even before he reaches the age limit or has served the 30 years required before making application for retirement.

For instance, a major may stand an examination for promotion to the next higher grade, and in two weeks be entitled to retire for age or length of service in the next higher grade, which in this instance would be that of colonel. Without further comment on this subject you will see that we have 220 brigadier generals on the retired list drawing $990,000 per annum for doing absolutely nothing. This is enough brigadier generals to general the armies of the European allies. No officer should be retired as long as he is capable of giving efficient service, and if we could get rid of those who were inefficient there would be but little trouble about a healthy flow of promotion.

This abuse runs down to the enlisted men. Out of the 3,832 men on the retired list only 168 of them are privates; the others are of the higher grade noncommissioned officers.

We have 49 Army posts in the United States. All of these posts except eight have been recommended for abandonment. Yet political influence and nothing else is preventing their abandonment. They have long since served their purpose and only hinder the economical mobilization of our Army for proper maneuver training and military instruction. Hundreds of thousands of dollars could be saved annually by following the recommendations of the War Department as to this useless branch of the service.

Mr. Chairman, I have already consumed more time than I had expected to when I took the floor. I can not take my seat without adding to what I have said that I hope nothing in the way of criticism will be construed as a reflection upon the painstaking and able committee presided over by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY]—of course, excluding myself from that statement—but it applies to both Democrats and Republicans alike. The committee as a body has devoted hours and days to the hearings in an effort to make up an intelligent, economical, yet ample, bill for the Army wing of our Military Establishment. This, I think, has been done. No committee of this House now has or has ever had an abler, more diligent, conscientious, and industrious chairman to counsel with and preside over it than has the Military Affairs Committee. My solemn judgment is that he is one of the best-informed men in the United States on the military status of our own and other great powers of the world, and it is consoling to us all that he is not the least "nervous or excited" about our ability to defend ourselves against all comers.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman and fellow Members, as a retiring member of the Committee on Military Affairs in the House of Representatives, having lately been assigned to service on another committee, I wish first to voice my appreciation of the work of the members of this most important committee.

Partisanship has not intruded itself to prevent the proper consideration of all matters coming before this committee, and every member I am sure has been guided by the sole desire to do that which was absolutely right and just.

The most pleasant personal relations have existed, and no committee of this House is presided over by a more patriotic and efficient chairman than the chairman of this committee, Mr. HAY, of Virginia. [Applause.]

The present Army appropriation bill is one which is almost entirely an appropriation bill, for very little legislation is carried.

At a time when a great part of the world is bearing arms there might have been some temptation to have made of this bill an occasion for evidencing by legislative action something really foreign to an appropriation bill, but the country will be gratified to know that this committee has pursued the even tenor of its way and has not gone beyond the bounds of legitimate appropriation.

So-called "preparedness" has been the topic of much discussion in the press, in this Chamber, and elsewhere throughout this land, and the very big thing for the realization of our people is that by the action of the Committee on Military Affairs preparedness is actually and continually being carried on so as to give proper strength to every department of the service.

I am of those who subscribe to preparation for national defense, and would do all things and everything to protect inviolate our institutions, our country, and our citizenship. [Applause.]

I do not share the opinion of those who fear almost immediate assault upon our national integrity for with all the great nations of the world we are at peace.

No policy of armed aggression is ours or ever has been, and the impress we seek to make upon history is attended by the arts of peace, not war; and we strive to have the best development of industries and of commerce make for our national progress.

Nor would I be lured into false security by the idea that all nations are to lay down their arms, for most desirable as this would be, the time does not give it proof; and we are to face the conditions of to-day and to-morrow as they are and probably will be, not as we would have them.

Some have deplored the publicity given to our Army and Navy affairs, but it seems to me that this is exactly what is wanted, so that our people may know, and that an honest and patriotic public sentiment may be builded up based on facts, and not on misinformation.

It is well for the great public, of which we are all members, to know that this bill is carefully following conditions, even unto possibilities, and that it carries and maintains rational preparations for our national defense.

Munitions of war can not be made or provided in a week or in a month, and the present method is to bring strength to all departments of the service, so that at any and all times our house may be in order.

It is this well thought out and considered plan as exemplified in this bill which must stand as the true American idea of a proper army for national defense.

Shall the American policy as we have known it for years, as it has gone with us in our development into the greatest Nation on the earth, be now changed?

Shall we have an immense standing army?

Shall we have a greatly increased standing army?

I am sure the very best sentiment of our citizens would echo the answer "No" to these questions.

The strength of our defense lies in the spirit of our people, which has never failed to rally upon an occasion of national emergency. [Applause.]

That which we should most look forward to is the best possible physical, mental, and moral condition of our young men. There is no better training for the boy and the young man than the exercises and requirements of the so-called military training.

Discipline, regulation, and order soon manifest themselves in the erect carriage, the clear eye, the splendid condition which so well reflect proper exercise, good conduct, and good health.

Many plans have been suggested concerning an Army reserve, and it would seem to me that our continued attention should be increasingly drawn to the promotion of the efficiency of the National Guard.

Despite criticism and discouragement, the militia has maintained itself and now stands on a plane of higher public regard than ever before. As munitions of war can not be procured in a relatively short time, so likewise it takes time and training to make an efficient soldier.

Not alone is a knowledge of military tactics necessary, but the man must learn how to live under conditions as they exist in the camp, on the march, or in the field.

The very nucleus of any reserve Army for national defense would be the National Guard.

The assistance given to the militia in the present bill is an indication of its potential strength as a war reserve, and with future enlargement of training and equipment, with the field instruction accorded to troops of the Regular Army, these bodies of troops may most fittingly and efficiently aid our Army of regularly enlisted men.

The training given to the thousands of the very best young men of the country who would give their service to the National Guard would in itself in the great results of experience, knowledge, and health furnish that high standard of patriotism which is the best guardian of the honor and security of the Nation.

The message which comes to this country from the present Army appropriation bill is that our established national policy is held inviolate and that the events of the times are being observed for our own good; that there has been no neglect, but that steadily we are doing all that can be done for the complete protection of our country.

This message greets a united people who do not wish any great advance of militarism here, but who would maintain the policy of preparation for our national protection alone, yet provide every man and every munition which is needed for the defense of the United States of America. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY].

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, one of the world's greatest warriors has said that "War is hell." If Sherman's definition is scientifically correct, and I guess it is, it follows a priori that war has no legitimate place in the world's economy and should be banished to the country where it belongs. The horrors of war are indescribable and incomprehensible. It has saturated the soil of every country with its best blood. It has sacrificed on its fields of battle the flower of its manly youth. It has made countless billions of widows and orphans. It has wrung unquenchable grief from untold millions of mothers and wives. It has scattered throughout the world in all ages hungry, emaciated orphans begging for bread. It has brought to this old world nothing but sorrow, distress, and horror. It has consumed the wealth, devastated the resources, and destroyed the property of nations, and has placed an intolerable and unbearable burden of taxation upon the laboring and producing masses. It has changed men from loving fathers and kind husbands to warring demons with an insatiable thirst for blood. It has changed the instinct of love and humanity to an uncontrollable mania for revenge. During all time it has not brought one ray of sunshine into any home or heart. It has not added one dollar to the Nation's wealth. It has not settled one question of right. Its whole record is demolition, destruction, devastation, sadness, and sorrow. It is therefore not strange that the best thought and conscience of the world are now turning their attention to the discovery of a means by which war shall be lessened if not entirely prevented.

In the few moments allotted to me I wish to calmly and candidly consider the methods that have been tried and the remedies that are proposed for an amelioration of this condition. That nations, like individuals, have and will have differences that they can not settle between themselves must be accepted as inevitable; that there does arise and will arise grave questions between them which can not be adjusted to the satisfaction of one or the other of the contending parties. So long as selfish interests and instincts bias the judgment of men and of nations it will often be impossible for them to agree upon what is right and fair between themselves, and so long as human nature remains the same as it is there are only two ways of settling these final differences. One is by the arbitrament of war and the other is by the decision of an impartial, unbiased, and disinterested tribunal. All good men, all patriotic men shrink from the horrors of war. Few can now be found who will justify it as a means or defend it as a method of settling questions of right. All want peace; but there are two divergent and clearly defined classes of thought by which it can be obtained. One class believes and advocates that the only way to prevent war is to be constantly prepared for it; that the only way for a nation to preserve its own peace is to become so strong in its military and naval equipment that no other nation will be tempted to declare war on it. This is called "armed peace." The whole history of the world demonstrates that armament does not prevent war; but, on the contrary, as a rule, invites it. No nation can become so strong and powerful in its military equipment as to guarantee itself against attack unless it becomes stronger than all the nations of the world; and that, under existing conditions, is impossible and certainly undesirable. No individual has ever undertaken to play the bully that did not find himself sooner or later confronted by a man or combination of men that would lay him low. No nation has ever undertaken to play the bully that did not sooner or later find some other nation or combination of nations strong enough to overcome it. I undertake to say, in the light of all history, that no nation ever secured its permanent peace by its prowess of war equipment. I undertake further to say that the nations that have had most war are those that have made most preparation for it, and the nations that have had the greatest peace are those that have given the least attention to the preparation for war. We do not need to delve into ancient history to verify these propositions. Ever since I was a boy I have read the history of England and the pronouncement of all of her premiers, lords of admiralty, and great statesmen. They have all justified England's great armament on the ground of protecting her own peace and the peace of the world. But she has done neither. She has been almost constantly in war or in the throes of threatened war. She has seen the whole world drenched in the carnage of blood and fire. If her purpose in maintaining this great armament has been to secure peace, every candid man must admit that it has been a failure. She has squandered her wealth, impoverished her people, and heaped upon them burdens of taxation, under which they stagger without having accomplished her avowed or declared purpose.

I have read the history of France. I have seen her spend billions of dollars in war preparation. I have read the statements of her Emperors, her Presidents, her premiers, and her warriors, and they have all proclaimed that these expenditures were made in the interests of peace. France has taxed her subjects almost to the point of exhaustion for the purpose of maintaining her naval and military equipment, and all this was done, according to the declaration of her statesmen, to guarantee peace. And yet the history of France is but a history of its wars. France has neither secured its own peace nor contributed to the peace of the world by her preparedness.

Russia, that great colossus of the north, has impoverished her peasants and depleted the revenues of her Empire in maintaining her standing army and in building her fortifications and armament, under the delusion that she could awe the world. She has dreamed that she could become so strong and powerful that she could secure her own peace and command the peace of the world. This has been the dream of her Czars and her statesmen. But the folly and supineness of her policy has been revealed by every page of her national history. She has neither been able to secure peace for herself nor add to the world's peace. Neither the presence nor preparedness of her vast hordes were able to command peace for her humblest protégé—Servia.

I have been intensely interested in the history of Germany. I have been fascinated with her wonderful development and have been astonished at her growth in the arts, science, and literature, and, most of all, in her industrial and commercial progress; but I have been shocked and astounded at her military preparations. She has taxed her people to the last point that they would endure, and several times she has been on the verge of domestic disquietude, if not revolution. Her populace has groaned under the burdens of her war budgets. But their murmurings of disquietude have been hushed by the declarations of her Emperors and chancellors that these things were necessary to preserve her own peace and the peace of Europe. She has turned Germany into a war camp and bedecked her hills and hamlets with glittering bayonets and helmets. Her military conscription has made every able-bodied man a warrior. She has created a military aristocracy and has made dominant the science of war over the arts of peace. If it is possible to secure peace by preparedness, Germany ought to have had perpetual peace. But her preparedness did not protect her. We now find her engaged in the most terrific war the world has ever seen, a war that not only challenges her military prowess but, by her own words, threatens her existence. If the superhuman preparedness of Germany has not been able to protect herself or contribute to the peace of the world, it leads every thoughtful man to inquire just how much preparedness is necessary in order to guarantee peace and protection to a nation.

This war clearly demonstrates the fallacy that war can be prevented by preparedness. In the last 40 years, since the close of the Franco-Prussian War, the nations now at war have expended more than $40,000,000,000 in preparedness for war. I saw a map the other day printing in black the portions of the globe now engaged in war and in white the countries blessed with peace. This map showed that three-fifths of the globe is now black and two-fifths is white, and it strangely and conclusively shows that preparedness for war does not prevent war. The countries that have expended the most money and made the greatest preparations for war are now engaged in war, while the countries that have made the least preparation are now enjoying the blessings of peace. In viewing that map I noticed the little spot on the Western Hemisphere marked the "United States," and it was in white. The jingo press of the country and the military chivalrists on this floor tell you that we are not prepared for war. For one I thank God that that is true—that we are prepared for peace. If in this crucial hour we had as large an Army as some men advocate, if we had a Navy as large as some men on this floor would wish, if we had the military spirit aroused as some are attempting to do, if we had as commander in chief of the Army and Navy of the United States a man of warlike temperament this country, like those other unfortunate countries, would now be grappling in the world's titanic struggle, and the little white spot now appearing on the Western Hemisphere as the United States would be added to the hideous map of black that now appalls the world. But if preparedness could purchase peace it could not secure justice. The rights of the strong would be respected or enforced while those of the weak would be disregarded or outraged. This world will not be civilized until it provides a method of securing international justice as well as peace.

The spectacle of this hour demonstrates that war can not be prevented by preparedness. It even demonstrates a stronger proposition that preparedness for war incites and invites war. The war spirit that was aroused in order to sustain the Governments in their policy of expenditures could not be satisfied with the mere building of war vessels or the construction of superior military equipment. This spirit demanded their use, the trying of them out in actual conflict. A nation that has been taught to believe that it has the strongest navy and an invincible army can not be contented until it has tested its prowess in real conflict. You might as well say that a football team would be satisfied with its months of training without ever allowing them to enter the real game. It thus happens that whenever a nation has developed the military spirit, in times of serious or even slight trouble this military spirit gets beyond the power of control by the conservative and peaceful forces, and on the slightest provocation demands war. The pages of history are replete with instances where nations have been driven to war against the calm, cool judgment of the people. In my judgment, if we desire to secure the blessings of peace for ourselves and for our posterity we should encourage the arts of peace instead of stimulating and emulating the arts of war. You can not stimulate peace and good order in a community by encouraging every man to carry a revolver, bowie knife, and brass knuckles, however effective they are in personal defense. But no man ever added to his own personal safety in a community by strapping a belt of revolvers about him or by leaving protrude from his boots the handles of bowie knives. He thereby only added to the danger of personal attack. Such preparedness only invites encounter, and this is just as true of nations as of individuals. The law of cause and effect works the same with one as with the other. The world's late craze for naval and military armament has brought its logical and natural climax—a world war.

Now, since war can not be prevented or even ameliorated by preparedness, it leads every man that wants peace to make a candid inquiry as to whether there is another method of prevention or amelioration. As I have said before, nations, like individuals, will have controversies that they can not settle between themselves. Nations, like individuals, are biased and warped by self-interest. Most questions arising between nations, like those arising between individuals, can be settled by negotiations through diplomacy. Most nations, like individuals, want to do that which is right. But the question of interest or expediency makes them look at it from different standpoints. Both are honest in their belief that they want to do what is right, but they can not see it alike. When nations reach that point there is nothing to do but to submit the difference to arbitration or war.

Take as an illustration the negotiations now taking place between this country and England over the rights of neutral commerce. It is the interest of England to cripple her opponent as much as possible by cutting off her food supply. It is the interest of the United States to keep open these markets for food products of which she produces a superabundance. The viewpoint of each is determined more or less by self-interest, and it could hardly be expected that either party thus biased or prejudiced could determine the question according to the very rights of the matter. But after a full discussion through diplomatic channels this country and England still disagree. America demands and England refuses. What then? Either war or the honorable submission of the question to some disinterested court of arbitration. Which of these methods is the saner one? The submission of a question to the determination of war never settled a question of right. It would not prove that we were wrong in the contention if England should whip us, nor would it prove that we were right if we should whip England. It would simply demonstrate which was the stronger. I believe that most, if not all, of the wars of the world could be prevented by the nations adopting the same judicial machinery that has been tried and made effective in determining the rights and settling the disputes of organized society. Primitive and barbarous men determined their own rights and settled them by force. But civilization has now reached the point when no man has the privilege of determining his own rights nor the power of enforcing them. Society has assumed through properly constituted tribunals the prerogative of determining the rights of the citizens and has created the instrumentality for enforcing them. Inherently I see no difference between the relations of individuals to each other and the relations of nations to each other. There are strong men who declare that there are questions of national honor that can not be submitted to arbitration. Logically and inherently it is just as true that there are cerain questions of personal honor that can not be submitted to the arbitration of courts. But experience has demonstrated that peaceful society can not be maintained by allowing any man to determine his own rights or methods of enforcing them. However sacred these personal rights may be to every man, society has demanded their surrender, except the one of self-defense, and this can only be exercised in the manner and under the rules prescribed by law, and even then society undertakes to punish the aggressor and protect the attacked. It is by this method that individual man has emerged from barbarism to civilization. The very minute that we recognize the right of every man to determine his own rights and use his own methods of enforcement, that minute we sink to barbarism. The progress and perfection of civilization is determined at once by the readiness and willingness of men to submit their rights to the determination of society.

It is a strange fact that while men in their individual capacity have made wonderful progress, as nations we are as barbarous as we were in the Dark Ages. The same methods of determining rights between nations are employed now as then. The same wild ferocity is just as much manifested now as then. The desperate carnage is just as great if not greater than then. Man in his individual relation is becoming marvelously civilized, but as a part of the nation he is still a barbarian. I ask, is it not possible that the same forces that have made man in his individual capacity civilized are capable of being applied to national civilization? The same reasoning that took from the man his gun, his pistol, and his bowie knife should deprive nations of them. When two men undertake to fight out their difficulties they do not simply involve themselves. They involve the best welfare and comfort of others, and therefore society has the right to demand that they desist, even though the matter in controversy is purely personal. So with nations. No two nations can go to war without involving the whole world. They not only disturb the commercial, social, and business relations, but they often involve other nations in the combat.

Take, for illustration, the present war. Servia and Austria-Hungary had a controversy. The exchanges of diplomacy failed to settle that controversy to the satisfaction of both parties. It is more than possible that Austria-Hungary had a real grievance and that Servia had a real right that was involved in that controversy. How much more sane and sensible it would have been to submit that controversy to disinterested parties. This war with its awful ravages will not settle the question as to which was right in that controversy. But the world had a real interest in that controversy as well as these two countries. In attempting to settle that controversy by arms they have involved the whole world. There is perhaps not a man, woman, or child in all the world who has not been affected by it. All Europe has been immediately affected by it and the rest of the world in a more or less direct degree. That little trouble started between Austria-Hungary and Servia has involved all Europe in a war that will probably cost more than 10,000,000 lives and twenty billions of money, and when one or the other wins at this awful sacrifice the question as to whether Austria-Hungary or Servia was right will not have been determined.

But there are those who will say that Austria-Hungary had a right to make the demand and enforce its observance at the point of the bayonet and that Servia had a right to resist, regardless of what effect it might have on the rest of the world. I challenge that proposition. Nations, like individuals, are part of a great community, and they are responsible to that community for their conduct. Neither of them had a right to settle their grievances in a way that might involve the whole world. National society has a right to protect itself as well as local society.

The nations of the world will never become really civilized until they have created machinery for settling such controversies and averting such national disasters. In my judgment, this can be easily done by the nations agreeing to create a court of arbitration to which all disputes might be referred. I know they say it is impossible to do this. I can not see why. Individuals in organized society have made such a compact through their common law. Why can not Governments? A supreme international court is not new nor novel. Since The Hague conference in 1899 the dream of the utopian has become the sober purpose of the real statesman. But some say it would be impossible to get impartial judges or tribunals. Every difficulty that is involved in securing such a court to settle international disputes is involved in securing courts or juries to settle individual disputes. There are prejudiced judges and partial juries. But no one would think for that reason that we should abandon the whole system of judicial procedure for determining and enforcing rights and go back to the old method. In my judgment it would be easier, subject to less difficulty and complications, to secure fair, impartial, and high-minded judges to sit in an international court than in a national court. It would be no more difficult to provide for the proper enforcement of the orders and decrees of this court than to provide for the enforcement of the decrees and judgments of a national court. Of course this court must be established by national agreement, like the local courts are established, and their powers determined by local agreement. If nations want peace they can secure it through an international court of arbitration. If they want war they can continue their present barbarous system of determining national disputes. For one, I am in favor of an international court.

But I wish now to devote a few minutes to the present situation in this country. There is a propaganda now going on in the press of the country for a large increase of the naval and military forces of the United States, and it is shared in and promoted by certain Members of this House. With some it has reached a stage of hysteria. They try to make us believe that the United States is constantly in danger of attack and that we are in no position to defend ourselves. I wish to examine that question not from the standpoint of a military or naval man, but from the standpoint of a common citizen and apply to it not merely the rules of war strategy, but of common sense.

In the first place our situation is our best protection. We are isolated from any possible enemies on the east by an ocean expanse of about 3,000 miles, and on the west by about 5,000 miles. Any country that would undertake to attack the continental United States would have to transport its armies with all its equipment across these vast expanses before they could attack us. The impracticability, if not impossibility of the transportation of any dangerous forces must be apparent. It would take at least 100 vessels to transfer 100,000 men, and such a flotilla could not be brought together, equipped, and landed in the United States in less than two months after the declaration of war, and probably not inside of three or four months. We may get some idea of this task from recent occurrences. After the declaration of war between Germany and England it took England nearly three weeks to land 60,000 men across the channel, a distance of only 25 miles. In the published conversations that took place between military officers of Belgium and England looking to the defense of Belgium by England in the event of attack by Germany, England would not agree that it was possible to land 100,000 English troops in Belgium in less than two weeks. If it would take two weeks to get together a flotilla for transporting 100,000 soldiers 25 miles, where every vessel could make five or six trips a day, how long would it take to get together a flotilla for transporting that number of men 3,000 miles? Such a task would be stupendous, so great that no nation has yet ever considered it, and, in my judgment, no nation ever will seriously consider it.

But now what would they do if they arrived here? It is conceded by every cool, level-headed naval man that they could not land their troops at any of our fortified ports. There is no naval officer that will now risk his ships within the range of land batteries. The contest between land batteries and a ship is too unequal to be hazarded. One well-directed shot from a land battery may sink a large dreadnaught. Its size and position make it an easy target. But the guns from the ship with difficulty locate the land battery, and its size and concealment make it a very doubtful target, and even if found and hit may do but little damage. It certainly can not be sunk. At most it can be silenced, while other batteries can keep up the contest. This constitutes such an unequal situation that it is becoming the recognized naval policy to never allow a fleet to engage in combat with a land battery. But the length of time that would be absolutely necessary for the moving of such a flotilla would make it easily possible to mine all of our ports, and against the destruction of these mines no naval officer will jeopardize his war vessels.

So it is conceded by all military men, I believe, that if any landing of such a fleet could be had on the eastern coast of the United States it would have to be on the open seashore. Now, let us see what are the difficulties connected with such a landing. Such a flotilla could not be organized and brought to our coast unknown or unobserved. Our ships on the sea could and would keep track of them, and their direction and probable landing place would be communicated by our modern system of wireless telegraphy. They could not creep up by stealth. The contemplated place of landing could and would be known a reasonable time at least before their approach, and our troops, through rapid transportation by rail, could be easily concentrated at such point. Now, what would happen? Neither the war vessels, colliers, nor transports could reach the shore so as to unload their soldiers direct. They would have to anchor at sea and send in their soldiers and their equipment in small boats. By the modern system our armies could be easily intrenched on the shore and could easily pick off these soldiers approaching in the small boats as fast as any attempt to land them was made. Our men would be in trenches and their men would be in boats on the open sea. What kind of a show would they stand in making such a landing? But it might be said that the war vessels would drive our men from the trenches. That is not so easily done. The present war has demonstrated that it is very difficult to drive men from trenches by cannonading, even with shrapnel. For months men have lain in trenches along the fighting line between Germany and France under almost constant artillery fire. It would be almost impossible to hold a naval fleet in one position long enough to completely drive our men from the trenches. Certainly it could not be done until large numbers of the landing soldiers had been slain. But suppose that the artillery from the war vessels was able to drive back our men so as to allow their soldiers to land. It would only be necessary for us to withdraw our soldiers far enough from the seashore to get out of range of the guns where we could reintrench, and then what would 100,000 men do toward conquering the United States on land? How far could they or would they dare to follow our soldiers into the interior?

What kind of an army could we organize in 60 days to meet such an invading army? We have a Regular Army of 80,000 men, a large part of which could be made available in the time that would be necessary for the transportation of this invading force. We now have about 120,000 national guards, all of whom are more or less trained in military tactics and operation. How long would it take to secure a million volunteers to defend our coast against foreign invasion? We now have more than a million arms with which to equip them. I undertake to say, judging from the experiences of the past, that in 60 days the United States could assemble a million men with sufficient training and ability to meet such an invading force. Such an invading force would not dare to leave the protection of their ships and undertake to go inland. Abraham Lincoln was right when he said that all the armies of the world could not water their horses in the Ohio River. Any such force as that which would undertake to penetrate that far would be surrounded, enveloped, and annihilated. Napoleon once said that he had figured out a hundred ways in which to land troops in England, but he never had been able to figure out one way by which he could get them out. Every military man in Europe that has ever contemplated the invasion of the United States has been confronted with Napoleon's dilemma. This may account for the fact that although we have been here now for 125 years no nation has ever yet declared nor, so far as I know, contemplated the declaration of an offensive war on the United States. It will be noticed that in my analysis of this defense I have left out of consideration entirely the American Navy, except such parts of it as might be necessary for scouting the seas and keeping track of the movements of the invading fleet.

But these advocates of increased militarism when confronted by the fact that it is practically impossible for an invading force to approach us from the seas at once say that England could land her troops in Canada and bring them across the border, and there is something sane and sensible in that suggestion. England could send her troops to Canada and mass an army that could attack us on the north, and that is the only place from which we could be endangered. And yet that but reveals the inconsistency of the advocates of armament, fortifications, and big armies. The only place from which an attack could be made is not fortified, and there is not any proposition in their program to fortify it. Here is a line between Canada and the United States that extends for more than 3,000 miles that has not a gun, a fortification, or a soldier, and this bill does not carry a cent for the purpose of increasing the fortifications along the line of our only possible danger of attack. When put to its final analysis it shows that the American people are depending for protection against England not upon her armies, not upon her fortifications, but upon the friendship, good will, and sense of justice of the English people. We are spending millions and millions of money in protecting ourselves against imaginary or impossible enemies and leaving absolutely exposed the only possible point of invasion. The very fact that that line has remained there unprotected and unfortified for a century and a quarter without a single hostile foe having even threatened its passage is the best argument in the world in favor of the proposition that war can best be prevented by amicable relations and adjustments and not by fortifications and armaments. Now, if we really have a nightmare of invasion, if we are hysterical, if we are scared out of our boots, let us be sensible and fortify and protect the only line of possible danger.

But when and where is this mad craze for increased armament going to stop? Every time one nation builds warships it is necessary for every other nation to build others to match them. Every time one nation increases its army it is necessary for other nations to increase theirs. This process has been going on for the last two decades, until it is sapping the financial resources and industrial activities of the people. Already our war expenses have reached the point where 73 cents out of every dollar that is paid by taxes into the Federal Treasury goes into the war chest. Sir Edward Grey said, on March 13, 1911, in the halls of Parliament, that—

If this tremendous expenditure on and rivalry of armaments goes on it must in the long run break civilization down.

In the last two decades Germany has increased its annual war budget in times of peace from $177,000,000 to $313,000,000; Russia has increased from $135,000,000 to $285,000,000; France from $180,000,000 to $233,000,000; Great Britain from $164,000,000 to $312,000,000; Japan from $9,000,000 to $74,000,000; and the United States from $137,000,000 to $409,000,000. Men on this floor talk about the passive unpreparedness of the United States, and yet our war budget is larger than any other nation in the world—almost $100,000,000 more than the largest, that of Germany. I chose the year 1910 as the proper one for comparison because the great powers of the world were then at peace. But while we are still at peace, the war budget of this session of Congress as reported carries nearly $20,000,000 more than it did in 1910. When are we going to reach a stage of defense that will satisfy the hysterical jingoes of this country?

Let us be practical for a moment. If we are going to maintain an army that will fairly match the standing armies of the leading powers of the Old World no one would place it at less than 600,000 men. If it costs $100,000,000 to keep a standing army of 80,000 men, what would it cost to keep a standing army of 600,000 men? Mathematics would tell you that it would cost at least $700,000,000. This would be for mere support. With this vast army, of course, the pension roll would be greatly increased. If we are to build a navy that is ample to protect us under all circumstances on the sea we must have a navy as strong or stronger than the strongest. The construction of such a navy within the next decade would call for an appropriation of at least $200,000,000 annually and would cost at least $300,000,000 a year for support. This, with our pension roll, would make an annual war budget of approximately $1,360,000,000. This would more than exhaust the entire present revenues of the Government, including the postal receipts. These cold figures ought to be sufficient to convince anyone that the American people are unwilling to enter upon a program of complete defense by military and naval prowess.

There are things that will furnish better protection than military preparedness. Nations like individuals can keep out of trouble best by tending to their own business and recognizing and respecting the rights of others. He is a big, brave, strong man that is always ready to defend his rights, but he is a bigger, braver, stronger man who is capable of recognizing and respecting the rights of others. It is a big, brave, strong nation that is ready at all times and under all circumstances to defend its rights, but it is a bigger, braver, and stronger nation that is capable at all times of recognizing and respecting the rights of other nations. It is by this course, and by this course only, that any nation can remain at peace. Justice, equity, humanity, respect for the rights of others are the only things that can secure peace. Armies and armaments do not even make for peace, let alone guarantee it.

But every nation is confronted by the danger of a natural and cultivated war spirit. Human nature is such that it is easy to stir up strife. One hot-headed man can start a riot that 10,000 cool, level-headed men can not stop. One real coward can stir a thrill of terror that a thousand brave men can not quiet. The world is one great magazine of war spirit that is easy to arouse, and when started is almost impossible to control. One schoolboy started a conflagration of war that has involved all Europe, that popes, presidents, sovereigns, and the united prayers of all civilized men can not stop; and if prayer is or can be answered it raises the question as to whether the Almighty Himself can stop it. The flames and passions of war can be easily fanned and the siren of peace becomes almost voiceless before its mad rage.

This situation and condition is utilized by those who are interested financially in the making of instruments of war equipment. In a recent speech made by Dr. Karl Liebknecht in the Reichstag, it was charged that the Krupps had been using their money freely in exploiting patriotism for the same reason and to the same end that manufacturers of other materials spent their money in creating a demand for their wares. It was alleged that this firm, for instance, would go to France and hire some scientific journal to publish an article exploiting the wonderful power of new instruments of war that were being manufactured by France. This in turn was published in all the leading papers of Germany and created a war scare that brought big orders to the Krupps for increased guns. They were constantly having published in foreign papers threats or preparations for war and these were republished at home. In this way they were able to stimulate public sentiment in Germany to the necessity of tremendous war preparations and equipment. After an investigation the substance of these charges were admitted on the floor of the Reichstag by the war minister of Germany. I venture the suggestion that when the real cause of the present terrible war in Europe is finally ascertained it will be found to lie at the door of those large concerns in the various countries that are interested commercially in furnishing war equipment. They have carried on a regular and systematic propaganda for the purpose of arousing envy and hatred between the nations and creating a war spirit at home. I am not without strong suspicions that such forces have been at play during the last two decades at least in the United States. I think the time has fairly arisen when the peace-loving people of this country should take a firm stand against this terrible and indefensible clamor for war, when we should as a Nation turn our attention to the arts, bounties, and blessings of peace, when we should conserve our resources for improving the living conditions of our people rather than wasting them in these fruitless attempts of securing armed peace.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, we have listened for some hours to a rather academic discussion as to whether we are prepared for war or not. Personally, I am far from being a militarist, but I do believe in rational preparedness for emergencies. I, too, have read a little of world history, and I find that no nation is, or ever has been, the sole arbiter of its own destiny. Take the conditions we find in Europe to-day. Six months ago we saw the little country of Belgium—the most densely populated section of the globe, for its area—with its people at peace, engaged in husbandry, in manufactures, in the arts. That little country was suddenly invaded, and its citizens were called upon at a moment's notice to defend themselves against the German invaders. At the same time, over in Asia, was China, the most populous country in the world, with 400,000,000 of people. It represents the oldest civilization on the habitable globe, so far as recorded history goes; yet this nation, with its teeming millions of inhabitants, appealed pathetically to the civilized world to protect it against the invading forces of England and Japan.

As a matter of fact we did not start our own last war, the war with Spain. Spain herself delivered his passports to the American minister and declared war against us. We were not prepared at that time to fight even a poor, weak, decadent nation. Our unpreparedness then has doubtlessly cost us many millions of the dollars that gentlemen have spoken of this afternoon. The very pensions to Spanish-American War soldiers that have been alluded to are in large part due to the unpreparedness of the United States in that conflict. If we had had the proper medical supplies and could have taken care of our boys even in the camps on our own soil, let alone the soil of foreign lands, many of those who fell sick and who incurred incurable diseases would not now find themselves in that sorry plight which compels them to seek a pension from a grateful country.

Crises in national affairs usually come unexpectedly. The war in Europe came like a thunderbolt out of a clear sky. If two or three months earlier any man had predicted such a conflict, he would have been looked upon as a fit subject for a lunatic asylum. But suddenly this great cataclysm burst into existence, and millions of men rushed to the front to fight the battles of their respective fatherlands.

Unfortunately jingoism is found in every country, and it is frequently jingoism that brings on armed conflict. Most of the countries of the world have ministries that resign when defeated in the parliament. If a jingo parliament obtains control of the reins of government, such a parliament can force the nation into war. And even though the disposition of our own people and our own Government were absolutely opposed to an armed conflict it is possible for us to be assailed and compelled to defend ourselves.

I have heard talk of war on this floor in very recent times, from men who are constantly opposing appropriations for moderate preparedness. I recall an incident that occurred about two years ago, when there was a controversy in my own State about the passage by our legislature of an alien land law. The people of California felt that they had a right under our constitution and our laws to regulate the ownership of land in that State. A country on the other side of the Pacific Ocean became intensely excited over the proposed legislation. There were threatening crowds in the streets of that country's capital. Excitement ran high. A gentleman on this floor, who has constantly opposed any appropriation for armament, said that he thoroughly agreed with the position the people of California had taken in this matter. In my own opinion he was right. I believe the people of California had the absolute right to take the stand they did. Then this gentleman went on to say that if the other country was displeased with the action of California and should attempt to interfere with the undoubted rights of the people of that Commonwealth, he, for one, was ready to fight—yes, to go to war to compel that other country to respect our rights. But what did he want to go to war with? He is opposed to armaments, but he was willing to fight in defense of principles he believed to be right. Do you think you can fight unless you have the munitions of war? Unless you have battleships, and cruisers, and submarines, and all the vessels that are required in a modern navy—and unless you have a thoroughly equipped army? And yet the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] was willing to fight another country unless the people of that country were content to accept the views of one of the States of the American Union.

Mr. Chairman, the American people are a race-proud people. We speak with pride of our history, our institutions, our commercial development, our material progress. We glory in our past triumphs and rejoice in the achievements of our martial heroes on land and on sea; and on account of the fact that we have been fortunate and have had success heretofore we are too apt to minimize the necessity for adequate preparedness.

I do not doubt, and no man can doubt, the intense patriotism of the American people. Patriotism, however, is not the only requirement for winning battles. The pages of history are replete with instances where the greatest personal patriotism succumbed on the field of battle to superior forces or better-equipped adversaries. We are too prone in this country to exaggerate our prowess, our fighting ability. The gentleman who spoke a moment ago, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY], delivered a speech on this floor about three or four weeks ago in which he pointed out the impossibility of landing an invading force from the transports of an enemy on the coast of some unprotected bay. He went on to say, as I now recall, that such a thing was impossible; that he could go out to Arkansas and get a regiment of squirrel hunters, take them to the shore of that bay, and just pop off the invaders as they were trying to land.

That kind of talk is pernicious. Did the gentleman ever consider that there would be great battleships of the enemy behind those transports, and that they would be firing 700 and 800 pound shells to drive off and scatter those squirrel hunters? The squirrel hunters would not get within 6 or 8 miles of the shore, and, as a matter of fact, they could not. The heavy shells from the battleships would just drive them inland while the landing was being effected. And yet that kind of bombast is uttered on this floor in the attempt to induce the American people to lull themselves into a belief that there is absolutely no danger from invasion at any time, and that we can drive off an enemy without difficulty and without any preparedness.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. BOOHER. I would like to ask the gentleman what our Navy would be doing at the same time that the transports were landing their men?

Mr. KAHN. The assumption was that we had lost control of the sea.

Mr. BOOHER. Before a gun had been fired?

Mr. KAHN. No; after a disastrous naval battle we had lost control of the sea. The enemy were trying to land their men. That happens, as the gentleman must know, once in a while.

Mr. BOOHER. It does not happen that we have ever been licked.

Mr. KAHN. We have been licked in some fights, but generally we have been successful; thank God for that.

Mr. BOOHER. And I think we will be again.

Mr. KAHN. I have no doubt that if the time shall ever come when the Army and Navy of the United States are called upon to give an account of themselves, we will find them both ready to defend our country and our flag with all the valor that has inspired them in our past conflicts. They will give an account of themselves that will bring a flush of pride to their admiring countrymen. But all the same I still believe that the old saying, "Trust in God, but keep your powder dry," applies in our day even as it did in the early days of the Republic, and I for one want a good deal of reserve powder to be kept dry.

Now, I recall one occasion in the Committee on Military Affairs when we were taking up this very question of possible invasion, and one of my colleagues said, "Oh, there is no danger; we will sweep them off into the Pacific Ocean with brooms." Well, we will find out that any nation that picks a quarrel with us and goes to war with us will not be fighting us with brooms. We will have to meet them with the same kind of weapons that they have, and, if possible, better ones. I heard a great deal, about two years ago, about the great work for world's peace that was going to be performed by the two good ships, Fellowship and Friendship. I think they were both scuttled at Vera Cruz. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. BOOHER. The gentleman has not given up all hope yet that good-fellowship and good friendship will yet reign in the world?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, good-fellowship and good friendship are mighty fine qualities to possess, not only for individuals, but even for nations; but, unfortunately, the selfishness that has been referred to repeatedly on this floor this afternoon still dominates the breasts of many individuals and even the rulers of nations. Therefore, we must be practical and take conditions as they are, and prepare ourselves accordingly.

Mr. BOOHER. Just one more question. The gentleman from California has not given up all hope of a final court of arbitration to settle questions between nations, has he?

Mr. KAHN. I am hoping there may be a court of arbitration some day, but even if we want to enforce the decrees of that court we will have to have ships of war and armed forces to do it, because the decrees of the court will never enforce themselves.

Mr. BOOHER. Then, the gentleman means to say that a nation that would enter into this arbitration agreement would not keep its contract with the other nations?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, I have seen nations tear up treaties as though they were scraps of paper, and I believe that even with the establishment of a court of arbitration every nation will still have to maintain a part of the world's police force in order to enforce the decrees of that court.

Mr. BOOHER. The gentleman does not believe that to enforce those decrees it would be necessary for this Government of ours to increase our standing army?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, I have not favored the increase of the standing army. I have never at any time favored the increase of the standing army. I have said that I am not a militarist, but for all that I believe in being prepared for possible emergencies.

Mr. BOOHER. The gentleman is in favor of an adequate defense?

Mr. KAHN Absolutely.

Mr. FARR. And have we an adequate defense?

Mr. KAHN. No, we have not.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. In reference to these treaties of peace, does not the gentleman think if they serve no other good purpose, they serve the purpose of permitting us to become very much better prepared while we are parleying about this?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I have no fear of any early trouble with any foreign country. And yet I recognize the fact that rulers and cabinets and peoples are all human, with all human frailties and passions, and emotions, and failings. We hope that we may never again be embroiled in war, but the best thing to do, in my judgment, is to be so well equipped that in case any country wants to engage in war with us that country will think twice or even three times before it undertakes to pick a quarrel with us.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio, Judge GARD, who, until very recently, was a very distinguished member of the Committee on Military Affairs, and we all have the highest regard for him, told the House this afternoon that the question of national defense is not a partisan question. I fully agree with that sentiment. It never should be a partisan question. Partisanship should never be injected into the question of the national defense, and yet I was greatly surprised a week ago or thereabouts to read in the newspapers that the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy had invited the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the chairman of the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee on fortifications to a conference on national defense. Not a single Member of the minority upon this floor was invited to that conference. I complain of that. If the national defense is not a partisan matter, and it should not be, then conferences of that character for discussing the question of a national defense ought to include Members of the minority. [Applause on the Republican side.] A gentleman on this floor, discussing the matter a few days ago with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], referred to the national defense as a partisan matter. I refer now to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON]. He asked the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] why the latter's party had allowed the conditions that he was complaining of to continue while the Republicans were in control of Congress. Thus the gentleman from Alabama sought to bring partisanship into the discussion. As a matter of fact, under the domination of the Republican majority, many things were done for our military preparedness. The reorganization of the Army was brought about, and the law creating the staff corps was enacted.

Most of the great coast-defense guns were emplaced. Mine planters were constructed and put into all the principal harbors of the United States so as to enable the coast-defense artillerymen at those ports to receive instruction in mining and defending those harbors in case of invasion. We even accumulated a considerable reserve of medical supplies, clothing, ammunition, rifles, and field artillery. And the only time that these reserves were eaten into was when the Democrats secured a majority in the House of Representatives and thus obtained control of the Committee on Military Affairs in the Sixty-second Congress. It was then that for the first time in the history of the committee and the House the reserve supplies were eaten into. I had not intended to refer to these matters, but when Members try to force partisanship into the discussion I think the truth ought to be told. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman mean that if this were a nonpartisan arrangement he would not tell the truth? Is that the advantage of nonpartisanship in these matters?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, no; I think the gentleman himself knows that the truth will be brought out, no matter whether Republicans or Democrats control the committee, and it is a good thing for the country that the truth be told. There has never been any desire on the part of the Republican members of the committee to hide the truth, and I know that there is no disposition on the part of the Democratic members of the committee to hide or distort the truth.

We have always worked in absolute harmony on questions of the national defense, and it has been rarely that a minority report has been brought in from the Committee on Military Affairs. The only occasion I can recall is when the attempt was made to increase the term of enlistment; and Members still differ, and honestly differ, as to what good, if any, has been accomplished by having changed the term of enlistment from three to four years.

A great deal has been said on this floor to-day, as well as on other occasions, to the effect that 70 cents on every dollar of taxation is now being expended for armament or for wars past and preparation for wars to come. Mr. Chairman, much of that expenditure is due to the large cost that was incurred by the people of the United States on account of their unpreparedness at the outset of hostilities in our past wars. But that cost is not a fair argument in favor of shutting off necessary military and naval supplies. I recall that in the early days of the Republic a similar argument was made against the continuation of the courts. Arguing from a similar viewpoint, there were many Americans who wanted to close the courts of the land because 50 cents out of every dollar that was collected from the taxpayers of the country was being used to run the courts of the 13 States. Men rose in the Continental Congress in those days—yes, and in the State legislatures—and urged that the courts be closed on account of this great expenditure of public money for their maintenance.

Sir, it is much cheaper to build up our military defenses in times of peace and the taxpayers' burden will be much lighter than if we await the opening of actual hostilities before we begin the necessary preparation for the national defense. The present cost of the Army is largely due to the increase of the military forces after the Spanish-American War and to the increase of the pay of officers and enlisted men. I may say in that connection that our country is practically the only country in the world that makes a soldier's life a career for its citizens. That is why we are spending so much money for the Army. We pay $15 a month to the enlisted man during the first enlistment, with increased pay and bonuses for subsequent enlistments, and retire him at three-fourths pay after 30 years' service. Why, this very bill carries $2,850,000 for the pay of enlisted men on the retired list of the United States Army. We do not want conscription in this country. No man wants to see a great armed camp in the United States.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. How does our pay to the private soldiers compare with the pay to the private soldiers in the armies of the other important nations of the world?

Mr. KAHN. England is the only other country that pays any considerable sum. I believe England pays something like $8 a month to her enlisted men, but in the armies of continental Europe the pay is about 60 cents a month to the soldier—about 2 cents a day. The countries that have conscription laws work upon the principle that it is the duty of every male citizen to defend the home and the fatherland. That is the principle upon which their system is founded, and they demand two years' service in the Army—in some of the countries three years' service—of every male citizen capable of bearing arms. The people of the United States would never consent to a proposition of that kind in this country.

But I do believe that we could form a very large reserve force in the United States that would come to the colors upon the first call of the President; a reserve of men who will have had at least one year's service in the Regular Army, and possibly two years.

In other words, I believe that we ought to reduce the term of enlistment to a period of not exceeding two years, with the right of a soldier to receive an honorable discharge at the end of one year. Gentlemen on this floor say that we can not build up an army of that character in the United States—that we can not turn out fully trained soldiers in two years. That statement discounts the ability of the American boy. Let me give you a bit of history.

In 1808 the treaty of Tilsit was signed between Napoleon Bonaparte and the King of Prussia. Under the terms of that treaty Prussia was restricted to an army of 42,000 men. She was not allowed to have any more soldiers than that, and these 42,000 men were to be distributed in her infantry, cavalry, and artillery organizations. She had a great general at the head of her War Department at that time, General von Scharnhorst. He was backed up in his plans by the great premier of Prussia, Baron Stein. They had to accept the humiliating terms that were imposed by Napoleon. They agreed to the army of 42,000 men. But Scharnhorst pointed out that the treaty did not state that those 42,000 men would have to be kept in the Army until they died. So he decided that a large percentage of 42,000 men could be discharged every year, and that new men could be enlisted to take their places immediately, so that the army could be kept up to a maximum enlisted strength of 42,000 men, while large numbers of men who had had a year's military training, could be sent back to the body of the citizenship of that country. Thus they could maintain the terms of the treaty and still build up a good-sized army reserve. They carried out that program.

Then, in the closing years of the Napoleonic wars, if history has been properly recorded, we recall that late in the afternoon of June 18, 1815, the Prussians, led by Blucher, came on the field of Waterloo and completed the downfall of the great Napoleon. Blucher's army was recruited from the thousands who had served a short period in the Prussian army under Sharnhorst's plan. They had all had military training, and on the call to arms they had promptly responded to the colors. [Applause.] And on that memorable afternoon they won the final victory for the allied forces against the flower of Napoleon's grand army, the "old guard."

Mr. Chairman, why can not the American youth be turned out a good soldier at the end of one or two years? I am satisfied that if the Prussian boy can make a good soldier in that brief period, certainly the American boy can make as good a soldier in that time. [Applause.] And I would not have the American boy tied to the Army by a hard and fast agreement that he must come to arms in time of trouble. I would trust to his love of and devotion to his country and Old Glory to bring him to the colors in the hour of need. When I would give him his honorable discharge from the Military Service I would say to him, "Take it, my son. We hope we will never again need your services. You now have an honorable discharge from the Army of the United States. But should the god of battles ever decree that the United States should require of her sons that they should fly to the colors in defense of Old Glory and the homes and firesides of the Nation, we hope that you will promptly return to the ranks and give your country the benefit of the training that you have received." [Applause.] And I am satisfied that they would return to the colors by the thousands, yes, by the hundreds of thousands.

Mr. Chairman, with that force and the force of the Regular Army and the force of the Organized Militia, we could put into the field within a week after a declaration of war a half million men who had had ample training to fit them for a first line of defense and who could hold at bay any possible invaders until the volunteer forces of the United States could be properly trained in the manual of arms and in preparedness for a campaign.

Mr. Chairman, something has been said here about the contest that is now going on in Europe. A great soldier died about two months ago in France. He was an English soldier—Lord Roberts. For years he had been dinning into the ears of the English people the fact of their absolute unpreparedness so far as their military establishment was concerned. But his words fell upon deaf ears. His countrymen did not listen to his words of counsel and advice. What has been the consequence? So far as her land forces are concerned, England has not been able to give a real helping hand to her allies in the present struggle. The brunt of battle has been borne by Belgians, by Frenchmen, and by Russians, and not, as a rule, by Englishmen.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield? One or two of the Members have suggested that there might be an error in the statement as to nationality. Lord Roberts was an Irishman.

Mr. KAHN. He was the head of the English Army. I know that he was born in Ireland. He made a good soldier, as the Irishmen invariably do. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, there is another way in which I think our Army Establishment could be materially improved. I think the law which compels the retirement of officers at the age of 64 years ought to be amended. I think officers should be continued much longer than that in the regular service. A man at 64 is still capable of giving his country excellent service and can materially help in solving the great problems of a military character that confront the American people. As I stated a short while ago, the great officers in the titanic struggle going on in Europe to-day are men practically every one of whom is beyond 64 years of age. Our retired officers have been educated by the Government. They have been trained by years of experience to that standard of excellence that will enable them effectively to do the work which they have chosen as a life career, and the country ought to have the benefit of their services far beyond the sixty-fourth year of their lives.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to detain the committee any longer. I believe this European war will have an excellent effect upon the military establishment of the United States, so far as educating the American people for preparedness is concerned. We are learning much about the flying machine, the aeroplane forces. We will continue to learn many things in that direction. We have learned already the practical use of armored automobiles, and we will learn much more about them. We are painfully deficient in that branch of our military service, but we expect to have a force of that kind attached to the Army of the United States that will at least make a beginning in the right direction. The pending bill makes appropriation for the inauguration of such a force. We must keep abreast of the times in military preparedness. A little expenditure of money now will save enormous extravagances in case we should be thrown into possible hostilities at any time in the future.

I do not believe, as I said, in an enormous military establishment; but such as we have ought to be the very best on earth. It ought to be so perfect that it can be extended and expanded without difficulty or delay. And then if war should come, we would be ready, so far as our first line of defense is concerned, to meet the emergency promptly and effectively.

The bill that is before us is, in my judgment, a fair bill. It takes proper care of all the various branches of the Army; and while the sum appropriated is a little larger than was the sum appropriated under the last appropriation bill, I feel satisfied that the needs of the country warrant the slight increase, and that from the funds thus appropriated material benefit will accrue, not only to the Army and to the military establishment, but to all the people of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TAVENNER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois does not seem to be present. The Clerk will read the bill.

Mr. HAY. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that the Clerk read the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRYAN. I would like the RECORD to show how the time stands.

The CHAIRMAN. Thirty minutes were not used. Does the gentleman desire recognition?

Mr. HAY. I have the floor, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BRYAN. No; I do not desire recognition, unless as much as 40 minutes remained, which could be used by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TAVENNER].

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1916.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 20347, the Army appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. STOUT, as requested by Mr. EVANS, for three days, on account of illness.

To Mr. RAINEY, for five days, to accompany to Illinois the remains of S. A. Murdock, an employee of the House, who died on Tuesday night.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR SUNDAY SESSION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair assigns the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BAKER] to preside next Sunday at the memorial exercises on account of the death of the late Mr. BREMNER, of New Jersey.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen may have five legislative days in which to print or extend their remarks on the Army appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 20241) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year 1915 and prior years, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the accompanying statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minority leader I would like to ask the gentleman from New York whether there is anything in this conference report that will take any considerable time, and whether he has consulted the minority leader with reference to it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I spoke to the minority leader yesterday, and thought I would endeavor to get the report up yesterday by unanimous consent without printing, and he said he would not object, but we had to wait until the Senate acted upon it. I do not think there is anything in the agreement to which anybody has objection, and my reason for calling it up to-night is that the Department of Agriculture is very anxious to get the appropriation for the suppression of the foot-and-mouth disease.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Is it a unanimous report?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], the minority representative, signed the report.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Did he desire to be present when the report was considered?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did not speak to him about that, but I do not believe that he desires to discuss it. There were only four amendments. One amendment involved an appropriation in which there was a disagreement, and that was the item for the employees for the collection of the war-revenue tax. The House recommended $75,000 and the Senate put in $180,000. The conferees agreed on $100,000.

There was one item of $1,200 for rent in North Carolina, an actual deficiency. Then there was an amendment by the Senate authorizing the widening of Fourteenth Street between F Street and Pennsylvania Avenue, and that has been eliminated. There was also an item referring to the Panama Canal, which merely makes available money to do certain work at once. So that there were no matters of any great importance in controversy between the two Houses.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will read the statement.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1306).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20241) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1915 and prior years, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 3.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1 and 5 and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$100,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amended paragraph insert the following:

"For the emergency caused by the infectious nature and continued spread of the destructive disease of citrous trees known as citrus canker, by conducting such investigations of the nature and means of communication of the disease, and by applying such methods of eradication or control of the disease as in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture may be necessary, $35,000; and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to pay such expense and employ such persons and means, and to cooperate with such authorities of the States concerned, organizations of growers, or individuals, as he may deem necessary to accomplish such purpose."

And the Senate agree to the same.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
C. L. BARTLETT,
F. H. GILLETT,
Managers on the part of the House.
LEE S. OVERMAN,
N. P. BRYAN,
REED SMOOT,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The Clerk read the statement, as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House, at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20241) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1915 and prior years, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to each of the said amendments, namely:

On amendment No. 1: Appropriates $1,200, as proposed by the Senate, for rent of temporary quarters for Government officials at Raleigh, N. C.

On amendment No. 2: Appropriates $100,000, instead of $75,000 proposed by the House and $180,000 proposed by the Senate, for salaries and expenses of collectors of internal revenue.

On amendment No. 3: Strikes out the paragraph, proposed by the Senate, authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to increase the width of the roadway of Fourteenth Street between F Street and Pennsylvania Avenue NW., and to repave the street with asphalt or asphalt block.

On amendment No. 4: Limits the amount to be used for personal services of the appropriation of $35,000 for eradication of citrus canker to employment of persons outside of the city of Washington.

On amendment No. 5: Inserts the paragraph, proposed by the Senate, constituting one fund of the appropriations heretofore made for the "Fortification of the Panama Canal."

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
C. L. BARTLETT,
F. H. GILLETT,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 7 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, January 22, 1915, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination and survey of channel at Seadrift, Tex., with a view to providing a suitable connection with the Texas coast waterway (H. Doc. No. 1511), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. VINSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 21089) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1307), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. PARK: A bill (H. R. 21090) to prevent cheating and swindling in interstate and foreign commerce; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. DIES: A bill (H. R. 21091) to make Beaumont, Tex., a subport of entry; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, a bill (H. R. 21092) to make Orange, Tex., a subport of entry; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. FRENCH: A bill (H. R. 21093) to extend the franking privilege to the American National Red Cross; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, a bill (H. R. 21094) to amend section — of an act defining matter that may be admitted to second-class mail privileges; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. MOTT: A bill (H. R. 21095) to increase the military strength of the United States; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. PORTER: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 407) to prohibit the export of wheat and the products thereof; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. SMITH of New York: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 408) to establish the priority of discovery of the North Pole and the region contiguous thereto; to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. SMITH of Maryland: Resolution (H. Res. 709) providing for action by Congress to increase the postal revenue; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. SMITH of Texas: Resolution (H. Res. 710) to amend the rules of the House of Representatives; to the Committee on Rules.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause I of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. VINSON: A bill (H. R. 21089) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors; to the Committee of the Whole House.

By Mr. AINEY: A bill (H. R. 21096) granting an increase of pension to Calvin C. Halsey; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BOOHER: A bill (H. R. 21097) granting an increase of pension to Eliza J. Michaels; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BORLAND: A bill (H. R. 21098) granting a pension to Lida W. Ashton; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 21099) granting a pension to Ella C. Squires; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 21100) granting a pension to Julia A. Sheck; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 21101) granting an increase of pension to Ann M. Ellenberger; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 21102) granting an increase of pension to Sarah H. Hunter; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 21103) granting an increase of pension to William S. King; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 21104) granting an increase of pension to Lucy M. Settle; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 21105) granting an increase of pension to Joseph J. Massey; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FRENCH: A bill (H. R. 21106) for the relief of Edward B. Sappington and William Vane; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois: A bill (H. R. 21107) granting an increase of pension to Daniel Hinkle; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 21108) granting an increase of pension to Charles W. Lair; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island: A bill (H. R. 21109) granting an increase of pension to Henry Marsden; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KEY of Ohio: A bill (H. R. 21110) granting an increase of pension to Adam Exline; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 21111) granting an increase of pension to Jeffrey Williams; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LESHER: A bill (H. R. 21112) granting a pension to Angeline Kelchner Wolfe; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MITCHELL: A bill (H. R. 21113) providing for the refund of duties collected on flax-preparatory machines, parts, and accessories, such as described in the act of Congress approved February 7, 1913, imported subsequently to August 5, 1909, and prior to January 1, 1911; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. MOORE: A bill (H. R. 21114) granting a pension to Mary A. Scott; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. POU: A bill (H. R. 21115) for the relief of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. RAINEY: A bill (H. R. 21116) granting an increase of pension to John N. King; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ROUSE: A bill (H. R. 21117) granting a pension to Fannie Baird; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. UNDERHILL: A bill (H. R. 21118) granting an increase of pension to John S. Early; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 21119) granting an increase of pension to John Heimroth; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WINGO: A bill (H. R. 21120) granting an increase of pension to Mary Willhoff; to the Committee on Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. ASHBROOK: Petition of John J. Stein, New Philadelphia; John J. Kaserman and Joseph Schwitzer Delaware; F. V. W. Trott, Coshocton; Martin Ahner, Blissfield; L. C. Geib, Millersburg; D. E. Garver, Wooster; Julius Eck and G. Arnold, Coshocton, all in the State of Ohio, favoring the passage of House joint resolution 377; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. BAILEY: Petitions of Bert S. Overdorff and J. W. Lint, of Johnstown, Pa., and Levi B. McGregor, of Altoona, Pa., protesting against amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill relative to freedom of the press; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, petitions of Pennsylvania German Catholic Societies, of Johnstown, and Washington Camp, No. 60, Patriotic Order Sons of America, Altoona, Pa., favoring passage of resolution to prohibit export of munitions of war by the United States; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin: Petition of E. J. Czamansbe, E. A. Schatz, and 165 other citizens of the village of Randolph, Wis., asking for the passage at this session of Senate bill 6688 or any similar measure to levy an embargo on all contraband of war save foodstuffs only; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition of Charles Marschall and 15 other citizens of Theresa, Wis., asking for the passage of Senate bill 6688 or any similar resolution or bill to levy an embargo on all material useful in war, save foodstuffs, wearing apparel, and surgical supplies only; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition of Rev. A. Werr and 33 other citizens of Brownsville, Wis., asking for the passage of Senate bill 6688, or any similar measure, to levy an embargo upon all contraband of war, save foodstuffs only; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition signed by Franz Radloff and 162 other citizens of the city of Plymouth, Wis., asking for the passage at this session of House joint resolution 377, to levy an embargo on and prohibit the exportation of arms and munitions of war to any of the European countries now at war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition of Rev. J. W. Halboth and 52 other citizens of Cascade, Wis., asking for the passage of Senate bill 6688, or any similar measure, to levy an embargo on all material useful in war save foodstuffs and wearing apparel and surgical supplies only; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, resolutions adopted by St. Joseph's Society, of Newburg, Washington County, Wis., composed of 69 members, asking for the passage at this session of House joint resolution 377, to levy an embargo upon and prohibit the exportation of arms, ammunition, etc., to any of the belligerent European nations; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, resolutions adopted by Port Washington Branch of the German-American National Society, representing 86 citizens, asking for the passage of a law at this session of Congress that will enable the President of the United States to lay an embargo upon all contraband of war save and excepting foodstuffs only; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. CARY: Petition of George Munclegler, George Kappel, H. Burkard, Alois Stephen, Charles Fischer, August Dellmam, Albert Schacht, H. Eggebrecht, Reinhard Ruhnke, William Jordon, and 176 others, all residents of Milwaukee, Wis., urging the passage of House joint resolution 377; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. CLINE: Petitions of citizens of the twelfth congressional district of Indiana, urging the passage of House joint resolution 377; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. CRAMTON: Petitions of Ludwig C. Schober and 30 others of New Haven; Ferd Zielesch, of Allenton; Eugene Moser, of Mount Clemens; Henry Ortmann, of Washington, and William Paetow, of Romeo, all in the State of Michigan, in support of House joint resolution 377, proposing to prohibit exportation of arms, etc.; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition of board of supervisors of St. Clair County, Mich., favoring embargo upon shipment of foodstuffs from this country during the present European war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. DALE: Petition of William H. Taylor, of New York City, protesting against the amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill relative to freedom of the press; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, memorial of German, Austrian, Hungarian, and Irish Alliance of America, favoring resolution prohibiting export of munitions of war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, memorial of priests of the Scranton (Pa.) diocese, relative to excluding from the mails publication called the Menace; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. DILLON: Petitions of citizens of Ramona, Parker, and Delmont, S. Dak., favoring passage of House joint resolution 377, prohibiting export of munitions of war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. ESCH: Petition of Rev. E. G. A. Wachholz and 24 citizens of Lyndon Station, Wis., urging passage of House joint resolution 377, relative to export of munitions of war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. FESS: Petition of sundry citizens of Urbana, Ohio, protesting against amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania: Memorial of priests of the Scranton (Pa.) diocese, protesting against publication called the Menace through the mails; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. GREEN of Iowa: Petition of numerous citizens of Atlantic, Iowa, urging the passage of House joint resolution 377; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island: Petition of Annabel L. Berry, of Newport, R. I., and Rev. L. L. Daniel, of Providence, R. I., favoring Owen-Palmer child-labor bill; to the Committee on Labor.

Also, petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Rhode Island, favoring passage of bill for censorship of moving pictures; to the Committee on Education.

Also, petition of Arthur Carney, of Providence, R. I., protesting against persecution of Catholic priests and sisters in Mexico; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition of J. L. Jenks, of Pawtucket, R. I., favoring Palmer-Owen child-labor bill; to the Committee on Labor.

Also, petition of John J. Shanley, of Providence, R. I., favoring protection for Catholics in Mexico; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, memorial of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Rhode Island, favoring passage of House bill 1864; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey: Petition of Glos Narodu, of Jersey City, N. J., protesting against the Smith-Burnett immigration bill; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. LOBECK: Petition from 94 citizens of Omaha, Nebr., favoring an amendment to our present Federal game law allowing an open season of 20 days in the spring of each year for hunting on rivers, lakes, and streams; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, petition of 150 members of St. Peter's Verein, of Omaha, Nebr., favoring legislation to prohibit export of arms; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. LONERGAN: Letter of Oscar Becker, secretary of St. Stephen's Benevolent Society, Elmwood, Conn., in re legislation prohibiting the sale of munitions of war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. McCLELLAN: Petition of Guy Cochran and Owen Barnard, of Kingston, N. Y., against amendment offered by Representative FITZGERALD to Post Office appropriation bill; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, petition of John Reis and 142 others, of Kingston, N. Y., favoring prohibition of export of munitions of war by the United States; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. MAGUIRE of Nebraska: Memorial of 300 members of Teutonia Lodge, of Nebraska City, Nebr., favoring resolution prohibiting export of munitions of war by the United States; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. MAHAN: Petitions of sundry citizens of Norwich, Conn., favoring the adoption of House joint resolution 377, to prohibit the export of munitions of war by the United States; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. MOORE: Memorial of Philadelphia (Pa.) Board of Trade, protesting against the railway-mail-pay provision of the Post Office appropriation bill; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. SCULLY: Petition of Branch 497 of the Polish National Alliance of the borough of South River, N. J., protesting against Smith-Burnett immigration bill; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. J. M. C. SMITH: Protest of H. A. Stafford and 87 citizens of Kalamazoo, 7 citizens of Grand Rapids, 1 citizen of Martin, and 1 citizen of Comstock, all in the State of Michigan, against amendment to Post Office appropriation bill; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, petition of F. H. Seitz and 25 citizens of Hillsdale, favoring Senate bill 6688, to prohibit export of arms; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. TALCOTT of New York: Petition of Polish National Alliance, Branch No. 447, Utica, N. Y., against Smith-Burnett immigration bill; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Also, petition of citizens of Little Falls, N. Y.; also of A. B. Russell and D. C. Markham, of Ilion, N. Y., favoring Senate bill 3672, providing for cession to State of New York of certain lands in the bed of the Harlem Ship Canal heretofore ceded to the United States; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. UNDERHILL: Petition of citizens of Los Angeles, Cal., favoring observance of strict neutrality by the United States; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition of Branch 1281, Polish National Alliance, Elmira, N. Y., against Smith-Burnett immigration bill; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. VOLLMER: Petition of Federation of Evangelical Brotherhoods of St. Louis, Mo., and M. G. V. Aurora, of Newark, N. J., and 925 American citizens, favoring resolution prohibiting export of war materials; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 22, 1915.

(Legislative day of Friday, January 15, 1915.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary (James M. Baker) read the following communication:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D. C., January 22, 1915.

To the Senate:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate, I appoint Hon. NATHAN P. BRYAN, a Senator from the State of Florida, to perform the duties of the Chair during my absence.

JAMES P. CLARKE,
President pro Tempore.

Mr. BRYAN thereupon took the chair as Presiding Officer.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 6856) to authorize the United States, acting through a shipping board, to subscribe to the capital stock of a corporation to be organized under the laws of the United States or of a State thereof or of the District of Columbia, to purchase, construct, equip, maintain, and operate merchant vessels in the foreign trade of the United States, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRYAN in the chair). The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], having preferred a request for a unanimous-consent agreement, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Oliver	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Hollis	Overman	Smoot
Brady	Johnson	Page	Sterling
Bryan	Jones	Perkins	Stone
Catron	Kenyon	Pittman	Swanson
Chamberlain	Kern	Poindexter	Thomas
Clark, Wyo.	La Follette	Reed	Thompson
Culberson	Lane	Robinson	Thornton
Cummins	Lea, Tenn.	Saulsbury	Townsend
Dillingham	McLean	Shafroth	Vardaman
du Pont	Martin, Va.	Sheppard	Warren
Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Sherman	White
Gallinger	Myers	Shields	Williams
Gronna	Nelson	Smith, Ga.

Mr. THORNTON. I was requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators have responded to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] makes a request for unanimous consent, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] asks unanimous consent that on Thursday, January 28, 1915, the Senate will vote upon any amendment that may be pending or that may be offered to the bill (S. 6856) to authorize the United States, acting through a shipping board, to subscribe to the capital stock of a corporation, etc., and that before adjournment on that day the Senate will also vote upon the bill itself, through the regular parliamentary stages, to its final disposition.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I object to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], upon which the yeas and nays have been demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the question be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the bill the consideration of which has been moved by the Senator from Michigan. It is the so-called omnibus claims bill.

The SECRETARY. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill H. R. 8846, its title being "An act making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, and under the provisions of section 151 of the act approved March 3, 1911, commonly known as the Judicial Code."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr.

O'GORMAN]. He is not in the Chamber and I will for the present withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Announcing my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] and its transfer to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON], I vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). Has the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not, the Chair is informed.

Mr. THOMAS. I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I inquire if the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] has voted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I have a pair with that Senator and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and vote "yea."

Mr. HOLLIS. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS (after having voted in the negative). I observe that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], with whom I have a general pair, is not in the Chamber. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. LEE] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. WEEKS (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], who, I understand, has not voted. I transfer my pair to the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] and let my vote stand.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]; and

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS].

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 38, as follows:

YEAS—28.

Bankhead	Dillingham	Nelson	Smoot
Brady	du Pont	Oliver	Sterling
Burton	Gallinger	Page	Sutherland
Camden	Gronna	Perkins	Townsend
Catron	Jones	Poindexter	Vardaman
Clark, Wyo.	Lodge	Sherman	Warren
Colt	McLean	Shields	Weeks

NAYS—38.

Ashurst	Johnson	Pittman	Smith, Md.
Bryan	Kenyon	Pomerene	Stone
Chamberlain	Kern	Ransdell	Swanson
Culberson	La Follette	Reed	Thomas
Cummins	Lane	Robinson	Thompson
Fletcher	Martin, Va.	Saulsbury	Thornton
Gore	Martine, N. J.	Shafroth	White
Hardwick	Myers	Sheppard	Williams
Hitchcock	Norris	Simmons
Hollis	Overman	Smith, Ga.

NOT VOTING—30.

Borah	Fall	McCumber	Smith, Mich.
Brandegee	Goff	Newlands	Smith, S. C.
Bristow	Hughes	O'Gorman	Stephenson
Burleigh	James	Owen	Tillman
Chilton	Lea, Tenn.	Penrose	Walsh
Clapp	Lee, Md.	Root	Works
Clarke, Ark.	Lewis	Shively
Crawford	Lippitt	Smith, Ariz.

So Mr. TOWNSEND's motion was rejected.

Mr. GRONNA. I am directed by the Joint Committee on Federal Aid in the Construction of Post Roads to submit a report, and ask to have it printed. I request unanimous consent to submit the report at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I listened with more than ordinary interest to the lecture delivered by the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] last evening. In so far as I am concerned, I would not keep my Democratic friends in the Chamber by force, if I could, and I could not if I would. I very earnestly hope that they will remain and hear what I have to say, for I frankly confess that it would be a high inspiration and a great encouragement if they were to do me the honor to listen to the observations I am about to make; but if they are of the opinion that the monition of the President is controlling or that the Secretary of the Treasury has said the last and only word upon this great subject, then I must suffer the consequences of that conclusion.

I desire, however, that it shall be distinctly understood that whatever other Senators may regard to be their duty, for myself I intend to discuss this measure in a legitimate way, without the slightest thought or intention of unduly prolonging the debate.

Mr. President, my observations upon the bill now under consideration will, in the main, be confined to an examination of the measure itself and a discussion of the obvious reasons for its rejection; but inasmuch as it is a part of the program which the President has prepared for Congress and is claimed by him to be a long stride in a highly progressive movement which he is leading, and inasmuch as I look upon it as one of the most reactionary and dangerous proposals ever made public, I intend in the very beginning to inquire into the title of this administration to the character and reputation which the Chief Executive so confidently asserts.

Mr. President, it is not my purpose at this time to add another reply to the President's unfortunate speech at Indianapolis, although I shall feel compelled to refer to certain parts of it in discussing the extraordinary proposal for the purchase or construction and the operation of merchant ships now before the Senate. I permit no man to go before me in devotion to the principles of the Republican Party, and naturally any legitimate thing which tends toward the restoration of the party to national power awakens more than a passing interest.

There is much in the address to which I have referred which, as a mere partisan, I read with the utmost satisfaction, for no one will long doubt that its effect has been, and will continue to be, to strengthen the Republican cause. I confess, however, that when I had finished it my pleasure as a partisan was lost in my disappointment and regret as a citizen. Its general tone is so far below the standard which, happily for the people of the country, has been established for a presidential utterance that the common conclusion must be that we have fallen upon evil days if the Chief Executive of a great Nation believes that such a deliverance can either advance or steady an administration already tottering toward its fall. I predict that it will pass into history as a lamentable attempt of a President to forget the courtesy and dignity always looked for in one who occupies the most exalted office in the world, and the dismal effort of a man of mature age to change the habit of a lifetime in order to win momentary applause. Before I close I may take occasion to present some proof of the criticism I have just made, but at this moment I desire only to refer to his argument, if it may be called one, upon the bill we are now considering. The President said:

> Do you know, gentlemen, that the ocean freight rates have gone up in some instances to ten times their ordinary figure, and that the farmers of the United States—those who raise grain and those who raise cotton, these things that are absolutely necessary to the world as well as to ourselves—can not get any profit out of the great prices that they are willing to pay for these things on the other side of the sea because the whole profit is eaten up by the extortionate charges for ocean carriage? In the midst of this the Democrats propose a temporary measure of relief in a shipping bill.
>
> The merchants and the farmers of this country must have ships to carry their goods, and just at the present moment there is no other way of getting them than through the instrumentality that is suggested in the shipping bill; and I hear it said in Washington on all hands that the Republicans in the United States Senate mean to talk enough to make the passage of that bill impossible.
>
> SAYS MINORITY DEFIES NATION.
>
> These self-styled friends of business, these men who say the Democratic Party does not know what to do for business, are saying that the Democrats shall do nothing for business. I challenge them to show their right to stand in the way of the release of American products to the rest of the world. Who commissioned them, a minority, a lessening minority? For they will be in a greater minority in the next Senate than in this. You know it is the peculiarity of that great body that it has rules of procedure which make it possible for a minority to defy the Nation; and these gentlemen are now seeking to defy the Nation and prevent the release of American products to the suffering world, which needs them more than it ever needed them before. Their credentials as friends of business and friends of America will be badly discredited if they succeed.

In this connection it is interesting to note what the President says of the general make-up and permanent purposes of the two great political parties. I quote again:

> What seems to me perfectly evident is this, that if you made a rough reckoning you would have to admit that only about one-third of the Republican Party is progressive; and you would also have to admit that about two-thirds of the Democratic Party is progressive. Therefore the independent progressive voter finds a great deal more company in the Democratic ranks than in the Republican ranks.

SOME DEMOCRATS HOLDING BACK.

I say a great deal more because there are Democrats who are sitting on the breeching strap; there are Democrats who are holding back. There are Democrats who are nervous. I dare say they were born with that temperament. And I respect the conservative temper. I claim to be an animated conservative myself, because being a conservative I understand to mean a man not only who preserves what is best in the Nation but who sees that in order to preserve it you dare not stand still, but must move forward. For the virtue of America is not statical; it is dynamic. All the forces of America are forces in action or else they are forces of inertia.

These extracts, Mr. President, furnish an excellent perspective for the picture, drawn by the President of progressivism in the abstract and of its application to a particular subject. Whether I am entitled to the honorable distinction of a Progressive Republican I leave others to say, but I have been so classified—by some in terms of compliment, by some in terms of disparagement. Without passing upon the validity of my own title, I am connected closely enough with the movement out of which the name grew to feel a profound interest in the subject brought forward by the President in praise of his administration and in censure of those who are unwilling to accept either his definition or his application of the spirit of progressivism in the government of the people of the United States.

I have faithfully attempted to rid myself of all partisanship in the work of the Senate. I have voted sometimes against the administration and sometimes with it; but it is my deliberate judgment that, taken as a whole, the course of the President has in two years turned back the hands upon the dial of progress so far that his party will not again be intrusted with the timepiece of the twentieth century. His primary understanding of a progressive is one who has the disposition to be doing something, and I quite agree with him that a progressive is a man who has the courage to go straight forward, without fear or favor, trying to better the institutions and laws of his country; but a man can be just as busy doing wrong things as right things, and the progressive must not only be willing to do things but they must be the right things; that is to say, they must tend toward justice, opportunity, equality, humanity, and prosperity.

The fact that the quotations I have already read have been made a part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, a part of the proceedings of the Senate, gives me a right to inquire into the character of the administration and its influence upon the affairs of the country.

Before mentioning the legislation and policies which have signalized our public affairs during the last two years I must be permitted to repeat what I have many times declared, both here and elsewhere: The country can and will speedily recover from the immediate effects of unwise legislation and mistaken policies, but the attitude of the President toward Congress and his usurpation of legislative power have inflicted a wound upon our institutions which may never heal. No one can be unconscious of the humiliating truth that the spectacle of a President whipping Congress, not only into quick action but into the particular action which he commands, has furnished vast amusement, possibly pleasure, not only to the unthinking and superficial but to some thoughtful men who had become discouraged with our slow pace; but they will all learn sometime that the remedy for legislative inactivity or dereliction is not a dictator. They will discover, and that speedily, that the true remedy is with the people themselves, and that it ought to be applied when they select their Senators and Representatives in Congress.

I trust that my friends upon the other side of the Chamber will not think that I am disparaging them, either individually or collectively, when I say that every measure of general interest and of great importance which we have considered since the 4th of March, 1913, or which is now on our calendar for consideration, with the possible exception of the tariff bill, has been initiated in the White House or in the office of a Cabinet minister. No Member of Congress, whether belonging to one party or the other, has even dared to hope that he, either singly or in concert with his fellow Members, could originate a law of any considerable import.

However energetic or patriotic we may be in bringing forward bills, we know that if they mark a real advance they die in the archives of a committee. Not only does all legislation of the kind I have described originate with the Executive, but there is promulgated from time to time an Executive order of business, and we are bound not alone to confine our work to the bills which have been issued by the Executive, but we must consider them in the way prescribed in his program. I do not inquire what influence has been employed to bring about this deplorable result. There will come a day, and there will be a forum for the examination of that vital question. I only know that somehow the substantial legislative power has been transferred from the Capitol to the White House. Somehow the spirit of our institutions has been transformed and the legislative branch of the Government has become a mere recorder. What the President really wants is a journal clerk instead of a Congress. We still retain our physical liberty, and so long as we are tractable I assume we will be permitted to enjoy it, but as a legislative body we have for the time being passed out of existence.

Our forefathers, or as many of them as were attached to representative government, understood better than we seem to understand that the liberty of the people, the endurance of free institutions, and the success of their undertaking depended upon the rigid separation of the three branches of the Government. It never entered their minds that any President would ever think of himself as the captain of a team made up of Members of Congress. They made him Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, but they never dreamed that he would ever assume to be commander in chief of the Congress of the Republic they were establishing. I have heard it said upon the floor of the Senate, and not long ago, that the President is a part of the lawmaking power of the United States. I deny it with all the emphasis of which I am capable. He has the constitutional authority to withhold his approval from an act of Congress which under some circumstances prevents it from becoming effective, but the veto power is in no proper sense a lawmaking power. The best that can be said of it is that it is a relic of antiquity which long ago ought to have been cast aside and allowed to take its place with other discarded doctrines which mark the passage of civilization from the rule of kings to the supremacy of the people. We have kept it, however, and as a law-abiding man I am not complaining of the exercise of the authority, but I must protest when it is ranked as a legislative prerogative.

Even were I to agree that the President is a part of the lawmaking power the suggestions I have made would lose none of their force, for if the President is a lawmaker the functions of the White House do not begin until the work at the Capitol ends.

I have made these comments upon the attitude of the Executive toward Congress in order to inquire whether it is a progressive or a reactionary attitude. The answer plainly is that, so far from being progressive, so far from being in harmony with the forward thought of the time, it is medieval in its character and vitally destructive in its tendency. It is, of course, possible that an administration following such a tendency might promote and secure the legislation which a rapidly developing country requires for its safety and welfare, and I turn for a brief moment to remark upon what has been actually accomplished.

It is a pleasure to say that the President and his Cabinet advisers have in certain respects accurately and comprehensively understood the movement in the country for many reforms of the highest importance. They have with great skill, in their messages and speeches, recognized that many changes in our laws were necessary, pledging themselves that the demands of the people should be met and fulfilled. These progressive declarations, full of honeyed words and sweet phrases, were poured out so lavishly that for a little while the people were inclined to believe that a genuine progressive administration had been installed in Washington. For a brief period they were so blinded with the glitter of the promise that they could not see clearly the character of the performance. They are now discovering that while the voice was the voice of Jacob, the hand was the hand of Esau. They are now realizing that asking for bread they were given a stone. A prospectus, while quite necessary, will not of itself make any administration progressive.

The President's view seems to be that the three great measures of his administration will be:

First. The tariff law, which he declares has emancipated business and given freedom to individual energy and enterprise.

Second. A Federal reserve act, which, as he looks at it, will furnish the lifeblood of production, trade, and commerce.

Third. The bill now before us, which, as he states, will enable emancipated business and unshackled enterprise, invigorated by the streams of capital which will flow from the Federal reserve banks, to enjoy their new-found liberty upon the high seas.

When the President insisted upon a revision of the tariff law he unquestionably appealed to an overwhelming progressive sentiment; but when he and his followers revised the tariff law, as it was revised in 1913, they forfeited their leadership. I believe that a majority of the people of the United States wanted a reduction in many of the duties of the Republican tariff law of 1909, but these same people believed in the policy of protection, and they understood the danger of the reduction below that point and were conscious of the disasters that would fall upon us if, under the guise of reducing tariff duties, the doctrine of adequate protection should be abandoned. What was done? The administration deliberately proceeded to repudiate the policy which had become a part of our institutions, and instead of going forward in response to the progressive thought of the country it returned to the dark ages, resurrected an exploded, discredited, discarded theory of political economy, and enacted a tariff law which was fast destroying production in this country, which was robbing millions of men of their opportunity to earn a living, until its ravages were somewhat checked by the war which has, for the time being, paralyzed the industrial activities of Europe. There are yet more idle men in the United States than we have seen since 1896, and it is safe to say that when normal conditions again prevail in Europe the disasters of the tariff law will reach their climax. It is worse than pretense; it is more than audacity; it approaches deceit, and is akin to conscious wrongdoing for any man to refer to the Democratic tariff law as the end toward which the progressive movement was leading the way.

It is likewise true that the prevailing belief among the people was that our banking and currency law was susceptible of improvement, and that it ought to be amended so that the currency of the country could not in times of stress and storm be controlled by a few men who could use their power for their own gain. These people also believed that there were times in almost every year when the ordinary volume of currency was insufficient, and that something should be done to temporarily enlarge its volume. Very much had been done in this direction before the present administration came into power, but there still remained much to be done to make the reform effective and adequate. When the President recognized this duty he was a progressive, but in order to make his title good to that distinction it was not enough to hear the cry for relief, for under the guise of rendering help it was entirely possible to forge the chains which were already clanking on every hand still more securely upon those who had felt the servitude of the existing system. This is just what has been done. While here and there the banking and currency law may work well its general effect will be to add strength to those already too strong, to authorize combinations in capital which in any other field of commercial or industrial activity the law denounces as a crime. There is not a line or a letter in it which has helped or can help those who most need assistance. The whole purpose which inspired the movement for a new law upon that subject has been defeated, and yet it is paraded before the country as an evidence of a progressive administration.

I come at last to the bill now under consideration. Every patriotic citizen of the United States is praying for the day that will see American merchant fleets upon the ocean. Every true-hearted son of the Republic wants to see his flag in every port borne by ships which are doing our share of ocean transportation. We desire this development, not to meet the emergency of a war, but as a permanent condition in transportation on the sea. I have no hesitation in granting the President's progressiveness in recognizing this overpowering desire and universal hope, but if the bill now under consideration should become a law we will have imposed upon the people the most reactionary, indefensible legislation which, so far as my knowledge goes, has ever appeared in Congress. To establish the conclusion I have just expressed, I intend to review the measure, first, from the standpoint of our constitutional power, and, second, from the standpoint of its practical operation if it were to become a law.

Mr. President, I assume that those who prepared this bill understood that if it has a constitutional foundation it will be found in that clause of the Constitution which confers upon Congress power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the States, and with the Indian tribes; and therefore the very first inquiry that must occur to any man who either loves the laws of his country or reveres the Constitution under which we are assembled here must be this: Is this a regulation of commerce with foreign nations?

Bearing these propositions in mind, let us examine the means employed to reach the end; and here I solicit, I really desire, the impartial consideration of the suggestions I am about to make by every man in the Senate who values the history of his country, who understands the perils through which our Constitution came and who believes that we ought to be a law-abiding body. Let us examine the bill in order to ascertain how we are to reach the end, which is to regulate commerce with foreign nations. If I make any error in the analysis of the bill which I now propose to lay before the Senate, I trust, if it be found, in accordance with the rules of this body, that some one present will correct me.

First. The United States finds a corporation organized under the laws of a State, with an authorized capital of not more than $10,000,000. The constitutionality of the measure must, of course, be ascertained and tested by the things that may be done under the proposed law, not the things that necessarily will be done. I repeat that the first fault in the bill is that somebody unknown, somewhere unknown, will organize a corporation under the laws of a State with an authorized capital of $10,000,000.

Second. The Government, through a shipping board, which is established in the bill and which consists of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Postmaster General, will subscribe at least 51 per cent of the authorized capital of the organization so organized under the laws of a State.

Third. The United States, through the shipping board, buys or builds merchant ships costing not more than $30,000,000, and sells them to the corporation so organized under the laws of a State, accepting the obligations of the corporation for the purchase price, namely, the cost to the United States.

Fourth. These ships and any others which the corporation may acquire while employed as merchant vessels are private ships, subject to all the laws and regulations which control other ships in the foreign trade.

Fifth. These ships, while entitled to an American registry, are not compelled or required to take an American registry. They may, if the corporation, the private corporation organized under the laws of the State, so decides, sail under a foreign flag.

Sixth. The corporation thus provided with a fleet of merchant vessels either purchased from the United States or by purchase elsewhere, or by construction or by charter, proceeds during its authorized life to do business as a common carrier upon the high seas.

The act contains a provision that the object of the corporation must be the acquirement and operation of a fleet to meet the requirements of the foreign commerce of the United States, but this does not limit its use to such commerce. It merely requires that the fleet shall be adapted to the commerce of the United States. It also contains the provision intended to exclude these ships from our coastwise trade except as to three ports.

Seventh. The corporation may have private stockholders to the extent of 49 per cent, and the Government, with the approval of Congress, may at any time sell all or any part of the stock it so holds.

Eighth. Next, we have no existing law for the regulation of rates of foreign transportation, and this bill provides for none.

I may pause here a moment to describe just what the influence of the United States would be so far as the regulation of foreign commerce is concerned. I repeat, this bill does not suggest any regulatory rule respecting our foreign commerce. It simply authorizes the United States to become a stockholder in a corporation organized somewhere, and assumes that the operation of that corporation will be a regulation of our commerce with foreign nations. There is not a line or a letter in the bill, nor could there be, determining what the corporation shall do, how it shall do it, what charges it shall make, or between what ports its boats should ply.

I desire it to be thoroughly impressed upon those who have reflected at all upon this subject and given it any study that there is not in the bill the faintest indication of an intent to control or to regulate our commerce with foreign nations except in so far as the mere presence of a corporation a portion of whose stock is held by the United States effects a regulation of that commerce.

It, of course, will be conceded that this influence could only be exerted through the vote of the shipping board in meetings of the stockholders of the corporation. The only influence which the Government can exert over this frankenstein thus launched upon the seas of commerce or thus floated upon the seas of business in the United States is the influence of a vote in a meeting of the stockholders.

If that were sufficient, there is no guide, there is no rule, there is no restriction, there is no suggestion given in this law to the shipping board with regard to the manner of the regulation, of what it shall consist, or what it shall accomplish.

Again I say if I err with regard to my analysis of this bill, and it can be done under the rules of the Senate, I trust that those who are interested in the subject will correct me.

The Government has by this bill, as I said a moment ago, no other power over the management of the corporation than it can exercise by voting its stock at a stockholders' meeting, and no rule of any kind is prescribed for these officers of the Government who are to constitute the shipping board and who vote the stock.

Ninth. The directors of the corporation must necessarily be chosen from the minority stockholders if the laws of the State under which the corporation is organized require, as the laws of nearly every State do require, that a director in order to be eligible for his office shall be a stockholder of the corporation. These directors can not be officers of the United States and can not be bound to the performance of any public duty.

According to our general understanding, I think that what I have said will conform to the information we have with respect to the laws of the several States. The directors manage the corporation. The first article in nearly every charter is one which declares that the board of directors shall manage the affairs of the corporation. They are chosen for that purpose. They exercise all the power of the corporation within the limits of the charter.

These directors are private persons. They will determine what ships shall be bought. Aside from the original purchase of the $30,000,000 of ships they will decide what ships shall be bought. They will decide what business, what particular part of the commerce of the world, these ships shall undertake. They will decide what commodities the ships shall carry. They will decide what rates shall be exacted of those who employ the services of the ships. There is nothing, there is not one line or letter, in this bill that gives to the Government of the United States, either through the Interstate Commerce Commission or any other body created by our laws, the authority to supervise, to regulate, to determine, to modify in any manner at all the rates which may be established by the directors of this corporation.

Remember that these directors are not in the service of the United States. They are not servants of the people. They are bound by none of the obligations which surround an officer of the United States. They are free to manage and control this corporation precisely as they will, or as they believe it to be managed for the best interests of the corporation, and are restrained only, and can be restrained only, by the indirect fear or apprehension that at the end of their terms the shipping board may find it desirable to supplant them with other directors, also chosen from private life.

Tenth. The officers of the corporation must be private persons whose obligation it will be to promote the financial welfare of this corporation. I say, whose obligation it will be. It is an obligation, and they can not escape it. Assume that there are $4,900,000 of private stockholders, what are their rights in relation to their officers, or rather what is the obligation of the directors and the officers of the corporation toward the minority holding in the corporation? The corporation is organized for pecuniary profit. That is the reason for its existence. It comes into being under a law. The law is for the creation of a corporation for pecuniary profit, and its officers are bound not only by their consciences but by the law to so conduct the corporation that it shall be profitable to the men who have invested their money in it. If these officers were to be so far under the influence of the shipping board that they would follow the advice, not the lawful advice, because the shipping board in giving that advice would not be executing the law, it would be unofficial advice; but if the officers were so far under fear that at the end of a year or two years, whenever their terms might expire, they would be displaced, as to accept the suggestions of the shipping board or its individual members, then if that advice should be that this corporation as a regulatory corporation, as one whose office it was to see that the people of the United States, as a whole, received some benefit from this act of Congress, and if they were asked to sacrifice the pecuniary interest in the corporation for the general good, and were to follow that advice, they could be, and they ought to be, instantly checked by the law of the land which creates an obligation upon the part of the directors and officers to conduct the corporation in a way that will insure a profit for those who have invested their capital in it.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to his colleague?

Mr. KENYON. May I ask my colleague a question?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield for a question.

Mr. KENYON. I am a little curious to know where these directors are coming from. With 51 per cent of this stock owned by the Government, I think it is pretty generally conceded that no private parties will subscribe for the stock. Ordinarily a director must own some stock. If there are no parties owning 49 per cent of the stock, where are the directors coming from? Where are the officers coming from? Has the Senator any theory about that?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have a theory about it, but I hardly venture to state it. If there are no minority stockholders under this bill, it then becomes wholly unworkable; there could not be an organization of the corporation, for if it were organized under the laws of a State which requires a director to be a stockholder there would be no eligible persons to receive the office of director. I do not quite agree——

Mr. FLETCHER. May I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to interrupt the Senator to inquire whether he finds fault with the operation of the Panama Railroad Co., the stock of which is owned by the Government and is voted by the Secretary of War as trustee. The shares are transferred, I understand, to a sufficient number of people to qualify them as directors and the stock of the Government is voted, the directors are elected. That corporation is operating under that system, and I ask the Senator if he thinks it is objectionable.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not mean to indicate that that may be the practice here.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have some familiarity with the Panama Railroad Co. and its operations. I am not prepared to affirm the legality of many of the things that have been done through the Panama Railroad Co. or by it. But the situation with regard to that enterprise was wholly different. The United States was buying the property of the French Panama Co. A part of that property consisted of stock of the Panama Railway, and as a part of our general purchase we became the owner of a large majority of the stock of that company. Of course, there is no question about our right to buy that stock considering its relation to the property which we did purchase and to our authority to construct the Panama Canal; but the Senator from Florida will remember that the United States immediately proceeded to purchase all of the stock of the Panama Railroad Co. within a very few months, as I remember it, and before the work had begun the United States had become the owner of all the stock of that company. Thereafter the company was regarded as a mere fiction, a mere instrumentality through which the United States might carry on its work upon the Isthmus of Panama.

Just how the United States found directors and officers who could qualify under the laws of the State of New York I do not know, nor is it material to inquire, for if it was wrongfully or unconstitutionally done in that instance, we ought not to repeat, under different circumstances, the mistake we made there. Personally I have believed for a long while that the United States ought to get rid of the Panama Railroad Co. and ought to do directly the work which it is doing indirectly; but the danger is reduced probably to a negligible consideration in view of the fact that the United States does own all the stock of the company.

The suggestion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], however, does not aid in the removal of the objection which has just been pointed out by my colleague [Mr. KENYON]. This bill does not qualify any officer or employee of the Government to become a director; it does not qualify any officer or employee to become an officer of the company; and therefore it goes without saying that when these directors are chosen and when these officers are chosen they will represent the minority of the stockholding interest in the proposed corporation. If they do not, of course they will be mere dummies without substantial existence.

I am not so sure as my colleague seems to be that there will be no minority stockholders. I think there will be minority stockholders. I believe there are men and corporations waiting now to subscribe toward the 49 per cent of the stock of this corporation which will be offered to the public. I think they understand just how they can reap a profit from the enterprise.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should have said, I think, "good-faith stockholders." I am not ready to contend that there might not be minority stockholders for ulterior purposes, but there will be no good-faith stockholders in the proposition not to make money.

Mr. CUMMINS. There will be no private stockholders, in my opinion, who become such with the hope of legitimate profit in the operation of the ships; but there will be stockholders, as I predict, who will acquire the stock, believing that in the purchase of ships they may realize fortunes. Moreover, there may be stockholders who will enter into that relation because they know that, before a long period elapses, the Government of the United States will desire to sell the stock for which it now subscribes, and then they may be able to discover a way to profit in the enterprise.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. BORAH. I take it, then, that that class of minority stockholders would be composed only of that class of men who stood in a position, governmentally or otherwise, to direct the purchase of ships and to control the business of the corporation by reason of their position?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think so. When I come to discuss the practical aspects of this measure, I shall point out what I think are the evils which will be encountered in the Government going into partnership with capitalists who could be persuaded or who could see their way clear to acquiring stock in this corporation.

I think, for instance, if Kuhn, Loeb & Co. were to subscribe for 49 per cent of the stock which is open to the public—and this is a mere hypothetical case, of course; I instance them because they are men of great influence and power, and are now masters of finance and captains of industry—if they were to become the owners of 49 per cent of the stock of this company, I just want you to imagine the scene, the spectacle of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., with 49 per cent of the stock, sitting down in an office consulting with, negotiating with, or conferring with the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Postmaster General with regard to the proper conduct of the corporation, who should be its directors, who should be its officers, in what trade the ships should engage, and upon what rates and terms the ships should do business. Assuming that the present Secretary of the Treasury, the present Secretary of Commerce, and the present Postmaster General are far above temptation, assuming that the Secretary of the Treasury is as pure in his morals as he is in his logic, yet he will not be Secretary of the Treasury always; the present Secretary of Commerce will have to give way sometime to a mere mortal; the Postmaster General must sometime surrender his vast power to one who might want to use it for a selfish purpose; and I ask the Senate of the United States, and the country, just to think of a conference or consultation, a meeting of the stockholders of this company held in that way. If you desire to bring the name of the United States into reproach; if you desire to surround it with clouds of scandal and suspicion; if you desire to destroy it as a great governing body, and to subject it to the influences which are dominant in trade and commerce, then this bill ought to be passed, and it ought to provide for that relationship which must necessarily grow out of its terms.

I may have projected myself a little bit into a later part of my speech. I was considering the constitutional phases of the proposal, and I will come back to that.

Remember that our power is "to regulate commerce with foreign nations." That is all the power we have so far as this bill is concerned. Remember, as I have pointed out, that when selection is made of the officers and directors who are to manage and control the corporation to be created, it is their management, their control of the corporation which is to effect the regulation of commerce, and that the only influence which the United States has over the conduct and the management of the corporation is its influence as a stockholder in the selection of directors and officers.

Mr. President, I have now submitted to the Senate what I believe to be a fair analysis of the bill from the standpoint of the Constitution; indeed, I think it is the only analysis of the bill; and I ask this question—and it is not one from which my friends upon the other side dare shrink; it is not possible that upon this subject they will accept the direction of the President or that they will indorse the rather crude constitutional views which are held by the Secretary of the Treasury. It is true that the Secretary of the Treasury believes it to be entirely within our power. Upon what ground does he base that belief? He said in his speech at Chicago that if any business in this country proved to be unprofitable in private hands and it was for the welfare of the country generally that the business should be carried on, it was not only within the power of the Government of the United States to carry it on, but it was its duty to undertake it and carry it forward.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, at the present rate of doing that would it not inevitably lead to public ownership of business affairs?

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly, Mr. President. I will show a little later what I think about Government ownership. I do not fear it in every respect as very many people do. I do not believe in it until we have used every effort within the limits of the Constitution and within the limits of our integrity and intelligence to regulate in some other way; but if regulation fails then I see no other conclusion but that the Government itself must accept the responsibility.

The Secretary of the Treasury, however, seems hardly content with that view. I did not intend to do it at this point, but I think I will read just a paragraph from his address at Chicago, which the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] declared to be the only thing that can be said about this subject, and that we are extremely unreasonable and, indeed, revolutionary to think of questioning anything that was here declared or of continuing the debate after he had spoken. He said:

> The objection that the shipping bill puts the Government in the shipping business is not tenable. Those who urge it—

I hope the Senator from Idaho will listen, because it is rather a novel proposal in a field with which the Senator from Idaho is very familiar, the constitutional field.

Mr. BORAH. Is the Senator reading from the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am now reading an extract from the speech of the Secretary of the Treasury in Chicago, delivered on January 9 of the present year. I repeat:

> The objection that the shipping bill puts the Government in the shipping business is not tenable. Those who urge it seem to forget that it is the duty of the Government to engage in any activities, even of a business nature, which are demanded in the interest of all the people of the country, when it is impossible to engage private capital in such operations.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield for a question.

Mr. BORAH. I was going to say that I had the pleasure of reading that speech, and I took that statement as a piece of humor. [Laughter.]

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, Mr. President, I really hope that the Secretary of the Treasury so intended it. It is an amazing, an astounding suggestion to make to the people of the United States. It would mark a great advance if it came from the mouth of the extremist radical, but when it proceeds from the lips of a conservative Democrat, a member of a party which has been holding up the Constitution now for a hundred years or more to prevent real and lawful activities upon the part of the Government, we are not only amazed, but we are bewildered, and I hope that my friend the Senator from Mississippi will comment in some way upon that declaration before this debate shall conclude.

I put the question again: Is it possible that any one can be found in this Chamber or elsewhere who, after having examined the question, will be willing to declare that this is a regulation of commerce with foreign nations?

Mr. President, this bill does not propose a governmental regulation, nor would it be a constitutional regulation if it were governmental. It is a purely private regulation, if it be a regulation at all. As the Secretary of the Treasury admits inferentially, it is not a regulation; it is an investment on the part of the United States in the business of shipping.

Before looking into the judicial authorities it will be well worth while to remember the subordination of Federal to State authority which the bill establishes; and I am very glad the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] is giving me his attention. I know that he is a patriot; I know that he wants to sustain the dignity and the power of the United States; and I count myself especially fortunate, because I can mention in his presence what I am about to say.

Under this bill the State will have the power to tax the corporation. Assuming that the corporation is organized under the laws of the State of New Jersey or under the laws of the State of New York, and the shipping board will naturally choose one or the other of those great Commonwealths. It might choose New Jersey, first, because the President lives in New Jersey, and, second, because its corporate laws are distinguished for their flexibility and their opportunity to the captains of industry. Possibly, however, the Secretary of the Treasury might insist upon precedence for his State, and it might be organized under the laws of the State of New York. But whether organized in one State or the other or anywhere else among the Commonwealths, the State which organizes the corporation will have the right to tax it. Is that denied? Is it open to dispute that if the corporation is organized under the laws of New Jersey the State can impose upon it such taxes as it desires to impose?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield for a question.

Mr. FLETCHER. I presume the Senator expects some response to that question now. I do not want to interrupt his argument, and I am rather inclined to favor the idea of each speaker running under his power and consuming his own smoke, as far as possible, without adding any fuel myself. I think, however, the Senator is entitled at this point, in all candor and frankness, to a statement from me to the effect that there will be an amendment offered to the bill which will provide for the incorporation of this corporation in the District of Columbia, and it will not be incorporated under the laws of a State, if our view prevails.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the suggestion just made by the Senator from Florida gives me great gratification in one respect, for it proves that the author of the bill and the source from which it springs is not infallible. We had been led to believe that amendments were made, not at this end of the Avenue but at the other. However, if the Senator from Florida pursues that course he will escape the dangers of Scylla only to fall into the perils of Charybdis. There is no law of the District of Columbia under which it can be organized.

Mr. FLETCHER. I know; but we will provide, in this law, how it shall be done.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well.

Mr. FLETCHER. I hope the Senator will not commit himself absolutely to that proposition until he hears the amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I commit myself absolutely to the proposition that at this time there is no law in the District of Columbia under which a corporation of this kind ought to be or can be organized. As you will presently observe when I come to unfold my views on another phase of the matter, I do not say that Congress can not create a corporation in order to accomplish this purpose. I have no disposition to deny that authority upon the part of Congress.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator suggested that this corporation would be likely to be organized either in the State of New York or in the State of New Jersey. I presume that wherever it is organized they will reach the directors' meeting through the "McAdoo tunnel." [Laughter.]

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course the Senator understands that I yield only for a question. I am seriously arguing this bill, Mr. President, and I hope the Senator from Idaho will not so excite my risibilities that I can not pursue the line of my argument. I do not know what the future will bring forth. I am presenting my views on the bill as it is now before the Senate. If it is to be radically and essentially modified, we are not ready for debate. Why is the Senator from Florida so vigorously pressing the consideration of the measure if he knows that it is to be shortly withdrawn and some other proposal substituted for it? It is not fair to one like myself, at least, who is devoting his discussion to the measure itself as closely as it is possible for him to do. But I shall feel compelled to proceed upon the assumption that this is the bill on which we will be asked to vote, and therefore I enumerate some other things that the State can do with reference to a corporation organized as this one might be organized under the bill now before us.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Washington for a question.

Mr. JONES. I simply wish to ask the Senator if he can give us any idea, if this is not the bill that we are expected to act upon, if the majority are expecting to bring in another bill, why it is that all other legislative business—appropriation bills and that sort of thing—is absolutely thrust aside?

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from Washington I will say that I am not omniscient. I do not know what the Democratic purpose is.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Nobody else does.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is mysterious and inexplicable, and therefore I can not answer the question of the Senator from Washington.

Second, under this bill, after the Government has subscribed to the stock of the corporation organized under the laws of New Jersey or of New York or of some other State, the Commonwealth will have the power to alter, amend, or repeal the articles of incorporation, commonly known as the charter of the corporation. Is it possible that the United States in its attempt to regulate commerce with foreign nations will employ as an instrumentality of that regulation a corporation in which it may own the controlling interest but whose articles of incorporation, whose constitutional life, is subject to be altered, amended, or repealed by the State which gives it existence? To me the thought is not only appalling, it is abhorrent; but, after all, it is unthinkable that the Government of the United States will intrust its regulatory power to a corporation over which it has no control except in the vote of a majority of the stock, and whose every function may be modified or withdrawn by the laws of the State under which it is created.

Third, the State may refuse the privilege of enlarging the capital of the corporation. The bill presumes a corporation with an authorized capital of $10,000,000, but it has a provision which runs something like this: That, with the consent of the Government, represented by its shipping board, its capital may be increased to some larger amount. Suppose, in order that the corporation may accomplish all that it is intended to accomplish, a larger capital is required; the Government of the United States must ask the State in which the corporation is organized for the privilege of exercising one of our own fundamental constitutional powers.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield for a question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to ask the Senator, if he has not touched upon the point, whether in his opinion the engaging in commerce by the Government itself, directly or indirectly, is such a regulation of commerce as the Constitution intended to give the Government the authority to exercise?

Mr. CUMMINS. I shall come to that question a little later. It may be the Government has the power to engage in commerce for the purpose of regulating it, but it must do so directly. It must have full control of the instrumentality that it selects for that purpose.

Fourth. The State can prescribe the powers, duties, and obligations of the directors and officers of the corporation. Here is a corporation to be created of which the Government becomes a controlling stockholder. It must operate through directors, through officers. They are not officers of the United States, as I said before, nor employees of the United States. They owe the United States no duty. They are bound under the law to the performance of no duty. Not only are these things true, but under this bill, if the corporation is so organized, the State can declare what the powers and the duties and the obligations of the directors and officers shall be; and again we are presented with the humiliating spectacle of the Government of the United States subjecting its sovereignty, in this respect, to the whim or the caprice of the State which organizes the corporation.

Fifth. The State can determine, with respect to all its corporations, the qualifications of directors and officers. Therefore, no matter what the Government might think of it, the State could prescribe such qualifications for the directors and the officers of the corporation as to imperil or destroy the efficiency even of the control which we would exercise over the corporation through a vote at the annual meeting of stockholders.

Sixth. The State could declare that the Federal Government should not own stock in one of its corporations, and require its disposition. There is no doubt but that in matters of great public policy the State has the right, in organizing or amending the charter of a corporation, to prescribe who shall own the stock. Suppose we were organized under the laws of the State of New Jersey, and there should come a time when the legislature of that State should think it unwise that the Government of the country should own capital stock in one of the corporations of the Commonwealth, it could declare that no corporation, whether a political or a financial or an industrial corporation, should own stock in one of its creations; and again we submit ourselves to a most shameful and degrading attitude with reference to the subject.

Seventh. While the State could not regulate the foreign commerce carried on by the corporation—I make a distinction, mark you—while the State could not regulate the foreign commerce carried on by the corporation, it could regulate everything that pertained to its management and its organization.

While these aspects of the bill may not be closely related to my objection against our authority to pass such a law under our Constitution, they exhibit so emphatically the absurdity and the folly of an attempt of this sort that I could not restrain myself from bringing them to the attention of Senators.

I now proceed a little further with regard to the question which I originally proposed. It is that this is not a regulation of commerce and is not, therefore, within our constitutional power.

Inasmuch as I hold a most liberal view of the Constitution with respect to our right to regulate commerce, I desire to make it clear in this argument that I am not questioning certain powers which many people, very many people, doubt. I stand upon the advanced line with regard to the power of the Government in the regulation of commerce, and whenever I discover a proposal that outruns my liberal view of this clause of the Constitution, I examine it closely. In view of this mental attitude of mine, I desire to say in the beginning of my reference to judicial expressions, first, I do not doubt nor question the right to buy or build and operate a railroad or a steamship, assuming that the former is to be used in commerce among the States and that the latter is to be used in commerce with foreign nations. Second, I do not question the right of Congress to create a corporation to carry on such commerce. Third, I do not question the right, under some circumstances, to work through a national incorporation of which the Government owns all the stock, although it is difficult for me to conceive the necessity of interposing the fiction of a corporation in order to do what the Government has the right to do. It must be understood, therefore, that I am not questioning the constitutionality of this bill for either of the reasons I have suggested. I want that statement to accompany my strictures of the bill.

We have the constitutional right to own and to operate an instrumentality of interstate or foreign commerce. We have a right to create a corporation through which others may enter interstate or foreign commerce, and we may have the right to create a corporation and take its stock—all its stock—and accomplish the purposes through the medium of such an incorporation.

But neither of these things is done in the bill before us, nor is there any approach to them. We are here acquiring a majority of the stock of a corporation which is to engage in foreign commerce, and we depend for our influence entirely not upon any law which we prescribe as a rule of foreign commerce, not upon any rule which we impose upon the corporation as an instrumentality of commerce, but we depend entirely upon our influence as a stockholder to induce those who are intrusted with the management of the corporation to do those things which the Government might do if it were operating directly. That is not a regulation of commerce, and it can not be so held.

I intend to present very briefly now, I hope, some of the earlier expressions of the Supreme Court of the United States with regard to this subject. Naturally one appeals immediately to what may well be called the origin of the law upon this phase of the Constitution as it was laid down in McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat., 316). It was in this case that for the first time the Supreme Court of the United States found it necessary to examine our power under the Constitution and to reach a conclusion as to the nature of the Constitution and the way in which the power granted by it to the General Government should be exercised. In this presence I need not comment upon the greatness either of the counsel who argued the case or the judges who decided it. They all understood the gravity of the issue, and, as history discloses, they gathered themselves together for the supreme effort of their lives. I will read very briefly from the opinion:

> We admit, as all must admit, that the powers of the Government are limited and that its limits are not to be transcended. But we think the sound construction of the Constitution must allow to the National Legislature that discretion with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution, which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it in the manner most beneficial to the people. Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional.

The question arose again in Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat., 1), and the rule was probably laid down there with even more distinctness than in the case of McCulloch v. Maryland. I read an extract from the opinion rendered by Chief Justice Marshall. Speaking of the Constitution, he said:

> We are now arrived at the inquiry, What is this power?
> It is the power to regulate; that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution.
> These are expressed in plain terms and do not affect the questions which arise in this case or which have been discussed at the bar. If, as has always been understood, the sovereignty of Congress, though limited to specified objects, is plenary as to those objects, the power over commerce with foreign nations and among the several States is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government, having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States. The wisdom and the discretion of Congress, their identity with the people, and the influence which their constituents possess at elections are in this, as in many other instances, as that, for example, of declaring war, the sole restraints on which they have relied to secure them from its abuse. They are the restraints on which the people must often rely solely in all representative Governments.

Of course all Senators know the general circumstances out of which this case grew, one relating to navigation or navigable water.

I need not read further the discussion with respect to what is commerce, but proceed at once to the conclusion, which, after all, is the part of the opinion that is most pertinent in the discussion here. The court said:

> We are now arrived at the inquiry, What is this power? It is the power to regulate; that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed.

That is the initial thought. I pause to suggest that in this opinion, as in the opinion in the case of McCulloch against Maryland, the dominant note is that the power to regulate is the power to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed.

> This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution. These are expressed in plain terms and do not affect the questions which arise in this case or which have been discussed at the bar. If, as has always been understood, the sovereignty of Congress, though limited to specified objects, is plenary as to those objects, the power over commerce with foreign nations and among the several States is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States. The wisdom and the discretion of Congress, their identity with the people, and the influence which their constituents possess at elections are in this, as in many other instances, as that, for example, of declaring war, the sole restraints on which they have relied to secure them from its abuse. They are the restraints on which the people must often rely solely in all representative Governments.

The essential point in this opinion to which I desire to call attention is the definition of the power to regulate, which is the power to declare or establish a rule which shall govern and control commerce among the States or with foreign nations.

I desire to read a word also from the case of California against The Railroad Company, in One hundred and twenty-seventh United States, at page 1. Senators will remember that this is one of the California tax cases, and the question involved was the right of the State of California to levy certain taxes upon the property of a corporation created under the laws of the United States. Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion, and I will try to select a very brief quotation, which is intended to show that the rule which was announced in the early days of the Republic has been constantly and consistently held throughout the entire development of the country. He said:

> It can not at the present day be doubted that Congress, under the power to regulate commerce among the several States as well as to provide for postal accommodations and military exigencies, had authority to pass these laws.

In the case I am reading from it was contended that the power of Congress to pass a law having for its object the construction and maintenance of a highway such as a railroad was found not only under what is known as the commerce clause of the Constitution, but under the power to establish post offices and post roads, and also the supreme national necessity of having an instrumentality that could move our Army from one part of the country to another, and in that way it would really constitute a part of the national defense. So Justice Bradley affirmed the power to create the corporation.

It was regarded as a great advance at that time to have it distinctly decided that Congress could create a corporation the stock of which was to be owned by private persons. To carry on an enterprise of this sort was seriously doubted, and was here, I think, for the first time definitely decided. But there is not in the opinion, which is very luminous and very persuasive, the suggestion that in order to regulate commerce Congress could take a share in a corporation organized under the laws of a State, and hope, through the influence of stockholding merely, to so direct the affairs of the corporation that it might be regulative of the commerce in which it was engaged. There is no intimation of that kind in any of the authorities. It has never been proposed, so far as I know, in any Congress. The power that we are seeking to exercise here has never before been asserted by any statesman or lawyer. It has never been espoused by any administration. The most generous interpreters of the Constitution of the United States have never even dreamed that the Government could undertake to regulate commerce with foreign nations by merely becoming a stockholder in a State corporation organized to carry on foreign commerce.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). Will the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield for a question.

Mr. STERLING. Can it be true that because the Government is a majority stockholder in this corporation it therefore participates in commerce, that because of its participation in commerce it therefore regulates commerce?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not heard it stated in that way before, but, of course, it is not true that because a corporation is engaged in commerce therefore its stockholders are engaged in commerce. Its stockholders are not engaged in commerce at all. So long as the law recognizes the artificial body known as a corporation it is that entity or body which is engaged in commerce. We have the right to regulate that body by prescribing any rule for its management and operation that may seem to us wise. As I admitted a few moments ago, if the United States chose to become that body itself by entering commerce in its political character, I am not prepared to say it could not, although I have grave doubt whether the appearance of the ship of a Government in a fleet of merchant vessels operating in a particular way could be regarded as a regulation of commerce. Something else must accompany it in order to constitute a regulation of commerce.

Of course there are more than a thousand, I presume, but suppose we have a thousand ships plying between the ports of the eastern coast of the United States and the ports of Europe. The United States buys one merchant ship, and enters that fleet as an owner and operator of the vessel. The United States determines not the rates that shall be charged by the thousand ships; the United States does not attempt to control the management or the character of the thousand ships, but it hopes because of its ship, one in a thousand, which it can operate according to its pleasure, that out of that operation there will grow a regulation of commerce. I very gravely doubt whether that is or would be held to be a regulation of commerce within the meaning of the Constitution.

Mr. WORKS and Mr. STERLING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from California, as he seemed to rise first, but for a question only.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa if there is not quite a clear distinction between the regulation of commerce and the actual carrying of commerce by the Government. The Government might be called upon to regulate commerce in which it was participating, which would be rather an awkward situation.

Mr. CUMMINS. Before I answer the question put by the Senator from California, I will say that before he came in I had attempted to show the scope of the phrase "regulate." Of course there is a great difference between regulation and ownership.

Mr. WORKS. I am sorry I interrupted the Senator if he has already gone over it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, no; because the subject is worth repetition. The Constitution says "regulate commerce." The courts say that a regulation of commerce is the imposition of a rule under which commerce shall be carried on. I think there are some instances in which that will have to be broadened. I think it must be said that the Supreme Court of the United States has held that we can pass a law organizing a corporation the object of which is to engage in interstate or foreign commerce under our power to regulate commerce. But we have gone no further than that. That is the advance thought of the Supreme Court of the United States; but when you try to torture that principle or doctrine into a warrant for the enterprise in which this bill would put us, we become ridiculous.

I have not heard a word said upon the legal aspects of the case. The Secretary of the Treasury, whose speech so highly commends itself to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]—and I read the quotation before he came in—stated broadly the ground upon which he justifies this proposal. I have no doubt the Senator from Mississippi has read it, because he seemed to be so profoundly impressed with it. The Secretary of the Treasury says that whenever any business in this country fails because it can not or does not attract private capital, if it is a valuable business it is the duty of the Government to undertake the business and carry it on. Such is the constitutional view of the Secretary of the Treasury. It is the only suggestion we have had from the other side with regard to the laws which will justify what we are now asked to do. I repeat to the Senator from California and to the Senate that what we are here endeavoring to do is not to regulate commerce by putting into a fleet of 5,000 ships 25 or 30 ships which will belong to the United States and which are under the complete control of the United States, but what we are trying to do here is to put a fleet owned by a private corporation into the business with its companions at sea, and we are relying for the regulation of commerce upon the influence which the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Postmaster General, as the majority stockholders of that corporation, may bring to bear upon its management and operation. It is the most astonishing proposition ever made in the United States or anywhere else. It can not be defended either in its legal aspect or in its practical aspect.

I desire to refer, just to show the development of this question and what our courts really believe to be a regulation of commerce, to some later decisions. I refer to the case of Interstate Commerce Commission against Brimson, in One hundred and fifty-fourth United States, at page 470. I read from the opinion delivered by Justice Harlan:

> The Constitution expressly confers upon Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes, and to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying that power into execution. While the complete internal commerce of a State is reserved to the State itself, because never surrendered to the General Government, commerce, the regulation of which is committed by the Constitution to Congress, comprehends traffic, navigation, and every species of commercial intercourse or trade between the United States, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

Omitting, then, some suggestions upon the particular case before it, the court says:

> What is the nature of the power thus expressly given to Congress, and to what extent and under what restrictions may it be constitutionally exerted?
>
> This question was answered when Chief Justice Marshall said that it was the power "to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed." "This power," the Chief Justice continued, "like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution."

What I am now reading is an extract from the case of Gibbons against Ogden, an extract used by Justice Harlan in delivering this opinion:

> These are expressed in plain terms and do not affect the questions which arise in this case or which have been discussed at the bar. If, as has always been understood, the sovereignty of Congress, though limited to specified objects, is plenary as to those objects, the power over commerce with foreign nations and among the several States is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single Government having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States. The wisdom and the discretion of Congress, their identity with the people, and the influence which their constituents possess at elections, are in this, as in many other instances, as that, for example, of declaring war, the sole restraints on which they have relied to secure them from its abuse. They are the restraints on which the people must often rely solely in all representative governments.

Those who are familiar with the opinions of the Supreme Court will remember that in McCulloch against Maryland, while it did not involve probably the interpretation of what is known as the commerce clause of the Constitution, yet the reasoning of the court was applicable to that clause—and, indeed, was applied by the court to that clause—as well as applicable to other parts of the instrument. Chief Justice Marshall said in that case that the act of Congress in execution of the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States" must be appropriate to the end; that it must be directed to the end; and if it was appropriate, if it did constitute a regulation under the rule which he had announced in an earlier paragraph of the opinion, then the court would give it effect, no matter how unwise it might think it to be; but that whether a particular act is a regulation of commerce is a judicial question which every act which we pass upon that subject must in the end meet.

I call attention also to the Employers' Liability cases in Two hundred and seventh United States, at page 463. I again remind the Senate that I am doing this simply to show that the definition of a regulation of commerce, announced but a few years after the adoption of the Constitution, has been continued to the present time; it has been applied to all our development; every varied condition and circumstance has been subjected to the test of that rule. Therefore, I think, these later decisions, even though they but reannounce the earlier rule, are of the utmost value in determining whether or not this legislation should be passed.

The Senate will recall that this decision was rendered upon what we know here as the employers' liability law, the original law, the law which the Supreme Court held to be unconstitutional in part, because of a defect or weakness which was afterwards removed by subsequent legislation. In order that the value of the decision may be fully understood I desire to point out the exact question which was before the Supreme Court.

We adopted a law defining the liability of railroad companies to employees. We passed it under the clause of the Constitution which gives us the authority to regulate commerce among the States. In the original legislation we did not sufficiently separate the State from the Nation. We endeavored to impose this rule upon every railroad company that was engaged in interstate commerce, and we attempted to give the benefit of the rule to every employee of such transportation companies.

When the case reached the Supreme Court of the United States there was a violent assault made upon it on the ground that it was not a regulation of commerce at all and that it was purely a matter of State policy and regulation; but the Supreme Court held otherwise, and I think very properly so. The opinion was delivered by Chief Justice White—he was then Justice White—and is well worth a most careful study by everyone who desires to secure a clear conception of the limits of the national power. I have neither the time nor the inclination to read much of the opinion, but I want to select the most pertinent paragraph, if I can. I read:

> All the questions which arise concern the nature and extent of the power of Congress to regulate commerce. That subject has been so often here considered and has been so fully elaborated in recent decisions, two of which are noted in the margin, that we content ourselves, for the purposes of this case, with repeating the broad definition of the commerce power as expounded by Mr. Chief Justice Marshall in Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat.,1, 196).

He then quotes what I have already read, and then proceeds to inquire whether the law which Congress had passed fixing the liability of transportation companies was a rule imposed upon commerce. His argument upon that issue is one of the closest and best I have ever read, and I wish, Mr. President, that I could make it a part of my remarks. I do not feel like taking up the time of the Senate in reading it all, but he goes forward to show that, even though this is a law of liability imposed upon transportation companies, establishing a relation between the transportation companies and their employees, nevertheless it is a law or a rule imposed upon commerce among the States; that in so far as it was attempted to be imposed upon intrastate commerce the law was unconstitutional, but so far as it was imposed upon traffic among the States it was constitutional. Mr. President, this opinion indicates this; more than that, it clearly shows that a bill of this character is not a rule of commerce; it is not sovereign declaration with respect to the manner in which commerce shall be carried on; it does not specify or denote any of the conditions which must be fulfilled; it has none of the characteristics of a regulation of commerce as we have hitherto understood that term throughout all the decisions of the Supreme Court—and there are many which interpret this clause of the Constitution.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I make an inquiry of the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield for a question.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, without signifying that I agree with the conclusions reached by the Senator—although many of his propositions, I think, are absolutely sound, and without signifying that I follow him in the idea that this bill would not come under the commerce clause of the Constitution—I want to ask him whether he thinks the general-welfare clause of the Constitution would not cover it?

Mr. CUMMINS. No, Mr. President, there is no legislative power in the general-welfare clause. If so, our Constitution would have no limitation at all. If it is true that we can pass any act which we believe to be for the general welfare of the people of the United States, then the Constitution is a mere mockery and might well be entirely disregarded. I am surprised that a statesman of the school to which I know the Senator from Florida belongs should even suggest that Congress had no limitation upon its power or its acts. Even I, who have insisted for years upon a liberal and generous interpretation of this immortal instrument, have never dared to say that we could do anything which we believed to be for the general good of the people of the country.

I refer the Senate, without reading anything from it, to the case of Atlantic Coast Line Co. v. The Riverside Mills (219 U. S., 186). I wish also to mention some very interesting and some very instructive discussions of this subject found in the writings of men eminent in their profession and who command the general confidence of all students of the Constitution. I shall not read from these books, because I desire to bring my observations to a close; but I cite the Senate to Miller on the Constitution, pages 447, 448, and 449; Watson on the Constitution, volume 1, pages 453, 470, 476, and the pages which follow; and Cook on the Commerce Clause of the Constitution, at page 65.

Mr. President, for the time being I close my argument with respect to the constitutionality of the measure before us. I hope that I am not prejudiced; I have tried to look upon this proposal from the standpoint of a citizen who really believes that the Government ought to do something to reestablish our merchant marine.

I am in favor of the Government purchasing or building ships to the extent of $30,000,000 or more—I would prefer to build them—suitable for auxiliaries to our Navy, and in times of peace to employ them through the intervention of transportation companies or persons engaged in foreign commerce in carrying the trade of the United States. No Senator upon the other side can surpass me in a desire to accomplish that result. I desire to do it because our Navy is useless without such auxiliary ships; I desire to do it because on every occasion when we have had occasion to employ our Navy, whether in war or in spectacle, we have been compelled to hire a large number of auxiliaries in order to sustain the movements of our warships. I think Congress fails in its duty when it does not provide for a number of vessels that would cost at least $30,000,000, adequate to the needs of and appropriate for the naval force of the United States, and it would be an inexcusable waste if during a time of peace—and we hope that we will never experience any other—these ships not needed for naval purposes should not be employed in the vocations of peace. I think that if we would buy these ships, own these ships, and then, when they are not needed by the Navy, lease them to those who are engaged in foreign commerce on such terms as will encourage and invite investment in the enterprise, and then put upon foreign commerce as a whole through law those regulations which ought to be imposed, we will have done something for the reinvigoration or the regeneration of our merchant marine. However, I do not intend to discuss that question now, because it is the subject of an amendment which I shall offer at the proper time, and when I do offer it I intend to address the Senate upon what I believe to be its merits as compared with the present proposal. So I forego a discussion of that question now and submit simply my views upon the power of the United States under the Constitution to engage in the enterprise into which this bill would lead us. When the proper time arrives it is my purpose to also point out how unavailing this measure would prove, even were it constitutional, in efficiently regulating the commerce in which we are all so deeply concerned.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hardwick	Page	Sterling
Borah	Hitchcock	Perkins	Stone
Brady	Johnson	Poindexter	Sutherland
Bryan	Jones	Pomerene	Swanson
Camden	Kenyon	Ransdell	Thomas
Catron	Kern	Reed	Thompson
Chamberlain	La Follette	Shafroth	Thornton
Colt	Lane	Sheppard	Tillman
Crawford	Lea, Tenn.	Shields	Townsend
Culberson	Lee, Md.	Simmons	Vardaman
Cummins	Lodge	Smith, Ariz.	Walsh
Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.	Warren
Gore	Nelson	Smith, Md.	White
Gronna	Overman	Smoot	Williams

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, after I gave my notice yesterday that I was going to speak to-day I felt, as I listened to the always entertaining observations of my friend the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], that I had been guilty of great temerity, because he then informed us that in two very able speeches, as I considered them, by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] and my colleague [Mr. WEEKS] there was absolutely nothing new; and if in those cogent, elaborate, and powerful arguments there was nothing new, I felt it would be difficult for me to introduce any novelty. But I reflected, Mr. President, that my friend the Senator from Mississippi had fallen so into the habit of saying about a tariff argument, whenever it was made by some one with whom he disagreed, that "we had heard it all before," and that "there was nothing new in it," that he had repeated his saying without sufficient consideration in regard to this question, because, however old the tariff may be, this question has never before arisen, because never before has it been proposed that the Government of the United States should enter upon the business of owning and operating ships and should undertake that new task in the midst of a world-wide war. That attempt and those conditions have never existed before.

I also felt, Mr. President, that though it is undoubtedly very witty to say that there is nothing in your opponent's speech—nothing, "absolutely nothing new"—as an argument the observation lacks completeness, perhaps, and is not wholly satisfying. At the same time I recognize the difficulties with which I am confronted in trying to say anything on this subject. We do not know yet what bill is before us. It is still being constructed "elsewhere," if I may use the conventional word when we are referring to transactions which take place outside the Senate Chamber. It is being made somewhere between the White House and the Democratic caucus, and we do not know what the bill is to be It is not an easy matter to argue about a bill that is not yet before us. To-day the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] took occasion to say to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] that a very important amendment was to be made to this bill changing the entire character of the corporation. He did not tell us what the corporation or what its franchises, limitations, and so forth, were to be, but he stated that a very important and vital change in that direction was to be made. Of course, under those circumstances it is difficult to discuss the bill. Moreover, we have no arguments presented on the other side in regard to it, so that we are at a loss to know why the Senators on the other side are supporting this bill so ardently. I understand the situation of the Senators on the other side. Even if some one has blundered, as was once said in a famous poem—

Theirs not to make reply,
Theirs not to reason why.

So we are left without the arguments of the other side, and we have to deal with the bill as it is.

I, however, offered an amendment yesterday to which I wish to address myself, which, I understand, has already been disposed of in the committee, but which will undoubtedly come before the Senate again. Perhaps at that time I will say something more about it.

This bill, whether in the form it first manifested when it broke in radiant perfection upon us here in the Senate fresh from the committee, or whether in the second edition which followed it in the course of a few days, or whether in still another edition which is to come to us later, presents for consideration questions of the very greatest magnitude. It commits the Government of the United States to Government ownership in a direction never before attempted, except on a perfectly insignificant scale by any nation, and never by any great maritime nation. It is an advance in the direction of socialism, as I look at it, which alone would merit a thorough debate in the Senate. It opens up the whole question—one of the greatest questions with which this country has had to deal for many years—of the best method of reviving the American merchant marine in the foreign trade. It also involves international questions of the gravest character, and fraught with most serious possibilities.

I propose, however, to deal to-day with only one very limited aspect of the many questions raised by this bill. I intend to ask the Senate's attention to the single point of what ships we are to buy if this bill becomes law. I am confronted here, as we are confronted in all directions, by a total lack of necessary information, which should properly be furnished by those who are urging the passage of this measure. The President has contented himself in speaking of it with a few simple generalities, which are of no use in the discussion, and with the assertion of his own personal determination to have the bill pass, which is a governing factor in the whole business but which is not an argument and sheds comparatively little light on the darkness which surrounds the pathway of the bill. The Secretary of the Treasury, who competes with the President in zeal for the bill, has uttered more words in regard to it, but has said comparatively little. In his testimony before the House committee, however, he gave the committee to understand that the ships which the Government intended to buy are the German ships now laid up in New York and Boston because they are unwilling to go to sea through fear of capture by the opponents of Germany. When this matter was first brought forward, soon after the outbreak of the war, it was generally understood, both here and in Europe, that the intention of the Government was to secure this legislation in order to buy the German ships. This purpose was never denied by anyone in authority and the Governments of France, Russia, and England protested against it, although the English Government, which apparently was informed that the intention was to buy the German ships, made her protest with certain modifications. At that time the Secretary of the Treasury went before the House committee and in the course of his testimony there spoke as follows:

Mr. SAUNDERS. How would this bill add to the number of available bottoms, when it proposes to make its purchases from existing bottoms? It will not add to the volume of bottoms.

Secretary MCADOO. There is a large number of idle bottoms. They may be purchased.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Chiefly, are not those all German bottoms?

Secretary MCADOO. More of those are idle at the moment than any other.

Mr. SAUNDERS. It has been suggested that there would be grave objection to our undertaking to purchase German bottoms.

Secretary MCADOO. Why?

Mr. SAUNDERS. The newspapers make the statement that objection has come from the nations concerned in this war.

Secretary MCADOO. Of course, I shall not attempt to talk of diplomatic matters.

Mr. SAUNDERS. They say that would be equal to furnishing immediate pecuniary aid—that is, to Germany?

Secretary MCADOO. That is a question altogether aside, I think, from the issue. I believe that it can not be successfully disputed by any individual or any nation that this Government, or any government, has a right to buy merchant ships, provided it buys them in good faith and for a neutral purpose, and that is exactly what would be done in this case.

The Secretary's statements of international law are almost as surprising as his statement of constitutional law which was quoted so effectively by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and commented upon so happily by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] this morning.

The CHAIRMAN. If we should buy some French ships, too, that would alter the situation. In other words, if they had some, as well as Germany, that objection would not be urged?

Mr. SAUNDERS. We would not buy any French ships, because they are not to be bought.

Secretary MCADOO. I infer from what you tell me of from what you have read in the papers that those ships, if purchased, would be purchased from the German Government. I understand that those ships are simply owned by German companies in which German citizens are stockholders. It does not follow that the proceeds of a purchase from a private corporation of that country would be turned over to the Government.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Those German companies have a certain relationship with the German Government. That is the basis of this protest. Of course, I do not know anything about the protest further than has been explained in the press.

Secretary MCADOO. I doubt if the press reports are accurate.

The CHAIRMAN. I apprehend that this Government, before they purchased from anybody, would look into all the conditions surrounding the transaction, and avoid any complications.

Secretary MCADOO. The board proposed in the bill consists really of the President of the United States and certain Cabinet officers therein mentioned.

I am not sure whether the President of the United States is one of the incorporators or not. I did not notice him in the bill.

I think there is no more punctilious citizen of the United States with respect to the neutrality of this country than the President of the United States. I think you may safely depend upon it, if this bill is passed and this board is vested with power to act, that that power will be exercised in such a way that the neutrality of this country will be preserved.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I would not question that; but then, if he exercised that power in that way he would not buy the ships to afford this relief.

I think no one can doubt, after considering what I have just read, that the Secretary of the Treasury practically admitted that the purpose of the bill was to buy the German ships, and this view is coincident with the uncontradicted popular belief.

On the 21st of January I clipped from the paper this statement, which suggests what is going on at the seller's end of the line:

Officials of the Hamburg-American Line said yesterday that the story printed some time ago in the Tribune announcing that Herr Ballin intended coming to this country to negotiate the sale of the company's vessels interned in American ports was correct. It was denied at the time.

It was said in German shipping circles yesterday that the sale of the Dacia was the beginning of an extensive sale of German steamships of small tonnage. But the unexpected complications arising from England's refusal to recognize the transfer to American registry have temporarily halted the negotiations.

Why, last summer, when this proposal to buy the German ships was first mooted, protests were made by France and Russia, as well as England.

Herr Ballin's private secretary has been in New York several weeks arranging the preliminaries for the sale. Local German steamship officials say that on the success of the efforts of the United States Government to induce Great Britain to accept the American registry of the Dacia may depend the future transfer of German vessels to American interests.

I think further that we may take it as admitted that the purchase of the German ships is the original intention of the administration. If it is not their intention, it is easy to demonstrate it by placing in the bill the amendment already voted down in the committee to debar the Government from buying the ships of any belligerent or of the citizens or subjects of any belligerent, under the appropriation made in this act. That amendment embodied my very strong conviction that the Government should under no circumstances buy the ships of the citizens or subjects of any belligerent. I am just as much opposed to buying English ships, or French, Russian, or Austrian ships, as I am to the Government purchase of German ships. The only difference is that the administration is apparently intending to buy the German ships, and no others, and Congress should have the wisdom to prohibit the purchase of any belligerent-owned ships. It is idle to say that we could not buy ships elsewhere. Among the neutrals are maritime nations like Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and Holland, possessing many steamships, some of which we could buy. Brazil, I am informed, has a large number of ships in a line owned by the Government or in a line in which the Government is largely interested, and some of those ships, cargo boats and nothing else, Brazil, it is said, would be glad to sell. Then there are the lines running to South America, which have more cargo space than cargoes. Vessels could be bought there. The United States & Brazil Steamship Line, Norton Lilly & Co., W. R. Grace & Co., the New York-South American Line, the Red D Line, the United Fruit Co., all operate American steamships to South American ports, but these vessels are unable to secure full cargoes owing to financial conditions in South America. There has been, in fact, a falling off of 25 per cent in the number of vessels engaged in this trade for the five months beginning August 1, 1914, as compared with the five months beginning August 1, 1913, and a decrease in net registered tonnage of 32 per cent.

Lastly, from our own coastwise trade ships could be obtained, thus not only giving the Government ships but also affording employment to our shipyards, in order to fill the gaps in the coastwise trade caused by the Government purchases. From all these sources we could obtain just the type of vessels we need—large, modern freighters—whereas with few exceptions the German ships are wholly unsuited, as I shall show, to our present purposes.

The only argument I have heard for the purchase of the German ships is that they are ready to our hand and that, as an emergency exists, we must buy ships of which we can take immediate possession. This is merely a pretext. The emergency may have existed last summer for a short period, but it does not exist now. I intend to discuss at a later date the question of the tonnage now available for the shipping of our exports, but I may say that from the best information that I can obtain I find that there is no difficulty in chartering ships for trade in any part of the world. Moreover, if an emergency did exist there are plenty of other ships besides the German ships ready to our hand—the South American ships I have mentioned, American coastwise ships, and the Brazilian ships already referred to.

No doubt the rates are high. That is because war exists and insurance rates and freight rates correspond to the risks, but high rates do not constitute an emergency. The number of ships which the Government could purchase from any source could take but a trifling part of our freight, and the favored few who could get their freight on the Government ships would no doubt have their risks paid for them by the United States, but this would be of no advantage to the great mass of our shippers and exporters. The emergency argument, therefore, wholly fails as a reason for buying the German ships.

In view, then, of the general belief to which I have referred, of the statements of the Secretary of the Treasury, and of the action of the committee upon the amendment which I introduced, I think it may be assumed that the German ships are the ships to be purchased under this bill, and I therefore desire to bring to the attention of the Senate just what those ships are and invite their consideration and that of the press and the people of the United States to the character of these ships and ask them to decide whether they fulfill even the alleged purposes of the bill.

Let me call attention first to this point, upon which I shall not now dwell, because it will, I am sure, be considered more fully by others, as well as by myself, in the course of the debate, and that is the international effect of the proposed transaction. These German ships are held in port, as I have said, through fear of being seized by hostile cruisers if they emerge from their present place of safety. The removal of these ships from trade, this keeping them laid up at New York and Boston, means of course a great loss to the owners and to Germany. Not only are the owners and Germany, which subsidizes these lines, losing a large amount of money by their being laid up at neutral ports, but they are at a heavy daily expense in caring for the ships and in mitigating, so far as possible, the inevitable deterioration which idle ships incur. Therefore, to buy these ships and relieve their owners from these expenses and to hand over to them thirty or forty millions of money belonging to the people of the United States would be a great and direct assistance to one of the belligerents in the war now raging. It would be an unneutral act, and very readily might be construed as a hostile act and an actual breach of neutrality.

To show that this matter of the transfer of the ships from a belligerent to a neutral flag has already engaged the thoughts of this administration, I desire to call attention to the case of the Dacia and the decision of our War Risk Bureau in regard to it. I read a dispatch from Washington to the New York Sun, dated January 14:

UNITED STATES DECLINES TO INSURE THE "DACIA"—WAR RISK BUREAU'S DECISION SUSPECTED AS MOVE TO PREVENT HER SAILING.

WASHINGTON, January 14, 1915.

It was disclosed to-day that the sudden turmoil over the Dacia and the request of the State Department that Great Britain permit the vessel to discharge her cargo at Rotterdam instead of Bremen were due to the refusal of the Government War Risk Bureau to insure the Dacia and her cargo.

This refusal completely upset the plans of the owners of the cotton about to be shipped. Having obtained consent of the Department of Commerce to the admission of the Dacia to American registry, they had taken it for granted that consistent action would be obtained from the Government War Risk Bureau and that insurance would be written as desired.

The insurance was refused on the ground that as the British Government had indicated objections to the Dacia engaging in trade with Germany, her arrest on the high seas was virtually a certainty and she was not therefore a good risk.

The fact that the Department of Commerce had seen fit to O. K. the transaction to the extent of granting American registry did not influence the War Risk Bureau, and, though flying the American flag, the Dacia was denied insurance.

Members of Congress who heard to-day of the refusal of the War Risk Bureau to insure the Dacia's cargo expressed great interest. It was said to be the first case in which the bureau has refused to give insurance to an American vessel. Many believed firmly that the administration was using the War Risk Bureau in an effort to prevent the sailing of the Dacia and the raising of a delicate issue with Great Britain.

The owners of the cotton to be shipped on the Dacia had, however, entered into a contract for the staple's delivery in Bremen on the assumption that insurance would certainly follow the granting of the American flag to the Dacia.

The American shippers of cotton, therefore, stand to lose heavily through the refusal of the Government's War Risk Bureau—hence the efforts now being made through the State Department to get a pledge from Great Britain that the Dacia be permitted to make a voyage to Rotterdam, a neutral port, instead of Bremen without interference.

The belief here is that the Government intends to use if possible the War Risk Bureau to prevent the recurrence of this delicate question if England consents to allow the Dacia to make this particular voyage to Rotterdam without interference.

It is apparent, of course, that refusal by the Government War Risk Bureau to grant insurance would prevent the sailing of the Dacia to a German port.

It has become known also that the State Department in the negotiations with Great Britain regarding the Dacia is seeking to secure her exemption from arrest for this particular voyage only.

Since that dispatch appeared we have been informed that the Dacia is to sail, with the approval of the State Department, in order to make a test case. It seems to me a rather dangerous business to make test cases of this character in time of war, when belligerent Governments are protesting against the action, and for the State Department to approve sending forth a vessel which, as late as January 13, our War Risk Bureau declined to insure.

Now, however, there has been a change, as we are all aware. The Post of to-day, January 22, says:

The British Government announced last night through its embassy here that if the former Hamburg-American liner Dacia proceeded to sea she would be captured and taken to a prize court. Her cargo of cotton will be purchased by the British Government or forwarded to Rotterdam without further expenses to the shippers, according as the owners may prefer.

The State Department had communicated this information informally to the owners of the Dacia as a result of a message from Ambassador Page, and was notified in reply that the vessel was loading at Galveston and would put to sea, notwithstanding the British Governments position. It was believed that the owners had resolved to test the issue in a prize court.

CARGO, NOT SHIP, INSURED.

Incidentally, the War Risk Insurance Bureau of the American Government yesterday issued a policy insuring the cotton cargo at 4 per cent, but declined to insure the vessel itself.

Naturally they are willing now to insure the cotton because the British Government has formally announced that they would pay for the cotton themselves. So it is a fairly good risk. The vessel, however, they refuse still to insure.

The statement from the British embassy was as follows:

"In connection with the transfer of the Dacia from the German to the American flag, the British Government, while anxious to avoid causing loss to the shippers of the cargo, have found it impossible to agree that the transfer, in the circumstances in which it has been effected, is valid in accordance with the accepted principles of international law. If, therefore, the Dacia should proceed to sea and should be captured, the British Government will find themselves obliged to bring the ship—apart from the cargo—before the prize court.

WILL RESPECT CARGO.

"It is stated that the cargo of the Dacia is to consist solely of cotton owned by American citizens. If this is so, and if the vessel should be captured, the British Government will guarantee either to purchase the cargo at the price which would have been realized by the shippers if the cargo had reached its foreign destination or, if preferred, they will undertake to forward the cotton to Rotterdam without further expense to the shippers."

This announcement concludes the first chapter in the negotiations which the American Government undertook on behalf of the owners of the Dacia to secure her freedom from capture. Under the declaration of London, a transfer of flag must be proven to be of a bona fide character, and not made merely to escape the consequences of war.

UNITED STATES ASKED EXEMPTION.

One of the alleged suspicious circumstances cited at first was that the Dacia planned to traverse her old route from the United States to Germany. This led to a proposal by the owners that the ship take her cargo to Rotterdam, Holland. The State Department asked that, in view of the change, a single voyage by the vessel be not interrupted.

Soon after the war began the State Department, holding that all of the parties to the declaration of London were finding loopholes in the convention and amending it at their own pleasure, announced that, as far as the United States was concerned, it would not be bound by those declarations. Consequently the American Government is operating under the general principles of international law, which recognize bona fide transfers of ownership of merchant vessels of a belligerent power even in time of war.

The following official announcement was made yesterday by Secretary McAdoo that the War Risk Bureau had granted insurance on the cargo of the Dacia.

I have to resort to the press for these matters, because our Government is conducted with such secrecy that the Senate is not even informed officially about these dealings in any respect. The Secretary said:

After careful consideration of the matter, the conclusion was reached that upon the merits of the case the insurance should be granted. It must be understood, however, that this does not establish a precedent and that each case of a similar character that may arise must be judged upon its merits.

The distinction between insuring the cargo and the hull of the Dacia has been found by the bureau on the ground that title to the cotton is absolutely vested in an American citizen, and it is not classed as contraband.

—

BRITISH SEEK TO REASSURE.

LONDON, January 21.

Sir Edward Grey, the British foreign secretary, to-day submitted to Walter Hines Page, the American ambassador, the reply of the British Government to the State Department's request that the steamer Dacia, which now flies the American flag, be permitted to make a special trip to Germany with a cargo of cotton without establishing a precedent as to the validity of the change in the vessel's register.

Every effort is made to reassure the United States about the Dacia's cargo, and a full explanation is made that Great Britain wishes to expedite the cotton movement, but that she can not abandon the position that belligerent ships must not be permitted to escape the effects of belligerency by transferring to another flag.

The English papers recently have carried many dispatches stating that both Greek and Italian firms are negotiating for the purchase of interned German and Austrian ships in the Mediterranean. But Great Britain and her allies, it is stated, will do everything possible to prevent enemy ships escaping the penalties of war by transfer to the flag of any neutral country.

—

"DACIA" HAS STEAM UP.

GALVESTON, TEX., January 21.

With her cargo of cotton for Germany on board and provisions for a voyage, the steamer Dacia is at her pier, with steam up, waiting for orders from E. N. Breitung, owner of the ship, before sailing. When shown the statement that British warships were guarding the Florida Straits, Capt. McDonald smiled, and remarked that he hoped they would remain there. He appears to be confident that he can take his vessel into the English Channel before being held up.

The cotton aboard the Dacia is for January sailing, which gives the ship's owner still 10 days in which to decide whether to sail.

All that relates to the purchase of a German vessel belonging to one of the great lines—the Hamburg-American—by a private individual. It demonstrates the attitude about it; it shows that our Government admits there is a great international question involved in the transfer of the flag from a belligerent ship to a neutral in time of war. But the Dacia is bought by a private individual, and it has been proposed and is the intention, I believe, to-day to give the Government authority to buy belligerent-owned ships and transfer the flag. I need not point out to the Senate what a very different condition that will produce in a situation which is admittedly dangerous internationally.

In the Post also of to-day—January 22—I call attention to the following:

Although the State Department has asked for more details as to the detention of American sailors from the steamers Greenbrier and Carolyn at Bremen, officials expressed the belief that the unusual military precaution has been exercised because the vessels previously had touched at enemy ports.

A consular dispatch to the department from Bremen gave the first intimation that the sailors of the two American vessels which brought cotton to Germany had been detained. The message added that the military authorities had promised to release the sailors the moment the ships were ready to depart. As officials believe both ships already have left Bremen, they took it for granted yesterday that the sailors had been released.

I read that to show the attitude of the other great belligerent power toward neutral vessels. In this connection let me call your attention to the attitude of Germany in regard to neutral commerce, as stated by Bernhardi in his War To-day:

It is customary as a rule to convoy prizes to the nearest port at home and to destroy them only in case of need, as is also provided for in the London declaration. But the party with few naval pivots of its own in foreign waters will very often find itself in a position to assume its case to be one of need, and will then naturally destroy at once the hostile ships captured; short work must likewise generally be made of neutral ships carrying contraband.

We are in friendly relations with Germany and wish to remain so, as with all the other fighting nations. But if we buy French or English or Russian ships and transfer them to our flag, do you imagine that Germany will accept our action? Germany feels that she is fighting for her life, and however willing she may be to make sacrifices and to hold our friendship and good will, you may be sure she will not sacrifice her own safety in the slightest degree in order to do it.

That is the attitude of Germany on one side just the same as that of the opposed powers on the other, and here we are proposing to buy ships owned by a belligerent—I care not what belligerent—and going much further than the mere question of contraband, making ready to put them into a trade where the seas are strewn not only with mines but with international complications of the most dangerous character.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LODGE. I yield for a question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I notice the Senator from Massachusetts assumes that it would be a more difficult or precarious proceeding if the purchase of a German vessel were made by the Government than by a private citizen. I sympathize to a considerable extent with the position taken by the Senator, but I want to ask him whether in the case of a purchase of a belligerent ship by the United States the question of bona fides would not be entirely removed; whether such a purchase made by a Government would not be upon a higher level than a purchase made or purported to have been made by an individual, which might or might not be a bona fide purchase and might or might not remove it out of the realm of suspicion?

Mr. LODGE. Undoubtedly there might be made a question of good faith, but let me first point out that Great Britain, which has always been the seller of ships when other nations were at war, has construed the rule about the transfer of belligerent flags to neutral vessels in time of war with greater liberality than anybody else. Her own interests were involved. France from the days of Napoleon, and both France and Russia to-day, hold to the broad doctrine that after hostilities are begun no transfer of a belligerent flag to a neutral ship can be recognized, except under certain modifications in the declaration of London, which are not binding, so far as we are concerned, and which would not alter this case.

Mr. President, the reason of this position is obvious. If such transfers can be made, a belligerent vessel escaping from a pursuing cruiser of another belligerent takes refuge in our port, or the port of some other neutral, is sold, her flag transferred, and she goes out beyond the 3-mile limit with the neutral flag flying, no nation on earth would recognize that transfer.

Mr. President, when nations are fighting for their lives, as the nations engaged in this war on both sides believe they are, their feelings, I take it, are not unlike our feelings when we were fighting for our national life in the Civil War. They are trying to win with all the desperation that a struggle for life gives to a man or a nation, and if they think that a neutral flag is being used in some way to help the power with which they are struggling for existence, it takes a great deal to stay their hands from what they regard as a great, a vital act of self-defense. We shall do well to remember our own case of the Laird rams. To have involved ourselves at that time in war with England would have been undoubtedly to have brought on the opening of the Southern ports, and thus very probably the failure of the Union cause, and yet in the controversy which arose in London about it, we all remember Mr. Adams's famous note to Lord John Russell, in which our minister said, in speaking of the escape of the Laird rams, "It is superfluous for me to point out to your lordship that this means war." We were fighting in desperation, and it would have been an overwhelming weight almost to throw England's hostility into the scale against us, but we did not hestitate to take the risk of war raher than see help given to our opponent in that struggle. Those nations of Europe have the same feeling burning in their hearts to-day. Why should we project a vessel bought from a belligerent and put under our flag into such a whirlpool of contending passions as the war in Europe is to-day?

The reason why it is worse for the Government than a private person is that if a private ship is taken by a belligerent it is a diplomatic incident; it can be settled by diplomatic arrangement, the cargo can be paid for as Great Britain offers to pay for the cargo of cotton in the case of the Dacia. You must remember that when I say that they do not recognize the transfer it means that France and Russia would regard those ships after their transfer as still German ships, and would capture or sink them, and to capture or sink a Government-owned ship is very different from capturing or sinking a privately owned ship.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRADY in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LODGE. I do. I yield for a question merely.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I wanted to call the Senator's attention to a difference which I think exists. In the case of a ship purchased, say, by Mr. Breitung from a subject of one of the belligerents there would still exist a suspicion—an individual purchasing such a ship—that it was a subterfuge to carry on, say, German commerce; but if Congress passes some such bill as is now proposed and is before the Senate and enters into the construction and purchase of ships for the benefit of the United States, to restore to the United States a certain export trade which has been imperiled by the war, would not that suspicion be dissipated and would not the act of the United States be construed not as being by any possibility in the interest of the belligerents but as being wholly for the benefit of the people of the United States?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not think the fact that the Government purchases a ship necessarily establishes bona fides. We suspected the good faith of Great Britain, and suspected it sometimes with very good reason, in regard to similar cases during our Civil War. The mere fact of the purchase by the Government is not enough, and there you raise at once one of the perilous questions which I fear. We would naturally ask in such a case, "Do you question the good faith of the United States?" Suppose they do? I do not want that situation to arise.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. LODGE. I yield for a question.

Mr. McCUMBER. While the Senator is on this particular subject I wish he would explain what he means by a bona fide transaction. Would he regard the mere payment in cash of the value of the ship as a bona fide transaction when the ship has just escaped from vessels that are seeking her capture? Is there not another element besides the mere passing of money in good faith and paying full value necessary to make a bona fide transaction?

Mr. LODGE. Of course, Mr. President, they could start with the proposition, as the Senator from North Dakota has said, which I stated when I used the illustration of an escaping vessel. The belligerent ship taking refuge in a neutral port, which is the case here, and then the purchase and putting on the neutral flag, no matter who put it on, would be enough without proving bad faith. The evasion by the transfer would be taken as established. But I do not want the question of the faith of the United States questioned. I do not want ships owned by the United States put into any such position. And yet, Mr. President, despite all this——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator has already stated the rule as interpreted by the French Government, which is, I understand, that the mere transfer of a vessel of a belligerent after the beginning of hostilities is regarded as justifying the seizure and condemnation of the vessel. In that view of it, would it make any difference that the vessel had been acquired by a corporation the majority of the stock of which was owned by the United States? The moment such a vessel was purchased by this corporation, a vessel of Germany, after the outbreak of hostilities, would not the French Government under their interpretation of the rule seize the vessel, would it not be condemned by their prize courts, and would they inquire into the question of bona fides?

Mr. LODGE. I answer "yes" to the Senator's question. I think he states the undoubted fact, and that is the danger which arises. They would be considered as German ships if German ships were bought. If we bought an English ship—and I have heard it suggested that that is one reason for keeping a provision for buying belligerent ships out of the bill—if we were to buy a British ship, Germany unquestionably would hold to the general law and would continue to regard her as a British ship after the transfer. Of course if a German cruiser—and there are some loose still on the Atlantic—met that ship, she would treat her as an enemy ship liable to prize or capture.

Mr. President, I did not mean to go so much into this side of the question. It will be discussed later and discussed, I hope, by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] as to the international aspect far more thoroughly and far more ably than I can hope to do it.

I merely want to call attention to the situation.

And yet, despite all this, we are apparently not to be permitted to put a simple clause into this bill which will at once guard us against any such dangers or misunderstandings. Why not? Why not? I have thus far found no answer to this question, nor have I heard any reason given why we should enter upon Government ownership by purchasing a large number of unsuitable ships from a belligerent, with all the difficulties and real dangers which such a step implies.

Supposing the purchase, however, to be made, the transfer of these ships to our flag would follow. Then the question at once arises as to whether the belligerents opposed to Germany would recognize that transfer. I do not intend to dwell upon this point, because, as I have said, it will be thoroughly discussed later; but this much I will repeat and emphasize, that France and Russia have always held consistently to the doctrine that the transfer of the flag from a belligerent to a neutral, after hostilities had begun, was not to be recognized, and England, although Sir Edward Gray in his dispatch last summer made some modifications in his opposition to the sale to us of the German ships as to the particular trade in which these ships should be engaged, he also made it abundantly clear that the objection to the transfer would lie if the ships were put into the European trade. As we now have more cargo space going to South America than we can fill, it is obvious that if the ships to be purchased under this bill are to be of any use they must be put into the European trade, so that we have notice of the views of those belligerents in regard to this question of the transfer of the flag. If the ships were purchased, the unneutral act committed, and the ships transferred to our flag, they would then go to sea as Government-owned ships, and, in the view of the belligerents opposed to Germany, would still be German ships, would be regarded as good prize and liable to be captured or sunk because they were still German ships. I think I need not enlarge upon further or reiterate the danger which such a situation would present to the peace and welfare of the United States. It would not help our export trade and would bring us within measurable distance of war, not with England alone but with France, Russia, and Japan.

I come now to the character of the ships which it is intended to buy, for I think that an examination will lead to some interesting and suggestive conclusions. I print first a list of the German and Austrian vessels now laid up in American ports, according to the Bureau of Navigation of the Department of Commerce. I ask to have that list printed.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. NELSON. I should be glad if the Senator from Massachusetts would read the list.

Mr. LODGE. I will read it. I shall analyze the list, and perhaps it is well to read it. It is as follows:

GERMAN STEAMSHIPS.

HAMBURG-AMERICAN LINE.

Name of vessel.	Gross tons.	Now at—
Vaterland	54,282	New York.
Amerika	22,622	Boston.
President Lincoln	18,168	New York.
President Grant	18,072	New York.
Cincinnati	16,339	Boston.
Pennsylvania	13,333	New York.
Bulgaria	11,440	Baltimore.
Konig Wilhelm II	9,410	New York.
Hamburg	10,531	New York.
Bohemia	8,414	New York.
Rhaetia	6,600	Philadelphia.
Prinz Oskar	6,026	Philadelphia.
Armenia	5,464	New York.
Arcadia	5,454	Norfolk.
Pisa	4,967	New York.
Prinz Joachim	4,760	New York.
Prinz August Wilhelm	4,733	New York.
Prinz Eitel Friedrich	4,650	New York.
Allemannia	4,630	New York.
Saxonia	4,424	Seattle.
Nassovia	3,902	New York.
Sibiria	3,535	Baltimore.
Sarnia	3,402	New York.
Georgia	3,143	New Orleans.
Total	248,301

HANSA.

Ockenfels	5,621	Boston.
Adamsturm	5,000	New York.

JOLIET COMPANY.

Neptun	197	San Francisco.

DAMPFSCHIFFS REED HORN AKTIEN-GESELLSCHAFT.

Portonia	2,778	New York.

OTTO ZELCH.

Clara Mennig	1,685	New York.

DEUTSCH-AUSTRALISCHE DAMPFSCHIFFS GESEL.

Harburg	4,472	New York.

HOLM AND MOLZEN.

Maia	2,555	New York.

D. FUHRMANN NISSLE AND GUNTHER NFLG.

Hohenfelds	2,974	Savannah.

KOSMOS.

Serapis	4,756	San Francisco.

NORTH GERMAN LLOYD.

George Washington	25,570	New York.
Kronprinzessin Cecilie	19,503	Boston.
Kaiser Wilhelm II	19,361	New York.
Grosser Kurfurst	13,102	New York.
Barbarossa	10,984	New York.
Prinzess Irene	10,893	New York.
Friedrich der Grosse	10,771	New York.
Rhein	10,058	Baltimore.

Name of vessel.	Gross tons.	Now at—
Neckar	9,835	Baltimore.
Koln	7,409	Boston.
Wittekind	5,640	Boston.
Willehad	4,761	Boston.
Total	147,887
DEUTSCH-AMERIKAN PETROLEUM CO. (TANK).
Jupiter	10,073	Norfolk.
Delphin	7,129	Norfolk.
Buffalo	6,631	San Francisco.
Phoebus	6,268	San Francisco.
Kiowa	5,076	New York.
Hagen	5,460	New York.
Ems	4,046	Philadelphia.
Meppen	4,045	New York.
Total	48,728
AUSTRIAN STEAMSHIPS.
UNIONE AUSTRIACA.
Martha Washington	8,312	New York.
Dora	7,037	New York.
Erny	6,515	Boston
Ida	4,730	New York.
Clara	3,932	New Orleans.
Teresa	3,769	New Orleans.
Anna	1,575	New Orleans.
Total	35,870
D. TRIPOVICH STEAMSHIP CO.
Himalaia	4,948	New York.
Campania	3,551	Galveston.
Franconia	4,637	Philadelphia.
ATLANTICA SEA NAVIGATION CO. (LTD.).
Morowitz	4,795	Galveston.
Budapest	3,651	Norfolk.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Massachusetts what is the total tonnage of the lines?

Mr. LODGE. Of the Hamburg-American Line it is 248,301 tons, and of the North German Lloyd Line it is 147,887 tons. Those are the two chief lines.

This list gives the names and tonnage of the Hamburg-American and North German Lloyd Lines and of some smaller lines, including the German-American Petroleum Co. I think the vessels of the small lines, except in the case of the Hansa Line, which is, I believe, controlled by the Hamburg-American Line, may be disregarded. They are very small vessels. I think we may also disregard the tank steamers of the German-American Petroleum Co., and I have seen nothing to indicate that the Government wished to extend its beneficent purposes to the ships of Austria. The vessels which it is believed the Government intends to purchase are those belonging to the North German Lloyd Line and the Hamburg-American Line. There are 38 ships belonging to those two lines now laid up at American ports. There are 4 at Baltimore, 2 at Philadelphia, 1 at New Orleans, 7 at Boston, 1 at Seattle, 1 at Norfolk, and 22 at New York. Of these vessels 13 are passenger ships, 9 passenger and freight ships, and 16 freight ships. Some of these passenger ships are of the finest type, and the Vaterland is conspicuously one of the greatest of modern Atlantic steamships. It is safe to say that none of these ships are fit for cargo ships and freighters. The ostensible purpose of this bill is to buy ships to carry freight. There is no lack whatever of passenger accommodations to Europe; on the contrary, the ships now on are all running very light and are probably losing money, owing to the small number of passengers. Let us therefore consider how suitable these passenger ships of the German lines are for the business which it is proposed to take care of under this bill, or for the South American trade, where they are not needed.

Speaking generally, it may be said that passenger ships on the North Atlantic route between Europe and the United States are wholly unfit for mere freight carrying. In proportion to their tonnage they have very little space for freight. Their engines are constructed for the highest speed; their coal bunkers are built to carry a very large amount of coal; their machinery, together with the accommodations for passengers, including dining saloons, reading rooms, bathrooms, and so forth, takes up a large amount of space, which leaves very little for cargo. The freight ordinarily carried in these vessels in normal times is what is generally called fast freight, consisting of goods of great value and comparatively small weight and size, where speedy delivery at a high freight rate is desirable and where the goods are so valuable as to bear the rate without loss. To attempt to use ships like these as general cargo carriers would be absurd on its face. The articles we desire to export are articles of great bulk, such as grain, cotton, and metals, things which these ships in ordinary times never take. In order to make these ships of any value as cargo carriers they would have to be stripped of all their passenger fittings and, in a large measure, rebuilt, causing great expenditure as well as loss of time. It would be preposterous, economically speaking, to take any steamer, for instance, of the Kronprinzessin Cecilie type, and use her simply as a freighter, and among the reasons why this would be so are: First, the initial cost of such a vessel; second, the cost of operation; third, the limited freight capacity. The figures I shall give cover the operation of the steamers, some of which would carry a large number of first, second, and third class passengers, with a limited cargo; others carrying a small number of passengers and a larger amount of cargo; and still others which carried no passengers but cargo only, among the latter type being such vessels as the Bohemia, Rhaetia, Sarnia, Georgia, and Allemania.

These are the type of freight steamers suitable for the carrying of ordinary cargo as distinguished from more valuable goods, which would ordinarily be forwarded by the better and faster steamers which are of the passenger type. No sensible shipping man would think of trying to operate in the South American trade a steamer like the Kronprinzessin Cecilie, for even if you should rip out of this steamer a great deal of her passenger accommodations the space occupied by her boilers and engines would be such a large percentage of the total space, and, further, her coal consumption would be so great, that the loss from operating such a ship in the South American trade would make the proposition absolutely prohibitory. Very few of the German ships laid up here could, even with the expenditure of considerable money, be made suitable for the South American trade. I am assuming for the moment that the original excuse about the South American trade is still extant. As a matter of fact it has faded away.

The only practical way of getting a steamer thoroughly suitable for any trade is to build her particularly for that trade. The operation in any trade of any steamers not suitable for that trade seriously increases the cost. Moreover, there are few harbors in South America that will take deep-draft steamers, and most of the German steamers laid up here are of that character. As an example, no steamer that draws over 22 feet is practicable for the Argentine trade, as she could not enter and leave Buenos Aires at all times, as this draft can only be exceeded under very exceptional circumstances of wind and tide.

If the bill is an emergency proposition, one of the most serious features in the shipping situation to-day, and which is making the handling of steamers very expensive, is not the shortage of cargo space but the seriously congested condition of all the prominent open ports of Europe, to many of which there is no use sending any more steamers, as they are now congested and unable to provide discharging facilities for those now waiting. This applies particularly to such ports as London, Havre, and Genoa, and, to some extent, Liverpool, and is aggravated materially by the scarcity of labor.

Every steamship is different, and the cost of turning her depends upon the number of passengers and amount of freight which she carries, and also the dispatch which she can be given at the respective terminals, and the weather conditions.

Steamships that have been built for particular trades are rarely suitable for other trades, and this applies especially to the North Atlantic trade as regards the passenger steamers and also the combination freight and passenger steamers; but it does not apply to the same extent on purely cargo steamers. Generally speaking, however, cargo steamers for the North Atlantic are more heavily constructed and have more speed than would have been given them had they been constructed for long-voyage trades, such as the South American, Australian, New Zealand and South African.

Passenger steamers constructed for the North Atlantic trade to carry 300 to 500 first class, 200 or 300 second class, and 1,500 to 2,000 third class, in addition to 7,000 or 8,000 tons of cargo, would be entirely unsuitable steamers for the South American trade—and those constitute almost the bulk of the German ships and of all other ships laid up in our ports—but those carrying fewer passengers with the same or more cargo capacity might be altered sufficiently to make them suitable. Altering old steamers, however, is always expensive, and usually it is not an economical undertaking.

The most suitable steamer for the South American trade, if any were needed, which is not the case, for we do not wish to send cotton and wheat to South America, would be one carrying from 100 to 200 cabin passengers, and from 300 to 400 third class passengers, with particularly good fittings—all accommodations to be adapted for the tropical trade—and with a cargo capacity of about 8,000 tons, a large proportion of which should be refrigerated space.

Considering the high price of coal in South America a steamship should be capable of carrying coal for practically the round voyage and, therefore, should not be expected to steam more than about 14 or 15 knots, but 12 knots would be more economical and more suitable for the trade.

I have dwelt a little on the South American trade to show, what perhaps it is needless to show in view of the fact that there is more cargo space to South America than we can fill, that these vessels which I am describing are unsuitable for the South American trade, because, when this proposition was first brought forward last summer, it was said, "Give us an opportunity to build up American commerce to South America."

Now consider what it costs to run these ships which it is proposed to buy. I take the expenses of the round voyage, from the best estimates I can get from gentlemen familiar with the shipping business, and I find that it costs for the round voyage between the United States and Europe, to turn the ships, as it is technically expressed:

Vaterland	$200,000
Kronprinzessin Cecilie	125,000
Kaiser Wilhelm II	125,000
George Washington	125,000

Mr. McCUMBER. That is the cost for each vessel.

Mr. LODGE. The cost of one round trip in the case of each. I am giving them in classes.

Mr. ROOT. The cost for each voyage, both ways.

Mr. LODGE. The "turning" of the ship, going either to England or to Germany, as the case may be, and coming back to New York, or vice versa. It is a voyage across the Atlantic and back.

Mr. ROOT. One round trip.

Mr. LODGE. One round trip.

America	$110,000
Cincinnati	100,000
President Lincoln	100,000
President Grant	100,000
Grosser Kurfurst	70,000
Barbarossa	70,000
Prinzess Irene	70,000
Frederick Der Grosse	70,000
Rhein	70,000
Pennsylvania	70,000
Hamburg	70,000

Imagine, if you can, running freight ships at such expenditures as these.

With two exceptions, the Rhein and Pennsylvania, these are ships carrying first, second, and third class passengers. The following ships carry only second and third class passengers: Brandenburg, Breslau, Koln, Wittekind, and Prinz Oskar. It costs $60,000 to turn the Brandenburg, Breslau, Koln, and Prinz Oskar, and $45,000 to turn the Wittekind. The Armenia, Pisa, and Willehad are immigrant ships and carry only third-class passengers, but it costs $45,000 to turn each one of them.

The following ships belonging to the Hamburg-American Line—the North German Lloyd has no vessels laid up in our ports which are exclusively cargo boats—are simply freighters:

	Year built.	Tonnage.
Bulgaria	1898	11,440
Konig Wilhelm II	1907	9,410
Bohemia	1902	8,414
Prinz Joachim	1903	4,760
Prinz Eitel Friedrich	1901	4,650
Allemannia	1893	4,630
Massovia	1901	3,902
Sarnia	1892	3,402
Georgia	1891	3,143
Graecia	1890	2,753

These are the only cargo boats, carrying nothing but freight, among those which it is proposed to buy. There are among them three large freighters, of 11,000, 9,000, and 8,000 tons, but only one of these is a modern ship, the Konig Wilhelm II, built in 1907. The dates of the building of the others range between 1890 and 1903. Several of them are more than 20 years old, are very small for modern freighters, and would be a poor purchase, with two or three exceptions.

This is the fleet which it is apparently proposed to buy, a fleet which was excellent for the purposes for which it was intended—the North Atlantic passenger service—the primary business being to carry passengers and freight. The freighters are largely for the South American trade, and, as I have said, they are mostly old and, with two or three exceptions, small. To purchase for the Government the passenger ships would be simply to throw away the money of the United States. To buy the cargo boats would be to load ourselves with a lot of old boats, some of them too old and too small to be at all desirable and too small altogether to bring any very substantial relief, if relief is needed. And yet to buy anything except the cargo ships would be monstrous. Some of these German ships, I believe, have been employed in the South American trade, and what we need are cargo steamers for the North Atlantic. These, as I have said, must be more heavily constructed and have more speed than boats constructed for long-voyage trades, such as the South American, New Zealand, Australian, and South African. A very few of these ships could be used to advantage, no doubt, in the North Atlantic trade, but, as a whole, for one reason or another, this fleet of the North German Lloyd and the Hamburg-American Lines is singularly ill fitted for the alleged purposes of this bill or to give the relief to the freight situation which, it is said, is needed. No intelligent man engaged in shipping would think of buying these ships, or, at most, more than two or three of them, for the alleged purposes of this bill. We ought to be protected not only against the international perils arising from the purchase of the German ships laid up at New York and Boston and other ports, but also from the intolerable waste of the public money which the purchase of these ships, as a fleet, or generally, would involve.

When we come to examine the character of these ships with care—I have done it very inadequately, but sufficiently for my purpose—the question at once arises, Why is it so earnestly desired to buy them?—for with care and effort we could get cargo carriers from our coastwise trade or from other neutral nations. We could pick up ships of the proper type here and there, and yet it is perfectly evident that the plan of the bill and the plan of the administration is to buy the German ships en bloc, or a very large number of them. Why? I am not alone in asking this question. Let me read an editorial from the Chicago Tribune of January 12, 1915, which I happened to see the other day:

WHAT IS BEHIND THE SHIP-PURCHASE BILL?

Secretary McAdoo's address in this city on the ship-purchase bill may have been intended to be direct and pointed, but as a matter of fact it was evasive and superficial. It failed to deal with the most fundamental objection to the measure; it did not attempt to justify what all intelligent critics regard as its inherent and incurable defect or vice.

That vice is this—that the bill rests on no definite, acknowledged theory. Its sponsors can't agree on any defense of it. The President gave us one theory in his message, and Secretary McAdoo hinted at another one in his speech, but neither adhered to his theory, and both contradicted themselves.

If the bill is an emergency proposal called forth by the great war, then it should frankly be advocated as a makeshift and stop-gap, and, moreover, as Senator BURTON has said, the alleged emergency should be demonstrated by relevant facts and figures. This demonstration is not forthcoming; certain misleading figures have been cited, but the shipping and transportation experts have repudiated the interpretation put on the figures by the sponsors of the bill. No business authority has been or can be quoted in its favor.

If, on the other hand, the bill is not an emergency proposal, but a serious and constructive piece of legislation designed to give impetus to the development of a merchant marine, then the very worst time has been unhappily and absurdly chosen for the introduction and passage of such a measure. A time of stress and uncertainty, of unprecedented disturbances in trade and shipping, a time altogether anomalous from every financial and business viewpoint, is assuredly not the time to try to take a momentous step toward the establishment of a merchant marine. We have waited 50 years, says Mr. McAdoo, forgetting that he has advanced the emergency view of the bill. Well, if we have waited 50 years, we can wait another year or two; we can wait till peace has been reestablished and normal conditions have been restored. The sensible man does not during a baffling crisis sit down to deliberate on lines of policy to be pursued under ordinary and normal conditions.

What alternative course do you propose? ask the defenders of the bill. Alternative to what theory, in what sense—as an emergency measure or normal and permanent one?

The simple truth is, neither Secretary McAdoo, nor Senator FLETCHER, nor anybody else has considered or met the many objections to their bill that the minority of the Senate committee or the chambers of commerce have advanced in reports and circulars. They have dealt in mere generalities and charged "partisanship." Mr. McAdoo "deplored" the fact that "great men" will fight a good bill solely because it is "sponsored by an opposite party." Before deploring that alleged fact he should have answered the arguments—the facts, figures, and reasoning—of the minority and the business men just referred to. He did nothing of the kind. Those arguments remain unanswered, as we shall show, and the charge of partisanship is gratuitous and totally unwarranted. The stubborn insistence of the administration respecting this dubious departure is in direct proportion to the feebleness of the arguments advanced for it. As the debate proceeds and this fact develops, curiosity is aroused.

Why is this bill being pressed so vigorously? What is the pressure behind it? Certainly not the pressure of overwhelming facts and cogent reasoning, for they would be brought forward.

It is not cynicism but common sense, therefore, that asks for more light.

What is behind the ship-purchase bill?

I confess I am entirely unable to answer the question of the Chicago Tribune, and I do not know that there is anything behind this bill except the desires of the administration. I am certain, however, that there are no good reasons or arguments in its favor, and I am sure that to allow it to become law without some provision protecting us against the purchase of the ships of belligerents, and the consequent international complications, will make it a very bad bill, indeed, for the American people, setting aside for the moment all the grave objections to Government ownership, upon which I shall hope to speak at another time.

The economic side of this bill is of enormous importance; the question of whether the Government shall own steamships is of the greatest magnitude economically; the importance of the measure can not be overestimated; but these all sink into insignificance compared with the dangers which surround this bill if it passes without some prohibition against the purchase of belligerent-owned ships. I am not going further into that question to-day; but for the Government to take belligerent-owned ships—I do not care whether they be German ships or English ships, as I have heard it said it is intended to acquire the latter—whatever belligerent-owned ships are bought and put into the north Atlantic trade will bring this country and this people into international complications which will be within easily measurable distance of war or humiliation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRYAN). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the original bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hardwick	Oliver	Smith, Mich.
Bankhead	Hitchcock	Overman	Smoot
Brady	Hughes	Owen	Sterling
Brandegee	James	Page	Stone
Bryan	Jones	Perkins	Sutherland
Camden	Kenyon	Pomerene	Thomas
Catron	Kern	Ransdell	Thornton
Chamberlain	La Follette	Reed	Tillman
Culberson	Lane	Robinson	Townsend
Cummins	Lea, Tenn.	Root	Vardaman
Dillingham	Lee, Md.	Shafroth	Warren
du Pont	Lodge	Sheppard	White
Fletcher	McCumber	Sherman	Williams
Gallinger	Martin, Va.	Simmons
Gore	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ariz.
Gronna	Norris	Smith, Ga.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-one Senators having responded to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, a day or two ago I gave notice that I would speak to-morrow, Saturday. In order to accommodate myself to the convenience of others I will change that notice to Monday, and will speak on Monday, with the permission of the Senate, at as early an hour as I can secure the floor.

I wish to say, if I may be permitted, that I shall devote some considerable attention to a question which was put by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] regarding the rule of international law as to good faith in the transfer of merchant vessels from a belligerent to a neutral flag in time of war.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I have heard some suggestions to the effect that certain commercial organizations have passed resolutions opposing the pending bill and that apparently no commercial organizations or representatives of business interests anywhere have favored the bill. I am just in receipt of a telegram which I will ask the Secretary to read in that connection, and also a resolution of the Board of Trade of Jacksonville.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Secretary will read as requested. The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., January 22, 1915.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The directors of the Illinois Manufacturers' Association in special meeting January 20 make the following presentation to the Senators and Representatives from Illinois in Congress:

"The manufacturers of the Middle West want Congress to pass the ship-purchase bill because they believe that American ships are the only means by which the ocean rate competition can be met. Their foreign trade can not be developed with foreigners fixing the tariff for the hauling of their goods.

"The Illinois Manufacturers' Association has been the greatest agency in the Middle West for the stimulation of foreign trade. It has consistently and persistently kept up the agitation for years. It believes the American manufacturer is about to reap a harvest. Interest is developing in every direction. One thing, and one thing only, stands in the way, and that is that America does not control the ships carrying the American products."

You are therefore respectfully requested to use all your influence and to vote to secure the passage of the ship-purchase bill.

EDWARD N. HURLEY, President.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., December 23, 1914.

Whereas it has been brought to the attention of the board of governors of the Jacksonville Board of Trade that there is now pending a bill before the United States Senate to authorize the United States, acting through a shipping board, to subscribe to the capital stock of a corporation to be organized under the laws of the United States, etc., and numbered Senate bill 6856; and

Whereas this organization thinks that this is a bill calculated to be of immense help in opening up routes of trade and getting our products to market: Therefore be it

Resolved by the board of governors of the Jacksonville Board of Trade in regular session assembled, That we most heartily approve the bill and urge its passage. Be it further

Resolved, That our Representatives in Congress, and particularly our Senators, be requested to use their best endeavors to secure the passage of the bill at an early date.

[SEAL.] JACKSONVILLE BOARD OF TRADE,
CHAS. H. MANN, President.
W. N. CONOLEY, Secretary.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Florida if Mr. Hurley, who signed the memorial in behalf of the Manufacturers' Association, is the same gentleman who has been tendered a position upon the Federal Trade Commission by President Wilson within the last few days?

Mr. FLETCHER. I really do not know as to that, Mr. President. I understand this is a very responsible and very influential and large organization in Chicago, composed in very large majority, anyhow, of prominent Republicans.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; I have no doubt about that. I think it is a thoroughly representative organization; but I do know that the Mr. Hurley who signed the memorial is the man who has just been tendered by the President a place on the new Trade Commission.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not suppose the Senator questions the accuracy of the statement?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, no; but it harmonizes very well with the plan for an official propaganda upon which the administration seems to rely for approval of its acts.

Mr. FLETCHER. I should be glad if the Senator would inform us how he knows that Mr. Hurley has been tendered this position. I never have heard of it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The semiofficial announcement has been made through the public press. I do not know whether the President has changed his mind about it or not. Two or three days ago Mr. Hurley was on the list given out at the White House, and this communication indicates his excellent qualifications for the place.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield for a suggestion?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly. I have not the floor, however.

Mr. ROBINSON. I saw a statement in the public press a day or two ago that a Mr. Hurley, of Seattle, Wash., was——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, no; that is a different man, a Progressive in Seattle—Will H. Perry, I believe. Mr. Hurley, who is quite well known in Illinois, I think, is entitled to this favor at the hands of the Democratic Party. Anyone who can swallow this bill without a grimace is deserving of prompt attention at the hands of the President.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, in the interests of accuracy I will say that it is Mr. Parry.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Very well. I do not know what it will be after the next election. I know he was shorn somewhat of some of his features in the last election, although he is nevertheless an excellent man.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. Parry was a great Republican hero, the head of the Manufacturers' Association, and testified before our lobby committee.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I ask permission to submit a resolution to have it referred to the Indian Affairs Committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I should like to add that Mr. Edward N. Hurley was part of the "insidious lobby" here during the tariff legislation in 1913. I can identify him as being here quite frequently in favor of free trade.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is not a resolution by Mr. Hurley, it is a resolution of this organization. Whatever may be said about Mr. Hurley has no application.

Mr. OVERMAN. If this is Mr. Hurley, I misunderstood the name. It was Mr. Parry to whom I referred.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. His name is Parry. My inquiry related entirely to Mr. Hurley.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it is now nearly 4 o'clock. The senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] intended to speak, but expected to start before this time. I will ask the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] if it would serve the purposes of the majority as well for the Senate to go into executive session at this time, so that the Senator from New Hampshire can start upon his speech in the morning rather than to break it, as starting at this hour of the day would do?

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 35 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRYAN) announced the signature of the Vice President to the following enrolled bills, which had heretofore been signed by the Speaker of the House:

S. 4012. An act to increase the limit of cost of the United States public building at Grand Junction, Colo.; and

S. 6309. An act to establish the Rocky Mountain National Park in the State of Colorado, and for other purposes.

S. W. LANGHORNE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the request of the House of Representatives to be furnished a duplicate copy of the bill (S. 2334) for the relief of S. W. Langhorne and the legal representatives of H. S. Howell, and, by unanimous consent, the request was ordered to be complied with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ROBINSON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Batesville, Ark., praying that an appropriation be made for the construction of seven locks and dams on the upper White River above Batesville, Ark., for the improvement of navigation, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. OLIVER presented petitions of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, Pa., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty with Colombia, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Retail Grocers' Protective Union of Pittsburgh, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation to prevent the unfair practice of cutting prices on standard goods, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Monessen, Pa., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Stoneboro, Pa., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to increase the Army and Navy equipment, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GALLINGER presented the memorial of John H. Bartlett, of Manchester, N. H., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation restricting the freedom of the press, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented the petition of A. O. Wharton, president of the Railroad Employees, Department of the American Federation of Labor, of St. Louis, Mo., praying for the enactment of legislation requiring the employment of competent inspectors in connection with the administration of locomotive-boiler safety-appliance laws, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. McLEAN presented petitions of the German-American Alliance of Meriden; the Lyra Singing Society, of Meriden; and of sundry citizens of Danbury, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Typographical Union of New Britain, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation to regulate interstate commerce in convict-made goods, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SHIVELY presented a petition of the Trades and Labor Union of Kokomo, Ind., praying for the enactment of legislation to regulate interstate commerce of convict-made goods, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of the Young Woman's Christian Union of Elkhart; of the congregations of the First Brethren Church of Elkhart; the Christian Church of Millersburg; the Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church, of Elkhart; the Lutheran Church of Middleburg; and the Christian Church of Clinton, all in the State of Indiana, praying for Government censorship of moving-picture films, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented the petition of L. A. Cox, James Cochran, J. R. Beck, and 320 other citizens of Columbus, Ind., praying for the repeal of the present migratory-bird law, which was referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game.

Mr. TILLMAN presented a petition of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, Order of Railway Conductors, Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, and Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen in the transportation department of the Seaboard Air Line Railroad, of Hamlet, N. C., praying for the extension of the Federal inspection of locomotive boilers, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Maiden, Hickery, Hudson, Gasto, Granite Falls, and Callettsville, all in the State of North Carolina, praying that just and fair relief be granted the railway mail employees over the Carolina & Northwestern Railway, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

FEDERAL AID TO POST ROADS.

Mr. GRONNA. I submit the report of the Joint Committee on Federal Aid in the Construction of Post Roads, and ask that it be received and printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SHIVELY:

A bill (S. 7359) granting an increase of pension to James A. McAllister;

A bill (S. 7360) granting an increase of pension to Isaiah Griner; and

A bill (S. 7361) granting a pension to William Meyers; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 7362) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to patent certain lands to the State of Utah, and to accept relinquishment from the State of Utah of certain other lands in lieu thereof; to the Committee on Public Lands.

AMENDMENT TO POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment providing that superintendent of mails and other supervisory employees in post offices shall receive pay while absent from duty caused by injuries received while on duty, the same as all other post-office employees, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 19906), which was ordered to be printed and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

THE MERCHANT MARINE (S. DOC. NO. 715).

Mr. NELSON. I have received a letter from the president of the Chamber of Commerce of Boston, Mass., transmitting a report of the committee on merchant marine, relative to the pending bills providing for Government ownership and operation of merchant vessels in the trade between the Atlantic, Gulf, or Pacific ports of the United States and the ports of Central and South America and elsewhere. I ask that the report may be printed as a public document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

A FOREST POLICY FOR TEXAS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have an article prepared by J. S. Peters, Chief of State Cooperation, United States Forest Service, on the question of a forest policy for Texas. I desire to have the article printed as a document, and with that view ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the article will be referred to the Committee on Printing for action.

COAST GUARD.

Mr. TOWNSEND. On yesterday the Chair laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to Senate bill 2337, and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] asked that the bill and amendments lie on the table and be printed. I now ask that the amendments be taken up and acted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2337) to create the Coast Guard by combining therein the existing Life-Saving Service and the Revenue-Cutter Service.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 6121) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Niagara River, in the town of Lewiston, in the county of Niagara and State of New York.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20241) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1915 and prior years, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 20241) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1915 and for prior years, and for other purposes, and it was thereupon signed by the presiding officer as the Acting President pro tempore.

RECESS.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate take a recess until Monday morning next at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m., Friday, January 22, 1915) the Senate took a recess until Monday, January 25, 1915, at 11 o'clock a. m.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate January 22 (legislative day of January 15), 1915.

COMMISSIONER FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Louis Brownlow to be a Commissioner for the District of Columbia.

RECEIVER OF PUBLIC MONEYS.

Martin N. Fegtly to be receiver of public moneys at Vale, Oreg.

REGISTER OF THE LAND OFFICE.

Nathaniel Campbell to be register of the land office at Portland, Oreg.

PROMOTIONS IN THE NAVY.

Commander Herman O. Stickney to be a captain.
Lieut. Commander Ivan C. Wettengel to be a commander.
The following-named ensigns to be lieutenants (junior grade):
George W. Hewlett,
Frank S. Carter, and
John M. Ashley.
Ensign James D. Moore to be a lieutenant (junior grade).

POSTMASTERS.

ALABAMA.

Theresa C. Spink, Grand Bay.

ARIZONA.

Ella G. Clarke, Florence.

CALIFORNIA.

T. C. H. De Lapp, Huntington Beach.
Charles L. Gassaway, Banning.
K. D. Harger, Riverside.
Henry E. Smith, Taft.

COLORADO.

James Brennan, Grand Valley.
Mary Farrell, Aspen.
D. W. Shores, Carbondale.

CONNECTICUT.

W. R. Monroe, Coscob.

GEORGIA.

W. A. Enterkin, Temple.

ILLINOIS.

P. M. Biwer, Lincoln.

INDIANA.

John L. Rohde, Hammond.
Merrimon Straughn, Cambridge City.

IOWA.

Frank W. Eichoff, Muscatine.
Walter E. Witten, Sloan.

KANSAS.

James T. Braddock, Madison.
John F. Hostetler, Great Bend.
W. A. McClure, Baldwin City.
W. S. Twist, Bonner Springs.

KENTUCKY.

Willis Green Bandy, Irvington.
Andrew M. Edwards, New Castle.
Helen L. Gurney, Erlanger.
John B. Lasley, Lewisburg.
Allie Reid, Brandenberg.
George T. Smith, Beattyville.
Edward F. Yelton, Butler.

LOUISIANA.

Frank J. Maricelli, jr., Campti.

MICHIGAN.

Clyde O. Barrett, Mackinaw.
Ward J. Kelly, Crystal Falls.
Charles J. Tarte, Marine City.

MINNESOTA.

Frank X. Eickmann, Glencoe.
Jacob Gish, Le Sueur.
James D. Griggs, Truman.

MISSISSIPPI.

Virginia B. Duckworth, Prentiss.
L. M. McClure, Ocean Springs.
James T. Skelton, Goodman.

MISSOURI.

William H. Alexander, Paris.
George H. Applegate, Keytesville.
James T. Dearmont, Mound City.
John H. Nelson, Lewistown.
Dow S. Pollard, Cowgill.
William J. Rouse, Monroe City.
Edward Smyth, New Hampton.
Bayard C. Wilson, Lawson.

NEBRASKA.

Edward H. Bishop, Central City.
A. S. Campbell, Imperial.
William H. Hartsick, Westpoint.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

John N. Grimes, Troy.

NEW JERSEY.

James D. Carpenter, Woodbury.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Stephen L. Ross, Robersonville.
William B. Walker, Andrews.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

David Duncan, Whitmire.
Benjamin J. Hammet, Blackville.
Samuel E. Owen, St. Matthews.
John W. Peeples, Estill.

TEXAS.

Walter C. Blalock, Linden.
William E. Cage, Pharr.
Horace B. Cooper, Quinlan.
J. T. Cox, Groesbeck.
J. A. Kercheville, Devine.
George P. Lillard, Seguin.
D. L. Lunn, Humble.
T. L. D. Richardson, Jourdanton.
James T. Tarlton, Gunter.
Elmo D. McCage, Aubrey.

UTAH.

Walter K. Granger, Cedar City.
L. P. Nelson, Mount Pleasant.

WASHINGTON.

Stonewall J. Craig, Clarkston.
George T. Heslin, Newport.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 22, 1915.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Profoundly sensible, O God our Father, of our utter dependence upon Thee for every pulsation of the heart, for every thought and act, most reverently we bow in Thy presence and devoutly pray for Thy guidance, that in all the duties and responsibilities of the hour we may faithfully and conscientiously strive to fulfill the desires of Thy heart. In the spirit of the Lord Christ our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. CARLIN. I will withhold the point for the present.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, by request of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, I ask unanimous consent that a session be held Monday evening, January 25, for the consideration of bills H. R. 21037 and H. R. 21089, one being from the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the other from the Committee on Pensions; that the House recess from 5 o'clock until 8 o'clock, and that no other business be transacted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that next Monday at 5 o'clock the House shall stand in recess until 8 o'clock, when there shall be a session, to extend not later than 11 o'clock, to consider two bills from the Pension Committees, and that no other business shall be transacted at that session. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, would it not be better to make the bills in order after we finish the military appropriation bill? This might cost us more time than the other way.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I would have no objection to that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The chairman of the Military Committee, the gentleman from Virginia, desires to finish the military bill to-day, even if it should run into a night session, and to-morrow take up another appropriation bill. We can change the order if it becomes necessary.

Mr. MANN. I should say that if we pass the Army appropriation bill to-night we can pass the pension bills after that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am informed that the pension bills will not take over 40 minutes.

Mr. MANN. I shall not object.

Mr. HAY. I will say that it is my purpose to finish the Army appropriation bill to-night, if I can keep gentlemen on the floor.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to that; but when we recess at 5 o'clock in order to have an evening session at 8 o'clock, to pass a bill that it is supposed will take about 40 minutes, we lose the hour between 5 and 6 o'clock to begin with. I shall not object to the request.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that it may be that when we reach Monday we can set aside the order by unanimous consent. There is no contest about these pension bills. I merely want to satisfy the gentleman from Ohio that the opportunity will be given, and we can set aside the order later, if an opportune time comes for the consideration of the pension bills.

Mr. MANN. I do not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD]?

Mr. CARLIN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia objects.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman understands, does he, that this request is for Monday—not for to-day?

Mr. CARLIN. I withdraw my objection to the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia withdraws his objection. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Reserving the right to object, I should like to have a proviso, if the leave is granted, that it shall not interfere with the business of District of Columbia day.

The SPEAKER. This is for a night session.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I know it is; but still I would like to have that reservation.

Mr. MANN. I understood the other day that the gentleman was satisfied with this arrangement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] insists on a proviso that this shall not interfere with the business of his committee on Monday.

Mr. MANN. I would not consent to a night session for District business in this way.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will not ask for one.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Ohio only asks for a night session.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. We might run as late as that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, we can not determine at this time whether District of Columbia business can have Monday or not. It may be that we shall need the day for the consideration of appropriation bills, but we can set aside the night session by unanimous consent if it is necessary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

GOVERNMENT MANUFACTURE OF MUNITIONS OF WAR.

Mr. TAVENNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of Government manufacture of munitions of war.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TAVENNER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the manufacture of munitions of war. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, it was my purpose to ask that the District of Columbia appropriation bill (H. R. 19422) be taken from the Speaker's table and sent to conference, but at the request of a number of gentlemen within the last few minutes I will defer it, and I give notice that I shall make that motion to-morrow morning immediately after the reading of the Journal.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 20347) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Army appropriation bill (H. R. 20347), with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingencies, military information section, General Staff Corps: For contingent expenses of the military information section, General Staff Corps, including the purchase of law books, professional books of reference; periodicals and newspapers; and of the military attachés at the United States embassies and legations abroad; and of the branch office of the military information section at Manila; to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, $11,000: Provided, That section 3648, Revised Statutes, shall not apply to subscriptions for foreign and professional newspapers and periodicals to be paid for from this appropriation: Provided further, That the actual and necessary expenses of officers of the Army who after July 1, 1914, have been on duty abroad for the purpose of observing operations of armies of foreign States at war, and of officers who may hereafter be on duty abroad for that purpose, shall be paid out of the appropriation for contingencies of the military information section, General Staff Corps, upon certificates of the Secretary of War that the expenditures were necessary for obtaining military information; and the amount appropriated for such contingencies by an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915," approved April 27, 1914, is increased to $26,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the last proviso.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, it is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CRISP). The Chair sustains the point of order. The last proviso will be stricken from the bill, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States service schools: To provide means for the theoretical and practical instruction at the Army service schools (including the Army Staff College, the Army School of the Line, the Army Field Engineer School, the Army Field Service School and Correspondence School for Medical Officers, and the Army Signal School) at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., the Mounted Service School at Fort Riley, Kans., and the School of Fire for Field Artillery and for the School of Musketry at Fort Sill, Okla., by the purchase of textbooks, books of reference, scientific and professional papers, the purchase of modern instruments and material for theoretical and practical instruction, employment of temporary, technical, or special services, and for all other absolutely necessary expenses, to be allotted in such proportions as may, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, be for the best interests of the military service, $35,350.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, after line 12, insert: "For pay of one translator, at $100 per month, to be appointed by the commandant of the Army service schools, $1,200.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order until we have some explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin reserves a point of order.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I introduced this amendment at the request of my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. AVIS], who is not able to be present this morning, but who has left with me a memorandum in which are set forth the reasons for offering the amendment.

"The translating to be done is of a highly technical nature, requiring an expert knowledge of military matters and experience of the military service. The position can not be properly filled by one from the civil service, however well qualified in a linguistic way, as such person will lack the experience of military service and knowledge of the technical military terms and expressions. The translator whom it is desired to employ has had 30 years' service as an enlisted man and officer, and has been engaged for years upon this line of work and is thoroughly competent in every way."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the special need of such legislation? Is this merely a provision to give employment to some one individual?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I can only say that in this particular instance I am executing a commission, as I have indicated, and have no further light or information in regard to the matter.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the amendment ever been submitted to the committee for consideration?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I understand the chairman of the committee may have some knowledge of it. At least, the subject was brought to his attention.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I have not any more information than has the gentleman from Vermont, but after looking into it I see no objection to the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has not the department an opportunity today to appoint a translator from the civil list, if it sees fit?

Mr. HAY. I do not know about that; but the wording of this amendment takes it out of the civil service and puts it into the hands of the man who commands the school. It takes it out of the civil service.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The very purpose of taking it out of the civil service is to prevent the possibility of some schoolmaster somewhere, who does not understand anything about the Army, qualifying under the technical requirements of the civil-service examination, but knowing nothing about the real atmosphere and detail of military matters.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand, the discretion is put in the head of the school?

Mr. HAY. To be appointed by the commandant.

Mr. STAFFORD. Relieved of the limitation of civil service?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Vermont yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does not the reason that the gentleman has just stated for taking this particular appointment out of the hands of the Civil Service Commission and turning it over to the special branch of the public service in which the man will be employed apply with equal force to many other places in the Government service that are now left absolutely with what he calls the schoolmaster system and the ability to qualify technically, and so forth?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I dare say. The best judgment I could give on that question, I will say to the gentleman, is that every tub should stand upon its own bottom, and the merits of each individual question I could better pass on when I know to what particular case the gentleman refers.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Oh, I refer to many of them.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I would not want to give very diversified information upon generalities at this time, with this amendments at stake. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the committee what is the practice in respect to the appointment of instructors in our various schools where the instructor teaches general subjects of education?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I understand that in the Army schools generally the instructors are appointed to give instruction in military matters, the science of war, and the school of the soldier, and so on, and are taken from the regular line of the Army by detail.

Mr. STAFFORD. I refer to instructors outside of those of tactical matters; for instance, instructors in the languages, and the like.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Academic studies?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; scientific and academic. Are those instructors appointed from the civil-service list or are they appointed from the service generally?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. These men at West Point have been there for years. I do not know how most of them secured their appointments. They have been there and have been retained in the service for many years, as I understand it, in most instances.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin make the point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BATHRICK) there were—ayes 36, noes 1.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT.

Contingencies, headquarters of military departments, and tactical commands: For contingent expenses at the headquarters of the several territorial departments, territorial districts, tactical divisions and brigades, including the staff corps serving thereat, being for the purchase of the necessary articles of office, toilet, and desk furniture, stationery, ice, and potable water for office use when necessary, binding, maps, technical books of reference, professional and technical newspapers and periodicals, payment for which may be made in advance, and police utensils, to be allotted by the Secretary of War, and to be expended in the discretion of the commanding officers of the several military departments, districts, and technical commands, $7,500.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 5, line 2, by striking out the word "technical" and inserting the word "tactical."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF SIGNAL OFFICER.

Signal Service of the Army: For expenses of the Signal Service of the Army, as follows: Purchase, equipment, and repair of field electric telegraphs, signal equipments, and stores, binocular glasses, telescopes, heliostats, and other necessary instruments, including necessary meteorological instruments for use on target ranges; war balloons and airships, and accessories, including their maintenance and repair; telephone apparatus (exclusive of exchange service) and maintenance of the same; electrical installations and maintenance at military posts; fire control and direction apparatus and matériel for field artillery; maintenance and repair of military telegraph lines and cables, including salaries of civilian employees, supplies, and general repairs, and other expenses connected with the duty of collecting and transmitting information for the Army by telegraph or otherwise, $600,000.

Provided, That not more than $500 of the foregoing shall be used for the cost of special technical instruction of officers of said section.

Provided, however, That not more than $300,000 shall be used for the purchase, maintenance, operation, and repair of airships and other aerial machines and accessories necessary in the aviation section: Provided, That hereafter the Signal Corps may exchange typewriters and adding machines in the purchase of similar equipment.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 4, page 7, after the figures "$300,000," insert the words, "of the foregoing appropriation."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. I also desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "section," in line 7, page 7, insert the words, "and for the purchase, maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles which may be necessary for the aviation section."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. HAY. I would rather for the gentleman to make the point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. I will make the point of order for this reason: There was a proviso in the legislative bill of last year which said that these motor-propelled, passenger-carrying vehicles should be estimated for and specifically appropriated for in the appropriation bill, and my understanding of that law was—and if I am wrong I am willing to withdraw the point of order—that they should estimate the number, and that number should be provided in the bill. Now, if I am wrong about that, that is all I have to say. In the Indian appropriation bill there was a provision, as gentlemen will remember, stating how many should be purchased of this kind of vehicles. The provision which the gentleman from Virginia has here does not differ from the old law, which provided that motor-propelled vehicles should be purchased out of certain appropriations in the bill. The same provision exists, I will say to the gentleman, further along in the bill, where it provides for the purchase of these vehicles; and what I am doing this for is to know whether that provision of the law should apply in reference to the naming of the number of vehicles that should be purchased or whether they shall be estimated for, and then the bill shall provide the same as it has done in the past, without any specific number, as has been done for years. As I understand the provision further along in the bill, it does give them the right to purchase any number they may see fit, so far as the appropriation will go, regardless of estimates. I judge they possibly would not do that, but I think in all fairness to this provision we put into the law there ought to be something of that kind, so that Congress may know how many are going to be purchased out of this appropriation. The only reason I make this point of order is to determine whether or not this does comply with the law. If it does, of course the law goes along in the same old way it did before, except we get estimates, and they can exceed them if they so desire in the purchase of these machines out of the appropriation which is given by Congress. Now, I spoke to the gentleman from Virginia before this bill was under consideration in reference to the matter. I have not the old law at hand which I could quote to the Chairman, but it was a provision put in the legislative bill of last year—section 5, I think, if I remember—but the Chair no doubt has that law and is familiar with the provision which was contained in the bill at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like for the gentleman from Illinois to state his point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. The point of order is that they must be specifically provided for in the bill, and the intention of Congress was to have the number estimated for, the number that they proposed to purchase, and that number should be provided for in the bill. That is the point of order that I make against this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman that statute before him? The Chair is not familiar with it.

Mr. MANN. I have the statute, which I shall be glad to send to the Chair.

Mr. FOSTER. I have not the statute right at my hand, and I will be obliged to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. It is section 5 of the legislative bill, which reads as follows:

SEC. 5. No appropriation made in this or any other act shall be available for the purchase of any motor-propelled or horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicle for the service of any of the executive departments or other Government establishments, or any branch of the Government service, unless specific authority is given therefor, and after the close of the fiscal year 1915 there shall not be expended out of any appropriation made by Congress any sum for purchase, maintenance, repair, or operation of motor-propelled or horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles for any branch of the public service of the United States unless the same is specifically authorized by law, and in the estimates for the fiscal year 1916 and subsequent fiscal years there shall be submitted in detail estimates for such necessary appropriations as are intended to be used for purchase, maintenance, repair, or operation of all motor-propelled or horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles, specifying the sums required, the public purposes for which said vehicles are intended, and the officials or employees by whom the same are to be used.

Mr. FOSTER. I think under section 5 the intention of Congress was that they should estimate for the number, and that number should be placed in the bill. Now, I am not going into the merits of this at all or as to the necessity for them, but I think it is right we should have this ruling, and we should know whether or not there should be a specific appropriation in the bill for the number of these motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the amendment is subject to a point of order. The matter was discussed quite fully in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union when the Indian appropriation bill was under consideration, and quite a length of time was taken with a discussion of the matter involving the same principle, and the Chairman of that committee held that the item was in order.

That is the authority which is required by the statute. Without this authority in making the appropriation no portion of the appropriation could be expended for the purchase of motor or other passenger-carrying vehicles. It is true the statute requires that estimates shall be made in detail, but that is a provision carried as to a great many items in estimates, which are not carried in appropriation bills. That is for the information of the committee making up the appropriation bills and for other Members of the House, but we constantly require a greater detail in estimates than we carry in the appropriation. The Committee on Military Affairs could not make up this appropriation bill, which largely consists of lump-sum appropriations, without more detailed information and more details in the appropriation than are carried in the bill. Is not that correct?

Mr. HAY. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. That is true of all the appropriations.

Mr. HAY. And I may say, Mr. Chairman, that there was an estimate made for those vehicles that are to be used by the Signal Corps, and if this proviso is not put in here, of course the Signal Corps out of this or any other appropriation can not have these motor-propelled vehicles. And in the discussion of this question the other day, and in the decision made by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole at that time, that decision was not based upon the fact that that bill contained the number of vehicles but upon the broad principle that in the bill then under discussion it was necessary to give the specific privilege to purchase motor-propelled and horse-drawn vehicles for passenger purposes. I can not think that the Chair could hold that in every instance the number of vehicles should be given in the bill. If we had to give the number of vehicles or if that law was applied to some other item, say blankets and saddles, and we had to give the number of blankets and the number of saddles, and so on, that we provide for in this bill, the bill would be voluminous and never ending.

The CHAIRMAN. Can the Chair ask the gentleman from Virginia a question?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands, then, that the contention of the gentleman from Virginia is that where an executive department or any branch of the Government is authorized out of a lump sum to purchase motor-propelled vehicles this statute in question precludes them from doing it unless the number is specifically provided——

Mr. HAY. I do not contend that. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] contends that. He contends that the number of vehicles to be purchased under this appropriation must be given in the bill. Now, I contend that that is not at all what the intention or the meaning of the law in the last legislative bill is; that it only provides that specific authority must be given by Congress when any motor-propelled or horse-drawn passenger vehicle is to be purchased under the appropriation. That is all that is necessary, and that was the decision of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union who presided over the committee when the Indian appropriation bill was under consideration.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, when the matter was up in the committee before on the Indian appropriation bill the discussion of the point of order was participated in by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], both chairmen of great appropriation committees, because it was understood that the principle involved applied to all of these bills. And the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], if I remember correctly, was in the chair, and he is a very competent chairman. After the discussion he ruled that it was competent for Congress, over the point of order, to provide generally by this specific language for the purchase of these vehicles.

Mr. FOSTER. If my colleague will permit, I think in the Indian appropriation bill there was a specific appropriation for 20 automobiles. There were 30 estimated for.

Mr. MANN. There was no specific appropriation of the amount for maintenance.

Mr. FOSTER. Possibly not; but it was for the purchase of the machines.

Mr. MANN. That provision in the Indian appropriation bill, as I recall it, authorized the use of $200,000 out of all the appropriations contained in the bill, with the limitation in the bill that not more should be used for the purchase.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it provided there would be 20 purchased.

Mr. MANN. No; there was a limitation that not more than 20 should be purchased.

Mr. FOSTER. An allowance for that purpose. The difference in the two provisions is that this provides for the purchase of machines, as the appropriation further on does, which is a little different from this in the wording. But here is the proposition. Now, under provisions of law which were inserted in the appropriation bills for the purchase and maintenance of these vehicles it went along, and they purchased many of them for years. Congress apparently did not know much about it or how many were purchased, so they finally secured the information, either in this body or the other, that there were so many machines owned by the Government. So Congress in last year's bill placed this provision in the law that Congress should know how many were proposed to be purchased under these appropriations.

Mr. MANN. Congress obtains that information now by specific reports in the estimates and otherwise.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand that; but the estimates are not in the bill. But the fact is that the bill does not comply with the law in that it does not provide for the purchase of so many, and under these provisions that are in the bill they can go ahead and purchase to the full amount of the appropriation if they so desire.

Mr. MANN. Now, if my recollection is correct, there was no specific authority in the Indian appropriation bill for the purchase of so many, but there was a limitation that they should not purchase more than so many. This amendment would not be added to, so far as the point of order is concerned, by adding at the end of it that not more than 1,000 of these vehicles should be purchased. It is a limitation that would not have any effect. The question is whether the appropriation is in order, and that was the precise question that was before the House when the Indian appropriation bill was under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair has read section 5 of the legislative appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1915, and is of the opinion that that section is a limitation upon the heads of the executive departments, but is not a limitation upon Congress. The Chair is of the opinion that it is very desirable to have uniformity of decisions in this House, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union during the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, passed on this very question, and he held—and, in the opinion of this Chair, he held correctly—that Congress had the right, if it saw fit, to pass a provision of this character, and the Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, I believe the law specifically declared that the estimate on the purchase of these machines should be specific, and I believe that the intent of the law was that a certain practice which has grown up in some of our departments, of expending public money for the purpose of having joy-ride facilities, should cease. While the Chair has ruled that this amendment is in order, I believe this House ought to vote this proposition down for another reason, namely, that it is coupled up with the amount intended to be used for the purchase of airships for the use of the Army. Now, as I read it and as I understand it—and I would be glad to be corrected by the chairman of the committee if I am mistaken—it puts it within the power of the department, if it expends this sum of money, to expend for automobiles all of that portion of the money in its possession intended for airships.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. BATHRICK. I would like to have the gentleman's explanation of why I am mistaken.

Mr. HAY. For the reason that the law provides that the estimates shall be made as to how many of these passenger-carrying vehicles shall be bought and how much of this $300,000 they are going to spend for them, and they can not expend more than they estimate for that purpose. I will say to the gentleman that these people now have about two of these machines. That is all.

Mr. BATHRICK. Have they estimated for these two?

Mr. HAY. They have. If this amendment is not adopted, they can not repair them, and they will rot and go to nothing. If it is going to be the policy of the committee to prevent the repair and operation of machines or the purchase of one or two more that may be purchased, why, then——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from Virginia a question?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Without authority being given to employ passenger vehicles, if a man goes out in a flying machine and the machine breaks down, how would you carry him in? Would you have to carry him in on the back of some one?

Mr. HAY. He could not be hauled in unless by means of a wagon or some other vehicle.

Mr. MANN. You could not hire it out of this fund, but some one would have to carry him in on his back.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. BATHRICK. The gentleman knows that no reasonable man in this House wants to provide against such a thing as that.

Mr. MANN. That is the reason why I mentioned the contingency that might happen.

Mr. BATHRICK. Could they not spend any or all of this money for the purchase of motor vehicles?

Mr. HAY. They could, but it is not to be thought that the officers in charge of the expenditure of this money are going to spend $50,000 or $100,000 or $200,000 for buying automobiles to ride around in.

Mr. MANN. Next year they must make a report as to how much they have expended for this purpose?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. BATHRICK. It is not my intention to interfere with the operations of the corps in this respect, but it is apparent that it should not be in their power to buy out of this fund as many automobiles as they please.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. CALLAWAY. What passengers do these automobiles haul? And I want to ask this further question right in that same connection: Is it not a fact that we make provision for ambulance facilities connected with our Army stations, wherever they are? That would get these parties who are injured in aeroplanes, and so on, would it not?

Mr. HAY. No. At San Diego, where the school of aviation is located, there is no Army hospital that I know of. They may have a field hospital there, but I do not think they have. The use they would have for these automobiles—one or two is all they would have—would be to go about from place to place in the discharge of their duties, and they can be used only for official purposes. They can not be used for a man's personal convenience or pleasure.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Or for his family?

Mr. HAY. It ought not to be. If it is done, it is against the regulations of the War Department and the law.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Would going and getting a man who fell from an aeroplane, or anything like that, be considered passenger traffic?

Mr. HAY. Yes, sir. That is the only way by which they would have any passenger vehicle at all. It would be under this appropriation, under this proviso.

Mr. CALLAWAY. It has been my understanding that we have ambulance provision for things like that.

Mr. HAY. We have ambulances connected with the hospital, but I will say to the gentleman that those people have a school at San Diego, Cal., known as the School of Aviation, and there is no hospital connected with the school that I know of.

Mr. CALLAWAY. This is simply an ambulance provision?

Mr. HAY. Well, no. That was merely an illustration given by the gentleman from Illinois to show what might happen in the event we did not have these machines. Mr. Chairman, I call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the proviso, beginning in line 1, page 7, and insert the same proviso after the word "section" in the foregoing amendment.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I do that because this $500 provided for special technical instruction of officers of this aviation section ought to be paid out of the $300,000 and not out of the general fund for the Signal Service.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, where was that to go in?

Mr. HAY. To strike out the proviso, beginning on line 1, page 7, and inserting it after the word "section" in the amendment which we have just adopted.

Mr. MANN. After the word "section" in the amendment?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that both after the word "Provided" there and after the word "Provided" now in the section it should be made to read "Provided further."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be modified by inserting the words "Provided further."

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will now recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] to offer an amendment.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GARDNER:
"Page 6, line 24, strike out '$600,000' and insert '$1,300,000.'"

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, if that amendment is adopted, it will appropriate for the aviation service $1,000,000, because, if it is adopted, I shall move to strike out the figures "$300,000" where they occur in line 4, on page 7, and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$1,000,000." I do not think myself that that is nearly enough for the aviation service. I think that amount is far too small, but the fact is that that is all the Committee on Naval Affairs have appropriated for the aviation service of the Navy. If I am correctly informed, it is all that Gen. Scriven asked when he sent his estimates to the Secretary of War. Now, it is true that when the Secretary of War submitted Gen. Scriven's estimate he cut it down to $400,000. That was the amount estimated by the Secretary of War, and the committee cut that amount still further down, to $300,000. I do not know that Gen. Scriven sent in an estimate of $1,000,000 to the Secretary of War, but I am told so, and I can well believe that it is so.

The fact is that we are hopelessly behind every other nation on earth in the matter of aeroplanes. Even little Servia has three times the aeroplane fleet that we have. Yet in the United States is where the business of flying started, and we ought to be away in the lead. What has happened? We have been experimenting and reporting and drafting designs, and doing everything except build aeroplanes. What did we do last year?

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, does not the gentleman know that the building of aeroplanes is wholly in the experimental stage?

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman please wait until I get through, and not ask foolish questions? [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, the fact is that we have been experimenting and doing everything except build aeroplanes, whereas the rest of the world has gone right straight ahead, and in France they had 1,400 aeroplanes on the 1st of last July. They had 22 dirigible balloons, like Zeppelins. In Russia they had 800 aeroplanes on the 1st of last July, and 18 dirigibles. In the United States we have only 23 aeroplanes and not a single dirigible or Zeppelin to bless ourselves with—not one single one; we, the great progressive country of the world!

Mr. Chairman, it is not as if the rest of the world did not know how to build aeroplanes.

Now, what did we do? We had a board appointed by the Secretary of the Navy two years ago. That board made a very elaborate report and recommended a large sum of money, and that is as far as it got. We sent over to Germany and we bought one aeroplane as a sample, as a model on which to build. That was an aeroplane with two Mercedes motors. Then we sent to France and ordered an aeroplane with two Salmson motors, and on those two machines we were going to found a little family of aeroplanes, but the war broke out and those aeroplanes were commandeered by foreign nations, and we are back again in the same old spot, experimenting, reporting, considering, and appropriating for pencils and paper to make plans. That is what we have been doing on aeroplanes, and as for the Zeppelins, we have been doing nothing at all. Now, every time anybody has tried to make a move, he has been suppressed by the department. The General Board of the Navy estimated $5,000,000 this year for the air service. What happened? Why, the Secretary of the Navy did not recommend a cent, but proposed to allow them to take something out of the general fund. After all, the committee have done better than that. The Committee on Naval Affairs have had their minds opened to a certain extent and have appropriated $1,000,000 for air service in general.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARDNER. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARDNER. I thank the Chair for extending my time. I should rather have five minutes than two.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes; I yield for a question.

Mr. McKENZIE. What effect upon our safety does the manufacture and owning of these aeroplanes by foreign Governments have upon us?

Mr. GARDNER. None whatever.

Mr. McKENZIE. Do you think there is any danger?

Mr. GARDNER. It is simply an illustration of what we ought to have.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Where did the gentleman get his figures as to the number of aeroplanes owned by foreign Governments?

Mr. GARDNER. I got that from Capt. Bristol's evidence before the Naval Committee. The evidence from the Clash of Nations is not very good.

Mr. KAHN. Gen. Scriven gave a very much smaller estimate before the committee.

Mr. GARDNER. He gave 500 aeroplanes for France and 11 dirigibles for France. His figures came from the Clash of Nations.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Capt. Bristol, before the Navy Department, gave 1,400 aeroplanes for France and 22 dirigibles. But, take your own figures, call the number 500 aeroplanes and 11 dirigibles, and you will see how far behind we are. This war has developed since the Clash of Nations was written, and everybody familiar with the facts knows that the number of air craft was vastly underestimated. Capt. Bristol gave his evidence very recently before the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what happened? Gen. Scriven has been kept down, if you please, to a flying force of 60 officers, with only 12 enlisted men. That is all we allow him, and he has to cut his coat to suit his cloth. Therefore, says he, "We will get a small fleet, because they will not give us the men to man a large fleet," and he comes in to the Secretary of War, as I have been informed—and I challenge contradiction—and says, "My estimate is $1,000,000 for that fleet," and the amendment I offer is to give that $1,000,000, which Gen. Scriven, in my opinion, originally asked the Secretary to approve. The Secretary of War, or some of his subordinates, cut the estimate down to $400,000. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs cuts it down still further and makes it $300,000.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts would provide a million dollars for the purchase, repair, and upkeep of aeroplanes. As I stated, the number of aeroplanes on hand now is 11, contracted for 8, and they want 32 machines.

This appropriation was made by the committee in accordance with the evidence of the Chief of the Signal Corps. Gen. Scriven says:

> We only want to accumulate 32 machines in the first line and a reserve of 50 per cent, because we have under the bill 60 aviator officers, and we are only allowed 12 enlisted men for instruction in flying.

He ought to have said only allowed 12 annually. They could instruct 12 enlisted men one year and 12 the next year. Gen. Scriven continues:

> The limit is therefore 72. If we organize 4 squadrons of 8 machines each, that is 32 machines—each squadron is supposed to have 20 pilots and observers—4 squadrons would require 80 men, observers and pilots. That would constitute the necessary complement of men. Now we are allowed 60 officers. We will probably get these officers, because they are coming in very fast and they appear to appreciate the work. We should then require 20 enlisted men to make up the full complement of 80 men.

These 12 enlisted men they can get next year.

> If these can not be obtained it will be necessary to cut off some of the 4 officers comprising the commander and staff of each squadron, or an observer need not be sent out with every machine. At all events it will be possible to put 4 squadrons in the field fairly well manned and equipped.
>
> But to the 4 squadrons of 32 machines should be added a reserve of 50 per cent of spare parts because the machines require this for spare parts all the time. That would add 16 more machines to be purchased, as the spare parts should constitute an entire semblance not put together, so that in case of immediate necessity the spare parts could be assembled and replace broken machines in the field at once.
>
> The CHAIRMAN. Of the $400,000 you are asking for, how much do you expect to spend for this purpose?
>
> Gen. SCRIVEN. I think I can give that exactly. We have 21 machines now and $40,000 left. The running expenses from now until July will be, I should say, about $25,000, which will give us $15,000 free and two more machines, which will make 23 machines. To make up the 32 machines we will have 9 machines to buy and to make up the reserve for the 32 machines, 50 per cent, 16, making it necessary to buy in all 25 new machines during the coming year to put the aviation squadrons into fairly good shape.

Now, Mr. Chairman, these machines cost, according to the evidence, $10,000 apiece. They want to buy 25 machines for the next fiscal year, and we are giving them $300,000. Out of that they can buy 25 machines for $10,000 apiece and have $50,000 for the purposes of repair and upkeep, so that we are giving them what they ask for and no more. In my judgment it is no reason because the French Government has 1,400 or 14,000 aeroplanes that we should undertake to have the same number. We have no use for them at this time. We will never have, in my judgment, any use for any such large number of machines. We are undertaking to supply what the department says we ought to have, and that is what we have done.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Is the department or the Government constructing these machines or are they depending upon purchasing them by contract?

Mr. HAY. They purchase them by contract. The Government has no plant where they can be manufactured.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. My opinion is that it is difficult to purchase machines in this country, and it seems to me that the Government ought to undertake the construction of them for the Government itself.

Mr. HAY. That is a question that does not enter into this proposition. There may be something in that, but, as a matter of fact, the Government at this time has no place where they can manufacture these machines. They are therefore compelled to buy them.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The construction and development of aeroplanes is something that I am much interested in, and I am also interested in their being developed and constructed by the Navy and the War Departments. The aeroplane, in my opinion, is only in its infancy; it is not wholly developed. It is a strange coincidence both in the construction of aeroplanes and of submarines, that we are going very slowly as to both. It seems that we can not get them manufactured or constructed, and the department is compelled to turn back a part of their appropriation.

One of the reasons I am especially interested in this is because I believe that when the submarines are developed they will in a short period of time make the battleship inoperative. It is going to stop the armor graft that has been going on in this country for a number of years, and we are now building battleships that, in my judgment, can never be of any use to the Government.

So it seems strange that we are so backward in developing the weapons of destruction to the battleships. We are paying and have been paying for years $250 a ton profit to the armor-plate ring, and we can not get submarines and aeroplanes manufactured. It is strange again that our Government officials when they have not been successful in securing the manufacture of these weapons by contract does not establish a plant where they can be manufactured by the Government itself. It seems to me there is a lack of interest and progress along that line. While I am in favor of going as far as possible in the development of air craft and submarines, as far as there is any reason for going, if the department refuses to spend the money appropriated for that purpose it seems that Congress should take some action forcing them to do it.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. Did the gentleman read the hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. No; I have not.

Mr. McKENZIE. In these hearings Col. Reber testified that we are keeping abreast of the progress that is being made everywhere.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I do not agree with the gentleman who made that statement. I think we are far behind other nations in the development of air craft.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. CALLAWAY. In what way are we behind them? In the number or in the efficiency of the ones that we have?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. In both. I think we should have more of them. I think we should develop new methods and new equipment, safety appliances, and so forth, if they can be developed. I am a believer in air craft. I think we are going to travel through the air in a short period of time as safely as we travel on the water now.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Does the gentleman think we ought to have as many airships for war as we would if we were actually engaged in war?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I think the air craft and the submarine are going to tend to stop this war craze, and that is one of the reasons I want them. I think they are going to stop the agitation for useless and unnecessary expenditures on battleships and armor plate, and when we come to the right conclusion on those things it will probably do away with some of the influence that is behind the forces that work to build large battleships, which will be of no service to the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to get some agreement on closing debate on this paragraph. How much time does the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] desire?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. About two minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I desire three minutes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. MANN. I think we would like to have 15 minutes on this side.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and pending amendments thereto close in 35 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto shall close in 35 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, this subject is too important really to have the debate upon it limited, but I believe the House would rather listen to a short statement than to a long one. Security and information are the life of an army. The sentinel, the outpost, and the cavalry in old times told you what your enemy was doing. They told you where his forces were small, so that you could attack, and where his forces were large and moving in your direction, so that you could prepare yourself for defense. That work has very largely gone now to the cavalry of the air. Any limitation on the training of air men and the purchase of these air machines I would regard as foolish, but that it should be limited to $300,000 seems to me to be fatal. The aeroplanes originated in this country, but we have not encouraged the manufacture of them by capital from the Government, as has been done abroad, and as a result military aeroplanes abroad travel at a speed, I believe, of a hundred miles an hour, while ours, as a rule, travel at a speed of about 40 miles an hour. The largest aeroplanes abroad carry 5, 7, and 10 passengers, and ours carry but 2. We must take advantage of what has been done abroad by every means in our power in order to keep abreast of the world. So far as doing it in time of peace is concerned, we maintain cavalry and artillery in time of peace because they can not be trained quickly. Much more should we maintain the aviation division of our Army in time of peace and enlarge it to the full, because it can not be created hurriedly if it should be needed.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the amount appropriated in this bill for aviation purposes is sufficient if we were to engage in actual war on that basis, and I would be in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] if I did not think it would be possible for us to manufacture such aeroplanes as were necessary before it would be possible for a foreign foe to land upon our shores. I do not entirely agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts, or I might say I do not agree with him at all, in his characterization of the question propounded to him by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK]. The construction of aeroplanes or dirigible balloons is still in an experimental stage.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BATHRICK. On the question of experimentation, is it not absolutely true that the automobile is still in a condition of experimentation?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The automobile has to a certain extent been standardized.

Mr. BATHRICK. In years to come the air caft will still be in a condition of experimentation.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. For a long time, I think; very likely.

Mr. BATHRICK. And we must keep up and progress. Because it is in an era of experimentation is no reason why we should not begin.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. We are making a beginning now. The bill provides for that. Only a few days ago patents were issued for a stabilizer for which much was claimed in the navigation of air craft. Certainly something of that kind will be eventually done, and unless it is obtained air craft will never be successful. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] speaks of Zeppelins, and, with a slip of the tongue, I think, spoke of France having Zeppelins. I do not think they have any Zeppelins.

Mr. GARDNER. Yes; they have Speiss dirigibles of the Zeppelin type, as well as Parsafals.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. They have dirigibles, but not of the rigid type known as Zeppelins. So far, the Zeppelins have had no effect upon the war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, very recently, and at the time of the dedication of the new Federal building in Dayton, Ohio, the First Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Byron R. Newton, told a very interesting story of how he, while acting as a newspaper correspondent, had been delegated to go to the city of Dayton, Ohio, to make a most rigid investigation of the claims of the Wright brothers of that city who had just given to the world the wonderful news that they had created a machine heavier than air which would enable man to make flights and direct his course in the air as he willed.

The skeptical and scoffing attitude of the general public was in the mind of Mr. Newton when he met the Wright brothers, and he gave to their invention the most particular scrutiny, striving to see wherein it might possibly fail; but he remained, only to be entirely convinced that the dream of these two hard-working mechanics who had striven to their goal of achievement despite lack of advantage, appreciation, or even understanding, had actually been worked out into the practical reality we all now know it to be.

A model of an early Wright machine is in the Smithsonian Institution, that exhibition place of the wonders of American creative genius, and nothing in all its halls is more wonderful than this; and, Mr. Chairman, I am proud to believe that when man has made mastery of the air the names of the Wright brothers, of Dayton, Ohio, will be given their full recognition as the pioneers of this most marvelous invention. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I have always been an advocate of preparedness for our Military and Naval Establishments, but I do not think that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] is at all necessary at this time. Gen. Scriven, Chief of the Signal Corps, appeared before the Committee on Military Affairs and told the committee that 32 aeroplanes for an army of the size we have in this country, in his judgment, was ample; it was the purpose of the committee to furnish him with enough money to secure those 32 machines as a first line. Gen. Scriven stated to the committee, and I read from pages 642 and 643 of the hearings:

Gen. SCRIVEN. I have been thinking it over, Mr. Chairman, and I am in hopes that we may be able to squeeze out two or three more machines, making a total, with the 21 on hand, of 23 or 24 machines.

He meant by that that he hoped to be able to squeeze two or three more machines out of the money still in his hands for the current fiscal year, so that would give him 24 machines.

If we can create four aero squadrons, like the one represented in that picture, of 8 machines each, that will give us 32 machines, and with that number we are quite well provided for an army of our size—32 machines in first line in commission. Then we should add 50 per cent of spare parts, or what really amounts to other machines, in the warehouses ready to put together, so that we will then have 50 machines, and then we shall be as well off in this respect as we need to be.

Now, that states the case from the standpoint of the officer in command of that particular branch of the military service.

After all, we are not in the condition that the European countries are in. They have their long lines bordering upon neighboring States, and it is necessary for them to have a much larger number of aeroplanes than we have. We would require them almost entirely in case some foreign foe should attempt to seek a landing in this country and should positively make a landing on our shores. Outside of that, I doubt whether we will have much use for aeroplanes. They certainly will not be required in the interior of the country to any great extent. They certainly will not be required in those sections of the country where there is no enemy, even if we were involved in war. In view of the fact, too, that great improvements are being made in these machines, it is well for us to expend simply those amounts that the Army officials themselves feel will keep us abreast of the times and furnish the number of machines that would be required for an army of the size of ours.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman how long it would take to construct an aeroplane when we needed it?

Mr. KAHN. It is a matter of slow operation.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Why, are not the engines——

Mr. KAHN. I asked Gen. Scriven, when he was before our committee, how long it would take him to secure 100 machines for the use of our Army, and he stated that the factories are small at the present time and in his judgment it would require a full year to secure that number of machines.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That was to get the factories running and not the machines, was it not?

Mr. KAHN. Well, we took his word for these facts, but I am confident that if we were to endeavor to purchase a larger number of machines each one of the three factories that is now supplying machines would immediately extend its plant and would furnish the machines in double-quick order.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Are they building their own engines?

Mr. KAHN. I believe so.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, in order that things may be perfectly understood here let me say there is an aeroplane factory in my district, but there is not an ammunition factory nor an artillery factory nor an armor-plate factory nor any other kind of factory which makes munitions of war, yet I am going to try to get the appropriation raised on various other articles which are needed when a nation is at war.

Now, to answer what the gentleman from California and the gentleman from Virginia have said. If there is anything in the argument that we do not need these aeroplanes because we are not going to have any war, then for heaven's sake let us save money on our coast defenses. They are the most expensive things we have. We do not want them if there is to be no war. We do not need them in the great West any more than we need military air craft in the great West. If we do not need ammunition and artillery and airships because the plea for them rests on an assumption or a dream that there is going to be a war, why not apply the same argument to our coast fortifications and cut off that enormous bill of expense. Now, remember what the situation actually is; do not confuse yourselves with these hearings partially read. Here is the real situation. Gen. Scriven wanted a million dollars and he asked for $400,000 under instructions. Now, if anyone doubts these estimates are made under instruction I call their attention to Gen. Crozier's evidence. When he was asked about a certain cut which he had made in an appropriation for field artillery he said:

That does seem a queer cut, but there is some explanation for it; and here I must say that in cutting it at all I am acting under instructions.

Finally, the department asked for $400,000 for air craft, and you have only given them $300,000. Now, you talk as if there would be 32 aeroplanes in the first line and 16 in reserve when this proposed appropriation has been expended. Nothing of the sort will happen. Of these 32 aeroplanes, 6 are of mighty little account, and by the 1st of July, 1916, there will be a great many more of them crippled. Not one of them is armored, and not more than two of them are of the same type. That is our aeroplane fleet as it stands to-day. Now, what is this reserve of 16 aeroplanes which the chairman has told us about? Nothing in the world but spare parts sufficient to make up 16 aeroplanes when they are put together. Here is the passage from Gen. Scriven's evidence which explains the situation:

But to the four squadrons of 32 machines should be added a reserve of 50 per cent of spare parts, because the machines require this for spare parts all the time. That would add 16 more machines to be purchased, as the spare parts should constitute an entire semblance not put together, so that in case of immediate necessity the spare parts could be assembled and replace broken machines in the field at once.

If you are going to calculate these spare parts as 16 machines in reserve, then where are your spare parts to come from for the repair of the 32 machines of the first line?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee). The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] is recognized.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, from information which I have obtained from reading, I find that it does not cost anything like it is stated here to get these air planes, as I prefer to call them. I read an article yesterday in an English magazine, by an English staff officer, which stated that the Zeppelins cost about £100,000, the biggest and best, and their air planes that we have in this country, with small engines and which have rigid planes, can not cost anything like what is estimated; and if this Government goes into the construction of them, expensive as Government work usually is, I think they will cost very much less.

Mr. Chairman, I want to speak for a moment about a matter much less important than the cost of these machines. I want to ask the chairman of the committee what is the difference in the meaning between the word "matériel," the word employed in the bill, and our English word "material." Do they mean the same thing, or is there some significance in the employment of the French word?

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that is a parliamentary inquiry. [Laughter.]

Mr. SLAYDEN. Well, I admit I do not know the difference.

Mr. MANN. I would like to refer the gentleman to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], who made quite an elaborate explanation of that last year when the fortification bill was under consideration.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I did not hear that. I think the lexicographers do not make any distinction. I encountered the same difficulty as some of my friends do in the word "aeroplane," which means, according to the dictionary, a rigid plane in air navigating machines. And there is the word "hangar," which means a shed. I think in the construction of this bill we ought to use the English language. This is not an important criticism, but the word "hangar," as every dictionary will tell you, does mean "shed." Then why not employ the word "shed"; and as to "aeroplane," which none of us can say easily, no matter how sober we are, and which means precisely the same thing as air plane, why not accommodate those of us who are less informed in these foreign tongues and use the English language? I am going to move to strike out the word "hangar" and substitute the word "shed" whenever I find it in this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I doubt whether the gentleman will find the word "hangar" in the bill anywhere.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It has been in there heretofore.

Mr. MANN. I think not.

Mr. Chairman, several years ago I offered on the floor of this House the first amendment for the purchase of air flying machines. At that time the proposition very likely was subject to a point of order in some shape, but I received the support of the gentleman from Virginia, now the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and Gov. Hull, of Iowa, who was then the chairman of the committee, and we managed to get into the bill a provision for air planes. I had become interested in the matter. From early youth I have dreamed of flying. When I dream, I fly. I served on the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution at the time the Wrights were making their experiments. A few years ago, and I think since the gentleman from Virginia became chairman of the committee, if I recall correctly, I offered an amendment to increase the amount. In both cases, as I recollect, the War Department had not made an estimate. The first time they had not made an estimate at all, and the second time, I think, they had not made an estimate for the amount that the bill carried. We commenced the work of supplying airships, as we now call them. Last year or the year before we provided for the Aviation Corps, through the efforts of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY], and that is doing good work. I understand we have an aviation school out in California now which is doing good work. I believe that we ought to make reasonable progress along the lines of aviation, and at the same time give some encouragement to the private manufacturers and the men who privately operate flying machines.

If we have a war, we will call upon every man who has a flying machine or who can fly a machine to enter the Government service in some way, and probably get some of our best men and best machines in that way. I doubt very much whether it is desirable at this time to increase the amount to a million dollars. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] said we ought to be prepared and thoroughly prepared for war at any time. Well, I do not know that this is a fair illustration; but any of us individually may at any time be attacked on the street by somebody who is angry at us, or by a lunatic, and yet I dare say that no one is now in training to prepare himself for a prize fight. We may have to meet the fight, but we take that chance. No one would deliberately go into a fight without training if he had the opportunity to train, but we are not training for that, although for years I used to train some in the expectation that it might come.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER. Are not our neighbors all having prize fights around us?

Mr. MANN. We are having many prize fights all the time throughout the country, and there is a fight in this town every day, and probably a good many of them. Men are arrested every day for fighting, and yet no one expects that it is necessary to spend all his time or his money preparing himself to meet a possible but improbable attack.

Now, when we make a reasonable provision for war, that is all we ought to be expected to do. It would be foolish, it seems to me, for any country to expend all of its resources in preparing for war and neglect other things which are much more important. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For additional pay for length of service, $2,300,000.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman is clearly right, but will he withhold the point of order?

Mr. HAY. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment has not been reported in full.

Mr. GARDNER. It is clearly out of order, and it is a long amendment, but I would like to have it printed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] asks unanimous consent that the reading of the proposed amendment be dispensed with, and that it be printed in full in the RECORD, and that he be permitted to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the amendment referred to:

Page 8, line 6, after the figures "$2,300,000," insert "Provided, That the following changes, to take effect on July 1, 1915, are made in the laws concerning the Army of the United States, to wit:

"SECTION 1. That the provisions contained in section 36 of the act of Congress approved February 2, 1901, limiting the total enlisted force of the line of the Army to 100,000 are hereby repealed, and the President is authorized to maintain all organizations of the Army at their prescribed statutory maximum strength at all times.

"SEC. 2. That the number of officers of the line of the Army is hereby increased by the addition of 24 colonels, 46 lieutenant colonels, 109 majors, 496 captains, 293 first lieutenants, and 32 second lieutenants, and the said officers of the respective grades mentioned shall be apportioned among the Corps of Engineers, Cavalry, Field Artillery, Coast Artillery Corps, and Infantry as nearly as may be according to the authorized commissioned strength of existing tactical organizations in said branches of the Army: Provided, That, for the purpose of this apportionment, 4 companies of Engineer or Coast Artillery troops shall be considered a battalion, with the quota of field and staff officers authorized for a battalion of Infantry, and 12 companies a regiment, with the quota of field and staff officers authorized for a regiment of Infantry.

"SEC. 3. That vacancies in the grade of field officer, captain, and first lieutenant created by this act in the Corps of Engineers, Cavalry, Field Artillery, Coast Artillery Corps, and Infantry shall be filled by promotion according to seniority in each branch, respectively. Vacancies in the grade of second lieutenant occasioned by promotions shall be filled by appointments in the following order: First, of members of the next graduating class at the United States Military Academy; second, of enlisted men whose fitness for advancement has been determined by competitive examination; third, of honor graduates of institutions of learning which have been designated by the War Department as 'distinguished institutions'; fourth, of graduates of institutions of learning having an Army officer detailed thereat as professor of military science and tactics; fifth, of candidates from civil life. All appointments shall be made in accordance with the provisions of existing law not inconsistent with this act.

"SEC. 4. That the number of officers authorized for the Coast Artillery Corps of the Army shall be increased by the addition of 12 colonels, 12 lieutenants colonel, 40 majors, 174 captains, 187 first lieutenants, and 187 second lieutenants.

"SEC. 5. That all vacancies created or caused by this act which can be filled by promotion of officers now in the Coast Artillery Corps shall be filled by promotion according to seniority, subject to examination as now prescribed by law: Provided, That one-fifth of the vacancies in each grade shall be filled in each fiscal year until the total number of vacancies in each grade is filled. Of the vacancies created or caused by this act which can not be filled by promotion of officers now in the Coast Artillery Corps, one-fifth shall be filled in each fiscal year until the total number of officers herein provided for shall have been attained. The vacancies remaining in the grade of second lieutenant shall be filled by appointment in the following order: First, of graduates of the United States Military Academy; second, of enlisted men whose fitness for advancement shall have been determined by competitive examination; third, of honor graduates of institutions of learning which have been designated by the War Department as 'distinguished institutions'; fourth, of graduates of institutions of learning having an Army officer detailed thereat as professor of military science and tactics; fifth, of candidates from civil life; and all such appointments shall be made in accordance with the provisions of existing law not in conflict with the provisions of this act.

"SEC. 6. That the authorized enlisted strength of the Coast Artillery Corps of the Army shall be increased by the addition of 10 sergeants major, senior grade; 16 master electricians; 90 engineers; 66 electrician sergeants, first class; 66 electrician sergeants, second class; 21 sergeants major, junior grade; 154 firemen; 93 radio sergeants with the rank, pay, and allowances of firemen, Coast Artillery Corps; 100 first sergeants; 100 quartermaster sergeants; 800 sergeants; 1,200 corporals; 200 mechanics; 200 cooks; 200 musicians; 7,672 privates; and 4 bands, Coast Artillery Corps, organized as now authorized by law: Provided, That the total enlisted strength of the Coast Artillery Corps shall not exceed 30,309, exclusive of the enlisted strength of the bands.

"SEC. 7. That the number of rated men now authorized for the Coast Artillery Corps shall be increased by 24 casemate electricians; 100 observers, first class; 100 plotters; 24 chief planters; 24 chief loaders; 100 observers, second class; 228 gun commanders; and 228 gun pointers: Provided, That no enlisted man shall receive under this section more than one addition to his pay."

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Virginia for his courtesy. The amendment was clearly out of order, and he could have stopped the reading of it at any moment he saw fit.

This amendment is a consolidation of two bills prepared in the War Department and introduced in the Senate at the request, so it is said, of the Secretary of War by Senator CHAMBERLAIN, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. These bills are identical, word for word, with bills which I have introduced in the House. One of them authorizes the increase of the mobile army by about 25,000 men more than are now actually in the Army. The other one increases the Coast Artillery Corps by about 9,000 altogether. The first one the chairman said yesterday he did not approve of. I do not know whether he approves of the second one or not.

The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House says he does not believe in that bill of the Secretary of War increasing the mobile army. Now, the reason for increasing the Coast Defense Corps can be very clearly shown if I read you a few lines from the report of the Chief of the Coast Artillery. He says:

From the foregoing it will be seen that the present authorized strength of the Coast Artillery Corps is short 564 officers and 10,988 enlisted men of the strength required to man our coast defenses under the adopted policy outlined above. In order to provide for our primary home defenses, to wit, the coast defenses of Portland, Boston, Narragansett Bay, Long Island Sound, eastern New York, southern New York, Chesapeake Bay, Pensacola, San Francisco, and Puget Sound there are required 662 officers and 16,251 enlisted men. It will thus be seen that there are now provided about one-fourth of the officers and one-half of the enlisted men necessary for this purpose. Unless provisions be made in the near future for additional Coast Artillery personnel, it will be necessary to reduce the garrisons to mere caretaking detachments at some of the defenses of lesser importance, including Portsmouth, Delaware Bay, Charleston, Savannah, Key West, Tampa, Columbia, Baltimore, Cape Fear, and Mobile.

Now, that is unpreparedness for war with a vengeance, and the only excuse under which you can reduce to mere caretaking detachments the forces in these various fortifications about which I have read you—the only possible excuse—will also apply to every other coast defense on the whole United States coast line, to wit, the excuse that there is never going to be another war.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia make the point of order?

Mr. HAY. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee, in view of the fact that I see the appropriation for longevity pay, roughly speaking, adds about 25 per cent to the pay of the men, whether he does not think that that system results in filling up the ranks with a lot of men who are too old really for the service?

Mr. HAY. Well, I would state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that this longevity pay does not apply to men who are old in the service. The longevity pay is this, that every man who serves five years in the ranks is entitled to an increase of pay, which is called longevity pay.

Mr. HULINGS. I understand that; but does it not result in this, that a man goes in there and stays and stays, encouraged by the longevity pay, while if he were serving a single enlistment, or perhaps two enlistments, and then went out, you would have a new man to take his place?

Mr. HAY. The gentleman is talking about the enlisted men and not the officers?

Mr. HULINGS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. They are really noncommissioned officers largely.

Mr. HAY. I do not think it results that way. After a man serves 30 years he can retire, and the average age of men going into the Army is about 20 or 21 or 22, so that he does not become very old when he retires.

Mr. HULINGS. I do not say that he becomes superannuated, but that it keeps in the Army the same men during a long term of years, whereas if those men were going out after a four-year enlistment, the body politic would be filling up with men who had been trained to military life, and in case of emergency you would have trained men to call on, while under this system of longevity pay you get only an opportunity to train a comparatively small number of men for the service.

Mr. HAY. I will say to the gentleman that about 15,000 of these men go out every year and about twenty or twenty-five thousand go out of the Organized Militia every year, and some 30,000 young men are educated in the different military schools of the country every year, so that, after all, you have quite a large number of young men trained in the military art.

Mr. HULINGS. I simply want to call the attention of the chairman to that policy. I believe you would accomplish a great deal better work and you would get a very much larger number of men trained to military life if you would stop the longevity pay.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SIGNAL CORPS.

Forty-six master signal electricians, at $75 each per month, $52,200.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 5, page 9, strike out the word "forty" and insert the word "fifty."

Mr. HAY. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that that was a mistake in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 6, page 9, after the word "month," insert the words "four having an increase of 50 per cent."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

One hundred and forty-eight first-class sergeants, at $45 each per month, $82,080.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 8, page 9, after the word "month," insert the words "eight having an increase of 50 per cent."

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I should like to know the reason for this increase?

Mr. HAY. In making up the bill we failed to put in these words. They are necessary to comply with the aviation law, which provides that so many men shall be employed in the aviation section, which comes under the Signal Corps, and when they are employed in flying and in the Aviation Corps they get an increase of 50 per cent on account of the hazardous character of their employment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

One hundred and sixty-eight sergeants, at $36 each per month, $76,896.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 10, page 9, after the word "month," insert the words "20 having an increase of 50 per cent."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Two hundred and thirty-four corporals, at $24 each per month, $70,272.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 12, page 9, after the word "month," insert the words "20 having an increase of 50 per cent."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

One superintendent, Nurse Corps, at $1,800 per annum, $1,800: Provided, That hereafter section 1222, Revised Statutes, shall not apply to officers of the Medical Corps of the Army who shall, with the approval of the President, be detailed or authorized to render professional services to State or other local governments within the United States or any of the possessions thereof.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Illinois reserve points of order.

Mr. HAY. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that this is put in at the request of the Surgeon General of the Army and the president of the American Medical Association.

Mr. MANN. I will ask, first, why is it inserted right in the middle of the provision relating to nurses? Has this proviso concerning medical officers anything to do with the superintendent of nurses or the female nurses?

Mr. HAY. No. Perhaps it was inaptly placed in this paragraph.

Mr. MANN. Putting it in here was an inadvertence?

Mr. HAY. Yes. It had nothing in the world to do with them. It only applies to the officers of the Medical Corps.

Under the law at present officers who accept civil employment or who are detailed for civil purposes, or who take any service of that kind, forfeit their commissions. The physicians of the country are extremely anxious that at times officers of the Medical Corps of the Army shall be allowed to confer with them, and also be detailed to certain sanitary work. As the gentleman knows, the officers of the Army Medical Corps have done great work in sanitary and other branches of the medical profession.

Mr. MANN. They have done that, though, in the Army.

Mr. HAY. Yes; that is true; but the medical profession outside of the Army are anxious that they shall not be hampered; that some provision shall be made by which these men, who are peculiarly fitted to render services of this kind, shall have the opportunity to be detailed, or rather be allowed, to do this work.

Mr. MANN. This applies to officers in the active service, does it not?

Mr. HAY. Oh, yes.

Mr. MANN. There is no prohibition or inhibition against officers on the retired list?

Mr. HAY. Oh, no.

Mr. KAHN. You can not get officers on the retired list.

Mr. MANN. Of course you can get them if you pay them for it. Under this provision it is designed to have Army surgeons ordered to New York, or Detroit, or New Orleans, or Chicago, or some other place, to give service to the municipality or the State?

Mr. HAY. That is what it is for.

Mr. MANN. We have a Public Health Service for that purpose.

Mr. HAY. That is true. I do not think, however, that Army officers would be employed in this way in any large number. It would only be some man who had made a study of the subject and was peculiarly fitted for some work of that character.

Mr. MANN. Of course this may be intended to cover some particular case.

Mr. HAY. No; it is not so intended.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman from Virginia will agree with me that any State or city that thinks it can get a good official of the Government of the United States to come and work for the State or city for nothing will never be very slow about asking for his services.

Mr. HAY. That is true.

Mr. MANN. Would not that be the temptation?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is not that the real purpose of it?

Mr. HAY. Oh, yes.

Mr. MANN. It is the purpose to permit it?

Mr. HAY. I do not think it is intended to permit officers to be sent around indiscriminately.

Mr. MANN. But the requests would be made indiscriminately.

Mr. HAY. Yes, of course.

Mr. MANN. Then it is a question of how much resisting power there is in the War Department.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I have the greatest respect for the surgeons of the Army; but it seems to me that when we create a Government service for this purpose, like the Public Health Service, we should be going crosswise in providing that some other service should do the work.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the officers of the medical department have made remarkable progress in the cure and prevention of certain diseases that have caused great disaster to the human family. It was not the Public Health Service, as I now recall, but the Medical Corps of the Army that discovered the mosquito-bite theory with regard to the transmission of yellow fever. It was also the Medical Corps of the Army that discovered the vaccine to prevent typhoid fever. As I understand it, the purpose of this amendment is to allow an officer who is attached to the Medical Corps, and who is familiar with work of that kind, to be detailed by the President for some limited period to some community where a disease is prevalent, in order that the local physicians may learn how to meet the situation. That, as I understand it, is the principal purpose of the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is aware that we have a Public Health Service, maintained at very large expense, in part for that very purpose, with skilled and able surgeons connected with it. Why should not they perform the service, instead of starting in to have some other service do it? The gentleman is well enough acquainted with the Public Health Service and the work done in his State to know that it is an efficient and capable service.

Mr. KAHN. Yes; it has done wonderful work; but, as I pointed out, there are certain medical discoveries that have been made in the Army as well as those made by the Public Health Service.

Mr. MANN. Yes; one man finds out something somewhere, some one person makes the discovery, and other people make use of it.

Mr. KAHN. The Army medical officers make use of the discoveries of their colleagues, and should be given every opportunity to extend the knowledge to the profession, and especially to the private practitioners.

Mr. MANN. And the Public Health Service has made as many discoveries in the same period of time as has the Army, and I have no doubt that the Navy physicians have made their share, and the physicians in private life have made their share.

Mr. KAHN. The public-health officers have done a great good in imparting their information to private practitioners. They are probably better able to do that than are the Army officers, because they have many more stations throughout the country. But occasionally, when an Army surgeon does discover some method of treating a contagious disease, he ought to be given the facilities of communicating his discovery to the private practitioner.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. As a matter of fact, when the medical officers in the Army or private practice make any discovery of importance the ethics of the profession require them to give it to the world, and they do it.

Mr. KAHN. That is true.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does the gentleman know of any reason why the States should not pay for their medical service?

Mr. KAHN. There is no desire by this item to extend the cost to the Government or put upon it any additional expense.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It does do it if it takes the medical officer away from the Army.

Mr. KAHN. He could only be appointed by the President, and if the President felt that it interfered with his work he could withhold the detail. For instance, if there was to be a medical convention in San Antonio and you had some typhoid fever in that vicinity, and an Army officer who was familiar with the methods of treating that disease should be detailed to go down to San Antonio and address the convention and point out the methods to the local practitioners how the disease should be treated, it might be very useful.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And I make the point of order as well.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Texas make the point of order, and the Chair sustains it. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Four retired veterinarians, $7,140.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making an observation. Page 15, line 2, has an item, "four retired veterinarians, $7,140." I wish to say that one of my principal objections to the increase of the standing Army of the United States is the fact that when we increase the organization for men and officers it becomes necessary to increase all along the line; and we have now a Dental Corps, a Veterinary Corps, and auxiliary bodies, who are made officers and go on the retired list. If we were to increase the Army to 205,000 men, as suggested by some gentleman, we would have an increase in the Dental Corps, an increase in the Nurse Corps, and all the auxiliary bodies until we had an expense that the people of this country would rebel against.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. In the item that just precedes the one my colleague refers to is one "for 14 pay clerks retired, $23,437.50," a rate of nearly $2,000 a year for clerks.

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Nobody knows how soon we will retire the balance of the clerks at this very high rate. The average clerk up here in the department for active service does not begin to get the rate that is given to these clerks for retired pay.

Mr. McKENZIE. I might say further that I realize, as I trust we all do, in case of a war with a foreign country it is the man behind the gun that will have to do the fighting. And if there is any increase at all, I am in favor of increasing the private force of our Army and not the clerks and veterinarians and nurses on the retired list. We passed a bill the other day adding another body of men to the retired list of the country. I simply wanted to call attention to this to make plain why I at this time oppose an increase in the standing Army of the United States.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making an observation along the line that the gentleman refers to.

In a local paper I find an account of a speech made by one of the Assistant Secretaries of War, Mr. Breckinridge. It says:

A plea for a larger standing army was made by Henry S. Breckinridge, Assistant Secretary of War, in an address last night at the "ladies' night" of the District of Columbia Society of the Sons of the American Revolution at Rauscher's.

"The statement has been made," said Mr. Breckinridge, "that a large standing army does not prevent war. This may all be true, but there is one thing it does prevent—annihilation."

Mr. Chairman, I pity the state of mind of any gentleman inside or outside of this Chamber who believes that a great standing army is essential to prevent the annihilation of the peoples of this Government. If it will be any enlightenment to gentlemen who are obsessed with that sort of fear, I want to call attention to two great battles that have been fought in this country. First, the Battle of New Orleans, and I read now from Messages and Documents by Richardson, in which he says:

Within a week after the Battle of Rodriguez Canal both Jackson and Sir Edward Packenham received reinforcements. Jackson's whole force on the New Orleans side of the river on January 8, 1815, was about 5,000, of which only 2,200 were at the front. Only 800 of the latter were regulars. On the opposite of the river was Gen. Morgan with 800 militia. This force of 5,800, indifferently armed and disciplined, was confronted by 10,000 of the finest soldiers in the world, most of them fresh from the continental campaign under Wellington. The Americans were intrenched behind their fortifications, which the British were compelled to approach across an open plain. In the conflict 2,600 were lost to the British, of whom 700 were killed, 1,400 wounded, and 500 taken prisoners. The Americans lost only 8 killed and 13 wounded. Probably no other battle in history presents this disparity in the numbers lost.

There were the squirrel hunters and the deer hunters engaged in battle with seasoned soldiers of Wellington, who had conquered Napoleon.

In 1836 Gen. Sam Houston mustered some 765 of this same sort of citizens to meet an army of 1,600, commanded by Gen. Santa Anna, who styled himself the Napoleon of the West.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIES. In that conflict, one of the decisive battles of the world, that gave independence to Texas and gave to the Union its empire State, the Mexicans lost 630 killed, 208 wounded, and 730 prisoners. The Texans lost 8 killed and 25 wounded. I may say that it was even a more wonderful feat than Gen. Jackson's victory at New Orleans. That was accomplished not by a regular army of trained men, drilled for battle, but by men who had taken up their abode in the primeval forests on the frontiers. They were men who could shoot straight. They were men who had courage in their hearts, and who were patriots and willing to fight to make the people free. I do not say that untrained soldiers are as capable as trained soldiers, but gentlemen should take into consideration, when they speak of the annihilation of this Government, that there are many millions of men in the country who have no chips upon their shoulders, who do not seek the loud acclaim of the glories of war, but who still know how to shoot, and in the event of war would yet perform feats for the liberty and glory of this country equal to that performed at New Orleans or San Jacinto.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. Yes.

Mr. QUIN. Is it not within the province of reasonable assumption that a great standing army would undermine the liberties of the people and overthrow popular government in this Republic in the course of time?

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, we can not have a great standing army without a great pension roll, as intimated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. Of course we have a modest roll now. It amounts to something like $200,000,000, a little more than the entire income of the Empire of Japan. What will we have when the martial dreams of our good friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] shall have been written into the statutes? If we pay out $200,000,000 now for pensions and have an Army of only 100,000, what will the pension roll be when we have five hundred thousand or a million in the standing Army of this country?

Mr. Chairman, I would not express my real feelings with regard to this matter. As I said before, my feeling is one of sympathy for that order of intellect and for that feeling of timidity that believes that this great, independent, liberty-loving people are facing annihilation for the want of a standing army. And I speak this as a student of history, if I may modestly make some pretensions to that. All of the nations of this earth combined have it not in their power, with all of their standing armies, to invade this country and annihilate this Republic. [Applause.] If this Republic shall share the fates of other similar Governments that have gone down in other times, it will not be from marching armies from across the seas. It will be from the folly of the people. It will be when they build up a great standing army in this country and make the military power dominant over the civil power. It will be when they cease to reverence the Constitution and the genius of this great Government and begin to imitate the debt-ridden and the soldier-ridden countries of other nations. [Applause.]

Gen. French, I believe, said, in calling for volunteers, that he did not care whether they knew the right foot from the left foot if they could shoot. It has been demonstrated in this war going on in Europe, where they dig themselves into the ground and fight a defensive battle, that they have but little occasion for the maneuver, march, and stately step of trained soldiers, and the man who believes that the men of the North, the men of the South, and the East and the West, the brave young men of this country, will be annihilated by soldiers sent here from abroad, I say, is suffering from a mental distemper, and I am sorry for him, and I would be sorrier still for our country if it gave heed to his intemperate dreams of martial conquest. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For commutation of quarters, and of heat and light, to commissioned officers, acting dental surgeons, veterinarians, pay clerks, nurses (female), and enlisted men, $440,000: Provided, That hereafter, at places where there are no public quarters available, commutation for the authorized allowance therefor shall be paid to commissioned officers, acting dental surgeons, veterinarians, and pay clerks at the rate of $12 per room per month; and, when specifically authorized by the Secretary of War, to nurses (female) and enlisted men at the rate of $15 per month, or in lieu thereof he may, in his discretion, rent quarters for the use of said nurses and enlisted men when so on duty.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question.

Mr. HAY. About heat and light? Mr. Chairman, I was very careful in my report on this bill to put in the report a full explanation of these provisos with regard to heat and light. There has been a great deal of controversy on the floor for the last two years with regard to it, and these provisos and this law have been worked out by the Quartermaster General of the Army and the Comptroller of the Treasury, Mr. Downey. If the gentleman will look at my report on pages 3 and 4 he will find a full explanation of this whole question of heat and light, and he will also find that the Quartermaster General states that it will result in considerable reduction of the item heretofore appropriated for the purpose. As a matter of fact, we were able to reduce it this year by $10,000, and he thinks when it gets into full operation we will be able to reduce it still further.

Mr. CALLAWAY. It just occurred to me that $12 per month per room——

Mr. HAY. Oh, that is fixed by law. That is the law now. The law now is that each officer, in accordance with rank, shall have rooms at the rate of $12 per month. A second lieutenant gets two, a first lieutenant three, a captain four, a major five, a lieutenant colonel six, a colonel seven, a brigadier general eight, and a major general nine rooms at $12 a month each. That is the law now.

Mr. CALLAWAY. What change is there in this from the original law?

Mr. MANN. Allowing rent of quarters.

Mr. CALLAWAY. They could not rent heretofore. What did they do for quarters where there were not any? I regret I have not had time to look at the report and get a detailed statement of this matter.

Mr. HAY. Gen. Aleshire said:

More than a year ago there were some questions as to the rental of buildings for quarters and the payment of heat and light allowances, brought up by the auditor and comptroller.

Mr. CALLAWAY. This does away with the heat and light proposition.

Mr. HAY. Oh, no.

The Secretary of War directed that the matter be fully investigated, and it was put in the hands of an officer of the Inspector General's Department. Investigation was completed, I think, about last June, or shortly afterwards.

As a result of that investigation the Inspector General invited attention to the fact that enlisted men for whom quarters were rented could not receive proper accommodations without an expenditure from their personal funds, and he also invited attention to the fact that the enlisted men of the Marine Corps on similar duty received commutation of fuel at the rate of $9 a month for clerks and $8 a month for messengers, and commutation of quarters at the rate of $21 a month for clerks and $10 a month for messengers. The practice has been to rent one room, and the price has varied from $8 to $12, and sometimes a little higher, but the tendency has been to make the selection of the room in a locality where rents are the lowest rather than in a desirable neighborhood. I do not mean to use the term "desirable neighborhood" in the sense of desiring to be in a fashionable part of a city, but where there are respectable people, people of the class of our noncommissioned officers and enlisted men.

The Secretary of War went over these reports, and so did I, as Quartermaster General, and it was noted that the inspector dwelt upon the hardships and inequalities imposed upon enlisted men by the existing system, and stated that in his opinion satisfactory relief can only be obtained by legislation fixing a flat money commutation for quarters and heat and light for officers and enlisted men whenever the Government does not provide them with public quarters.

He goes on to explain the whole question. I will not take up the time to read it all, but I will say as a result of it it will decrease the appropriation which heretofore has been necessary in order to provide heat, light, and quarters for enlisted men and for commissioned officers. It is very carefully gone into, and it was through the efforts of the auditor, I may say, and I believe that is true, that this investigation was made, and the law contained now in the bill is the result of a consultation between the officers of the War Department and the auditor, Mr. Downey. I am sorry I can not read it all to the gentleman, but I have not the time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I believe the point of order is reserved.

Mr. HAY. No; the gentleman moved to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. I might as well get a little information concerning this and the other paragraphs.

Mr. HAY. All right.

Mr. MANN. As I understand the purpose of this paragraph it is to enable the Secretary of War to provide quarters for these people when the commutation of quarters would not be as much as the rent.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. In Chicago, for instance, under this an officer might have quarters rented for him at $50 a month per room if the Secretary of War——

Mr. HAY. No; I think not.

Mr. MANN. Well, I think so. It says:

Or in lieu thereof he may, in his discretion, rent quarters for the use of said nurses and enlisted men when so on duty.

Now, there is no limitation as to the amount of rent.

Mr. HAY. At the rent of $15 per month.

Mr. MANN. Not at all; that is the commutation. The law now provides that you furnish quarters to certain people or commutation. This repeats the commutation provision which provides for an allowance at the rate of $12 per month and certain people at the rate of $15 per month, and then says that in lieu thereof he may in his discretion rent quarters for the use of said nurses and enlisted men when so on duty. I have no objection to that provision——

Mr. HAY. I will say to the gentleman it was not intended the Secretary of War should be authorized to go beyond the commutation already allowed by law.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I think the gentleman is mistaken. Now, the gentleman may not have had any such intention, but the Secretary of War has. The War Department is seeking to obtain the authority where it does not furnish quarters, where quarters cost more than $12 per month per room, to have the Secretary of War rent quarters in an apartment building in Chicago and other cities at whatever rate the ordinary charges may be, and they are usually considerably more than $12 a month for good quarters. Now, the provisions below show that——

Mr. HAY. I will say to the gentleman, that is not my understanding. If the law does that, I propose to offer an amendment which will prevent it. My understanding is that they want to rent quarters at not exceeding the rate now allowed by law.

Mr. MANN. Then I call the attention of the gentleman to lines 21 and 22, which read: "Which rate——"

Mr. HAY. That is light and heat.

Mr. MANN. Yes; that is heating and lighting there; but the paragraph above is the one that authorizes the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to hire quarters for commissioned officers, where there are no public quarters available, when in his opinion the commutation above provided for is inadequate, and when quarters are so furnished no commutation thereof shall be paid. Now, the very purpose of that is that if an officer who is allowed six rooms at $12 a month, which would be $72 a month, can not rent in an apartment which he thinks is suitable for his style six rooms at that rate he will ask the Secretary of War to increase it to $100 or $125 or $200, and I suspect in New York it will be allowed.

Mr. HAY. I will state my idea is utterly opposite to that.

Mr. MANN. It is clear on the face of it. I am going to make the point of order, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. HAY. Of course, it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. MANN. This provision as to nurses and enlisted men I feel a little more sympathetic with, although I hope they will not start in to rent quarters for nurses at the rate of $50 a month.

Mr. HAY. They can not do it.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon; it is exactly what they can do.

Mr. HAY. I do not think so.

Mr. MANN. They can pay the commutation, or, in lieu of commutation, the Secretary may, in his discretion, rent quarters for the use of said nurses and enlisted men when so on duty. There is no limitation as to the expense he may pay for those quarters.

Mr. HAY. I will put in an amendment to prevent it.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. If the section does what the section says, it is certainly not the desire of the department itself to bring that about.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I think that is what the department wants. It is not the first time they have tried to put it here.

Mr. KAHN. Here is what he said in the hearings. Gen. Aleshire said:

The purpose of this proposed amendment is to provide that commutation shall be paid to officers in all cases where they are not quartered in public quarters, whether they be on duty with troops or without troops.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will that cost more or less money than at present?

Gen. ALESHIRE. It will cost less. Our figures show we can commute quarters to the officers for whom we are now renting quarters at a reduction of about $7,200. No definite estimate has been made as to the total savings that will result from this proposed change, considering the whole scheme, but the savings will be material.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, Gen. Aleshire was talking through his hat. He had not looked through the provision himself. Some officer down there has fixed it up. Does the provision in here which provides that when, in his opinion, the commutation provided for is inadequate he shall hire new quarters mean that he shall rent them for less than the commutation? Gen. Aleshire generally knows what he is talking about, but this time I think he was trying to conceal his knowledge.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report. The Chair will state that there is a point of order pending. It was made to this proviso by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY], who reserved it.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I reserve the point of order. With the explanation of the chairman, and if this amendment goes into the bill, I think I will withdraw the point.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment with the point of order pending.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "duty," in line 7, page 16, insert the following amendment:

"Provided further, That not more than the rate now allowed by law shall be paid in any case."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] withdraw the point of order?

Mr. CALLAWAY. I think we might pass that for the present and take up something else. I think the amendment could be put in at another place.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will suggest an amendment——

Mr. CALLAWAY. If you will pass that over, I will prepare an amendment and see if we can agree on it and go back to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that this paragraph may be passed.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to pass over things. I am satisfied that this legislation is in the interest of economy. If the gentleman wants to make a point of order, it is all right. I have no objection to that.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I do not want to make a point of order on anything that is in the interest of economy.

Mr. HAY. What does the gentleman propose to add to the amendment that I have offered? I have offered it in good faith and tried to safeguard the proposition.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Well, Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw the point of order and let it go.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That hereafter the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, hire quarters for commissioned officers, acting dental surgeons, veterinarians, and pay clerks on duty with troops where there are no public quarters available, when in his opinion the commutation above provided for is inadequate, and when quarters are so furnished no commutation thereof shall be paid.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes a point of order against the proviso, and the Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That hereafter heat and light for the authorized allowance of quarters of commissioned officers, acting dental surgeons, veterinarians, pay clerks, nurses (female), and enlisted men, when on duty where there are no public quarters available, will be commuted at rates fixed by the Secretary of War and paid with and as a part of commutation of quarters, which rates shall, as nearly as possible, be computed upon a reimbursable basis.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes a point of order, and the Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For extra pay to enlisted men employed on extra duty for periods of not less than 10 days in the offices of coast defense artillery engineers, and coast defense ordnance officers, and as switchboard operators, at seacoast fortifications, $14,004.90.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to have some information about this matter of extra pay to enlisted men. I remember distinctly that on one occasion when I was in command of troops on board a transport there was a strike or mutiny of the civilian employees—the stokers and firemen. The captain or shipmaster, who was in the employ of the Government, came to me and proposed that he would pay the going wages for stokers to such of my men as might volunteer. Thirty or forty enlisted men volunteered and performed the duty of stokers and were paid by the shipmaster, about $400. But afterwards, when the shipmaster put in his bill to the United States Government, the whole amount was thrown out on the ground that the Government did not pay enlisted men for extra duty. Now, if that was a good rule amongst the volunteers, why should an exception be made for the enlisted men of the Regular Army? The services of these men in the Regular Army for every day in the year are employed——

Mr. MANN. It is all fixed by law.

Mr. HULINGS. It is all fixed by law; but it is just the law that I am objecting to. I think this would be a good time to change it.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HULINGS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. If you get an enlisted man at $16 a month and assign him to the performance of some duty to which he may be properly assigned, and to which if he was not assigned you would have to pay a man $100 a month to perform, does the gentleman say you ought not to let him do the work and pay him $100 a month for his services?

Mr. HULINGS. I did not say that until that rule was denied in the case of the volunteers I have referred to. I have given you the circumstances, where the civil employees mutinied, and under the rule that enlisted men in the Regular service may be paid, this shipmaster, who had expended some four or five hundred dollars, put his claim into the Treasury for reimbursement. He never was paid, because they were Volunteers and not Regulars, I presume.

Mr. MANN. This extra pay is not at the whim of officers. The extra pay, in the main, is fixed either by law or regulation in all the cases where it is allowed.

Mr. HULINGS. Well, in that case there were civil employees, and they quit. The soldiers had to stoke the ship.

Mr. MANN. The fact that the law did not cover the case is hardly reason for repealing the law in a case where it is proper.

Mr. HULINGS. Yes; I understand that, but the objection I make is that there should be any law to cover these two cases differently.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman, I understand, is complaining because the law did not cover his case, and then at the same time because it does cover equally meritorious cases of somebody else?

Mr. HULINGS. My objection is that there should not be fish made of one and fowl of the other.

Mr. MANN. Well, fish and fowl are different. You have to make a distinction when you have them before you.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For amount required to make monthly payments to Mabel H. Lazear, widow of Jesse W. Lazear, late acting assistant surgeon, United States Army, as per act of Congress approved May 23, 1908, $1,500.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I would like to have the chairman of the committee explain the nature of the allowances contained in these provisions.

Mr. HAY. I will say to the gentleman, Mr. Chairman, that a law was passed some years ago providing for the payment of these sums to these different individuals. It is the law, and of course we have to pay. These first two are widows of medical officers who lost their lives in Cuba as the result of experiments with yellow-fever mosquitoes. The other man, named in the paragraph beginning on line 6 of page 19, is a man who is still living; but he is a confirmed invalid, and his invalidism came from having been experimented upon for the same purposes.

Mr. CALLAWAY. These allowances are made every year?

Mr. HAY. Yes; ever since the Sixty-first Congress.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, these parties gave their lives to the development of the mosquito-bite theory of yellow fever?

Mr. HAY. Yes; they gave their lives in developing the mosquito-bite theory of yellow fever, and a special act was passed in each case for the benefit of these people, providing for the payment every year of these sums of money.

Mr. CALLAWAY. And this is a law?

Mr. HAY. Yes; it is based on the law. It is not only carried in an appropriation bill, but it is based upon a law that has been passed.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Additional pay for length of service, $30,220.12.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, when the Army bill was before the House last year it contained a provision affording relief to officers of the Porto Rico Regiment. There were 11 American officers who were appointed to that regiment shortly after the Spanish-American War, most of whom saw service in the Spanish-American War, and have been holding positions as captains ever since 1904 without being afforded any opportunity whatever for promotion. Last year the House passed an amendment, which was incorporated in this bill, affording them relief by placing all the officers of the Porto Rico Regiment on the lineal list of officers of the Infantry of the Regular Army. The provision of last year applied to every officer of the Porto Rican Regiment, natives and Americans as well. When the bill got into conference, as I understand, there was some objection to the provision on the ground that it was not considered advisable to delocalize the Porto Rican Regiment. But there is no question, gentlemen of the committee, but that the American officers who are serving with that regiment ought to be afforded some relief, and if we give them relief in the shape of the amendment which I propose to offer, it will merely transfer them to the lineal list of the officers of Infantry, to come in with and following officers of equal length of service. It will leave 11 vacancies in the Porto Rico Regiment in the grade of captain, to which the native officers, now first and second lieutenants, would be eligible for promotion, thus affording them promotion which otherwise would not come to them. The Porto Rico Regiment is one of the finest in our Army. Its officers both American and Porto Rican are a splendid lot of men, the equal of others of their rank in other branches of the service and so deserving of the same privileges and opportunity for promotion. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ANTHONY: Insert as a new paragraph, to follow line 15, page 19, the following:

"Provided, That on the date of the approval of this act the permanent captains of the Porto Rican Regiment of Infantry shall be recommissioned as captains of Infantry of the United States Army, to take rank on the lineal list of officers of Infantry immediately after the junior officers of the same grade whose total commission equals or exceeds theirs."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. MANN. It provides that on the date this act takes effect these captains will have to be recommissioned. They will have to be recommissioned by nomination of the President and confirmation by the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not know as to that; but I think the provision is subject to a point of order.

Mr. HAY. Their names will have to be sent in to the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Certainly; their names will have to be sent to the Senate and confirmed.

Mr. ANTHONY. The same as any other officer on promotion?

Mr. MANN. Yes. Here you put in a provision that they shall be recommissioned on the day this act takes effect.

Mr. ANTHONY. They are already commissioned in the United States Army. This gives them no promotion, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. It puts them in the regular establishment.

Mr. ANTHONY. They are already in the regular establishment, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Either one of two things is self-evident: Either it does something or it does not. If it means anything at all, it means a new commission and a new nomination and a new confirmation. The President has no authority to do it now under the law. I suppose we might give him the authority to appoint Army officers, if he proposed to avail himself of it, without sending the names to the Senate; but this provision requires that he shall commission these officers on the 3d of March, and possibly this bill will not be signed until four minutes before the final adjournment. How can he commission these officers under those circumstances? The gentleman from Kansas had better change that and not say "on the date of the approval of this act."

Mr. ANTHONY. How would the gentleman change it?

Mr. MANN. If I could hear it read again, I might suggest a way to change it. But I would say leave out the language "on the date of the approval of this act." Let us have the amendment read again, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. MANN. Just leave out the language "on the date of the approval of this act." and provide that the Porto Rican captains shall be recommissioned.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask that the language referred to be stricken out, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the language of the amendment will be modified as indicated.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as it would read when modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as a new paragraph, to follow at the end of line 15, page 19, the following:

"Provided, That the permanent captains of the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry shall be recommissioned as captains of Infantry of the United States Army, to take rank on the lineal list of officers of Infantry immediately after the junior officers of the same grade whose total commission equals or exceeds theirs."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to insert in the RECORD a brief speech made by David Clark, of Charlotte, N. C., before the Child Labor Conference in Washington a few weeks ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the speech referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as a new paragraph, preceding line 16, page 19, the following:

"Provided, That officers of the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry shall be eligible for detail on detached service."

Mr. HAY. I make a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia makes a point of order, and the Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Encampment and maneuvers, Organized Militia: For paying the expenses of the Organized Militia of any State, Territory, or of the District of Columbia, which may be authorized by the Secretary of War to participate in such encampments as may be established for the field instruction of the troops of the Regular Army, as provided by sections 15 and 21 of the act of January 21, 1903, entitled "An act to promote the efficiency of the militia, and for other purposes," to be immediately available and to remain available until the end of the fiscal year 1917, $250,000.

Provided, That of this sum $50,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, is authorized to be expended for payment of transportation of teams of the Organized Militia authorized by the Secretary of War to participate in the national match.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is it proposed to have any maneuvers this year?

Mr. HAY. Yes; I think so.

Mr. KAHN. This is for the coast-defense maneuvers.

Mr. HAY. It is the ordinary appropriation for the off year.

Mr. KAHN. One year it is for the mobile Army, and the next year it is for the coast defense.

Mr. HAY. One year we appropriate $1,250,000, and the next year $250,000.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The big appropriation is for the mobile Army, as I understand; but we did not have the maneuvers of the whole mobile Army last year.

Mr. HAY. No; and we did not spend the money.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is what I wanted to know.

The Clerk read as follows:

Care of horses and matériel for Field Artillery of the Organized Militia: For the purchase and issue of forage, bedding, shoeing, and veterinary services and supplies for Field Artillery horses of the Organized Militia that may be owned or acquired by or issued to any State or Territory, or the District of Columbia, or an individual, a battery, or battalion, or regimental headquarters, and for the compensation of competent help for the care of the matériel, animals, and equipment thereof, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, $200,000: Provided, That for the purpose of this section the total number of horses shall not exceed 32 to any one battery or 4 to each battalion or regimental headquarters, and that such horses shall be used exclusively for Field Artillery purposes: And provided further, That the men to be so compensated, not to exceed 5 for each battery, shall be duly enlisted therein and shall be detailed by the battery commander under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, and shall be paid by the United States disbursing officer in each State provided for in the act of January 21, 1903, entitled, "An act to promote the efficiency of the militia, and for other purposes," as amended: And provided further, That the funds appropriated by section 1661, Revised Statutes, and by the act entitled "An act to promote the efficiency of the militia, and for other purposes," approved May 27, 1908, as amended, shall be available for the purchase, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, of horses conforming to the Regular Army standards, said horses to remain the property of the United States and to be for the sole continuous use of the Field Artillery of the Organized Militia: And provided further, That the Secretary of War may, under the provisions of this act and such regulations as he may prescribe, issue to the Field Artillery organizations hereinbefore mentioned and without cost to the State condemned Army horses which are no longer fit for service but may still be suitable for purposes of instruction, the same to be sold as now provided by law when the latter purpose has been served, $.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, line 9, after the word "served," strike out the comma and the dollar mark and insert a period.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have not yet had an opportunity to read the hearings before the committee, and I want to ask the chairman whether there have been any recommendations by the Secretary of War or any of the chiefs of the various staff departments or any consideration of the question of the substitution of motor vehicles for horses? As I have read the story of the great war in Europe, it has seemed to me that one of the lessons of that war is that for the moving of guns and ammunition, and also largely for the transfer of men from one section of the battle line to another, which, in modern times, seems to have grown longer and longer, the day of the horse has gone, and that these machines are to be substituted and are much more efficient. I remember when I had the honor of serving on the committee under the chairmanship of my distinguished friend [Mr. HAY] a proposition was brought to the committee, or there was a recommendation, that there should be a purchase of motor vehicles—gasoline driven, I think, rather than electric—and I was impressed with it at the time. Subsequently, a colonel of the Army, a man in whom I have great confidence, a man of large experience and sound judgment, told me—and this was before the present war in Europe came on—that he believed the time had arrived when we would be compelled to equip our Army with these motor-driven machines. Now, I am not a big-army man. I am not in favor of expanding the Army at this time, because there appears to be less reason for it now than at any other period in my experience as a Member of this House, but I do want it the most efficient army possible; and if by getting these machines we can add to the mobile qualities of the Army, so that we can make the same small Army cover a much larger field of operations, I think it ought to be done. I have been interested in that, and I hope that an effort will be made to begin the construction of our Army upon that line. I wanted to ask the chairman of the committee if there had been any consideration of that proposition by the committee at this session in the making up of this bill?

Mr. HAY. No; there has not. We have not had any recommendation of that sort. I do not suppose the gentleman means to suggest that field artillery is to be drawn by motor vehicles?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I understand they are doing it in Europe.

Mr. HAY. Oh, no.

Mr. SLAYDEN. They are certainly drawing field artillery by dogs.

Mr. HAY. They may be drawing field artillery by dogs, but they are not transporting it by motor-drawn vehicles, as I understand it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Including machine guns in the term "field artillery."

Mr. HAY. Oh, that is in armored cars; and we have an appropriation for that later on in the bill.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is what I wanted to know.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Regular supplies, Quartermaster Corps: Regular supplies of the Quartermaster Corps, including their care and protection, consisting of stoves and heating apparatus required for heating offices, hospitals, barracks and quarters, and recruiting stations, and United States disciplinary barracks; also ranges, stoves, coffee roasters, and appliances for cooking and serving food at posts, in the field, and when traveling, and repair and maintenance of such heating and cooking appliances; authorized issues of candles and matches; for furnishing heat and light for the authorized allowance of quarters for officers and enlisted men; for contract surgeons and acting dental surgeons when stationed at and occupying public quarters at military posts; for officers of the National Guard attending service and garrison schools, and for recruits, guards, hospitals, storehouses, offices, the buildings erected at private cost, in the operation of the act approved May 31, 1902; for sale to officers, and including also fuel and engine supplies required in the operation of modern batteries at established posts; for post bakeries, including bake ovens and apparatus pertaining thereto, and the repair thereof; for ice machines and their maintenance where required for the health and comfort of the troops and for cold storage; ice for issue to organizations of enlisted men and officers at such places as the Secretary of War may determine, and for preservation of stores; for the construction, operation, and maintenance of laundries at military posts in the United States and its island possessions; for the authorized issues of laundry materials for use of general prisoners confined at military posts without pay or allowances, and for applicants for enlistment while held under observation; authorized issues of soap; for hire of employees; for the necessary furniture, textbooks, paper, and equipment for the post schools and libraries; for the purchase and issue of instruments, office furniture, stationery, and other authorized articles for the use of officers' schools at the several military posts; commercial newspapers, market reports, etc.; for the tableware and mess furniture for kitchens and mess halls, each and all for the enlisted men, including recruits; of forage, salt, and vinegar for the horses, mules, oxen, and other draft and riding animals of the Quartermaster Corps at the several posts and stations and with the armies in the field, and for the horses of the several regiments of Cavalry, the batteries of Artillery, and such companies of Infantry and Scouts as may be mounted; for remounts and for the authorized number of officers' horses, including bedding for the animals; for seeds and implements required for the raising of forage at remount depots and on military reservations in the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands, and for labor and expenses incident thereto; for straw for soldiers' bedding, stationery, typewriters and exchange of same, including blank books and blank forms for the Quartermaster Corps, certificates for discharged soldiers, and for printing department orders and reports: Provided, That no part of the appropriations for the Quartermaster Corps shall be expended on printing unless the same shall be done at the Government Printing Office, or by contract after due notice and competition, except in such cases as the emergency will not admit of the giving notice of competition, and in cases where it is impracticable to have the necessary printing done by contract the same may be done, with the approval of the Secretary of War, by the purchase of material and hire of the necessary labor for the purpose. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, whenever the ice machines, steam laundries, and electric plants shall not come in competition with private enterprise for sale to the public, and in the opinion of the Secretary of War it becomes necessary to the economical use and administration of such ice machines, steam laundries, and electric plants as have been or may hereafter be established in pursuance of law, surplus ice may be disposed of, laundry work may be done for other branches of the Government, and surplus electric light and power may be sold on such terms and in accordance with such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War: Provided, That the funds received from such sales and in payment for such laundry work shall be used to defray the cost of operation of said ice, laundry, and electric plants, and the sales and expenditures herein provided for shall be accounted for in accordance with the methods prescribed by law, and any sums remaining after such cost of maintenance and operation have been defrayed shall be deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the appropriation from which the cost of operation of such plant is paid: Provided, That $4,590, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the amount appropriated herein may be used for reimbursing Apache prisoners of war for construction of approximately 51 miles of reservation fence around the Fort Sill (Okla.) Military Reservation, $7,732,000.

Mr. MANN. I make a point of order on the last proviso.

Mr. HAY. I think it is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman want to reduce the amount?

Mr. HAY. No; I think not. The amount was cut considerably by the committee, anyway.

Mr. MANN. Then I make the point of order as to the proviso, only down to but not including the figures "$7,732,000."

Mr. HAY. I did not understand that the figures "$7,732,000" were included in the proviso.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether they were or not. They read as a part of the proviso.

Mr. HAY. I did not understand that the point of order reached that far.

Mr. MANN. I did not desire to make any point of order against the appropriation, although I think it ought to be cut.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois modifies his point of order so as to eliminate the total amount at the end of line 4 on page 28.

Mr. HAY. The proviso preceding that is subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order as modified.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I want to ask the chairman of the committee about this provision here as to the United States disciplinary barracks. Is not this the creation of something new?

Mr. HAY. No. It is simply a change in name. What used to be called the military prison is now called the United States disciplinary barracks. The same provision which has been heretofore made for the military prison is now made for the United States disciplinary barracks.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is it not predicating new legislation?

Mr. HAY. No, I think not; we struck the new legislation out of the bill as it was proposed to the committee. It was proposed to turn over the military prison which is now controlled by a board of Army officers to the Secretary of War, and give him the power to designate some officer to have supervision of these prisons. That was not accepted by the committee.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What I intended to ask the gentleman—and the gentleman from Texas will pardon me for interrupting—was with reference to a paragraph in which the provision seems to be specifically made of a change in the system of handling the prison.

Mr. HAY. That is in another paragraph. It is on page 30.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I see, it begins at the bottom of page 29.

Mr. HAY. The military prison is at Fort Leavenworth, and all the others are branches, and they propose to call that the United States disciplinary barracks, and the others branches of it. The language was put in in order to meet this proposed change. It has no bearing upon appropriations at all.

Mr. CALLAWAY. But it is a change in the manner of treatment?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Horses for Cavalry, Artillery, Engineers, etc.: For the purchase of horses of ages, sex, and size as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War for remounts, for officers entitled to public mounts, for the Cavalry, Artillery, Signal Corps, and Engineers, the United States Military Academy, service schools, and staff colleges, and for the Indian scouts, and for such Infantry and members of the Hospital Corps in field campaigns as may be required to be mounted, and the expenses incident thereto, and for the hire of employees: Provided, That the number of horses purchased under this appropriation, added to the number now on hand, shall be limited to the actual needs of the mounted service, including reasonable provisions for remounts, and, unless otherwise ordered by the Secretary of War, no part of this appropriation shall be paid out for horses not purchased by contract after competition duly invited by the Quartermater Corps and an inspection under the direction and authority of the Secretary of War. When practicable, horses shall be purchased in open market at all military posts or stations, when needed, at a maximum price to be fixed by the Secretary of War: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the purchase of any horse below the standard set by Army Regulations for Cavalry and Artillery horses, except when purchased as remounts or for instruction of cadets at the United States Military Academy: And provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for polo ponies except for West Point Military Academy, and such ponies shall not be used at any other place: And provided further, That the Secretary of War is authorized to expend $2,110.32, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the amount appropriated herein, for the completion of the purchase of certain lands included in the reservation of the Front Royal (Va.) Remount Depot, which was acquired under authority of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1911, namely, tracts 22, 25, and 28, aggregating 193¾ acres, more or less, and for the release of all claims against the United States for the use and occupation thereof, the said sum being the amount necessary to complete the purchase of the said tracts under the proposed compromise of the suit now pending for the condemnation of the same, $495,120.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to inquire, although it may not be so pertinent to this paragraph as it was to a former paragraph, is the gentleman from Virginia able to tell us from specific knowledge as to the constant sale of quartermasters' supplies. I hold in my hand a letter from the Secretary of War, dated December 7, 1914, transmitting a statement of the proceeds of the sale of old material, condemned stores, supplies, and other public property, and so forth. I notice in one place that there are about a dozen items of quartermasters' property amounting to $1,428. Below in another place there are 15 or 20 items, amounting to $3,686, and in another place $8,053, and all through are items like these: "A. S. Morgan, captain, kind of property sold, quartermaster's property, $2,119."

Mr. HAY. I must confess, Mr. Chairman, that I do not know anything about that. I never have had it heretofore called to my attention, and therefore have made no inquiry about it.

Mr. MANN. Of course I assume that it is all right and regular.

Mr. HAY. I take it that it is under some existing law.

Mr. MANN. I am not questioning that, but I thought the gentleman might know whether it was property of somebody in the service or whether it was condemned property that was sold.

Mr. HAY. I think some of both.

Mr. MANN. I have noticed on F Street a place where they advertise Army and Navy supplies. I do not know how much is condemned property. Out in my town, I think, they keep a standing advertisement of condemned quartermasters' property, and they sell some very fine articles. Whether it is because there is a change made in the kind of blanket used, or something of that sort, I do not know.

Mr. HAY. That is true. Recently they have made a change in the saddle for the Cavalry, and as they provide the new saddles they sell the old. That has happened a number of times.

Mr. MANN. I suppose they buy the old ones, take them over to Europe and make use of them and are thankful of the chance, and find them just as good as the new saddle.

Mr. HAY. I do not think the Government sells any war material to other nations.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; they sell it to private individuals.

Mr. HAY. They have gone so far now as to stop that—to prevent any war material reaching the belligerents, to prevent its getting there through private individuals.

Mr. MANN. Every one knows that we maintain an Army at a far greater expense per capita than any other nation in the world. I sometimes wonder if it is not because we first spend so much money sending companies back and forth from one place to another when it serves no useful purpose, and second in change of Army regulations concerning uniforms, selling them and buying new instead of having supplies that are continuous. I do not know whether that is the reason or not.

Mr. HAY. I think that has something to do with it, but the real reason is the pay of the Army. The gentleman will observe that nearly one-half of this bill is pay—over $48,000,000.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but when you have an Army and pay it 50 per cent of the amount you would think that $50,000,000 in addition would be more than enough to supply the necessities of the Army, even with some increase of ammunition and things of that kind.

Mr. HAY. I think the items we are now going over that come under the Quartermaster General are very carefully pruned. I know that he administers his department with a great deal of care and ability and with a purpose of economy.

Mr. MANN. I have no criticism or reflection on the Quartermaster General. I think he is one of the most efficient men I ever saw in any place in the Government.

Mr. HAY. I want to say that since he has been Quartermaster General he has reduced the expenses very largely. Of course in the last year or two this trouble down on the border has cost much more than the ordinary expenses. We have had to keep transports in condition to transport all the troops, and we have had a great deal of expense by reason of it. I do not think the transportation of the Army, the expense of it, is as great as it was some years ago. We must also take into consideration the fact that we have more men in the Army than before. The Army has been increased in two years by about 10,000 men, which, of course, makes it more expensive to keep it up.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask if it is not true that since the consolidation of the Pay Department, the Quartermaster General's Department, and the Subsistence Department into what is now known as the Quartermaster Corps there has been made all of the savings in administration which Gen. Aleshire told the committee would be effected?

Mr. HAY. Yes; and more.

Mr. SLAYDEN. He has made good in every respect?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Barracks and quarters: For barracks, quarters, stations, storehouses, magazines, administration and office buildings, sheds, shops, and other buildings necessary for the shelter of troops, public animals, and stores, and for administration purposes, except those pertaining to the Coast Artillery; for repairing public buildings at military posts; for hire of employees; for rental of the authorized allowance of quarters for officers and acting dental surgeons on duty with the troops at posts and stations where no public quarters are available; of barracks or authorized allowance of quarters for noncommissioned officers and enlisted men on duty where public quarters are not available; of grounds for cantonments, camp sites, and other military purposes, and of buildings or portions of buildings for occupation by troops, for use as stables, storehouses, and offices, and for other military purposes; for the hire of recruiting stations and lodgings for recruits; for such furniture for the public rooms of officers' messes and for officers' quarters at military posts as may be approved by the Secretary of War; for wall lockers in permanent barracks, and refrigerators in barracks and quarters; for screen doors, window screens, storm doors and sash, and window shades for barracks, offices, and quarters, and for flooring and framing for tents: Provided, That no part of the moneys so appropriated shall be paid for commutation of fuel or quarters to officers or enlisted men: And provided further, That the number of and total sum paid for civilian employees in the Quartermaster Corps shall be limited to the actual requirements of the service, and that no employee therein shall receive a salary of more than $150 per month, except upon the approval of the Secretary of War, $2,000,000.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 33, after the figures "$2,000,000," in line 12, amend by adding the following words:

"Provided, That of the foregoing appropriation $5,000, or so much thereof as may be required, shall be expended to complete the post chapel at Fort Sam Houston."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question in reference to this. Is there an appropriation for constructing this post chapel now?

Mr. SLAYDEN. No; there is not.

Mr. MANN. This refers to completing the post chapel?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes. The chapel was constructed from money contributed by the people of San Antonio, who gave altogether about $36,000, although when the chaplain who engineered the project appealed to them in the beginning they agreed to give only $25,000. However, he was a very plausible and successful beggar, and he induced them to increase their contributions by ten or eleven thousand dollars. This money has all been expended.

Mr. MANN. Can the chapel be completed with this $5,000 it is proposed to appropriate?

Mr. SLAYDEN. So the Quartermaster General's office says.

Mr. MANN. I hope, Mr. Chairman, they will extend the service and benefit of that chapel beyond the military camp to the citizens of San Antonio, including my distinguished friend. Hoping that that will be done, I can see no objection to the appropriation.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is stated that our population has been increased very much by immigration from the State of Illinois, and probably the suggestion is a good one.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Transportation of the Army and its supplies: For transportation of the Army and its supplies, including transportation of the troops when moving either by land or water, and of their baggage, including the cost of packing and crating; for transportation of recruits and recruiting parties; of applicants for enlistment between recruiting stations and recruiting depots; for travel allowance to enlisted men on discharge; of persons on their discharge from the United States disciplinary barracks or from any place in which they have been held under a sentence of dishonorable discharge and confinement for more than six months, or from the Government Hospital for the Insane after transfer thereto from such barracks or place, to their homes (or elsewhere as they may elect), provided the cost in each case shall not be greater than to the place of last enlistment; of supplies furnished to the militia for the permanent equipment thereof; of the necessary agents and other employees, including per diem allowances in lieu of subsistence not exceeding $4 for those authorized to receive the per diem allowance; of clothing and equipage and other quartermaster stores from Army depots or places of purchase or delivery to the several posts and Army depots and from those depots to the troops in the field; of horse equipment; of ordnance and ordnance stores, and small arms from the foundries and armories to the arsenals, fortifications, frontier posts, and Army depots; for payment of wharfage, tolls, and ferriage; for transportation of funds of the Army; for the hire of employees; for the payment of Army transportation lawfully due such land-grant railroads as have not received aid in Government bonds (to be adjusted in accordance with the decisions of the Supreme Court in cases decided under such land-grant acts), but in no case shall more than 50 per cent of full amount of service be paid: Provided, That such compensation shall be computed upon the basis of the tariff or lower special rates for like transportation performed for the public at large and shall be accepted as in full for all demands for such service: Provided further, That in expending the money appropriated by this act a railroad company which has not received aid in bonds of the United States, and which obtained a grant of public land to aid in the construction of its railroad on condition that such railroad should be a post route and military road, subject to the use of the United States for postal, military, naval, and other Government services, and also subject to such regulations as Congress may impose restricting the charge for such Government transportation, having claims against the United States for transportation of troops and munitions of war and military supplies and property over such aided railroads, shall be paid out of the moneys appropriated by the foregoing provision only on the basis of such rate for the transportation of such troops and munitions of war and military supplies and property as the Secretary of War shall deem just and reasonable under the foregoing provision, such rate not to exceed 50 per cent of the compensation for such Government transportation as shall at that time be charged to and paid by private parties to any such company for like and similar transportation; and the amount so fixed to be paid shall be accepted as in full for all demands for such service; for the purchase and hire of draft and pack animals in such numbers as are actually required for the service, including reasonable provision for replacing unserviceable animals; for the purchase, hire, operation, maintenance, and repair of such harness, wagons, carts, drays, other vehicles and motor-propelled and horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles, as are required for the transportation of troops and supplies, and for official, military, and garrison purposes; for drayage and cartage at the several depots; for the hire of teamsters and other employees; for the purchase and repair of ships, boats, and other vessels required for the transportation of troops and supplies and for official, military, and garrison purposes; for expenses of sailing public transports and other vessels on the various rivers, the Gulf of Mexico, and the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans: Provided further, That $75,000 of the appropriation hereby made shall be available for additional pay of employees on harbor boats, quartermaster service, in lieu of subsistence: Provided further, That authority is hereby granted the Secretary of War to sell or otherwise dispose of, in accordance with law and regulations, the United States Army transports Meade and Crook, $10,516,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the last proviso. Last year we authorized the sale of the transports Seward and Wright, if I remember correctly. I do not know whether they have been sold or not or how much has been realized from them if they have been sold. I do not know whether the President's shipping bill—I believe that is the proper term to use in speaking of it, and I do not want to call it anything that is not agreeable to the other side—I do not know whether the President's shipping bill is going to become a law or not, but if that becomes a law is it desirable to sell these transports to somebody and then buy them back at probably twice the price?

Mr. HAY. I understand these transports are very old. One of them——

Mr. KAHN. Is 32 years old.

Mr. MANN. Oh, there are lots of vessels 32 years old that we will buy before we get through, if we start to buy vessels.

Mr. HAY. I take it that the War Department thinks it will be to the interest of the service to dispose of these two transports.

Mr. MANN. Possibly we do not need them any more. I do not know about that; but if the War Department sells vessels and then the Treasury Department buys them, we all know that the Government in the end will get left as it did under the McKinley administration. We bought a lot of useless vessels at the time of the Spanish War and then afterwards tried to give them away. Maybe these are some of them. I do not know.

Mr. HAY. I will say to the gentleman I had a statement here giving the reasons why these are to be sold, giving the age of the ships and the further reason that they were no longer useful for transportation purposes.

Mr. MANN. They are giving such exhaustive consideration to this subject over in the body at the other end of the Capitol that I am inclined to make the point of order upon this, and then let them reinsert it into the bill if they think it wise, after they have passed the shipping bill and if they still want to sell these vessels. Of course I do not care.

Mr. HAY. It is subject to a point of order.

Mr. MANN. I understand the gentleman does not care?

Mr. HAY. Except for this, that I think the recommendation has been made in good faith.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt of that. The War Department wants to get rid of the vessels, I have no doubt. The Treasury Department wants to get hold of some vessels.

Mr. HAY. Whether they want to get hold of vessels of this character, I do not know.

Mr. MANN. Neither do I; but the authority in the shipping bill is to transfer these vessels that are not needed over to the men who have charge under the shipping bill. That authority is carried.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman means in the shipping bill?

Mr. MANN. In the shipping bill. If that becomes a law, it seems to me we ought to be consulted first before we start to build the vessels.

Mr. HAY. I have no objection. Mr. Chairman, it is subject to the point of order. The gentleman, I understand, does not include the appropriation in the point of order?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. I make the point of order on the last proviso, not including the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Roads, walks, wharves, and drainage: For the construction and repair by the Quartermaster Corps of roads, walks, and wharves; for the pay of employees; for the disposal of drainage; for dredging channels; and for care and improvement of grounds at military posts and stations, $600,000.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LOBECK] wants to offer an amendment. I do not know what it is.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 37, line 6, after the figures "$600,000," insert: "Provided, That not more than $6,000 of this appropriation may be used in defraying one-half the cost of paving Thirtieth Street between Fort and Laurel Streets, along the east side of Fort Omaha, in Omaha, Nebr."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, Fort Omaha is situated on the west side of Thirtieth Street, in the northern part of the city of Omaha, and it is necessary that that street be paved, or rather repaved. Heretofore the property owners on the street have had to pay for the Government share of the paving. I have had this matter up with the War Department, and they estimated the cost of paving, according to the engineer's figures, and the War Department states it ought to pay $6,000 as its share. This does not increase the appropriation at all, but it directs that of this $600,000, $6,000 should be used for this purpose. The residents of Omaha living out on this street are ready to have the street repaved. The abutting property owners on the east side of the street are willing to pay their full share.

Mr. CALLAWAY. What is the reason that the Government ought to pay any part of this street paving?

Mr. LOBECK. The Government owns a large part of the property, and it is used for the Signal Corps at old Fort Omaha, and there is no reason why the small cottage owners on the east side of the street should pay for this Government paving.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Is that a public street of the town?

Mr. LOBECK. It is a public street which extends out into the country.

Mr. GARNER. But the citizens pay on each side, and therefore it is contended that if the citizens pay half the Government ought to pay half. Is that right?

Mr. CALLAWAY. It is the city's business——

Mr. LOBECK. No; it is not the city's business, because the law on paving is different from what it is in the District of Columbia. Here in the District of Columbia the Government pays one-half of all the paving.

Mr. BAILEY. How are the other streets paved?

Mr. LOBECK. In Omaha? The property adjoining on each side of the street pays its proportionate share.

Mr. BAILEY. Special assessments on it?

Mr. LOBECK. Special assessments. This matter has been looked into very carefully——

Mr. CALLAWAY. As I understand, the Government owns property on one side of the street and the citizens on the other side of the street, and they want a division of the cost between the Government and the citizens?

Mr. LOBECK. And the street railroad pays for its share of paving where the street railway runs along the street and extends into the country.

Mr. CALLAWAY. We have some kind of a provision, I remember, in the city of Fort Worth. The citizens of Fort Worth want the Government to pay one-half of the paving expenses where the public building is, and they said they had no authority under law to do anything like that.

Mr. LOBECK. I will say to the gentleman that around the Federal building in Omaha, which covers a full square, and the Army building, which covers a quarter of a square, the city has paid for paving and repairing. That is down town in the city, where the public use it, but this street leads out into the country in the suburbs of the city, and it is hardly fair for the small cottage owner to pay for all of the paving.

Mr. CALLAWAY. It is just as fair out there that the expense should come on the city or county as it is on the city or county down town.

Mr. LOBECK. I will tell the gentleman what more we do. Wherever the intersections of streets occur there, the city pays the paving of the intersections out of the general fund, so that the only paving that the Government would pay for on this street is actually in front of its own land.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Would not that be a change of policy of the Government in respect to street paving throughout the whole country?

Mr. LOBECK. No; it has been done heretofore in the matter of guttering along the east side of its property. The Government would not have to pay for any of the street guttering; the Government has already paid its share of the improvement.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CALLAWAY. It looks to me like a dangerous innovation.

Mr. LOBECK. I offer the correspondence in relation to this paving between the city, the War Department, and myself:

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS,
OFFICE OF CITY CLERK,
Omaha, Nebr., May 29, 1914.

Hon. C. O. LOBECK,
Congressman, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Herewith please find copy of resolution No. 2926, adopted by the city council on May 28, 1914, relative to repairs needed on North Thirtieth Street, from Fort Street to Laurel Avenue, together with plat showing said proposed improvements.

Trusting you will give this matter your prompt attention, I remain,
Yours, respectfully,

THOMAS J. FLYNN, City Clerk.

CITY OF OMAHA, COUNCIL CHAMBER,
Omaha, Nebr., May 28, 1914.

Whereas North Thirtieth Street is the main thoroughfare leading into the city of Omaha from the north and the daily travel upon said street, to and from Forest Lawn Cemetery, Miller Park, the village of Florence, and the thickly settled agricultural portion of Douglas County surrounding same is very heavy; and

Whereas North Thirtieth Street, from Fort Street to Laurel Avenue, leads past the property of the United States Government known as Fort Omaha, and is not in suitable or proper condition for public travel; and

Whereas the estimated cost of repairing said portion of North Thirtieth Street and placing same in suitable and proper condition for public travel, by paving and curbing and constructing necessary sewers, is as follows:

	Total cost.	Chargeable to Government.
Paving:
District, 6,293 square yards	$13,251.30	$6,925.00
Intersections, 322 square yards	676.20	.....
Curbing:
District, 1,840 linear feet	1,472.00	.....
Intersections, 101 linear feet	95.00	.....
Constructing sewers	4,208.58	2,200.00
Total cost	19,703.88	9,125.00

Therefore be it

Resolved by the City Council of the City of Omaha, That Senator G. M. HITCHCOCK and Congressman C. O. LOBECK be, and they are hereby, requested to take the necessary steps to procure an appropriation by Congress amounting to $9,125 for the purpose of paying that portion chrgeable to the United States Government of the cost of placing North Thirtieth Street from Fort Street to Laurel Avenue in a suitable and proper condition for public travel by paving and curbing and constructing necessary sewers.

Resolved, further, That the city clerk be, and he is hereby, directed to forward a copy of this resolution forthwith to Senator G. M. HITCHCOCK and Congressman C. O. LOBECK at Washington, D. C.

By THOMAS MCGOVERN.

Adopted May 28, 1914.

JAMES C. DAHLMAN,
Mayor and President City Council.

Attest:

THOMAS J. FLYNN,
City Clerk.

—

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., June 1, 1914.

Hon. C. O. LOBECK, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your communication of May 28, 1914, relative to the War Department contributing one-half the cost of repaving Thirtieth Street adjoining the military reservation of Fort Omaha, Nebr., has been received. A proper reference has been made in order to enable the necessary information to be obtained. As soon as possible you will be further advised in the premises.

Very respectfully,

J. B. ALESHIRE,
Quartermaster General.
By R. B. MCBRIDE,
Captain, Quartermaster Corps.

—

JUNE 2, 1914.

Hon. LINDLEY M. GARRISON,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: We desire to request consideration by the War Department of a matter of some repairs urgently needed on Thirtieth Street from Fort Street to Laurel Avenue, in the city of Omaha, along the east line of the Fort Omaha Reservation. The city council of the city of Omaha has adopted a resolution, copy of which is herewith inclosed, reciting the need for repairs to this street and estimating the total cost of paving, curbing, and sewer work at $19,703.88, as follows:

	Total cost.	Chargeable to Government.
Paving:
District, 6,293 square yards	$13,251.30	$6,925.00
Intersections, 322 square yards	676.20	.....
Curbing:
District, 1,840 linear feet	1,472.00	.....
Intersections, 101 linear feet	95.00	.....
Constructing sewers	4,208.58	2,200.00
Total cost	19,703.88	9,125.00

It will be seen from the above that the amount properly chargeable to the Government is $9,125, and we are now engaged in an effort to secure the inclusion of this item in the sundry civil appropriation bill, now in the hands of the committee in the House of Representatives and soon to be reported. If possible, we would like to have the department make an estimate for this appropriation before the bill leaves the committee of the House; and if not possible to do it so soon, it is requested that you furnish an estimate that can be used before the Appropriations Committee of the Senate.

From our knowledge of the situation we are impressed with the necessity of this work, as Thirtieth Street is a highway of heavy travel, and the macadamized road heretofore serving has some time ago ceased to be of any service. We sincerely trust, therefore, that this may receive the early and favorable consideration of the War Department.

We also inclose for your information a blue print prepared by the department of public improvements of Omaha, showing in detail the district in which the improvements are to be made.

Yours, truly,

G. M. HITCHCOCK, United States Senator.
C. O. LOBECK, Member of Congress.

(Inclosures.)

—

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 4, 1914.

Senator G. M. HITCHCOCK,
Hon. C. O. LOBECK, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIRS: Referring to your letter dated June 2, 1914, I have the honor to inform you that the matter of repairing that part of Thirtieth Street which lies directly east of the Fort Omaha, Nebr., reservation in the city of Omaha has been previously referred to the War Department, and that the papers relating thereto have been forwarded to the commanding general, Central Department, for a report.

It is noted from the blue print furnished with your letter that the proposed sewer is not on land belonging to the United States, and it would not therefore seem that any part of the cost of construction thereof should be paid for by the Government. It is also noted that one of the tracks of the Omaha & Council Bluffs Street Railway Co. will, in the proposed new location, be entirely on the lands of the reservation. There is no information in the War Department regarding such a location of this railroad. From maps on file in the War Department it would seem that if the railroad tracks were left in their present location, which is not on Government land, the cost of repairing the street would be materially less than the amount, $19,703.88, stated in the estimate. No information is given in the papers as to whether or not any grading will be required, the character of the material to be used in the repairs, nor what effect the work might have on Government improvements on the reservation.

All of the information referred to in the preceding paragraph will be furnished in the report requested from the commanding general, Central Department. Until the receipt of this report it is thought that any estimate which might be furnished would be so inexact as to be of little practical value.

However, from the information in your letter it would seem that an approximate amount of $6,000 would be ample to pay for the Government's share of the paving. The item of $2,200, for half of the cost of the sewer, is not included in this estimate for the reason that the sewer in question will not be on the reservation.

As soon as the report requested from the department commander is received, the matter will receive further consideration, and a definite estimate of cost as requested in your letter can be furnished.

Very respectfully,

L. M. GARRISON,
Secretary of War.

—

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 15, 1914.

Hon. C. O. LOBECK, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Referring to your letter to the Chief of Engineers dated June 10, 1914, I have the honor to advise you that there is no record of the matter of the extension of the water main along the Fort Omaha grounds on Thirtieth Street, in Omaha, Nebr., in this department. However, the records of the office of the Quartermaster General show that a letter was received from you on May 28, which referred to repaving Thirtieth Street along the Fort Omaha reservation and the reconstruction of the sewer line on that street. A letter was mailed in reply thereto on June 3, 1914, stating that the matter had been referred to the department commander for report. On June 3 a letter signed jointly by Senator G. M. HITCHCOCK and yourself was referred to this office. This letter stated the necessity for repaving Thirtieth Street and for laying a sewer line, and requested an estimate of cost. Under date of June 4 the Secretary of War replied to the letter of June 2, and there is inclosed for your information a copy of that reply. It will be noted that the water mains referred to in letter of June 10 do not seem to have been mentioned in the previous correspondence.

2. The report regarding the repaving of Thirtieth Street has not yet been received, but it is expected that in a short time the matter will be again taken up.

Very respectfully,

HENRY BRECKINRIDGE,
Assistant Secretary of War.

—

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, August 6, 1914.

Hon. C. O. LOBECK, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: 1. Replying to your letters dated May 28 and June 2, 1914, with which you inclosed a letter from Mr. Randall K. Brown, Omaha, Nebr., relative to the paving of Thirtieth Street adjoining the Government property at Fort Omaha, I have the honor to advise you that the case has been given consideration.

2. It appears that this street lies alongside of the Fort Omaha Reservation; that it is the main traveled thoroughfare coming into Omaha from the north; and that the Government reservation extends to the middle of the street.

3. Careful consideration has been given the matter, and it is believed that the improvements suggested by you are necessary and will be a benefit to the Government. It is thought that $6,000, the amount stated in the previous communication as necessary for the purpose, will be sufficient to pay for that portion of the cost of the proposed improvements which should be borne by the United States. The cost of the sewer, which is not a necessity for the reservation and does not in any way improve it, should not be charged against the Government.

4. As to the application of the Omaha & Council Bluffs Street Railway Co. for permission to relocate its tracks on that part of the street within the reservation, the Judge Advocate General has held that the city, in its control of the easement of the public for a right of way over said street for public use, has full power to authorize any such relocation. I am of the opinion, however, that if such a relocation be authorized, the company should be required to pave and to keep in repair all that part of the street between the Government line and the tracks for a width of 8 feet west of said boundary. If the city has authority to authorize relocation of the tracks, it should make provision for the upkeep of that part utilized by the street railway company.

Very respectfully,

JOHN C. SCOFIELD,
Assistant and Chief Clerk.

—

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE QUARTERMASTER GENERAL OF THE ARMY,
Washington, December 23, 1914.

Hon. C. O. LOBECK, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: 1. Referring to your visit of this date, the records regarding the proposed paving of that part of Thirtieth Street, Omaha, Nebr., adjoining Fort Omaha, have been examined by this office.

2. For your information, it appears that the original estimate of May 28, from the city council of the city of Omaha, stated a total amount of $19,703.88 as necessary for this work, and that the part chargeable to the Government would be $9,125.

3. The question was carefully examined by the local officers, and the conclusion stated in the letter from the assistant and chief clerk of the War Department, dated August 6, 1914, that $6,000 would be sufficient to pay for the part of the work which would be properly chargeable to the United States, was arrived at. The cost of constructing sewers, viz, $2,200, did not appear to the War Department to be a proper charge against the Government. It was also thought by the War Department that the city authorities would have the right to grant the application of the Omaha & Council Bluffs Street Railway Co. to relocate its tracks, and that if such relocation should be authorized the company should be required to pave and keep in repair all that part of the street between the Government line and the tracks for a width of 8 feet west of said boundary.

4. No action seems to have been taken after the letter of August 6, except that the local military authorities were furnished with a copy of that letter for their information.

5. For your information, it may be stated that the letter of August 6 indicates the belief of the War Department that the Government should bear a part of the cost of the contemplated improvements. No funds are available for the expenditure necessary and no estimate has been made for the purpose.

6. It would therefore seem that if the work is to be done and the Government is to pay for its part of it, the necessary amount, viz, $6,000, would have to be secured by congressional action.

7. The correspondence which you left in this office is herewith returned.

8. Trusting that the information given above will fully inform you as to the present status of the case, I have the honor to remain,

Very respectfully,

J. B. ALESHIRE, Quartermaster General.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I want to say the Government, or rather Congress, heretofore has declined, except in some very extraordinary cases, to make appropriations for roads in cities or from the town to a cemetery, and so forth. There are now pending before the Committee on Military Affairs some forty or fifty bills asking appropriations for the building of roads and pavements in towns where they have national cemeteries, and so forth, amounting to some four or five hundred thousand dollars, and heretofore the committee has not felt justified in reporting any of those bills. Now, if this is a different case from the usual case, I am perfectly willing the gentleman should have his appropriation; but I have not seen yet that he has differentiated his case from any of the others which are asking for the same thing, and unless he can do so I shall be compelled to insist on the point of order and oppose his proposition.

Mr. LOBECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. LOBECK. Will the gentleman allow me to recur back to this item in a few moments? I will bring letters from the department from my office on this subject and then take it up.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to pass this over until he can bring some information from the department.

Mr. LOBECK. I intended to bring it with me, but forgot to do so.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman can not bring any information on this subject to keep me from making the point of order on it.

Mr. LOBECK. I do not care to argue the point of order with the gentleman, because I am not a lawyer or a parliamentarian.

The CHAIRMAN. What does the gentleman from Illinois say about this? That this is not authorized by law?

Mr. MANN. Yes; and also that this committee does not have jurisdiction over this class of items anyhow.

Mr. HAY. We have jurisdiction over appropriations for military roads.

Mr. MANN. But this is not a military road, and the committee of the gentleman does not have jurisdiction over this class of cases, which go into the sundry civil bill. They have jurisdiction over such legislation.

Mr. HAY. The committee has jurisdiction, in my judgment, to report a separate bill.

Mr. MANN. Oh, undoubtedly.

Mr. HAY. Now, if the gentleman is going to make the point of order, there is no use of delaying the committee.

Mr. MANN. I would not be willing to make a departure from the settled policy of the Government in a particular case without legislation upon the subject. I do not know but that I would favor the legislation, however.

Mr. HAY. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 6, page 37, insert as a separate paragraph the following:

"The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to accept on behalf of the Government of the United States the land which has been donated for the purpose of connecting the monument of the Ninth Regiment of New York Volunteers with the road system of the battle field of Antietam."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I will say that I offer that at the request of these associations.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Water and sewers at military posts: For procuring and introducing water to buildings and premises at such military posts and stations as from their situation require it to be brought from a distance; for the installation and extension of plumbing within buildings where the same is not specifically provided for in other appropriations; for the purchase and repairs of fire apparatus, including fire-alarm systems; for the disposal of sewage, and expenses incident thereto, including the authorized issue of toilet paper; for repairs to water and sewer systems and plumbing within buildings; and for hire of employees, $1,639,000.

Provided, That $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the amount appropriated herein shall be immediately available for commencing the project of improving and increasing the water supply at Corregidor Island, P. I.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the proviso.

Mr. MANN. I reserve the point of order against the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves the point of order against the paragraph and the gentleman from North Carolina reserves the point of order against the proviso.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, this proviso reads:

Provided, That $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the amount appropriated herein shall be immediately available for commencing the project of improving and increasing the water supply of Corregidor Island, P. I.

In the sundry civil act for 1916 there is an item, estimated for and put in at the request of the War Department, which reads as follows:

For continuing the construction and installation of the necessary accommodations and equipment for storage, electric power, and water supply for the Army in the Philippine Islands, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended, $154,000.

I make the point of order against this proviso. No estimate was submitted in the Book of Estimates for this particular item and it has already been appropriated for in a previous appropriation bill.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is entirely mistaken. It has not been appropriated for. It is an entirely separate and distinct proposition from the one contained in the sundry civil bill. This is for the purpose of obtaining drinking water, which they absolutely have to have—the digging of artesian wells, as I understand it—and it was requested to be put in here, and the Quartermaster General sent me an explanation of it when my attention was called to it by one of the members of the Appropriations Committee, showing that it was an entirely separate and distinct proposition. I do not think it is subject to the point of order for either one of the reasons given by the gentleman from North Carolina. Of course the words "shall be immediately available" make it subject to the point of order.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes; the fact that it shall be immediately available I think makes it subject to a point of order if for no other reasons.

Mr. HAY. Of course if the gentleman insists on the point of order——

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, in addition to that——

Mr. HAY. But I want to call his attention to the fact that it is not the project to which he refers.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I would say to the gentleman from Virginia that in reading the hearings before the sundry civil subcommittee a year ago I do not see that there is any differentiation made by the officials as to a drinking supply and any other water supply. This work had been in progress at that time, and they represented to the committee in the hearings when this appropriation was made that this $154,000 was necessary to complete the water supply at this particular place; and in that bill it was made immediately available on their representation. Now I will read from the hearings.

It was requested that $75,000 of the amounts needed for Corregidor Island be made immediately available, as the situation was acute, and it was thought that this amount could be advantageously and economically expended before the 1916 appropriations became available.

If the gentleman will allow me, Col. Burr, in the hearings before the subcommittee on appropriations having in charge the sundry civil bill——

Mr. HAY. He was an engineer officer?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. He was an engineer officer. The chairman of the committee, Mr. FITZGERALD, propounded questions to him. He said:

We had appropriated all that was asked—

That was in connection with this water supply—and they missed their guess by $154,000. Now, who missed?

Col. BURR. The explanation is probably due to the fact that the $250,000 which was appropriated for storage purposes——

The CHAIRMAN. First, what did we appropriate for the power plant?

Col. BURR. $154,666.67 was appropriated for electric power plant at Corregidor Island to cover the cost of the power plant for general post purposes. This figure came up in this way——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). That was in the fortifications bill?

Col. BURR. In the sundry civil act of March 4, 1911. Those figures were derived from an estimate made by the Engineer Department of the cost of a joint plant for defensive and post purposes, the proportionate share, one-third of the cost, being chargeable against defense appropriations and being provided for out of the appropriations of the Engineer Department made for that purpose, and the other two-thirds being chargeable to post purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] has expired.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Carolina may have two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, in regard to the point of order, I will quote from section 1136 of the Revised Statutes:

Permanent barracks or quarters and buildings and structures of a permanent nature shall not be constructed unless detailed estimates shall have been previously submitted to Congress and approved by a special appropriation for the same, except when constructed by the troops; and no such structure, the cost of which shall exceed $20,000, shall be erected unless by special authority of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. From section 1136 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. This is undoubtedly subject to the point of order on account of the words "immediately available."

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I do not care to say anything more.

The CHAIRMAN. If the point of order is insisted on, the Chair will sustain the point of order.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I insist on it, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I insist upon the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HAY. The Chair sustains the point of order to the proviso?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that we amend the total by subtracting the $75,000, otherwise I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] would insist upon a point of order on the whole paragraph.

Mr. HAY. If he does, I can offer an amendment.

Mr. MANN. I will not, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. HAY. I want to point out to the gentleman that the War Department estimated——

Mr. MANN. It seems to me that the amount ought to be reduced, but I am not going to make the point.

Mr. HAY. I want to say this: The War Department estimates for improving water supply at Corregidor Island by the construction of reservoirs with a capacity for 1,000,000 gallons, down-spout connections, cisterns, pipe lines, fittings, and so forth, to utilize rainfall on that part of the reservation known as "Top Side," $116,859, and they propose to spend $75,000 of it at once. The very fact that this item of $75,000 has gone out on a point of order, forbidding them to spend that amount at once, does not cut out the estimate they have made for expenditure on that object.

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly, if the appropriation is to be made on the Army bill, the sum ought not to be reduced. If, however, the appropriation is made on the sundry civil bill, it ought not to be here.

Mr. HAY. The claim is that the sundry civil bill of last year carried this item; not that they are going to make this improvement, but that it was made.

Mr. MANN. I did not hear what the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] said, but I have no doubt it was correct; but I presume the claim was that the sundry civil bill for last year carried for this purpose all that was asked for at that time.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. That is true.

Mr. MANN. The assumption I was making was that the Appropriations Committee had jurisdiction and would carry any appropriation that was necessary this year.

Mr. HAY. I do not agree with the gentleman from North Carolina in the statement that the Committee on Appropriations has no more jurisdiction over this item than has the Committee on Military Affairs, and now is a very good time to call attention to the manner in which the jurisdiction of these committees is arranged. Here is a very good illustration of it. Here we are asked to appropriate so much for a project in the Philippine Islands. Here comes the gentleman from North Carolina from another committee and says that they have already appropriated the money. Now, if the Committee on Military Affairs, as was intended, appropriated for the entire military establishment, things of that sort could not happen.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will permit me, there was never any contemplation that the Committee on Military Affairs should appropriate for the entire military establishment. The Committee on Military Affairs was given the Army appropriation bill, which carries the appropriations for the mobile Army.

Mr. HAY. That was done by a ruling of the Chairman in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no. The gentleman knows that the whole military establishment was never intended to be covered by the Committee on Military Affairs, because the departmental service and everything that properly belongs in the fortification bill go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HAY. The rule says that all that pertains to the military establishment shall go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FITZGERALD. At the time of the adoption of that rule th purpose was to put into the Committee on Military Affairs the Army appropriation bill, and the rulings have been to the effect that things that pertain to the control of the mobile Army are to be carried in the Army bill. Now, for instance, out of appropriations made in the Army appropriation bill the War Department has been building up a post at Fort Shafter, in the Hawaiian Islands. They have been requesting our Committee on Appropriations for several years past to make specific appropriations to continue that work, and the Committee on Appropriations has declined to do so because the work thus far has been done out of appropriations obtained from the Army bill, and we took the position that appropriations should not be made in two bills for the same work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. It was the time of the gentleman from Virginia.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for five minutes more

Mr. FITZGERALD. The truth of the matter is that the War Department so mixed up its estimates that they could not account for $154,000 which they were short, and they said it was needed, and finally they were given that sum in addition to the amount they estimated. Now it looks as if they had made another mistake.

Mr. HAY. I do not think so. The Quartermaster General of the Army informs me that this is an entirely different proposition from the one appropriated for in the sundry civil bill. I do not agree with the gentleman at all in the statement that it was intended that the Committee on Military Affairs should have only the mobile army. It has not got the mobile army even, because the Committee on Appropriations appropriates for the field artillery of the Regular Army, while the Committee on Military Affairs appropriates for the field artillery of the Organized Militia—a most absurd proposition, which has resulted in times past in duplications of appropriations. I think something ought to be done.

I made the attempt in the Sixty-second Congress to have the rules changed so that one committee or the other should have these appropriations, and so that there should not be an opportunity to have appropriations duplicated and mixed up between two committees, and I shall make an attempt in the next Congress; and so far as I am concerned, it will be much better for the public service for the Committee on Appropriations to take the appropriations from the Committee on Military Affairs entirely or to give us the appropriations entirely—one of the two.

However, that is not relevant to what is before the House, and I will move to reduce the total by the sum of $116,859, taking that sum from $1,639,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. HAY. Just make it read "$1,564,000."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 37, line 19, by striking out "$1,639,000" and inserting "$1,564,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Repair and maintenance, military and post roads, bridges, and trails, Alaska: Repair and maintenance of military and post roads, bridges, and trails, Territory of Alaska, $125,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I should like to make a simple inquiry. Have we now reached the point in Alaska where the repair and maintenance of the roads cost $125,000 a year? That is the amount which heretofore we have carried for the construction, repair, and maintenance of roads in Alaska.

Mr. HAY. It ought to include construction now, and I will offer that amendment. I do not know why the word was left out.

Mr. Chairman, in line 23, before the word "repair," I move to insert the word "construction."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 37, in line 23, by inserting before the word "repair" the word "construction."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. And in line 24, before the word "repair," insert the word "construction."

Mr. MANN. "For the construction."

Mr. HAY. "For the construction."

Mr. MANN. That is the way it is now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 24, before the word "repair," insert the words "for the construction."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Barracks and quarters, Philippine Islands: Continuing the work of providing for the proper shelter and protection of officers and enlisted men of the Army of the United States lawfully on duty in the Philippine Islands, including repairs and payment of rents, the acquisition of title to building sites, and such additions to existing military reservations as may be necessary, and including also shelter for the animals and supplies, and all other buildings necessary for post administration purposes, $400,000: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended for the construction of quarters for officers of the Army the total cost of which, including the heating and plumbing apparatus, wiring and fixtures, shall exceed in the case of quarters of a general officer the sum of $8,000; of a colonel or officer above the rank of captain, $6,000; and of an officer of and below the rank of captain, $4,000; $400,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The figures "$400,000," in line 16, should be stricken out. The appropriation is carried in the amount in line 9, and that is apparently an error.

Mr. HAY. Yes; that is a printing error. I move to strike out the figures "$400,000," in line 16, on page 38.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 38, in line 16, strike out "$400,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill is this $400,000 an annual appropriation?

Mr. HAY. No; it is not an annual appropriation. It has been made, though.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. How much money have we expended for these purposes?

Mr. HAY. That is something I could not tell the gentleman without making a calculation. We have made expenditures of this kind during the last 15 years. I have not the amount at my fingers' ends.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. As these expenditures have been going on for the last 15 or 16 years, it seemed to me that the natural inquiry would be, when the department came before the committee asking for $400,000 for the next fiscal year, to ask them how much they had already spent in that way, and how many more buildings they need, in order to see whether they ought to be provided.

Mr. HAY. This is not altogether for the construction of buildings. Very little of it is for the construction of buildings. Most of it is for repairs and the payment of rent, and things of that sort.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I see they are still buying sites.

Mr. HAY. They do not propose to buy any sites. However, if the gentleman wants a full statement of how this $400,000 is proposed to be expended, I can give that to the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I am not so much concerned about that as I am to know how much we have already expended and when expenditures of this kind will cease.

Mr. HAY. All I can say to the gentleman is that I have not before me the figures, and the gentleman can get them just as quickly as I can. If the gentleman wants to know how this money is to be expended, I shall be very glad to give him that information.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. How much is to be spent in building officers' quarters? That is all I am concerned about.

Mr. HAY. They do not propose to build any officers' quarters with any of this money.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Then, that limitation is brought forward from some previous bill.

Mr. HAY. Yes. That is always put in.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Let me ask the gentleman another question, not concerning this particular item. In his remarks yesterday afternoon he spoke of the Secretary of War saying that 15,000 troops were needed in the Hawaiian Islands. Why are so many more troops needed in the Hawaiian Islands than are needed in the Philippine Islands, and what are they doing there?

Mr. HAY. That is the number of troops that the Secretary of War thinks ought to be there and that he intends to order to the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. What are they needed there for?

Mr. HAY. I understand they are needed there to occupy the Army post in the Hawaiian Islands, upon the theory that the Hawaiian Islands are our outpost in the Pacific and that if any foe in the Orient attacks us we must be thoroughly prepared and fortified in the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Is the probability of our being attacked in Hawaii twice as great as that we would be attacked in the Philippine Islands? They seem to want twice as many troops there.

Mr. HAY. I do not think so. Personally I do not think they ought to have that many troops there, but of course the President, through the Secretary of War, can order the Army anywhere he pleases.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. How many troops are there now?

Mr. HAY. There are now in Hawaii 7,351 men.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Does the gentleman think that is a sufficient number?

Mr. HAY. I think so; but the War Department does not agree with me.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. What is the significance of the word "lawfully," in line 4?

Mr. HAY. I presume it means what it says—lawfully on duty.

Mr. ESCH. Are we to presume that there are officers and enlisted men in the islands unlawfully?

Mr. HAY. Not that I know of. I can tell the gentleman how that word got into the bill. The first time there was an appropriation for barracks and quarters in the Philippine Islands a point of order was made against the appropriation, and Mr. Cannon, who was then chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, drew this provision as it now reads, and it has remained in the law ever since.

Mr. ESCH. Is there any necessity for it, in the opinion of the gentleman?

Mr. HAY. I think so; because when the word "lawfully" was first put into the bill it helped to make the paragraph in order. It provided for troops that were lawfully there, troops that were ordered there by the President of the United States, and that was the reason the word was put in there, in order to get around the point of order. I remember the discussion at the time very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clothing, and camp and garrison equipage: For cloth, woolens, materials, and for the purchase and manufacture of clothing for the Army, for issue and for sale at cost price according to the Army Regulations; for payment for clothing not drawn due to enlisted men on discharge; for altering and fitting clothing and washing and cleaning when necessary; for equipage, including authorized issues of toilet articles, barbers' and tailors' materials, for use of general prisoners confined at military posts without pay or allowances and applicants for enlistment while held under observation; issue of toilet kits to recruits upon their first enlistment, and issue of housewives to the Army; for expenses of packing and handling and similar necessaries; for a suit of citizen's outer clothing, to cost not exceeding $10, to be issued upon release from confinement to each prisoner who has been confined under a court-martial sentence involving dishonorable discharge; for indemnity to officers and men of the Army for clothing and bedding, etc., destroyed since April 22, 1898, by order of medical officers of the Army for sanitary reasons, $6,624,000: Provided, That hereafter whenever contracts which are not to be performed within 60 days are made on behalf of the Government by the Quartermaster General, or by officers of the Quartermaster Corps authorized to make them, and are in excess of $500 in amount, such contracts should be reduced to writing and signed by the contracting parties with their names at the end thereof. In all other cases contracts shall be entered into under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Quartermaster General: Provided further, That all the money hereinbefore appropriated under the titles Subsistence of the Army, Regular Supplies—Quartermaster Corps, Incidental Expenses—Quartermaster Corps, Transportation of the Army and its Supplies, Water and Sewers at Military Posts, and Clothing and Camp and Garrison Equipage shall be disbursed and accounted for by officers and agents of the Quartermaster Corps as "Supplies, Services, and Transportation, Quartermaster Corps," and for that purpose shall constitute one fund: Provided further, That hereafter funds appropriated for support of the Army may be used for the procurement of supplies to be held in store for issue to the Army during subsequent fiscal years: Provided further, That articles of serviceable quartermaster property may be sold by the Quartermaster General of the Army to officers of the Navy and Marine Corps, for their use in the public service, in the same manner as these articles are now sold to officers of the Army.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

Mr. MANN. I wanted to suggest a grammatical amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. And I want to inquire about the proviso on page 40, that hereafter funds appropriated for the support of the Army shall be used for the procurement of supplies to be held in store for issue to the Army during subsequent fiscal years.

Mr. HAY. The purpose of this, Mr. Chairman, is to reduce the expenses and to provide, as it is in the pay of the Army, that all of it shall be in one fund. Thinking that this would meet the approval of the House, the committee reduced the various items incorporated here about 4 per cent. The Quartermaster General pointed out that within the last 10 years, I think, there had been turned back into the Treasury from the saving of each one of these items at least 4.1 per cent, so that instead of making the items as large as they were we could reduce it by 4 per cent. There is a very full explanation in the hearings and also in the report on the bill.

The report says:

Gen. ALESHIRE. The first proviso suggests legislation for the disbursement of the funds appropriated under the six appropriations enumerated therein as one appropriation, and it is submitted with the view to simplifying the actual disbursement of funds by the Quartermaster Corps and reducing the total of the estimates, and therefore of the amounts to be appropriated by Congress. There has been compiled from the records of the Office of the Quartermaster General data showing amounts appropriated on regular estimates and on deficiency estimates covering five fiscal years, 1909 to 1913; the total appropriated and the amounts turned into the surplus fund of the Treasury at the end of each of the fiscal years referred to. This data has been tabulated and is here inserted in the hearings.

From an examination of this table it will be found, Mr. Chairman, that from the fiscal year 1909 up to and including the fiscal year 1913, five years, there have been turned into the surplus fund of the Treasury from the six appropriations enumerated in the proviso during that period amounts of money that average $1,665,921.38 a year. That is to say, there was appropriated for 1909, under the appropriation "Subsistence of Army," $7,673,471.45; "Regular supplies," $9,300,000; "Incidental expenses," $2,275,000; "Army transportation," $11,646,317.46; "Water and sewers," $2,711,275; "Clothing and equipage," $7,000,000; making a total of $40,606,063.91.

Now, of that total amount there was turned into the surplus fund of the Treasury $1,950,288.30 not having been expended, as it was not required. It will be noted that that amount is about 4.8 per cent of the total amount appropriated under the appropriations referred to.

The same is true for the fiscal years 1910, 1911, and 1912. In 1913 the amount turned in was not so large a percentage; but, as stated before, the average that has been turned in each year was $1,665,921.38, or about 4.1 per cent of the total of the amounts appropriated.

The total appropriated during these five years was $198,661,238.31, or an average of $39,732,249.66 per year.

After a careful study of this subject I believe that if the appropriations I have enumerated were disbursed as a single appropriation, just as is done for the appropriation "Pay of the Army," that the amounts included in the estimate for 1916 under each of the appropriations included in the proviso could be reduced by amounts, respectively, the total of which will approximate $800,000.

Mr. FOSTER. As I understand, this is for the purchase of supplies that are held in store and then withdrawn and issued, and in buying for all the different purposes they make a saving.

Mr. HAY. Yes; they can do it without creating a deficiency in any one department.

Mr. FOSTER. So that when the item is taken out of the stores it is charged up to that particular department?

Mr. HAY. Yes; it is.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, on page 39, line 17, the word "should" ought to be stricken out and the word "shall" inserted. I think the gentleman will see that the proposition submitted by the War Department is grammatically incorrect.

Mr. HAY. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 39, line 17, strike out the word "should" and insert the word "shall."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Claims for damages to and loss of private property: For settlement of claims for damages to and loss of private property belonging to citizens of the United States, Hawaii, and the Philippine Islands, $2,928.86.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. What is a citizen of Hawaii?

Mr. HAY. Well, Mr. Chairman, I suppose he is a citizen of the United States; he is a citizen of the Territory of Hawaii.

Mr. KAHN. As I recall, under the organic act creating the Territory, the citizens of this island were declared to be citizens of Hawaii.

Mr. MANN. No; they are citizens of the United States, and they were so declared to be. However, if they want to differentiate themselves, all right. This would not include the citizens of Porto Rico; they are not citizens of the United States, but the Hawaiians are.

Mr. KAHN. The citizens of Porto Rico have filed no claims for damages.

Mr. MANN. These are claims over which the committee had no jurisdiction, but I did not make the point of order.

Mr. KAHN. These are very small damages, in most cases not over three or four dollars.

Mr. HAY. Mainly damages which occurred in target practice.

The Clerk read as follows:

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT.

Medical and hospital department: For the purchase of medical and hospital supplies, including motor ambulances, their maintenance, repair, and operation, and disinfectants, and the exchange of typewriting machines for military posts, camps, hospitals, hospital ships, and transports; for expenses of medical supply depots; for medical care and treatment not otherwise provided for, including care and subsistence in private hospitals, of officers, enlisted men, and civilian employees of the Army, of applicants for enlistment, and of prisoners of war and other persons in military custody or confinement, when entitled thereto by law, regulation, or contract: Provided, That this shall not apply to officers and enlisted men who are treated in private hospitals or by civilian physicians while on furlough; for the proper care and treatment of epidemic and contagious diseases in the Army or at military posts or stations, including measures to prevent the spread thereof, and the payment of reasonable damages not otherwise provided for, for bedding and clothing injured or destroyed in such prevention; for the pay of male and female nurses, not including the Nurse Corps (female), and of cooks and other civilians employed for the proper care of sick officers and soldiers, under such regulations fixing their number, qualifications, assignment, pay, and allowances as shall have been or shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War; for the pay of civilian physicians employed to examine physically applicants for enlistment and enlisted men, and to render other professional services from time to time under proper authority; for the pay of other employees of the Medical Department; for the payment of express companies and local transfers employed directly by the Medical Department for the transportation of medical and hospital supplies, including bidders' samples and water for analysis; for supplies for use in teaching the art of cooking to the Hospital Corps; for the supply of the Army and Navy Hospital at Hot Springs, Ark.; for advertising, laundry, and all other necessary miscellaneous expenses of the Medical Department: Provided, That hereafter, with the approval of the Secretary of War and at rates of charge of not less than the contract prices paid therefor plus 25 per cent to cover the cost of purchase, inspection, etc., the Medical Department of the Army may sell for cash to the American National Red Cross or to any surveying or exploring party organized or conducted under the auspices or direction of any State or municipal government, or of any college or society incorporated, established, or instituted for the acquisition of knowledge or the dissemination of learning, in the United States or their insular possessions or dependencies, such medical supplies and equipments as can be spared without detriment to the military service: Provided further, That hereafter in the settlement of accounts between the appropriations of the Medical Department and those of any other branch of the Army service, or any bureau or office of the War Department, or any other executive department or establishment of the Government, payment thereof may be made by the proper disbursing officer of the Medical Department or of the branch of the Army service, office, bureau, department, or establishment concerned, $750,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. I would like to ask about the proviso beginning at the bottom of page 43. What is the reason for putting in this provision authorizing the medical supplies to be sold to anybody who seeks to call himself "a society for the acquisition of knowledge or the dissemination of learning"?

Mr. HAY. The explanation given by the Surgeon General is that it would be useful to an organization like the Red Cross. That is what brought the question up primarily.

The Yale University applied for the convenience of purchasing a unit from us. They said that in this way they could change the stock and help them to keep it up to date.

Mr. MANN. It is plain that it would have no effect on the change of stock unless they sold large amounts. Is it desirable to have the Government go into the business of buying and selling medical supplies in large amounts? I suppose the medical supplies are delivered here.

Mr. HAY. They have different places to deliver them—one here, one in Chicago, one at San Francisco.

Mr. MANN. They would sell those in South America and Alaska and China, where the Red Cross is operating, where any of these societies chose to go, and the Government would pay the cost of transportation, because all they can charge is 25 per cent over the contract price.

Mr. HAY. I only know that the committee was governed by the apparent good reason given by the Surgeon General. In the hearings he says:

I recommend the enactment of the proviso appearing in the text of the estimates authorizing sales of Army medical equipments to the Red Cross and to exploring or surveying expeditions conducted under State or private auspices. Under existing law such sales can not legally be made; but it seems entirely proper that they should be authorized in view of the benefits inuring to the general public from the operations of the Red Cross and the expeditions referred to. The fieldwork of these enterprises calls for medical outfits of established standards and compact form especially designed for easy transportation under adverse conditions. The Medical Department has established standards for such outfits, and procures them in considerable lots for military use. They are not kept in stock in the regular commercial markets; to make and assemble them requires months; dealers would scarcely be willing to make two or three of them at a time, and practically, therefore, they are procurable by the Red Cross and the surveys only from the Medical Department. The Medical Department could readily furnish a few outfits now and then, if authorized so to do, without any embarrassment whatever under ordinary circumstances, as the proceeds of the sales would become immediately available under the law of June 12, 1906 (34 Stat., 256), to procure new supplies.

Mr. MANN. What class of supplies is the gentleman referring to?

Mr. HAY. To the outfits carried on expeditions in the operations of the Red Cross.

Mr. MANN. I should say that it was much easier to get outfits to go on expeditions from private concerns, which might have them for that particular purpose, than to get them from the Medical Department of the Army.

Mr. HAY. The Medical Department of the Army keeps them on hand.

Mr. MANN. Mountain-climbing supplies, or something of that sort?

Mr. HAY. Oh, no; not mountain-climbing supplies, but supplies used in the medical department for medicinal purposes—not alpenstocks or anything of that sort.

Mr. MANN. I can not understand why the medical department should need medical supplies for the Army which nobody needs in private life.

Mr. HAY. I will say to the gentleman that it seemed to us a good reason was given why these people should be allowed to dispose of these supplies. Of course the proviso is subject to a point of order.

Mr. MANN. Of course we have had a tender solicitude for the Red Cross. I do not know that I should object to that, but when you undertake to say that the Government shall sell supplies to anybody who calls himself an exploring or surveying party organized or conducted under the auspices of a State or municipal Government, or a colloge or a society incorporated, established, or instituted for the acquisition of knowledge, I think we open the door too wide. Anyone can get into that category.

Mr. HAY. That is true.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. As I understand it, the medical department has regular chests containing various supplies that are used by the Army. Say, for instance, in the Philippine Islands a party is out reconnoitering and men are injured. The chest is so prepared and equipped that those men can be taken care of immediately. As I understand it, Yale University has been fitting out an expedition under Prof. Bingham to make discoveries in Peru, in some of the old villages of the Incas, and it was the purpose of the department by this provision to furnish these expeditions with their medical supplies, provided, of course, Congress would give the department the permission to do it. The supplies the medical department of the Army has would probably better suit an expedition of that kind than supplies purchased at random in any shop, and for that reason the department wanted the authority to sell to institutions of learning of that kind that fit out such expeditions.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that these people would like to buy from the Government more cheaply than they can buy some place else, and there may be many cases where it ought to be done. It is easy to pass a law based on some good cause, but what limitation is there here? To permit the purchase of whatever medical supplies could be bought more cheaply under this provision than they can in the open market—and doubtless there are many medical supplies where the profit between the manufacturers and the consumer is more than 25 per cent—would throw it open to have the Government go into that business. Of course, they say they do not want to; but what is the use of enacting legislation to permit them to do it just because there is some case where it might be desirable to do it.

I would like to buy my boots and shoes from the Government; I would like to buy my clothing and my coal from the Government. If I were living in a house and keeping house and could get the same facilities furnished me that the Army officers can, I could buy coal much more cheaply than I could otherwise, and I could buy clothing much more cheaply; but, after all, the Government does not undertake to run all of these things. I make the point of order against the proviso beginning at the bottom of page 43 and running down to and including a part of line 12 on page 44.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, it is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the library of the Surgeon General's office, including the purchase of necessary books of reference and periodicals, $10,000.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if the committee has given any thought to the suggestion that the name of that library in the Surgeon General's office should be changed?

Mr. HAY. It did not.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The suggestion was made to the gentleman, I think he will recall.

Mr. HAY. The suggestion was made last year that it should be transferred to the Library of Congress, but that was done by amendment of the Senate. The question was looked into, and the Senate receded.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Of course everyone who has thought about the matter knows that the Senate made a very grievous error in ordering the transfer. The suggestion was made by distinguished medical men in the United States in civil life that the name of the library in the Surgeon General's office should be changed, because it is not a title that gives any correct idea of the real importance and dignity of that great library. My information is from very distinguished men in the medical profession that this is the greatest medical library on the face of the earth. There is nothing in the world to equal it.

Mr. HAY. That is true.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. And the suggestion has been made that it ought not to be called the library of the Surgeon General's office, but should be called by some other name, such as the National Medical Library, or something of that sort, in order that many who do not appreciate its real significance and its real value may get an accurate idea of its importance and character.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I would be very glad to consider some name if it were suggested, and I think the committee will be very glad to take that up next year.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It ocurs to me that it is very well worth while. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordnance stores—ammunition: Manufacture of ammunition for small arms for reserve supply, ammunition for burials at the National Soldiers' Home in Washington, D. C., ammunition for firing the morning and evening gun at military posts prescribed by General Orders No. 70, headquarters of the Army, dated July 23, 1867, and at National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers and its several branches, including National Soldiers' Home in Washington, D. C., and soldiers' and sailors' State homes: Provided, That not more than $5,000 of this appropriation may be used in the purchase of ammunition, $100,000.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 49, line 10, strike out "$100,000" and insert "$3,000,000."

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, according to the ideas of the chairman of this committee, as submitted in his table, we have on hand already sufficient reserve rifle ammunition. He said yesterday:

I ask unanimous consent to print a table furnished me by the War Department which corrects a certain error.

I said to him that his table was not the War Department's estimate at all, but the estimate of Gen. Crozier. The fact is that the War Department's estimate is that we need 513,430,640 rounds of reserve ammunition instead of 196,000,000, as stated by the gentleman. Now, when the chairman said that, yesterday, I went down to the War Department and in person presented a letter of inquiry. Here is the answer from the Secretary of War, under date of January 21, 1915:

JANUARY 21, 1915.

MY DEAR SIR: In a letter of even date you ask me whether "a table published in a newspaper article by Hon. JAMES HAY on Sunday, January 10, and subsequently published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD," was furnished by the War Department and is official. In answer thereto I beg to advise you that the said table was not furnished by the War Department and is not official.

I have been informed by the Chief of Ordnance that Mr. HAY requested him to furnish him with some information, that he came to me and secured my consent to his furnishing Mr. HAY with certain information, and he did so. The information gathered by Gen. Crozier and furnished Mr. HAY was not submitted to me, and I did not, therefore, officially pass thereon, nor did anyone else in authority in the department outside of the Chief of Ordnance.

Sincerely, yours,

LINDLEY M. GARRISON,
Secretary of War.

Now, what are the facts? I wrote letters on the 11th, 12th, and 16th instant to the War Department to find out what the figures as to artillery and ammunition in the plan of the General Staff actually are. I asked to know whether they corresponded with the figures published by the chairman of this committee. Here are two of the questions I asked in my letter of January 16 with regard to Chairman HAY's table:

Does the figure given as to rifle ammunition correspond with the estimates of the General Staff contained in the "Tables of Organization" submitted February 25, 1914?

This document which I hold in my hand is the War Department compilation, entitled "Tables of Organization." It was approved by order of the Secretary of War February 25, 1914. Here is another question which I asked:

According to the "Tables of Organization" above cited, what number of rifles would be required for a field army of 460,000 men and 50,000 Coast Artillery troops, and how much ammunition per rifle ought we to have?

Remember that the estimate published by Chairman HAY was for a field army of 460,000 mobile troops and 50,000 coast artillerymen. According to his table, all the rifle ammunition which we need to accumulate for this army is 196,000,000 rounds. Counting what is being manufactured, we have a good deal more than that amount already on hand. In fact, on hand or being made we have 241,000,000 rounds.

Here is the War Department's answer to my first question:

The ammunition required by this force to begin war, calculated on the basis of table 2, page 7, "Tables of Organization," would be 513,430,640 rounds of rifle ball cartridges.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, we need 270,000,000 more rounds of rifle ammunition than we have provided for, instead of being ahead of the game. Mind you, this figure does not count the ammunition needed for the coast artillerymen if they are used as infantry.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARDNER. That means, Mr. Chairman, that we are pretty nearly 300,000,000 cartridges short at the present time. Now, if the committee adopts my amendment for an appropriation of $3,000,000, we shall be able to pay for the manufacture of over 100,000,000 cartridges. At that rate it will take us less than three years to catch up to where we ought to be.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARDNER. Certainly.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. The gentleman's sole amendment is to substitute $3,000,000 for $100,000?

Mr. GARDNER. That is right.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. But in that same clause there is a provision that not more than $5,000 of this can be used for ammunition.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. For the purchase of ammunition.

Mr. GARDNER. For the purchase of ammunition; exactly.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Will the gentleman please explain that provision?

Mr. GARDNER. It is inserted because Congress desires the Government to make its rifle ammunition in its own factories. My amendment does not interfere with that.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GARDNER. Certainly.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Is it not true that up to about 1909 we were appropriating $1,200,000 a year for this reserve supply of ammunition, and if the deficiency from that sum were taken from the years since then that the gentleman's $3,000,000 would be less than the amount that would have been appropriated during that time?

Mr. GARDNER. I do not know. I think the gentleman was on the committee at that time.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Not since then.

Mr. GARDNER. Here is the evidence that the chairman's table is wrong. The fact is, we are pretty nearly 300,000,000 rounds short. If you adopt that amendment which I have offered, you will have 100,000,000 more cartridges at the end of the next fiscal year and we shall catch up with the whole of it in less than three years. This bill as it stands practically puts an end to the accumulation of more rifle ammunition. That will substantially be the result if the bill becomes law in its present shape. In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, the committee acted under an entire misapprehension of the facts.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD this entire correspondence with the Secretary of War without reading it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the matter indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The correspondence referred to is as follows:

CONGRESSMAN GARDNER TO SECRETARY GARRISON.

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 12, 1915.

Hon. L. M. GARRISON,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Will you be so kind as to give me the following material:

(1) A copy of the findings of the board convened under your instructions by an order issued December 16, 1914. The board to which I refer was convened for the purpose of considering possible changes in our coast defenses and their armament.

(2) A copy of the recommendations as to matériel for a mobile army of approximately 460,000 men, worked out by the General Staff and tentatively approved by the War Department.

(3) How much artillery ammunition did the General Staff recommend as the proper amount to be accumulated prior to the breaking out of a war and what was the size of the estimated army to be equipped?

(4) How much, if any, ammunition have we for our seacoast defenses besides the amounts mentioned on page 6 of the Report of the Chief of Staff United States Army, 1914? Do the figures of the Chief of Staff refer exclusively to "reserve" ammunition or is there a substantial amount of Coast Artillery ammunition on hand in the United States proper besides the "reserve"?

(5) I quote from Assistant Secretary Roosevelt's testimony before the Committee on Naval Affairs, page 978: "In the case of mines the Navy's opinion is that the Army has not gone far enough in the development of harbor mines." How many harbor mines have we?

(6) I again inquire whether it would be necessary to abandon the Crozier disappearing gun carriage in case it were desired to remount the 12-inch guns so as to secure a range of 20,000 yards?

Very respectfully,

A. P. GARDNER.

—

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 11, 1915.

Hon. L. M. GARRISON.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I append a table which appeared in yesterday's Sunday Star in an article written by Hon. JAMES HAY, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives.

Memorandum of the state of preparation, in the principal items of fighting material, of the United States Army for entering upon a war that would require the equipment of an army of about 460,000 mobile troops and 50,000 Coast Artillery troops.

	On hand.	Additional provided for by appropriation	Total provided for.	Total in project.	Required to complete project.
Rifles	1,037,000	36,749	1,073,749	600,000	.....
Pistols and revolvers	145,579	31,271	176,850	172,378	97,020
Sabers	68,763	5,000	73,703	41,006	11,006
Ball cartridges, caliber .30, models of 1906 and 1898	196,000,000	45,000,000	241,000,000	196,000,000	.....
Pistol and revolver cartridges	31,196,227	11,500,000	42,696,227	31,942,600	.....
Personal equipments (sets)	476,161	27,839	504,000	504,000	.....
Horse equipments (sets)	55,122	3,200	58,322	94,349	39,227
Machine guns	1,236	66	1,302	1,033	331
Field batteries complete, 4 guns each	169	46	215	325	110
Ammunition trains	.....	3	3	63	60
Harness, wheel (sets)	2,808	527	3,335	7,500	4,165
Harness, lead (sets)	5,412	1,071	6,483	16,000	9,517
Ammunition for Field Artillery, rounds	177,800	402,200	580,000	1,137,000	557,000

I am anxious to know how this table compares with the plan prepared by the General Staff, to which reference has often been made in the hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs. I ask this information as to following items only: Cartridges, field batteries, Field Artillery ammunition.

Please inform me as to whether the plan of the General Staff was worked out before or after the breaking out of the European war.

If I can not have the whole of this information, I should like, at least, to have a part of it.

Very truly, yours, A. P. GARDNER.

—

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 16, 1915.

The honorable THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I invite your attention to an article by Hon. JAMES HAY which appeared on January 10, 1915, in sundry newspapers.

In the course of this article Mr. HAY presents a table showing the state of preparation of the United States Army for entering upon a war. The fourth column of this table is headed "Total in project." It purports to give figures showing the amount of munitions of war requisite for the various items in the equipment of a field army of about 460,000 men and 50,000 Coast Artillery troops.

In find in column No. 4 that a supply of rifle cartridges to the extent of 196,000,000 is stated to be the total amount of rifle ammunition required in the project. Furthermore, in the same column I find that the ammunition required for Field Artillery is stated to be 1,137,000 rounds.

Would you be kind enough to answer the following questions?

1. Whose is this project, and when was it prepared?

2. Does the figure given as to rifle ammunition correspond with the estimates of the General Staff contained in the "Tables of organization" submitted February 25, 1914?

3. According to the "Tables of organization" above cited, what number of rifles would be required for a field army of 460,000 men and 50,000 Coast Artillery troops, and how much ammunition per rifle ought we to have?

4. Does the figure for ammunition for Field Artillery given above correspond with the figure given in the report of the so-called "Greble board" in 1911, and does it correspond to the figures in "Tables of organization" above cited?

If not, please state what the difference is.

Very respectfully, A. P. GARDNER.

—

SECRETARY GARRISON TO CONGRESSMAN GARDNER.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 21, 1915.

Hon. A. P. GARDNER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: In a letter of even date you ask me whether "a table published in a newspaper article by Hon. JAMES HAY, on Sunday, January 10, and subsequently published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD," was furnished by the War Department and is official. In answer thereto I beg to advise you that the said table was not furnished by the War Department and is not official.

I have been informed by the Chief of Ordnance that Mr. HAY requested him to furnish him with some information; that he came to me and secured my consent to his furnishing Mr. HAY with certain information, and he did so. The information gathered by Gen. Crozier and furnished Mr. HAY was not submitted to me, and I did not, therefore, officially pass thereon; nor did anyone else in authority in the department outside of the Chief of Ordnance.

Sincerely, yours,

LINDLEY M. GARRISON,
Secretary of War.

—

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January —, 1915.

Hon. AUGUSTUS P. GARDNER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. GARDNER: In answer to the inquiries in your letters of the 11th, 12th, and 16th instant, you are informed:

Herewith is a copy of a list of supplies of all kinds necessary to place in the field a division at full war strength and maintain it in the field for one year, worked out by the General Staff shortly before January 6, 1911. On January 14, 1911, the secretary of the General Staff furnished chiefs of bureau copies of these recommendations that pertained to their respective departments, stating:

"The War College Division of the General Staff has prepared the following list of supplies—of each supply department—necessary to place in the field a division at full war strength and to maintain it in the field one year.

"The Chief of Staff desires you to revise this list with a view to showing the articles for one division which, in your opinion, should be stored in depots for distribution to the national forces on mobilization."

The Report on the Organization of the Land Forces of the United States, page 62, states:

"* * * It is estimated that at the outbreak of war with a first-class power we should be capable of mobilizing at once in the United States an effective force of 460,000 mobile troops and 42,000 Coast Artillery; * * *."

On August 10, 1912, the Secretary of War indorsed the Report on the Organization of the Land Forces of the United States as follows:

"The accompanying report of the General Staff on 'The Organization of the Land Forces of the United States' contains the broad outlines of a comprehensive military policy. The General Staff has been directed to proceed with a detailed study of the plan with a view of securing specific recommendations for the executive and legislative action necessary to carry the policy into effect. During the progress of this work comments and suggestions with the view of perfecting the policy are invited, and for this purpose the report is published for the consideration of the Army, the National Guard, and all others who are interested in the development of a sound military policy for the Nation."

From the attached list of supplies for one division—about 20,000 men—and the above-mentioned estimate in the published report on the organization of the land forces for 460,000 mobile troops—about 23 divisions—it is calculated that approximately twenty-three times the quantity of supplies given in the attached list for one division would be needed to put 460,000 mobile troops in the field.

On February 20, 1911, a board of officers, of which Lieut. Col. Edwin St. J. Greble, General Staff, was president, and Capt. Fox Conner, General Staff, was recorder, was appointed by order of the Secretary of war "to consider questions concerning the types of field guns and ammunition supply therefor." This board is referred to as the Greble Board. In the report of this board appear the following:

By the secretary of the General Staff, June 23, 1911:

"* * * The Secretary of War, having approved the accompanying report of the board of officers convened in Washington to consider questions concerning the types of field guns and ammunition supply therefor, directs that policy outlined in this report be adopted by the General Staff."

By the Acting Chief of Staff, July 14, 1911:

"The Secretary of War directs that the accompanying report of the board of officers on types of field guns and ammunition supply therefor be referred to the Chief of Ordnance, the Quartermaster General, and the Chief Signal Officer for notation, and then filed in The Adjutant General's Office."

The report of the Greble Board contains the following:

"On February 4, 1911, the Chief of Staff approved a memorandum to the effect that in case of war with a first-class power it would be necessary for the United States to raise at once a mobile force of approximately 450,000 men within the continental limits of the United States. * * * Recommended that the number of guns below be procured in time of peace; * * * total batteries, 323; * * * total guns, 1,292 * * *."

The total number of rounds of ammunition for these guns which, in different parts of the report, it is stated should be provided in peace is 1,713,240, and it is further stated in the report: "It is to be noted that the ammunition here provided for is simply that which should be on hand at the outbreak of war and is in no sense a complete supply for war."

The following is contained in the order publishing Tables of Organization, February 25, 1914:

"The following Tables of Organization, prepared by the General Staff of the Army, are approved and published for the information and government of the Regular Army and the Organized Militia of the United States. * * *"

It is calculated from table 2, pages 19 and 21; table 2–B, page 23; and tables 3–A, B, pages 31–39, inclusive, Tables of Organization, that about 460,000 mobile troops, organized on the basis outlined on page 63—report on the organization of the land forces—would need to begin war about 335,139 rifles, 166,814 pistols, and 820 machine guns. The ammunition required by this force to begin war, calculated on the basis of table 2, page 7, Tables of Organization, would be 513,430,640 rounds of rifle ball cartridges, and 37,597,952 rounds of pistol ball cartridges.

If 50,000 Coast Artillery troops were equipped as Infantry, with rifles and pistols and ammunition therefor, which is not provided for in Tables of Organization, they would, on the same basis of calculation, require about 47,649 rifles, 5,348 pistols, 64,802,640 rounds rifle ball cartridges, 1,347,696 rounds pistol ball cartridges.

According to table 2, page 7, Tables of Organization, at the beginning of war each rifle used by the Infantry requires 1,360 rounds of rifle ball cartridges, each rifle used by the Cavalry 1,080 rounds of rifle ball cartridges, each rifle used by Engineers 320 rounds, and each machine guns 85,600 rounds. According to this table, the ammunition for each class of troops is distributed as follows: One-fourth with organizations, one-fourth at or near advance depots, one-half at or near the base. According to table 2–B, page 7, Tables of Organization, Field Artillery ammunition is similarly distributed. The Tables of Organization are consistent with the recommendations of the Greble Board.

Arms and ammunition reported on hand Jan. 1, 1915.

Rifles, caliber .30, model 1898	349,098
Rifles, caliber .30, model 1903	703,976
United States magazine carbines, model 1898	34,374
Automatic pistols, caliber .45, model 1911	84,127
Revolvers, caliber .38	57,072
Revolvers, caliber .45	21,707
	Rounds.
Rifle ball cartridges, caliber .30, model 1906	208,077,396
Rifle ball cartridges, caliber .30, model 1898	36,112,813
Pistol ball cartridges, caliber .45	10,316,638
Revolver ball cartridges, caliber .38	8,918,192
Revolver ball cartridges, caliber .45	3,799,679

Field batteries:

20 batteries of 2.95-inch mountain guns (obsolescent).
1 battery of 3-inch mountain guns.
126 batteries of 3-inch guns.
2 batteries of 3.8-inch field guns.
2 batteries of 3.8-inch field howitzers.
9½ batteries of 4.7-inch field howitzers.
9½ batteries of 4.7-inch field guns.
8 batteries of 6-inch field howitzers.

Field artillery ammunition:

2.95-inch mountain gun (obsolescent), 51,800 rounds.
3-inch mountain howitzer, 3,798 rounds.
3-inch field gun, 170,431 rounds.
3.8-inch field gun, 1,582 rounds.
3.8-inch field howitzer, 10,240 rounds.
4.7-inch field gun, 10,563 rounds.
4.7-inch field howitzer, 15,075 rounds.
6-inch field howitzer, 12,408 rounds.

In the table of figures contained in the newspaper article to which you refer the column headed "Total in project" contains figures some of which are identical with those recommended by official boards. Others are those estimated by the Chief of Ordnance. The estimate for 196,000,000 ball cartridges, caliber .30, was made by the Chief of Ordnance. I understand that all the figures in the table referred to were transmitted by the Chief of Ordnance on October 21 last, in response to a request made direct to him.

The figures in this table do not correspond with those stated above. The difference between the 1,713,240 rounds of Field Artillery ammunition called for by the Greble Board and the 1,137,000 rounds appearing in the newspaper article you refer to is stated by the Chief of Ordnance to be a clerical error.

There are on hand a total of 5,071 mine cases. The total number of mines that can be planted with material now on hand is 3,725; the principal deficiencies in material which prevents the planting of the remaining mine cases is the shortage in cable.

Except for a small amount of target-practice ammunition, approximately sufficient for one year's expenditure by the regular service, there is no ammunition for our seacoast defenses besides the amount mentioned on page 6 of the Report of the Chief of Staff, 1914. The figures of the Chief of Staff refer exclusively to reserve ammunition. The target-practice ammunition referred to is not suitable for war purposes except in the preliminary training of troops.

In answer to your inquiry as to whether it would be necessary to abandon the Crozier disappearing gun carriage in case it were desired to remount the 12-inch gun so as to secure a range of 20,000 yards, the Chief of Ordnance states:

"In reference to the extreme ranges of 12-inch gun, firings made with the lighter weight projectile recently adopted indicate that a maximum range of 19,500 yards can be secured with the older model of 12-inch gun mounted on barbette carriages, and on those disappearing carriages, after contemplated alterations, for which an angle of depression below 5° is not required by the conditions of the site. For the latest type of 12-inch guns, of which there are 11 on hand or mounted in fortifications, a maximum range of approximately 22,000 yards can be secured under similar conditions of mounting."

The findings of the board appointed December 16, 1914, for the purpose of considering the question of coast defenses and their armament, are confidential in their nature. The copy requested is, therefore, not inclosed.

Very sincerely,

LINDLEY M. GARRISON,
Secretary of War.

List of supplies of all kinds necessary to place in the field a division at full war strength and maintain it in the field for one year, worked out by the General Staff shortly before January 6, 1911:

Articles.	Number necessary to place division in the field.	Per cent to be added to keep division in field for one year.	Remarks.
QUARTERMASTER'S DEPARTMENT.
Ambulances, complete	48	10	Includes supplies except the medical.
Anvils	2	.....
Aparejos	50	10
Axes, with helves	1,028	25
Bags, barrack	4,532	100
Basins, canvas	488	100
Batons	9	10
Bedding roll, officers	750	100
Belts, color, olive drab	20	50
Blankets, woolen, light weight	19,854	100
Blinds for pack mules	10	10
Boilers, G. I., with lid	96	50
Bolts, king	48	100
Bolts and nuts, ambulance, sets	48	300
Bolts and nuts, field wagon, sets.	717	300
Brassards	978	300
Breeches, service, mounted	4,764	300
Breeches, service, foot	14,511	300
Bridles, complete	80	40
Brooms, corn, for use in mobilization camps	1,078	300
Brooms, stable, for permanent camp	324	200
Brushes, horse	767	40
Brushes, scrub, for use in mobilization camps	767	300
Buckets, canvas	488	100
Buckets, G. I.	980	100
Bugles and slings	249	40
Cans, garbage, for use in permanent camp	1,168	100
Caps, canvas, blanket lined	19,859	10
Cases, color or standard	61	100
Cases, farriers'	65	10
Chairs, folding	750	25
Chevrons, overcoat, pairs	4,772	100
Chevrons for service uniform	4,772	200
Clothing roll, officers	750	20
Coats, service	19,283	100
Colors, camp, with staff	139	50
Colors or standards, silk, with staff, National and regimental sets	13	20
Colors, National, service, with staff	35	20
Cords, hat, for enlisted men	18,533	200
Cots	19,854	20
Covers, mule, blanket lined, for permanent camp	3,700	10
Curry-combs	767	40
Desks, field	211	10	But twice cubical space for 1 year's supply stationery contained therein.
Doubletrees, extra	701	100
Drawers	57,849	200
Flags, red, bunting, and staff	192	50
Flags, Red Cross, with 50-foot halliards.	4	50
Flags, post, with halliards	5	50
Flags, storm, with 50-foot halliards.	21	50
Forge, field, complete, Quartermaster Department.	2	10
Forks, stable, for use in mobilization camp.	368	25
Gauntlets, leather, pairs	4,764	300
Globes, lantern	1,154	400
Gloves, white, wool	19,854	100
QUARTERMASTER'S DEPARTMENT—continued.
Grain, for horses and mules, pounds.	88,162	.....	Amount shown is 1 day's allowance.
Grates, fire, iron	96	25
Grease, axle, cases	1,530	600
Guidons, ambulance, on lance staff.	84	50
Guidons, service, and staff	30	100
Guidons, silk, and staff	30	50
Grindstones and fixtures, for permanent camp.	14	10
Halters, with straps	3,701	50
Hames, extra	1,502	100
Handcuffs	92	10
Harness, wheel and lead, sets, double, ambulance, 779 each.	1,558	20
Hatchets, with helves, for ambulance.	48	50
Hatchets, with helves, for use in permanent camp.	1,880	25
Hats, service	19,283	150
Hay, for public animals, pounds.	11,579	.....	Amount shown is 1 day's supply.
Helves, ax	166	200
Horses, draft	1,400	100
Horses, riding	3,171	100
Incinerators, seats required, sink equipment, for use in permanent camp	1,590	10
Instruments, band, sets	12	10
Jacks, wagon	36	10
Kettles, camp	8	10
Kit bags, surplus	1,411	10
Lampblack, permanent camp	52	200
Lamps, ambulance	96	20
Lanterns, combination	1,493	50
Lanterns, green and white, ambulance	96	20
Lanterns, for field wagon	703	20
Lanterns, red, for ammunition wagons	192	25
Leggings, canvas	15,093	200
Leggings, russet leather	4,190	200
Lime, sink equipment, for permanent camp, barrels	21⅛	600
Links, open	2,157	400
Lumber, 12" x 1" x 18' b. m., for permanent camp, feet	27,000	100
Marking pots and brushes, permanent camp	52	20
Marking stamps, for permanent camp	201	10
Mosquito bars, for permanent camp	19,858	100
Mosquito head nets	19,858	100
Mules, pack, riding and draft	3,700	100
Nails, 6d, for permanent camp, pounds	400	100
Nails, 10d, for permanent camp, pounds	1,320	100
Nails, horseshoe, pounds	6,659	1,000
Nuts, axle, extra, for field wagons.	1,406	100
Nuts, axle, extra, for ambulance.	96	100
Ordorless excavators, sink equipment, for use in permanent camp.	13	10
Oil, mineral, gallons per day, on field service and permanent camp.	144 1/12	.....	Allowance for 1 day.
Oil, neatsfoot, gallons	389½	1,200
Ornaments, collar, sets	18,533	300
Overcoats	19,283	5
Overshoes, arctic	19,283	5
Pads, saddle	80	40
Pannier, veterinary	37	40
Pans, mess	8	50
Paulins, including permanent camp.	38	20
Pickaxes	735	50
Poles, extra, ambulance and field wagon.	729	200
Ponchos	15,012	25
Pouches, music, olive drab	336	20
Pump and tank, excreta, for use in camp.	13	10
Rakes, steel for permanent camp.	715	50
Reach, extra, field wagon	703	100
Rope, one-half inch, in lengths of 150 feet.	703	150
Saddles, riding, complete, quartermaster.	80	10
Scoops, sink equipment, permanent camp.	229	10
Shirts, olive drab	19,283	200
Shirts, under	57,849	150
Shoes, horse	25,426	1,000
Shoes, mule	29,200	1,000
Shoes, russet leather	38,566	200
Shovels, long handle	29	100

Articles.	Number necessary to place division in the field.	Per cent to be added to keep division in field for one year.	Remarks.
QUARTERMASTER'S DEPARTMENT—continued.
Singletrees, extra	1,402	100
Slickers	4,834	20
Slings, color olive drab	20	50
Soap, harness, pounds	3,116	500
Spades	968	100
Sponges	719	200
Sterilizer, Forbs	187	200
Stockings	77,132	200
Stoves, tent	3,475	10
Stovepipe, lengths	24,325	25
Straps, hame, extra	2,253	200
Straw for animals, pounds	27,572	.....	One day's supply.
Strings, hame, extra	2,109	200
Tag, identification	19,854	25
Tacks, water	96	10
Tape for identification tags, lengths.	19,854	300
Tape, measuring, steel	36	10
Tents, common, with poles and pins, for use in permanent camp.	173	100
Tents, storage, with poles and pins, for permanent camp.	2,589	100
Tents. conical wall, complete, with poles and pins, for permanent camp.	2,589	100
Tents, hospital, with poles and pins, complete.	165	100	Pins, 200.
Tents, hospital, with poles and pins, complete, for permanent camp.	199	100	Pins, 300.
Tents, shelter halves, with poles and pins, complete.	20,604	200
Tents, wall, complete, with poles, complete.	417	100	Pins, 200.
Tents, wall, complete, with poles and pins, for permanent camp.	748	100
Tools, blacksmiths' and farriers', sets.	37	10	For contents, see paragraph 927, Manual Quartermaster's Department, 1904.
Tools, saddlers', sets, Quartermaster's Department.	37	10	For contents, see paragraph 529, Manual Quartermaster's Department, 1904.
Tools, wheelwrights', and carpenters', sets.	27	10	For contents, see paragraph 728, Manual Quartermaster's Department.
Troughs for sink equipment, permanent camp.	496	10
Trumpets, with trumpet cords and tassels.	60	40
Twine, balls	753	600
Typewriting machines	52	10
Veterinary supplies, Quartermaster's Department.	[1] 8,271	300	A sufficient supply of medicines to last the number of animals noted for 3 months, and the necessary instruments, dressings, etc.
Wagons, field, complete	701	20
Wagons, spring	4	20
Whips, complete	767	100
Whistles, with chain	1,587	20
Wicks, lantern	490	600
Wicks, lantern, for permanent camp.	1,003	600
Wood, cords, for one day camp.	116.30	.....	1 day's supply.
Wrenches, wagon	705	20
Wrenches, monkey	48	25
SUBSISTENCE DEPARTMENT.
Blocks, meat, permanent camp.	17	10
Brushes, tooth	19,854	100
Chests, commissary, and their equipment of tools, etc.	17	10
Combs, hair	19,859	100
Desks, field	17	10	But twice cubical space for 1 year's supply stationery contained therein.
Housewives	7,161	10
Kits, war, blank	9	10
Ranges, field, No. 1	185	25
Ranges, field, No. 2	70	50
Rations	19,854	.....	For 1 day.
Safes, field	17	10
Scales, platform, folding	17	10
Soap, toilet.....cakes	19,854	1,200
Tobacco, chewing....pounds	312.39	.....	1 day's supply.
Tobacco, smoking.....do	1,230.87	.....	Do.
Towels	19,854	600
Wagons, bakery, complete	14	20
ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.
Ammunition, revolver, caliber .45, rounds.	347,960	200
Ammunition, rifle, caliber .30, rounds.	5,386,950	400
Axes, hand, with carrier	678	25
Bags, nose	4,571	100
Bags, saddle.....pairs	3,859	40
Battery wagons for 3-inch Field Artillery, with spare parts, accessories and tools.	12	.....	Pages 124, 128, 129, and 132, Handbook 3-inch Field Artillery material, 1908.
Bayonets	12,171	25
Belts, cartridge, rifle, mounted, caliber .30.	2,029	50
Belts and fasteners, revolver, cartridge, caliber .45.	3,070	50
Belts, cartridge, rifle, caliber .30.	12,148	50
Belts, rifle cartridge, caliber .30, with fasteners and loop for saber attachment.	1,042	50
Belts, waist	877	20
Blankets, saddle	4,469	40
Bolos and scabbards	1,715	50
Boxes, bacon	129	20
Boxes, condiment	129	20
Bridles, complete	3,069	40
Bridles, watering	3,322	40
Brushes, horse	3,769	40
Caissons, field, 3-inch, complete, including spare parts and accessories.	144	.....	Pages 124, 127, and 128, Handbook, 3-inch Field Artillery material, 1908.
Cans, bacon	14,508	200
Cans, condiment	14,508	200
Cans, meat	19,854	150
Canteens	19,283	100
Canteen covers, Infantry	13,907	100
Canteen covers, Infantry, mounted.	601	100
Carriers, pack	13,868	40
Carts, reel, complete	6	.....
Chests, artificers, complete	129	10
Cleaning and preserving material, sets, Infantry, Cavalry, etc.	26	100	Page 630, Ordnance Supply Manual, 1904.
Cleaning and preserving material sets, Artillery.	12	100	Page 134, Handbook, 3-inch Field Artillery Material, 1908.
Cloths, saddle, service	420	20
Covers, horse, for permanent camp.	4,571	10
Cups, tin	19,854	150
Currycombs	3,769	40
Die, steel, for stamping identification tags.	181	10
Dispatch cases	149	10
Forges, portable, complete, Ordnance Department.	22	10
Forks	19,854	150
Guns, 3-inch field, and carriage, including spare parts and accessories.	48	.....	Pp. 124 to 126, Handbook 3-inch Field Artillery Manual, 1908.
Gun slings	13,571	50
Halters with straps	4,570	50
Harness, Artillery, lead, sets, double, with spare parts.	458	25
Harness, Artillery, wheel, sets, double, with spare parts.	242	25
Haversacks	15,431	150
Holsters, revolver, caliber .45	6,317	40
Knapsacks, Artillery	2,252	10
Knives	19,854	150
Knife and scabbard, Hospital Corps.	877	10
Knots, saber	1,795	40
Lanyards, revolver	2,063	25
Lariats	2,412	40
Limber, forge, 3-inch, Field Artillery, with spare parts, accessories, and tools.	12	.....	For contents and articles, see pp. 124, 128, and 133, Handbook 3-inch Field Artillery Material, 1908.
Limber, store wagon, for 3-inch Field Artillery, with spare parts, accessories, and miscellaneous equipment.	12	.....	See pp. 124, 128, 129, 130, and 131, Handbook 3-inch Field Artillery Material, 1908.
Limbers, for 3-inch field gun and caisson, with spare parts and accessories.	192	.....	See pp. 124 and 127, Handbook 3-inch Field Artillery Material, 1908.
Links	2,828	40
Machine guns, Maxim automatic, with tripod.	60	40
Outfit, marking	129	10
Outfit, stencil	129	10
Pack outfits, machine gun, complete, sets.	10	40
Pick mattock, intrenching, with carriers.	1,326	25
Pins, picket	2,412	40
Plotters, Field Artillery	6	20
Pouch, for first aid packet	19,283	25
Range finder, Weldon, and 60-foot tape	134	10

[1] Animals.

Articles.	Number necessary to place division in the field.	Per cent to be added to keep division in field for one year.	Remarks.
ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT—continued.
Revolvers, caliber .45	6,317	50
Rifles, caliber .30	13,571	50
Rod, cleaning, and case	1,640	40
Sabers and scabbards, enlisted men	1,063	40
Sabers and scabbards, officers	732	20
Saddles, complete, Ordnance	3,069	40
Saddlers' material, sets, Artillery	12	100	Page 135, Handbook Field Artillery Material, 1908.
Saddlers' material, sets, Infantry, Cavalry, etc.	26	100	Page 631, Ordnance Supply Manual, 1904.
Scabbards, bayonet	12,171	40
Scabbards, rifle	1,545	25
Shell, steel, rds., 3-inch Field Artillery	5,568	400
Shovels, intrenching, with carriers	3,978	25
Shrapnel, rds., 3-inch	16,604	400
Spoons	19,854	150
Spurs, with straps, pairs, enlisted men	3,451	100
Spurs, with straps, pairs, officers	420	100
Stirrup, with socket for guidon	50	10
Store wagon for 3-inch Field Artillery, with spare parts, accessories, and miscellaneous equipment	12	.....	See pages 124, 128, 129, 130, and 131, Handbook 3-inch Field Artillery Material, 1908.
Straps, canteen, mounted	3,249	200
Straps, canteen, haversack	3,086	50
Straps, lariat	1,795	40
Straps, saber	3,590	100
Surcingles	4,469	40
Suspenders, rifle cartridge, belt, pairs	1,218	100
Tape, measuring, steel	108	10
Tool kit, complete, for repair caliber .30 rifle	15	10	For contents, see G. O. 89, War Department, 1906.
Tools, saddlers, sets, Ordnance Department	.....	.....	For contents, see page 630, Ordnance Supply Manual, 1904.
Wads, 3-inch field artillery	3,600	100
Wagons, reel cart	6	10
Wire cutters, intrenching, with carrier	1,674	20
ENGINEER CORPS.
Blinds for pack mules	3	10
Compasses, watch	750	20
Equipment, Engineer company, engineer supplies, sets	3	.....	See G. O. 13, Engineer Corps, 1909. About twice the bulk will be required for one year's supply.
Reconnaissance instruments, sets	156	(1)	Paper, etc., 200 per cent; instruments, 20 per cent. See G. O. 73, War Department, 1907, and G. O. 113, War Department, 1906, for contents of set.
Saddles, pack, complete, Engineer	18	20
Wagons, map	1	10
Wagons, tool	9	10
SIGNAL CORPS.
Blanks, field message, blocks	682	60
Envelopes, field message	13,640	600
Equipment, Battery Field Artillery, for fire control, sets	12	20	See G. O. 150, War Department, 1910.
Equipment, battalion, Field Artillery, for fire control sets	4	20	See G. O. 150, War Department, 1910.
Equipment, regimental, Field Artillery, for fire control, sets	2	20	See G. O. 150, War Department, 1910.
Glasses, field	903	10
Kits, flag, 2 feet	260	20
Signal Corps property, equipment for 1 battalion of 2 companies	.....	.....	See pages 34 and 32, Field Service Regulations, and Circular 6, 1910, Office Chief Signal Officer.
Wagons, instrument	2	10
Wagons, wire cart	8	10
MEDICAL DEPARTMENT.
Ambulance companies, medical supplies of	4	(1)	See par. 594, Tables 1 and 2, sub. pars. (a), Manual Medical Department, 1906. Expendable articles, printed in Roman letters, 300 per cent; unexpendable articles, printed in italics, 20 per cent.
Blinds for pack mules	16	10
Dressings, surgical, for ambulance, boxes of	48	1,200
Field hospitals	4	(1)	For capacity of chests carrying medicines for 1 field hospital see par. 630, Medical Manual, 1906. Pars. 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, and 589 in column 1 show property and stores other than medicines. Those in italics should be increased 20 per cent, those in Roman letters 1,200 per cent for 1 year. All above are packed on 8 field wagons. The amount should be multiplied by 4 for the 4 field hospitals packed on 32 field wagons.
Litters, hand, with slings	147	25
Litters, with slings, for ambulances	192	25	Carried in ambulance.
Packets, first aid	19,854	150
Regimental infirmary, medical supplies and property, sets	12	(1)	For medical supplies, etc., see par. 593, Manual Medical Department, 1906; under headings (a) and (b) find paragraphs giving contents of chests. Articles in italics 20 per cent, in roman letters 300 per cent.
Reserve, medical	1	(1)	For medical property and supplies see par. 596, Manual Medical Department, 1906. For articles in roman letters 1,200 per cent, for those in italics 20 per cent.
Saddles, pack, complete, medical	28	20
Stores, hospital, for ambulance, boxes of	48	1,200	Par. 598, Manual Medical Department, 1906.
Travois	16	20

[1] See Remarks.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chariman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 17, noes 55.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GUERNSEY. Mr. Chairman, I am decidedly in favor at this time of strengthening the Army and Navy and in favor of the amendments to that end such as have been offered to the Army bill now being considered. I can scarcely understand how at this time any man on the Atlantic seaboard should oppose strengthening these branches of the Government, particularly the Members from New England.

It is our duty to pass legislation now that will strengthen the Navy, strengthen the coast defenses, and strengthen the Army.

It takes time to carry out such legislation, so we should act at once. There is no necessity of becoming alarmed; but the suddenness with which war came in Europe last August should be a warning. Let us be prepared to defend ourselves if the occasion arises.

And as a Member from the State of Maine, I fear that the administration's policy in regard to Government-owned ships may lead us into difficulties with England, with whom we may have to deal on account of it before the close of this European war, as the proposed shipping legislation and our policy in purchasing foreign ships may cause England to believe she is being embarrassed in her struggle for existence. If England turns her attention toward us, I want the Army and the Navy and the coast defenses in the East strong enough to make her stop and think twice, as her plan might be to seize the harbor and the city of Portland in order to secure control of the terminus of the Canadian Grand Trunk Railway and the control of that line to Canada, an act that would set Maine off into Canada overnight, make New England the seat of war, and life and property there worth no more than it is to-day in Belgium.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Small-arms target practice: For manufacture of ammunition, targets, and other accessories for small-arms and machine-gun target practice and instruction; marksmen's medals, prize arms, and insignia for all arms of the service; and ammunition, targets, target materials, and other accessories may be issued for small-arms target practice and instruction at the educational institutions and State soldiers' and sailors' orphans' homes to which issues of small arms are lawfully made, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, provided the total value of the stores so issued to the educational institutions and homes does not exceed $30,000, $800,000.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end of line 22, page 49, the following:

"Provided, That no more than $30,000 of this appropriation may be used for the purchase of articles not manufactured by the Government and necessary for small-arms target practice."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, that amount is made up of 12,000,000 gallery-practice cartridges, at $1.60 per thousand, $19,200; 15,000 score books, various models, at 20 cents each, $3,000; Aiken targets, target spotters, recording rifle rod outfits, sand glasses, time-interval recorders, and so forth, $2,800; unforeseen expenditures, $5,000.

Under the provisions of the bill as it is they could not buy anything under this appropriation with this authority that I now propose.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Very much of the ammunition for which provision is herein made is produced at the Frankford Arsenal in Philadelphia, and at the present time that arsenal is very much cramped for room. An effort is being made to obtain additional equipment and also to secure some ground adjacent to the present property to better conduct the great and economical work now being done at the arsenal, to increase the safety of the employees, and to protect the property of the Government.

In compliance with what appears to be the urgent need of the arsenal at this time, the Secretary of War, I am informed, has recommended to Congress the advisibility of making appropriations, as follows:

One tin shop	$72,000
Extension of the lumber shed	22,500
Extension of the double-action press shop building	6,000
Improving the facilities of the boiler plant	15,000
Purchase of additional land	130,000

As to those improvements which, in view of present and possible future demands upon the arsenal, are badly needed, I desire to quote some timely suggestions made by a joint committee of trade bodies, citizens, and workmen who have taken a public-spirited interest in the arsenal.

As to the tin shop, this committee says:

It is one of the oldest buildings at the arsenal and it has been added to from time to time so that it is practically a brick shanty. This tin shop is really a sheet-metal shop, being engaged largely in the manufacture of sheet-metal boxes for ammunition, and we have been informed that should the manufacture of small arms ammunition be resumed at the full capacity of the plant, the tin shop is inadequate to meet the situation. We are also informed that the question came up some time ago of putting in additional machinery to manufacture metal boxes for artillery ammunition and the project had to be given up by reason of lack of space. The building is very low, the hangers supporting the shafting not being more than 10 feet from the floor. We have noticed material stored on the outside, due to lack of room, and we have noticed on the north side that a small addition had been put to the building, made of frame with a roofing of canvas, to give additional room for property under manufacture. The tinning plant where all of these boxes are required to be tinned, is a small frame building, very much worn out and very discredible to the arsenal.

As to the items for the lumber shed, the double-action press shop, and the boiler shop the joint committee says:

The extension to the lumber shed is needed to relieve the congestion in the present shrapnel shop, and also in the carpenter shop. It was found necessary in order to meet the appropriations made by Congress last year, to largely increase the quantity of machinery in the present buildings, with the result that they are so congested that the working conditions for employees are not what they should be, and there is not adequate space for inspection of the finished articles. The congestion would be greatly relieved by this extension of the lumber shed, if not entirely removed.

The extension of the double-action press shop building is also necessary, for the reason that the space in that building at the present time is inadequate for the storage of the cartridge metal required in the manufacture of small arms ammunition. It has been necessary to store boxes of cartridge metal on the platform of the building. It is well known that corrosion of the brass will take place under such conditions, which makes manufacturing particularly difficult as it increases the wear on the various punches and dies used in drawing the metal.

The object of improving the facilities of the boiler plant is to get rid of the smoke nuisance of which daily complaints are now made in the newspapers, and to enable the arsenal to burn a more volatile and cheaper grade of coal. It has been computed that after allowing for depreciation and interest on the investment, the expenditure would net the Government about 10 per cent annually, and this is based solely on the guaranty of one manufacture of stokers, who will undertake to install these facilities with such a guaranty.

Strong reasons are also submitted by the citizens' joint committee in support of the acquisition of additional land to afford ample scope for the operations of the arsenal:

1. To furnish space along the Delaware River on which to erect magazines for the storage of powders and explosives, which magazines are now within about 50 yards of the nearest shop building in which American citizens are obliged to work. The United States Government should be the first and leading employer in the United States in the matter of providing for the safety of its employees.

2. The additional land will provide for the removal of the present dry houses wherein detonators and primers are dried. In May of 1913 one of these dry houses blew up, killing a man who was inside and destroying windows in the adjacent shop buildings. These dry houses would be located on this land, so that they would no longer be an element of danger.

3. The procurement of this land will enable the Government to erect storehouses there for the storage of artillery ammunition, which would save the Government $15,000 to $20,000 annually on the transportation to Picatinny Arsenal, near Dover, N. J., where such ammunition is now stored after manufacture at this arsenal.

4. The purchase of the land will give the arsenal a water front on the Delaware River and greatly improve its shipping facilities. The purchase of the land will make the Frankford Arsenal a better shipping point than probably any other arsenal, as shipments from it can more economically and expeditiously reach the Pacific coast, the Hawaiian Islands, and the Philippines by reason of the opening of the Panama Canal than can shipments from any other distributing point. It also has the similar advantage if it should obtain this water front of cheaply distributing ammunition along the entire seacoast of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

Manufacture of arms: For manufacturing, repairing, and issuing arms at the national armories: Provided, That existing written agreements involving the purchase of patented articles patents for which have not expired may be carried out, $250,000.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 50, line 2, after the words "carried out." strike out "$250,000" and insert "$1,700,000."

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, this is not the amount that I think we ought to appropriate. I think it ought to be $7,250,000, so that we could put 500,000 rifles in our reserve every year. We have only 480,000 arms of the present pattern in reserve, and there are 200,000 more in the hands of certain schools or of the Army or of the National Guard. We have 343,000 Krags, I shall be told, and that is true, but those Krags do not carry the same ammunition as the other guns, and they are therefore not the best rifles to put in the hands of an army in the field.

Up to the year 1909, however, Mr. Chairman—and I address the chairman of the committee especially on this—for 10 years we appropriated this sum of $1,700,000, which put into our arsenals, at the price then prevailing, 100,000 rifles a year, and which would now put in a few more, for they cost $15 instead of $17. The policy now adopted of reducing that amount to $250,000 will only give, according to Gen. Crozier, 12,000 new rifles and 1,000 pistols. The rifles that are thus given are not enough to take care of the ordinary wearing out of the guns in the Army and in the militia; and I also submit that the policy of putting at least 100,000 a year into our reserve is not only according to precedent but what ought to be conceded to me by the committee. I submit that it is fair. I know that I can carry nothing here in this Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union without the leave of the Committee on Military Affairs. I know that they have the interests of the country at heart; but why should we have appropriated up to 1909, when there was nothing to threaten us, $1,700,000 a year and then refuse to appropriate that sum now, to put only 100,000 rifles in the armories of this country each year? It can do no harm, and, if they are needed, it can do much good. And I appeal to the chairman of the committee that this amendment, at least, should pass, and we should to that extent have assurance that we should not be put in the awful position of a nation of the first class calling upon volunteers to defend it and being unable to put rifles in their hands—a position that England, at least, has been in for the last five months. I ask that this additional appropriation be made in the bill.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I just want to say a word. I appreciate the interest of my friend from New Jersey, with whom I served for many years on the Committee on Military Affairs, as to this item, but this was what was asked for by the War Department. We have not cut it down at all. And the fact that we appropriated $1,700,000 for so many years has resulted in this reserve and enables us now to appropriate only $250,000.

Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman grant me a minute out of his time? The gentleman will remember that in 1899, by action of the committee, without request, we increased the appropriation from $400,000 to $800,000. It was done by the committee. This should be done by the House. It is the House that ought to judge of the necessities of the Nation in such a case. And all I ask of the chairman of the committee is, not that he will accede, but I ask him to say that he is willing to leave it to the judgment of the House.

Mr. HAY. I have to leave everything to the judgment of the House. I give my own judgment about it. I think when we give them all they ask for, that is all we ought to do.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, in the amendment which the gentleman from New Jersey has offered I have an interest somewhat different, I must admit, from the country at large and from the other Members of the House, because these rifles are made in the city where I live.

Therefore I wish to suggest one argument which has not been touched upon. It is very important and essential that there should be always kept on hand in the Government factory a trained and steady and, as far as possible, permanent force of skilled artisans, who in time of war can suddenly speed up and make the arms which will then be necessary, because, as I understand the theory upon which the gentleman from Virginia opposes any increase, is that upon the premonition of war we should be able, as to ammunition and all kinds of armaments, to increase very largely the production, and therefore our armies would be equipped in time.

Now, of course, to accomplish that it is necessary that there should be a large nucleus of men competent to do the work. The manufacture of rifles requires a peculiar skill on the part of the mechanics. It can not be done by labor picked up momentarily. It requires long training, and there has been collected at Springfield a large force of men who are wonderfully equipped for that particular work, and it would be a shame to scatter and lose them.

I remember when I first came to Congress, 20 years ago, my predecessor gave me the advice that he thought it was best for the United States, and it was the policy which he had followed for a long time, that there should be a steady and regular, rather than a very large, appropriation for the manufacture of arms, "because," he said, "in that way you keep up a permanent and contented force of skilled mechanics who are necessary for the Government in time of peril."

Now, the House will readily see that the sudden drop of late from $1,700,000 to $250,000 a year naturally breaks up and dissipates this force. And it is particularly hard upon the men that this decrease of force should come when all manufactures are stagnant and it is hard for them to find other places. It would be vastly better, I believe, to have followed the principle suggested by my predecessor and not to have gone up to such a high level as $1,700,000 a year if we are going to drop to so low a level as $250,000 a year; and I think that is an element which ought to be considered in the interest of good administration, not only of this arsenal, but of all arsenals where mechanics of great skill are required to carry on the production for the Government. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, now that we are discussing the question of the need, or the absence of any need of a large increase in the number of rifles, I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia, the chairman of the committee, about what percentage of the adult male population of the United States could effectively use in time of war the repeating Army rifle?

Mr. HAY. Well, about 16,000,000.

Mr. COOPER. Does the gentleman think that every adult person in the United States could use effectively an Army rifle?

Mr. HAY. No; I am talking about male citizens of military age.

Mr. COOPER. So that the gentleman thinks that training by shooting at targets is of no value, but that every male citizen of military age is a natural expert with a rifle?

Mr. HAY. I have not said that. I have said that they could use them.

Mr. COOPER. They could use them as a club, perhaps. I mean as a rifle?

Mr. HAY. Of course they would have to be trained.

Mr. COOPER. Precisely; "they would have to be trained." But how and where and when are they to be trained? I ask this question because it has been stated in this debate that there is approximately 111,000 militia in the United States who are supposed to be fitting themselves should the country call on them to help defend it. Of that 111,000, 44,000 did not appear at the rifle ranges for target practice last year. They were out on parade, but they were not fitting themselves to be able to shoot straight.

Now, it was once truly and forcefully said by a very distinguished American that "in war the only shots that count are those that hit." England to-day is training her militia to shoot. I have seen pictures recently, reproductions of photographs, showing how Lord Kitchener has, if I may use the expression, the green militia and volunteers out in England trying to teach them in this time of great stress, of possible dire emergency, how to shoot. Thousands of them had never before had a rifle in their hands, did not know how to load it, did not know how to sight it, did not know anything about how to elevate or depress the muzzle of a gun to hit an enemy at 300 or 500 yards, or at any other distance. Training of this sort is something that we ought, either by National legislation or State legislation, to bring about.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I know of a case, Mr. Chairman, where more than 300 new men were put into a regiment when the troops went down to Fort Sam Houston, Tex., and by the use of assiduous practice at diminished targets they were able to obtain credit marks for marksmanship, almost every one of them, within a month, and a large proportion of them qualified as sharpshooters. I am answering as to the time necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] asks for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 20, noes 68.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask unanimous consent to return to the item on page 44, relating to the library in the Surgeon General's office, for the purpose of permitting the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] to ask unanimous consent to extend his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] asks unanimous consent to return to the item on page 44, under the Army Medical Museum Library, for the purpose indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, what is his purpose? I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. HAY. In order to permit the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LLOYD. I wish to extend my remarks on this particular subject. I was attacked during the last campaign for having voted for the merger of this library with the Congressional Library, and I wish to say something about this particular library and why it should be continued, and give something of its history.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request to extend his remarks?

There was no objection.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, in the Army appropriation bill for the present fiscal year as passed by the House of Representatives $10,000 was appropriated for the library of the Surgeon General's office, including the purchase of necessary books of reference and periodicals. Such a provision has been regularly included in the appropriation acts for many years past, but in that bill, as it was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs in the Senate, the same item appeared with the following additions:

Provided, That on or before January 1, 1915, said library shall be transferred to and become a part of the Library of Congress, and so much of the amount herein appropriated as may be necessary is made available for paying the expenses of such removal.

You will observe that this provision would have merged the Surgeon General's library with the Library of Congress. After the adoption by the Senate of the amendment I received a letter from the chairman of the Medical Association of the City of St. Louis protesting against the adoption of the amendment. I made some inquiry about the provision and wrote, in reply to the letter, some of the arguments which I had heard in favor of the merger of these two libraries, and expressed myself rather strongly in praise of the Library of Congress, and said, in effect, that I did not know why the Library of Congress might not include a medical library, a law library, and in fact any kind of library that was useful to the public.

After this letter was written the military appropriation bill, as amended by the Senate, came to the House and on motion of the chairman of the military committee of the House all the amendments of the Senate were disagreed to and a conference was asked with the Senate. I voted for that motion; in fact, there was no opposing vote to the motion. When the bill came back with an agreement of the conference committee between the two Houses the amendment referred to was eliminated. I voted for the conference report with this provision eliminated. So that, in fact, I cast two votes in opposition to the merger of these two libraries, although there was no direct vote in either case on that particular amendment.

Within a few weeks of the passage of the bill, with the Senate amendment eliminated, the Medical Association of Missouri passed resolutions denouncing me for voting for the merger of these two libraries, and the resolution was sent by the secretary of the association to every physician in my district with instructions, in effect, not to support me as the candidate for Congress. Several months after that time the secretary of the medical association of the State was kind enough to publish in the Medical Journal in the State of Missouri, of which he is the editor, a statement to the effect that they were mistaken in charging me with voting for the merger of the two libraries, and apologized to that extent for the course of the medical association.

I wish to say now that on account of the attack that was made upon me I made investigation, as I had never done before, of the necessity for the Surgeon General's library and the desirability of the merger, and am fully convinced that the merger was not desirable and that both libraries have important functions to perform. The Library of Congress is a general library of literary productions and is not devoting itself especially to the development and advancement of any profession, and the Surgeon General's library is performing splendid duty in furnishing information that could not be well secured elsewhere to the medical fraternity in the United States. I quote from the report of the Surgeon General of the United States on the advisability of the merger of the two libraries and concur in his views as expressed in the statement, and take pleasure in commending these views to the consideration of Congress.

There is no reason to believe that the Library of Congress is in a position to take over at short notice such an enormous institution as the library of the Surgeon General's office, and it is very certain that should the actual expenses of transporting the books from the one library to the other be paid for from the $10,000 allowed for, little or nothing would remain for the purchase of books and periodicals during the fiscal year. The library of the Surgeon General's office has been for years in amicable relations with the Library of Congress, which refers to the former all questions dealing with medical literature. It is well understood that a purely medical library should be strictly delimited from a general library of secular literature, and to distribute the books now in the Surgeon General's library throughout the stacks of the Library of Congress would, if not impossible, be entirely destructive of the usefulness of the medical library. The Library of Congress is increasing along its own lines at the rate of 70,000 to 80,000 volumes a year, and it has distributed throughout its stacks space sufficient to allow for its own healthy growth for some years. It does not, however, have en bloc sufficient space to house the medical library should the proposed amendment of the Senate committee become law. There would still have to be special reading rooms for the users of the medical library and a specially trained force for its cataloguing and for the issue of volumes to readers in Washington and throughout the country. The shelving now in the library building at Seventh and B Streets SW. has cost in the neighborhood of $25,000, and it is doubtful if these stacks could be removed and used in the building of the Library of Congress, as they are entirely different in size, shape and structural material. A large sum of money would therefore necessarily be expended in making the transfer, and it is believed no gain whatever in economy of administration would result. The time lost to the many institutions and scientists who use the medical library throughout the country by the transfer is also well worth considering. To stop the current work of the Surgeon General's library even for a month would be to inflict a serious injury upon the public, and probably much more time than one month would be required to make the transfer.

The library of the Surgeon General's office, so called because it has been attached to that bureau of the War Department since 1836, is, in effect, the national medical library, consisting of over half a million medical books and pamphlets which are constantly used, not only by the Medical Corps of the United States Army but by the medical profession of the whole country at large. The index catalogue of this library, now numbering 33 volumes in folio, is acknowledged and used all over the world as the standard bibliography of medical literature, consisting of a subject and author index arranged in strictly alphabetical order, thus easily accessible to physicians seeking information on any medical subject whatever.

I think in this connection, as no statement has been given to the public of the history of this library, it would not be out of order to submit as a part of my remarks a brief history of the library and its index catalogue as furnished by the librarian of the Medical Library:

For many years there was a small collection of medical books and journals in the Surgeon General's office at Washington, which collection was commenced by Surg. Gen. Lovell prior to 1836. At the commencement of the Civil War this collection amounted to between three and four hundred volumes. During the administration of Surg. Gen. Hammond—1862–63—359 volumes were added to the collection. During 1864–65 about 1,000 were added, selected mainly by Dr. Woodward and Dr. Otis. In the fall of 1865 the library came under the administration of Dr. John S. Billings, who had just completed a long and honorable period of service as Army surgeon during the Civil War. Dr. Billings at once recognized the opportunity offered of founding a great national medical library, and the valuable collection we have to-day is the result of his energy, perseverence, and judgment. Aided by liberal appropriations from Congress, the growth of the library under its able and energetic director was phenomenal.

A catalogue of the books in the Army Medical Library was published in 1872, and another in three volumes in 1873–74. In connection with this Dr. Billings had early conceived the idea of indexing the files of periodicals in the library, so that as an addition to the catalogue of authors a subject index of the literature of medicine might also be printed. The work of indexing periodicals was actually begun in 1873, and in 1876 a "Specimen Fasciculus of a Catalogue" of the library, consisting of a combined index of authors and subjects arranged in dictionary order in a single alphabet, was printed and distributed to medical libraries and bibliographers to obtain criticisms and suggestions as to the form of catalogue that would be most acceptable and useful. At this time the library contained about 52,000 books and pamphlets.

Soon after the publication of the "Specimen Fasciculus" Dr. Robert Fletcher was assigned to duty in the library and became the principal assistant in the work of preparing and printing the index catalogue. The first volume of the latter—a large quarto of 888 pages—was printed in 1880, and 15 volumes of similar size followed making a first series from A to Z of 16 volumes, 1880–1895. Volume I of the second series was printed in 1896, and 17 volumes of this series—1896–1913—have been printed to date, covering the alphabet from A to T, inclusive. After the completion of Volume XVI of the first series Dr. Billings was retired from active service in the Army at his own request, to assume the professorship of hygiene in the University of Pennsylvania, afterwards becoming librarian of the New York Public Library. The administrative successors of Dr. Billings in the Surgeon General's library have been Col. D. L. Huntington, 1896–97; Maj. James C. Merrill, 1898–1902; Maj. Walter Reed, 1902; Col. Walter D. McCaw, 1903–1913. The library is at present under the administration of Lieut. Col. Champe C. McCulloch.

The Index-Catalogue of the Library of the Surgeon General's Office consists, as its title implies, of a full catalogue of the works contained in the library, and, in proper alphabetical sequence, a complete bibliography by subjects of the literature of medicine, carefully indexed, classified, subdivided, and arranged under the subject headings in alphabetical order by authors. Although bibliographies of medical literature had been attempted before by Gesner as early as 1545, and later by Merklin, von Haller, Ploucquet, Haeser, Young, Forbes, Atkinson, Callisen, Watts, and others, yet, in the language of Osler, "their efforts are Lilliputian beside the Gargartuan undertaking of the Surgeon General's Office," which he describes further as "one of the most stupendous bibliographical works ever undertaken." By reason of the completeness of its bibliographies, especially in the matter of periodical literature and its exhaustive cross-reference, the catalogue is practically a working guide and index to the medical libraries of other cities and countries, and it is stated on good authority that well-thumbed and well-worn copies in foreign universities and libraries attest its constant use.

The edition of the Index-Catalogue is limited to 1,500 copies, which are distributed with care and discrimination among the great medical and general libraries of the United States and Europe and among individual workers in scientific medicine. The cordial recognition and appreciation of the work of the catalogue by medical men is evidenced by their constant use of the library and by the great increase in the number of large medical libraries in the country, many of which, like those of Boston, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, have adopted the methods of the National Medical Library. Tokens such as these go far toward verifying the prediction made by Dr. Billings 30 years ago that "if a sufficient number of the catalogue be printed and distributed to our medical writers and teachers, so that they may at their leisure learn what aid they can obtain in their researches, no collection of the Government will be more used or be of more practical utility; that it will soon tend to elevate the standard of medical education, literature, and scholarship of the Nation, and will thus indirectly be for the benefit of the whole country, since the general knowledge and skill of the medical profession becomes a matter of personal interest to almost every individual at some time during the course of his life." It will be seen, therefore, that the gratitude of the entire medical profession, if not the public, is due to the liberal and broad-minded spirit displayed by Congress in furthering and supporting this important work, which is one of the well-recognized landmarks in the history of modern medicine, and, if we may again cite Osler, "will ever remain a monument to the Army Medical Department."

There are many Members of Congress, I have no doubt, whose attention has never been called to this library and do not know even where it is located.

The books in this library are stored in the Army Medical Museum at Seventh and B Streets SW. in this city. One-half of this splendid building contains the Medical Museum proper—one of the finest collections of its kind in existence—and the other one-half is used for the purpose of the library.

It is claimed by those familiar with this library that it is necessary for the Medical Corps of the United States Army, and through it valuable information is given to the medical fraternity as well. The librarian of this library in another statement commends the library in these words:

As an adjunct to the Medical Corps of the United States Army, the library is of inestimable value, forming, in connection with the Medical Museum, the Army Medical School, and the Walter Reed General Hospital, a central medico-military plant adequate for the needs of a good modern army establishment not unlike those of Netley, in England, Val de Grace, in France, or the Friedrich-Wilhelms Institute, in Berlin. The latter is the only other military establishment which has a library of anything like the value of the library of the Surgeon General's Office.

It is submitted that to make any change in the present title and administration of this library would have the effect of destroying its usefulness. Moreover, such a library ought, in any case, to be under the direction of some highly educated physician, and to dissociate it from the Army medical establishment would be to deprive that branch of the service of one of its best working tools. The examinations for admission to the Medical Corps of the United States Army are so rigorous as to make a definite selection of physicians of much higher grade than the average, and the history of modern medicine shows conclusively that some of the greatest recent advances in tropical medicine and in the prevention of infectious and parasitic diseases have been due to the work and cooperation of Army surgeons. To date the Nation's medical library has thrived and prospered very well under the Army administration, to the satisfaction of the entire medical profession, and it is difficult to see what advantages would be derived from pitchforking it into a general collection of secular literature such as that of the Library of Congress.

This library at the present time contains 189,171 bound volumes and 325,639 pamphlets. The United States Government pays annually for the salaries of the persons in charge of the library $37,730, and has 44 persons employed.

My candid judgment is that any reasonable amount of money spent in maintaining this library and adding to it from time to time is money well expended. I therefore take pleasure in supporting the provision in this bill appropriating $10,000 for the purchase of new books and periodicals.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. COOPER. I do so for the purpose of reading a line or two from the Chief of Staff as to the number of militia practicing in the use of the rifle and how expert they become. On page 7 he said that the number of men who had any practice with the rifle during the 1913 season was 52.56 per cent, or a little over one-half, and that the number who qualified as second-class men or better was 33 per cent and a fraction. Only one-third of those who did practice got so that they were even second-class men or better.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase and manufacture of armored motor cars, $50,000.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. With regard to the purchase and manufacture of armored motor cars, was that appropriation recommended by the department?

Mr. HAY. It was not.

Mr. GARDNER. In other words, the committee saw fit to go beyond the recommendation of the department in that respect? [After a pause.] I did not catch the chairman's answer.

Mr. HAY. That is obvious, so there is no need to answer that.

The Clerk read as follows:

Field artillery for Organized Militia: For the purpose of manufacturing field artillery material for the Organized Militia of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, without cost to the said States, Territories, or the District of Columbia, but to remain the property of the United States and to be accounted for in the manner now prescribed by law, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, under such regulations as he may prescribe, on the requisitions of the governors of the several States and Territories or the commanding general of the Militia of the District of Columbia, to issue said artillery material to the Organized Militia; and the sum of $2,090,000 is hereby appropriated and made immediately available and to remain available until the end of the fiscal year 1917 for the manufacture and issue of the articles constituting the same.

Provided, That not more than $25,000 of this appropriation may be used for the purchase of field artillery material.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 3, page 52, strike out "$25,000" and insert "$170,000."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, the reason I offer that amendment is that there are certain things pertaining to field artillery which the Government does not manufacture and can not manufacture. The items of this appropriation are:

Tools, accessories, and horse blankets	$34,595.00
19 battery commander's telescopes, at $350 each	6,650.00
19 horizontal base range finders, at $625 each	11,875.00
26 time-interval recorders, at $16.25 each	422.50
722 automatic pistols, at $13.25 each	9,566.50
1,444 extra magazines for automatic pistols, at 50 cents each	722.00
Range finders to complete batteries already appropriated for	42,500.00
Battery commander's telescopes to complete batteries already appropriated for	48,300.00
Unforeseen expenditures	15,369.00
Total	170,000.00

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GARDNER:
Page 51, line 22, strike out the figures "$2,090,000" and insert "$4,000,000."

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, according to the table given by the chairman of the committee we are now 440 guns short of the proper number of field artillery pieces. His figures are correct so far as the Greble Board report is concerned. Of course, the number is nothing like what is required according to the report of Gen. Wotherspoon, the Chief of Staff, made since the war broke out; but taking the figures that the chairman gives, we are 440 guns short. Gen. Crozier estimated that at the rate of this appropriation it will take us six years to get those guns. Last year he appeared before the committee and estimated then that it would take six years to get the guns at the rate of appropriation which he then advocated. This year Gen. Crozier came before the committee and said he had made a cut. The committee asked him why, and he said it was his orders. Then he proceeded to justify the cut in an argument substantially like this: "We are no nearer to war," he said, "than we were a year ago, and if it was safe to be six years behindhand with our guns a year ago, it is safe to be six years behindhand with our guns now." On that line of reasoning, when the day of judgment comes, we shall still be six years behindhand; we shall never catch up.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the $2,090,000 appropriated here will bring us 52 new guns out of the 440 which the chairman of the committee says we need—52 new guns and 4 ammunition batteries. If you adopt my amendment, instead of the 52 guns and 4 ammunition batteries you will get some 120 guns and 4 ammunition batteries and a little more. When the money is spent, instead of being 388 guns shy with five years to run before we catch up to the Greble Board project, we shall only be 320 guns shy, if as many. It seems to me that what I propose is none too safe. Surely everyone must admit that we ought to be at least within four years of the number of guns requisite according to the low estimate of the Greble Board. The Greble Board reported in 1912. Of course, the figures have been vastly increased in Gen. Wotherspoon's report; but even the Greble Board report called for 1,292 guns, and we have only 860. If you fail to adopt my amendment, you will still be over 380 shy, even after the money is spent which the committee proposes to appropriate by this bill. The figures which I have just given you are those which Chairman Hay put in the RECORD yesterday morning and which he included in the article which he published in various Sunday papers two weeks ago; only he figures the guns by batteries. His figures show 325 batteries of 4 guns each to be provided ultimately. That equals 1,300 guns. Also, 215 batteries ready or being manufactured. That equals 860 guns. Also, his figures show 110 batteries yet to be provided for. That equals 440 guns.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I call for a vote.

Mr. GARDNER. Does not the gentleman intend to answer any of these arguments, or does he consider them not worthy of it?

Mr. HAY. We went over this matter thoroughly yesterday in general debate.

Mr. GARDNER. You did not discuss the figures that came from the War Department this morning, for we did not have them.

Mr. HAY. I will say, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Massachusetts wants me to say something——

Mr. GARDNER. I want the gentleman to say whether I am correct or not.

Mr. HAY. I do not know, for I have not the figures.

Mr. GARDNER. Here are your own figures.

Mr. HAY. I say that according to the board they called for 1,292 field artillery guns. We have provided for and appropriated for and are providing for in this bill 912 of them, which leaves 380 to be hereafter provided for.

Mr. GARDNER. But your own table says 440.

Mr. HAY. If 912 from 1,292 does not leave 380, I do not know what arithmetic is. We have on hand, completed, 634 guns. We have appropriated for 226 guns, and we are appropriating in this bill for 52 guns, which makes 912.

Mr. GARDNER. Quite right, if you add the 52.

Mr. HAY. That is what I said. Now, Mr. Chairman, we are now appropriating what is asked for by the War Department. We have not cut the appropriation one dollar, and, in my judgment, it is not necessary for us to jump into this thing with great big appropriations. We have plenty of time before the dreams and visions of the gentleman from Massachusetts shall come about, to make all these guns.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. In addition to this amount which provides guns for the militia of the country, the Committee on Appropriations also gives something like $900,000 for the manufacture of field guns.

Mr. HAY. That is true.

Mr. GARDNER. Yes; and last year the other committee did not give quite the whole amount asked for. Your committee did so. I do not know what the other committee will do this year. But the length of time which Gen. Crozier says it will take at the present rate of appropriation to complete the 1,296 guns is based on the appropriations from both committees. He says that it will take six years.

Mr. KAHN. Gen. Crozier says that this is about all the money that he can expend the next year.

Mr. GARDNER. No; he does not, if you will excuse me. He says no such thing.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I suggest that this colloquy affords another opportunity for the House to witness the fact that we have to straddle between the two committees to find out whether we have any guns at all under the present arrangement.

Mr. HAY. That is a fact.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 51, line 12, after the word "manufacturing" insert "in Government establishments."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. TAVENNER) there were 65 ayes and 9 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ammunition for field artillery for Organized Militia: For the purpose of manufacturing reserve ammunition for field artillery for the Organized Militia of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, the funds to be immediately available and to remain available until the end of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, $2,900,000.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will it be in order for me to offer an amendment now or wait until the reading of the bill is completed? The provisos relate to different things.

Mr. HAY. The proviso is a part of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts will not lose his rights if the Clerk completes the reading.

Mr. GARDNER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARDNER. The last two provisos do not qualify the paragraph for Field Artillery. Should my amendment be offered when we reach line 14, or line 6 on page 53?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is immaterial.

Mr. HAY. I have no objection to the gentleman offering his amendment in either place.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can offer his amendment now if he desires.

Mr. GARDNER. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 52, line 11, strike out "$2,900,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$5,000,000."

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, the line of reasoning is exactly the same as for the manufacture of field artillery. Two million nine hundred thousand dollars will manufacture 300,000 rounds of artillery ammunition. If my amendment is adopted, we shall be able to manufacture 600,000 rounds.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That not more than $25,000 of this appropriation may be used in the purchase of Field Artillery reserve ammunition.

Mr. DEITRICK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 52, after line 14, insert the following: "Provided, That no part of the appropriations made in this bill shall be available for the salary or pay of any officer, manager, superintendent, foreman, or other person having charge of the work of any employee of the United States Government while making or causing to be made with a stop watch or other time-measuring device, a time study of any job of any such employee between the starting and the completion thereof, or of the movements of any such employee while engaged upon such work; nor shall any part of the appropriations made in this bill be available to pay any premium or bonus or cash reward to any employee in addition to his regular wages, except for suggestions resulting in improvements or economy in the operation of any Government plant; and no claim for services performed by any person while violating this proviso shall be allowed."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve a point of order.

Mr. DEITRICK. Mr. Chairman, in offering this amendment to abolish the stop-watch and premium system, which has been in operation for the past five years at the Watertown Arsenal, I may state for the benefit of those who are not familiar with this alleged efficiency system that an attempt is made by the use of the stop watch to get the shortest time in which the best workman can perform a given piece of work. If possible, the job is divided and each part is timed, and everything that possibly can be is eliminated and processes are shortened in order to obtain the "task" time for the job. Two-thirds of the "task" time is then added, and ever afterwards, unless the "task" time can be still further shortened, this total or job time is the time within which a workman is expected to complete a similar job. All workmen are expected to keep up with the pace thus set hour after hour, day after day, and week after week throughout the year. It will thus be seen that invariably the result is the speeding up in the movements of the workman. He must work faster, and for this faster work the Government allows him a premium based on the number of minutes he saves within the job time. This premium is in addition to his regular wages.

When the system was first introduced in Watertown there was a strike immediately among the molders. They refused to work under it. An attempt was made to introduce it, I am informed, at one of the other arsenals, and the men threatened to go out upon a strike.

Three years after this system had been forced into the Watertown Arsenal a petition was signed by a majority of the men employed in each department protesting against its further use. Many others would doubtless have signed the petition had it not been that they feared losing their positions. A large number of the men receiving premiums were among the signers. That petition was sent to me as the Representative of that district, and I submitted it to the War Department. Since then I have had wait upon me on a dozen different occasions committees of men from each department in the arsenal, and I have been stopped on the street many times by the men who work under the stop-watch system, and on one occasion, recently, I addressed a meeting of 200 men employed in the arsenal, and all these men protested vigorously against the stop watch.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that any of us object to proper and safe efficiency. I certainly do not, especially when it is efficiency forward; but I do object strenuously when it is efficiency backward and when it places additional burdens and risks upon the man at the bench. My contention is that in the speeding-up process such as is employed at the Watertown Arsenal there is not to be found real efficiency. This alleged efficiency system creates discontent among the workmen. It humiliates them. It makes uncertain their jobs. It contains many pitfalls. It increases the possibility of serious, if not fatal, injuries to the workmen. It causes a waste of material; and the whole atmosphere surrounding such a system tends to injure the health of the employees and results in a nervous state of mind which is wholly undesirable in a well-regulated shop.

Only last October a painter was killed while striving to earn a few extra cents as premium held out to him by the management as an inducement to hurry with his work; and as recently as December 21 last, four days before Christmas, a young laborer, 36 years old, while piling pig lead, was killed. Although the latter was not working under the premium system at the time he met his death, the man preceding him in handling the pig lead was working under the premium system, and the evidence indicates that the careless manner in which the premium worker handled the pig lead made it more difficult if not more dangerous for the laborer to pile it, and thus not only consumed more of the laborer's time but indirectly contributed to the laborer's death.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. BALTZ. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, how long does the gentleman from Virginia expect to let this debate run?

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, a reasonable time. Does anyone want any time on that side?

Mr. MANN. I do not want any time.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair does not sustain the point of order, I would like to have some time.

Mr. HAY. I do not think there is any question about the point of order.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. If the point of order is sustained, I do not care to discuss it.

Mr. HAY. I will make the point of order when the gentleman from Massachusetts completes his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman from Massachusetts proceeding for five minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DEITRICK. Mr. Chairman, while not attempting to even partially discuss in detail the essentials of the efficiency system, so called, I wish to state that it contains many other disagreeable and wasteful features. The claim is made in its favor that it increases the workmen's pay. The men say that it takes it out of their very lives, because if they do not keep up with or approach the time set, the standard time, for a job, they will probably soon lose their positions. Of course that is not assigned by the officials as the reason for discharging a workman, but when we remember that the system requires frequent examples being made of workmen in order to frighten the others, it is quite evident that failure to make the time set on a job or the least infraction of the rules will result in the workman's discharge.

I know of my own knowledge one case in the Watertown Arsenal to which I wish to call attention. The foreman of the blacksmith shop, who had been there for 23 years, drawing the highest pay of a workman in his line, one day stated to a workman under him that the time allowed the workman within which to complete a job was insufficient. Up to that time no complaint had been made against this foreman. He had a splendid record, yet he was at once suspended, and inside of a few weeks he was reduced in rank and pay—reduced to such an extent that he resigned rather than bear the humiliation of such unjust punishment.

Now, I know something about that man. I have known him personally for a great many years. I have seen him upon the witness stand in the courts, called by some of the best lawyers in Boston, to give expert testimony upon questions involving steel and iron. He was a man 57 years old, in perfect health, and had a rugged physique at the time he was forced out. Even this old employee, after a quarter of a century of faithful service to the Government and while still competent, fell a victim to this un-American stop-watch system. And yet our good friends who speak on behalf of this system will tell you that the men themselves help to determine the time allowed upon a given piece of work. This is absolutely false. The very object of the system will not permit it.

The primary purpose of this system is to force a larger output, to get more out of the plant with the same or a less number of workmen. There is another object of this system which, of course, we are not told much about, but it is perfectly evident to every man who knows anything about workmen and their positions. Mr. F. W. Taylor, the originator of the system, in his book on the subject, states it is not well for workmen to be paid too much. He gives the whole story away right there. Wages eventually will be reduced. This is made easy when workmen become disorganized through the merely temporary stimulant of premium bait.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. DEITRICK. May I ask for just one minute more?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. What is the request?

Mr. DEITRICK. For just one minute. I merely wish to state in closing, Mr. Chairman, that the Members perhaps do not know that the Labor Committees of both the Senate and the House in the last Congress unanimously reported out a bill to abolish the stop watch as now employed in Government plants.

I wish also to add that the Labor Committee of the House in this Congress, after a hearing on the so-called efficiency or stop-watch system at Watertown, unanimously reported in favor of abolishing all such systems as now used in Government plants.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. HAY. I do not care to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard. This amendment, Mr. Chairman, is clearly in order. There have been similar amendments made and held in order, and I want to call the Chair's attention to an amendment made by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] on February 21, 1911, which is as follows:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the construction of any boat by any person, firm, or corporation which has not at the time of the commencement and construction of said vessel established an eight-hour workday for all employees, laborers, and mechanics engaged or to be engaged in the construction of the vessel named herein.

That is found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD (No. 451, vol. 46, pt. 4, p. 3084).

The CHAIRMAN. Was the point of order made on that?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. The point of order was made against that, and the point of order was sustained by the Chair, and the decision of the Chair was overruled by the House by a vote of 96 to 111. That vote will be found on page 3088.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 96, noes 111.

Now I want to call the attention of the Chair to the argument which was made by Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey and Mr. FITZGERALD at that time which would be much more convincing than any argument I could make at this time. This amendment is similar; it is a restriction, and it is clearly in order. If the Chair wishes, I could read some of the arguments made at that time and some of the references made.

A MEMBER. What is the date?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. February 21, 1911. I will say that on February 21 (p. 3084), a reference is made to an amendment of similar character by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], which amendment was as follows:

That no part of any money appropriated by this act for charities or charitable institutions shall be paid to any institution named in this act until the charter or articles of incorporation thereof shall be so amended as to accord to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, or to their designated agents, authority to visit and inspect such institutions and to control and supervise the expenditure therein of all public funds paid out of appropriations made by Congress.

Mr. FITZGERALD claimed that the ruling was clearly analogous to the ruling which should be made here. Other references are also made.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does my colleague recall the very prominent case of the limitation that was put on the bill making appropriations for National soldiers' homes and State soldiers' homes, that no part of the appropriation would be expended in the homes for the maintenance of the canteen?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I was just going to refer to that.

Mr. MANN. Will my colleague yield? He has probably seen the amendment before. I have only heard it read. But as I heard the amendment read, if I got it rightly, it does not require anybody to do anything?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. No.

Mr. MANN. But only requires that the appropriation shall not be made if something is done?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. That is it.

Mr. MANN. It does not require positive action. It is not a change of law. It only says that the appropriation shall not be available if they do something which they now have the privilege of not doing?

Mr. HAY. Well, that is not exactly it, if the gentleman will permit me. Part of the amendment reads as follows:

Nor shall any part of the appropriation made in this bill be available to pay any premium or bonus or cash reward to any employee in addition to his regular wages except for suggestions resulting—

And so forth.

Mr. MANN. That is a pure limitation.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. That is clearly a limitation, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANN. We do not have to make an appropriation in order to give a bonus. As I caught the reading, it excepts the provision we passed in a special act here a few years ago to encourage suggestions.

Mr. HAY. We did pass a special act.

Mr. MANN. I thought the exception covered that, so we would not change the law in that respect.

Mr. HAY. I think it does. I have not the law before me.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. It seems the amendment in regard to the canteen provided that no part of the appropriation should be appropriated to any national home for disabled volunteer soldiers which maintained the canteen. It seems that that was held to be in order, and if so this certainly is in order, because it restricts and limits the expenditure of the appropriation. It tells why it shall not be expended for a certain purpose, which is a limitation on the expenditure and would reduce the amount of the appropriation. Mr. Chairman, it has really been well established that the expenditure of money for purposes of this character is not only injurious to the working people of the country, but is an absolute waste. There are no business people of any standing to-day that have accepted the so-called stop-watch or Taylor system. It is demonstrated that it is not a scientific management or an efficient management, and therefore this amendment is clearly a limitation and will result in a reduction of the appropriation. It is not only a humane amendment, but is an amendment that will reduce the appropriation and result in economy, both to the resources of the working people that are working for the Government and in the Government's finances. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me there is not a question of doubt, and should be no question of doubt, about the parliamentary status of an amendment of this kind.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DEITRICK].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the appropriations hereinbefore made under the heading "Ordnance Department" shall be available for the payment of an allowance not to exceed $4 per day to civilian employees of the Ordnance Department traveling on official business outside of the District of Columbia and away from their designated posts of duty.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. What is the allowance now given to civilian employees?

Mr. HAY. I understand this provision was put in to meet some provision in one of the appropriation bills of last year.

Mr. KAHN. The sundry civil bill of last year.

Mr. HAY. It was put in to conform to that provision last year. I do not remember now which bill it was in.

Mr. MANN. I think that provision says there shall be no allowance of over $4 or $5 a day.

Mr. HAY. I think $4 is the amount.

Mr. KAHN. Four dollars.

Mr. MANN. I wondered whether these people now receive as much as $4 a day.

Mr. HAY. I think they do. At least, I suppose so; but I do not know, to be perfectly frank with the gentleman. I have not looked the matter up.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the Chief of the Ordnance Department says that was put in there in accordance with legislation that was carried in the sundry civil appropriation bill last year, which required it to be put in. They always had these allowances heretofore, but they did not have to be covered by special legislation until the requirement was put in the law.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw my point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That when one bureau or executive department procures by purchase or manufacture stores or material of any kind or performs any service for another bureau or executive department the funds of the bureau or department for which the stores or material are to be procured or the service performed may be placed subject to the requisition of the bureau or department making the procurement or performing the service for direct expenditure by it: Provided, That when the stores being procured are for current issue during the year stores of equal value may be issued from stock on hand in place of any of those aforesaid.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that paragraph; and, relating to the previous paragraph, where I withdrew the point of order, the provision of the law put in the sundry civil bill last year was this:

SEC. 13. That the heads of executive departments and other Government establishments are authorized to prescribe per diem rates of allowance not exceeding $4 in lieu of subsistence to persons engaged in field work or traveling on official business outside of the District of Columbia and away from their designated posts of duty when not otherwise fixed by law.

Now, that provision fixed in this bill is futile entirely, and instead of there being a law requiring this provision to be put in, if the officer who made that statement had read the law he would have found that a law already on the statute books authorizes the department to provide subsistence at $4 a day.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is not the provision we have just passed broader in its phraseology, because it has not so many limitations as the provision in the sundry civil act? I imagine this is to escape from the limitations in the present law.

Mr. MANN. I do not see any difference. They are both for traveling outside the District of Columbia.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is a slight difference.

Mr. MANN. What is it?

Mr. STAFFORD. One relates to "when they are actually employed." This does not have any such limitation.

Mr. MANN. Where is the provision "to be actually employed" in the law?

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood there was such a restriction in what the gentleman read.

Mr. MANN. It is not there. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, against this amendment.

Mr. HAY. It is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HAY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 13, line 13, for the purpose of permitting the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] to offer an amendment, to which amendment I will make a point of order when the time comes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] asks unanimous consent to return to page 13, line 13, for the purpose of permitting the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] to offer an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MADDEN moves to amend, at the end of line 13, page 13, by inserting the following proviso:

"Provided, That hereafter the clerks of the Quartermaster Corps who were formerly clerks of the Quartermaster's and subsistence departments shall have the same status, pay, and allowances as are now granted by law to the pay clerks of the Quartermaster Corps, including retirement and retired pay."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I now move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 20347) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia moves the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill with instructions to the committee to increase the amount allowed in the bill as the appropriation for airships by $700,000.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GARDNER moves to recommit the bill, with instructions to the committee to strike out the figures "$600,000," on page 6, line 24, and insert "$1,300,000"; and to strike out the figures "$300,000," on page 7, line 4, and insert "$1,000,000."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, on that I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia moves the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit with instructions.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GARDNER) there were—ayes 20, noes 123.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point that no quorum is present. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 34, nays 253, not voting 137, as follows:

YEAS—34.

Bathrick	Hayes	Miller	Stephens, Cal.
Cooper	Helgesen	Moss, W. Va.	Sutherland
Curry	Hinds	Murdock	Temple
Edmonds	Hobson	Nolan, J. I.	Thomson, Ill.
Esch	Johnson, Wash.	Parker, N. J.	Underhill
Farr	Lafferty	Peters	Volstead
Gardner	Lindbergh	Platt	Winslow
Greene, Mass.	McLaughlin	Rogers
Guernsey	Mapes	Smith, J. M. C.

NAYS—253.

Abercrombie	Dies	Humphreys, Miss.	Price
Adair	Dillon	Igoe	Prouty
Adamson	Dixon	Jacoway	Quin
Aiken	Donovan	Johnson, Ky.	Raker
Allen	Doolittle	Johnson, S. C.	Rauch
Anderson	Doremus	Jones	Reilly, Wis.
Anthony	Doughton	Kahn	Riordan
Ashbrook	Driscoll	Keating	Rouse
Aswell	Drukker	Kelly, Pa.	Rubey
Austin	Dupré	Kettner	Sabath
Bailey	Eagan	Key, Ohio	Seldomridge
Baker	Estopinal	Kiess, Pa.	Sherley
Baltz	Evans	Kindel	Sherwood
Barkley	Ferris	Kinkaid, Nebr.	Sims
Barnhart	Fields	Kirkpatrick	Sinnott
Bartlett	Finley	Konop	Sisson
Barton	Fitzgerald	La Follette	Slayden
Beakes	FitzHenry	Langley	Slemp
Blackmon	Flood, Va.	Lazaro	Sloan
Booher	Floyd, Ark.	Lee, Ga.	Small
Borchers	Fordney	Lesher	Smith, Idaho
Brockson	Foster	Lever	Smith, Minn.
Brodbeck	Fowler	Lieb	Smith, Tex.
Brown, N. Y.	Francis	Linthicum	Stafford
Brown, W. Va.	Gallagher	Lobeck	Stedman
Browne, Wis.	Gard	Lonergan	Steenerson
Browning	Garner	McAndrews	Stephens, Miss.
Brumbaugh	Garrett, Tenn.	McClellan	Stephens, Nebr.
Bryan	Garrett, Tex.	McGillicuddy	Stephens, Tex.
Buchanan, Ill.	Gerry	McKellar	Stevens, Minn.
Buchanan, Tex.	Gill	McKenzie	Stevens, N. H.
Bulkley	Gillett	Madden	Stone
Burgess	Gilmore	Maguire, Nebr.	Sumners
Burke, S. Dak.	Goeke	Mann	Switzer
Burke, Wis.	Good	Martin	Tavenner
Burnett	Goodwin, Ark.	Mitchell	Taylor, Ark.
Byrns, Tenn.	Gordon	Mondell	Taylor, Colo.
Calder	Graham, Ill.	Montague	Ten Eyck
Callaway	Gray	Moon	Thacher
Campbell	Green, Iowa	Moore	Thomas
Candler, Miss.	Greene, Vt.	Morgan, Okla.	Thompson, Okla.
Caraway	Gregg	Morrison	Towner
Carlin	Gudger	Moss, Ind.	Townsend
Carter	Hamilton, N. Y.	Mott	Treadway
Cary	Hamlin	Mulkey	Tribble
Casey	Hardy	Murray	Underwood
Church	Harris	Neeley, Kans.	Vaughan
Clancy	Harrison	Norton	Vinson
Cline	Haugen	O'Brien	Vollmer
Coady	Hawley	Oglesby	Walker
Collier	Hay	O'Hair	Wallin
Connelly, Kans.	Hayden	Oldfield	Walters
Connolly, Iowa	Heflin	Padgett	Watkins
Cox	Helm	Page, N. C.	Watson
Cramton	Helvering	Palmer	Weaver
Crisp	Hensley	Park	Webb
Cullop	Hill	Parker, N. Y.	Wingo
Danforth	Holland	Patten, N. Y.	Witherspoon
Davenport	Houston	Peterson	Woods
Decker	Howard	Phelan	Young, N. Dak.
Deitrick	Howell	Plumley	Young, Tex.
Dent	Hughes, Ga.	Porter
Dershem	Hulings	Post
Dickinson	Hull	Powers

NOT VOTING—137.

Ainey	Fairchild	Knowland, J. R.	Rothermel
Alexander	Faison	Korbly	Rucker
Avis	Falconer	Kreider	Rupley
Barchfeld	Fergusson	Langham	Russell
Bartholdt	Fess	Lee, Pa.	Saunders
Beall, Tex.	Frear	L'Engle	Scott
Bell, Cal.	French	Lenroot	Scully
Bell, Ga.	Gallivan	Levy	Sells
Borland	George	Lewis, Md.	Shackleford
Bowdle	Gittins	Lewis, Pa.	Shreve
Britten	Glass	Lindquist	Smith, Md.
Broussard	Godwin, N. C.	Lloyd	Smith, N. Y.
Bruckner	Goldfogle	Loft	Smith, Saml. W.
Burke, Pa.	Gorman	Logue	Sparkman
Butler	Goulden	McGuire, Okla.	Stanley
Byrnes, S. C.	Graham, Pa.	MacDonald	Stout
Cantor	Griest	Mahan	Stringer
Cantrill	Griffin	Maher	Taggart
Carew	Hamill	Manahan	Talbott, Md.
Carr	Hamilton, Mich.	Metz	Talcott, N. Y.
Chandler, N. Y.	Hart	Morgan, La.	Taylor, Ala.
Clark, Fla.	Henry	Morin	Taylor, N. Y.
Claypool	Hinebaugh	Neely, W. Va.	Tuttle
Conry	Hoxworth	Nelson	Vare
Copley	Hughes, W. Va.	O'Shaunessy	Walsh
Crosser	Humphrey, Wash.	Paige, Mass.	Whaley
Dale	Johnson, Utah	Patton, Pa.	Whitacre
Davis	Keister	Pou	White
Difenderfer	Kelley, Mich.	Ragsdale	Williams
Donohoe	Kennedy, Conn.	Rainey	Wilson, Fla.
Dooling	Kennedy, Iowa	Rayburn	Wilson, N. Y.
Dunn	Kennedy, R. I.	Reed	Woodruff
Eagle	Kent	Reilly, Conn.
Edwards	Kinkead, N. J.	Roberts, Mass.
Elder	Kitchin	Roberts, Nev.

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. GOLDFOGLE with Mr. SHREVE.

Mr. RAINEY with Mr. BARCHFELD.

Mr. SCULLY with Mr. FAIRCHILD.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina with Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania.

Mr. WHALEY with Mr. AINEY.

Mr. WILSON of Florida with Mr. DUNN.

Mr. BELL of Georgia with Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada.

Mr. ALEXANDER with Mr. BARTHOLDT.

Mr. BORLAND with Mr. AVIS.

Mr. CANTRILL with Mr. BUTLER.

Mr. CAREW with Mr. BELL of California.

Mr. CLARK of Florida with Mr. BRITTEN.

Mr. CONRY with Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania.

Mr. DALE with Mr. CHANDLER of New York.

Mr. DOOLING with Mr. COPLEY.

Mr. EDWARDS with Mr. DAVIS.

Mr. GLASS with Mr. FESS.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina with Mr. FREAR.

Mr. GORMAN with Mr. FRENCH.

Mr. GOULDEN with Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania.

Mr. HAMILL with Mr. GRIEST.

Mr. HART with Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan.

Mr. HENRY with Mr. KELLEY of Michigan.

Mr. KITCHIN with Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington.

Mr. LEE of Pennsylvania with Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland with Mr. JOHNSON of Utah.

Mr. LLOYD with Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa.

Mr. LOFT with Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island.

Mr. NEELY of West Virginia with Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY with Mr. KREIDER.

Mr. POU with Mr. LANGHAM.

Mr. RAGSDALE with Mr. LEWIS of Pennsylvania.

Mr. RAYBURN with Mr. MANAHAN.

Mr. RUCKER with Mr. MCGUIRE of Oklahoma.

Mr. RUSSELL with Mr. MORIN.

Mr. SAUNDERS with Mr. NELSON.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD with Mr. PAIGE of Massachusetts.

Mr. SPARKMAN with Mr. PATTON of Pennsylvania.

Mr. STOUT with Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts.

Mr. TAGGART with Mr. SCOTT.

Mr. WILLIAMS with Mr. SELLS.

Mr. BRUCKNER with Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH.

Mr. CLAYPOOL with Mr. VARE.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. HAY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning in order to expedite the passage of the Agricultural bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is it the intention to go on with general debate to-night on the Agricultural bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman in charge of the Agricultural bill desires to go on with general debate this evening. Some gentlemen desire to speak, but it is not the desire of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] to press the House to do any work to-night.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the House how long he expects to sit?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I would say to the gentleman that it is my intention to run until half past 8 or 9 o'clock.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it the intention of the gentleman to finish the general debate to-morrow?

Mr. LEVER. We will try to get through with general debate to-morrow and take up debate under the five-minute rule, although I do not think it is the desire of the committee to run to-morrow later than 6 o'clock. However, I would not commit myself absolutely to that.

Mr. STAFFORD. How much general debate is proposed?

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman from Iowa and I have talked over the situation, and I think we will be able to agree on seven or seven and a half hours for general debate.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman think that if we conclude general debate to-morrow, together with the consideration of several other matters to be presented, the sending of the District appropriation bill to conference, that we will have concluded a pretty good day's work?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, that is a question that we better let to-morrow determine. We can not tell now. We are getting close to the end of the session, and gentlemen ought to stay here.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. RUSSELL was granted leave of absence for two days, on account of sickness.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS IN THE RECORD.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Virginia rise?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by publishing a paper put forth by the Boston Maritime Association discussing the legal aspects of the Government-owned merchant marine bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by publishing an essay in some Boston paper——

Mr. JONES. The Boston Maritime Association.

The SPEAKER. The Boston Maritime Association on the ship-purchase bill. Is there objection?

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana objects.

CODIFYING, REVISING, AND AMENDING THE LAWS OF THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Speaker to lay before the House the bill H. R. 19076, with Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 19076) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 20241. An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1915 and prior years, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 6121. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Niagara River in the town of Lewiston, in the county of Niagara and State of New York.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

H. R. 20241. An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1915 and prior years, and for other purposes.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 20415) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and pending that motion I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] if we can not agree upon time for general debate?

Mr. HAUGEN. Well, I will state to the gentleman I have had several requests for time, probably more than I can accommodate, but I would like four hours on this side.

Mr. LEVER. I would suggest to the gentleman that is rather a long time for debate on this bill, and would suggest we agree upon seven hours of general debate, three and a half hours to a side.

Mr. HAUGEN. Let me suggest, if we run an hour or two this evening, can not the gentleman afford to give eight hours' time to this important bill? Of course I appreciate we are close to the close of the session and I am not going to insist upon it, but if possible I would like to accommodate gentlemen who have asked for time.

Mr. LEVER. I appreciate the fact the gentleman has had a good deal of pressure on him; so have I; but I have said to gentlemen on this side that they would have to limit themselves in their demands for time, and I would appreciate very much if the gentleman and myself can agree upon seven hours.

Mr. HAUGEN. What would the gentleman say to seven and a half hours?

Mr. LEVER. Does the gentleman think he can not get along with less than that?

Mr. HAUGEN. Of course I can get along with whatever I can get, but I would like to have that much time.

Mr. LEVER. Let me submit the request. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be limited to seven hours, three and a half hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa and three and a half hours to be controlled by myself.

The SPEAKER. Before the Chair puts that, the Chair neglected to ask if there is objection to the request of Mr. FIELDS this morning to have a correction made in the RECORD. They seem to leave the letter "s" off of his name. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina for seven hours' general debate, half of the time to be controlled by himself and half by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question now is on the House resolving itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 20415.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 20415, with Mr. HAMLIN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 20415, the agricultural bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20415) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, how long does the gentleman expect to run to-night?

Mr. LEVER. I would like very much to run for two hours this evening. That would run us up to 8 o'clock. I have an hour and a half on this side to yield to gentlemen who are prepared to talk now, and I understand the gentleman from Iowa——

Mr. HAUGEN. I have 40 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Is it the expectation there will be no other business done to-night except this general debate?

Mr. LEVER. None whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD].

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, within the last few days we have heard very able and lucid discussions of the rural-credits question by two of our distinguished colleagues, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MOSS].

In entering upon the discussion of this subject, to which I have given much thought and study, I do so for the sole purpose of presenting for consideration my own notions about the establishment of land-mortgage banks, which coincide with the views of many gentlemen throughout the country who have devoted years of study to this question. The views I shall give expression to do not dovetail entirely with the views previously expressed by my distinguished colleagues.

In presenting the provisions of House bill 12746, introduced by me January 31, 1914, and upon which I made an address to the House on February 17, 1914, attaching at the same time a detailed explanation of the bill, which I shall append hereto, I do so in no spirit of jealousy or with the least ambitious desire to have my views accepted over those of others if they do not appeal to the deliberate good judgment of those of us whose only purpose is to serve in the most practical way the great army of American farmers.

All of us who have given close study to the condition of the farmers and their needs are compelled to admit that the American farmer pays a higher rate of interest for the money he obtains from banking institutions than the farmer of any other great nation on earth. In fact, the rate of interest exacted of the small farmer, although it be the legal rate of interest prescribed by the laws of the different States, is almost prohibitory.

My judgment is, the existence of this condition is attributable to a system of banking which has been founded and built up to meet the necessities of commercial rather than agricultural purposes.

Commercial and agricultural banking are as unmixable as oil and water, and the reason is this: Commercial banking institutions receiving the demand deposits of their customers are compelled by the very necessities of the case to keep their assets liquid and convertible into cash upon short notice for the protection of their depositors, and they therefore make short-time loans to meet any emergency, having fixed as a rule 90 days as the maximum limit; to which conditions commercial and industrial institutions have adjusted themselves. But any loan made to a farmer which is of shorter duration than from the time he plants his crop until the time he harvests his crop harasses rather than benefits him.

But while there is need for an extension of banking facilities, so that the farming loans may be carried from seed time to harvest—or for periods ranging from 6 to 12 months—yet this is by no means the principal need of the farming classes in a banking way. The provision of adequate banking facilities for enabling the farmer to properly finance his annually recurring needs is important and necessary. But even more important is the necessity of enabling him to secure the capital with which to partly pay for, improve, or stock his farm. The capital for the business must be provided before the business can be successfully conducted. In the farmer's case this capital can only be secured through mortgage loans, repayable in small periodical installments extending over a long term of years. The handling and placing of these long-term loans is the special business of the land-mortgage bank, and consequently in this discussion I shall confine myself largely to a consideration of these institutions.

Those of us who seek to relieve existing conditions in the extension of credit to the farmers of this country, and who are interested in upbuilding our great agricultural resources, and in encouraging that intelligent element of our citizenry who are now upon the farms (and those in the already overcrowded civic centers who would gladly follow agricultural pursuits under more favorable conditions) have sought to devise a plan, businesslike, safe, practical, easily attainable, and mutually beneficial to lender and borrower, whereby we can accomplish that which has so greatly stimulated agricultural production in other great countries.

It is my purpose now to ask the indulgence of my colleagues while I discuss with you a plan which I hope will receive the consideration that I know you have generously given to all legislation involving the welfare of the farmers of this country, and which will necessitate a comparison of the bill I have introduced with those known as the Bulkley-Hollis bill and the Fletcher-Moss bill.

Before entering upon this discussion of land-mortgage banks, however, I wish to correct certain misunderstandings and mistaken impressions which seem to exist in the minds of many of those who are interested in this subject. These misunderstandings are, in my judgment, largely due to a failure to define and distinguish the terms commonly used. Some of these terms I shall now attempt to strictly define and distinguish.

The term "land-mortgage bank" is itself not clearly understood as distinguished from institutions providing for personal credit to the farmers, and in its strictest sense the term "bank" in this connection is misleading. Strictly speaking, a pure "land-mortgage bank" is not a bank at all in the common acceptation of the term. It is an institution or organization designed for the purpose of enabling the individual farmer to borrow money, secured by a mortgage on his farm, from a distant investor or from the general public at the lowest interest rate and on the best terms. It is the means or instrumentality by and through which the farmer can place and sell his long-term mortgage loans. It is the machinery for creating, securing, handling, and selling the mortgage loans of the individual farmer and at the same time for protecting the holder of these loans by seeing that the money loaned is used in the improvement of the farm by assuring the title to the land, the validity of the mortgage, and the value of the security behind the mortgage, and by guaranteeing to the investor the prompt payment of principal and interest of the loan as they mature. By doing these things for many farmers at the same time it can be done at a minimum of expense. The land-mortgage bank could more properly be called the land-mortgage security and brokerage company. It handles farm-mortgage securities, guarantees their payment, and acts as broker in placing and selling them.

The picture of a land-mortgage bank brought before the mind's eye of the average man involves a handsome bank building with a large force of bookkeepers. The strict land-mortgage bank needs nothing of the kind. Its business in an average county could be conducted by one paid employee at a nominal salary, at a small desk in a corner of his sitting room or office. Only a small part of his time would be required after the bank was in full operation.

It is evident that in consequence the cost of operating a strict land-mortgage bank is extremely small. In so far as these banks are permitted to transact any of the ordinary banking functions in the bill which I will discuss, it is believed that the additional expense will be offset by the additional profits from this branch of the business.

Having defined a land-mortgage bank in its strict sense, I now want to emphasize the distinction between ordinary commercial banks and land-mortgage banks, so as to further clarify the argument I will make.

The commercial bank is the exact antithesis of the land-mortgage bank. The operation of the one is an exact reversal of the operation of the other. The commercial bank brings together the cash of the community and sells that cash for credit. The land-mortgage bank brings together the credit of the community and sells that credit for cash. The commercial bank pools the money of the community and sells it for interest-bearing notes or bonds. The land-mortgage bank pools the interest-bearing notes or bonds of the community and sells them for cash.

I will emphasize and elaborate this distinction later on in my argument; but this statement alone should serve to indicate that the two systems of banking, being in direct antithesis, should be kept separate as far as possible.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. HOWARD. For a question.

Mr. CARLIN. I want to inquire if it is your purpose to offer an amendment to the pending bill?

Mr. HOWARD. My purpose is to impress upon the House the great merit of the bill that I have had the honor to introduce myself as compared with the bills introduced by other people.

Mr. Chairman, on the 19th of December the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], who is chairman of the subcommittee in charge of the rural credit bill, delivered a most able argument before this body in advocacy of the bill recommended by his committee and introduced by him in the House last May as H. R. 16478 and in the Senate by Senator HOLLIS as S. 5542.

In the argument made by Mr. BULKLEY he discussed at great length and with marked ability the question of governmental support of land-mortgage banks, drawing the distinction between the various kinds of support which the Government might give to these institutions, and showing very conclusively to my mind that no open-minded citizen can question the wisdom of certain kinds of governmental support; while certain other kinds might be ground for a decided difference of opinion. [Applause.]

In this speech Mr. BULKLEY referred to the bill recommended by the United States Commission on Agricultural Credits, introduced in the House by Mr. Moss of Indiana and in the Senate by Senator FLETCHER, of Florida.

In discussing this question of land-mortgage banks, and in presenting for your consideration the arguments which seem to me conclusive as to the value of the general plan outlined in the bill which I have presented I shall go into detail as little as possible, and only so far as is necessary to bring out the few important points which I think merit attention.

The bill which I have introduced is, to a large extent, similar to the Fletcher-Moss bill except in its provisions for a central bank and for ultimate mutualization.

FLETCHER-MOSS BILL.

The Fletcher-Moss bill provides for a system of independent banking, each bank being allowed to do a State-wide business, and each bank being allowed to sell its debentures against the first mortgages taken by it.

Under the Fletcher-Moss bill a given number of persons can organize a bank and do business all over the State in which the bank is organized, lending money on lands anywhere in that State and selling the debentures of the bank under certain regulations and restrictions, such debentures being issued against the mortgages held by the bank. Each bank is an independent unit, and each bank is operated independently of any other bank except for the supervisory control exercised by the governmental department provided for that purpose. While the provision is made in the Fletcher-Moss bill for cooperative institutions, the real theory of that bill seems to be that the ground on which the establishment of these institutions is to be hoped for is the purely selfish ground of large returns to the investor.

BULKLEY-HOLLIS BILL.

On the other hand, the Bulkley-Hollis bill does not provide for the establishment of independent banks. It provides for the establishment of a banking system, consisting of local institutions, known as "National Farm Loan Associations," to make direct loans to the farmers who are stockholders of the association, and limited in their operations to the farm loan district in which the association is situated. The mortgages secured by the local farm-loan association are thereupon to be indorsed by it and forwarded to a larger institution known as a "Federal land bank." These Federal land banks are to each operate over a district comprising several States, the theory being apparently that there should be about as many Federal land banks as there are now Federal reserve banks in our national banking system. The mortgages forwarded by a local association to its Federal land bank are used by the Federal land bank as security for land-bank bonds issued by the Federal land bank, each issue of such bonds being guaranteed by all of the 12 Federal land banks provided for in the system.

HOWARD BILL.

My bill provides for a local farm-land bank, limited in its operations to a county, which lends the money to the farmer, taking a first mortgage for the same. This local land bank then indorses or guarantees the mortgage and sends it to a State land bank, whose operations are confined to that State and who can then itself indorse or guarantee the mortgages and send them on to the United States land bank or central bank. This central bank can take the mortgages from a given State so guaranteed by a local bank and by a State bank, and against these mortgages can issue land-bank bonds of the central bank and sell the same. The central bank alone has the power to issue and sell these debenture bonds or land-bank bonds, secured by mortgages on farm lands which have been indorsed by the local bank and by the State bank.

LOCAL, STATE, AND CENTRAL BANKS.

Under my bill the local bank, with a minimum capital of $10,000, is owned and controlled locally and is limited in its loans to the county where it is located. As many banks as are desired can be established in a given county. All of these banks have exactly the same facilities for obtaining money for the farmers on advantageous terms. They can purchase first mortgages and guarantee the payment of the same to the extent of fifteen times their capital and surplus. These mortgages, when so guaranteed and sent to the State bank, are in turn by it guaranteed and sent to the central bank. The State bank can guarantee mortgages—which are first guaranteed by the local banks—to the extent of one hundred times the capital and surplus of the State banks. The State bank, in turn, guarantees these mortgages—all guaranteed by local banks—and forwards them to the central bank, which alone can issue and sell debentures against the same.

PROFITS ALL GO TO LOCAL BANKS.

The stockholders of the local banks under my bill have a double liability, as in national banks, and their dividends are restricted to 6 per cent. The State bank is owned by the local banks in that State, each of which is required to contribute 20 per cent of its capital and surplus to the purchase of stock in the State bank. Each local and State bank is required to contribute 10 per cent of its capital and surplus toward the purchase of stock in the central bank. The result is that all the profits of the central bank, after a fair surplus has been created, go to the State and local banks, and all the profits of the State bank, after a fair surplus has been created, go to the local banks. Thus all the profits of the entire system come back to the local banks.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. HOWARD. With pleasure.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I understand you provide one bank in each county, or as many banks as the business would justify in each county, and that there would be under your bill only one bank in the State?

Mr. HOWARD. One State bank.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. And then only one great central bank in the United States?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. To control all the business going down the line to the local community?

Mr. HOWARD. Let me explain to the gentleman. I think I can make that clear. The county bank and the State bank take stock in the central bank, thereby owning the central bank. In other words, the contribution of 20 per cent of the capital stock in these banks in the central bank and 10 per cent in the State banks make the county banks own the State banks, and then, in turn, the State banks in the 48 States in the Union own the central bank. Therefore the entire system is controlled, as the gentleman can see, by the small banks in the counties.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. So there would be a mutuality of interests running from the county banks to the central bank?

Mr. HOWARD. Absolutely. How much time have I consumed, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 20 minutes.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I thank the gentleman very much for his courtesy.

Mr. MURRAY. I apprehend the purpose of this interlocking system of banks is to sell the bonds easily and to give them credit?

Mr. HOWARD. Absolutely. In other words, if the farmers expect to get cheap credit in this country, there is but one way to do it, and that is to make the security of that farmer, by a collection of all of the credit of the farmers of the country, brought together in one great central institution, as good as a municipal bond, a State bond, or a Government bond itself. To give you an illustration, yesterday the bonds of the land-mortgage banks in Germany and France were selling for 1½ per cent more, so it was stated in a daily paper that I saw, than the bonds of the Governments of Germany and France.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. With pleasure. I wish I had time to yield to all of my colleagues on this particular subject, because I would like to answer any questions and hear any criticism that they might have to make of the bill.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Do I understand my colleague to say that the profits are limited to 6 per cent?

Mr. HOWARD. The dividends they can declare as a profit. But that makes no difference. In other words, we do not allow a divided declared over 6 per cent; but what difference does it make about the dividend? All of the profits eventually are owned by the farmers themselves. Now, I want to say this——

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for a short question as to the European banks? I would like to know if they have Government aid?

Mr. HOWARD. The only aid they get from the Government, as I understand it, is of the character of bringing the man who has the money and the man that wants to borrow the money together. Some of them do put up a certain amount of money.

Mr. SUMNERS. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. HOWARD. With pleasure.

Mr. SUMNERS. The suggestion is that the gentleman had better proceed with his manuscript, as he has but a little more time left.

Mr. HOWARD. Now, gentlemen, if you will pardon me, I will adopt the suggestion of my good friend from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] and try to get down to at least the gist of what I am driving at.

HOW PROFITS ULTIMATELY GO TO FARMER BORROWERS.

The stockholders in the local banks only receive 6 per cent dividends on their investment. The balance of the profits of the local banks, representing the profits of the entire system, are used to create a fair surplus, and thereafter the profits are used to buy in from the stockholders of the local bank at par the stock owned by them which is thereupon canceled. Thereafter the profits of the local bank, representing the profits of the entire system, are annually distributed back to the borrowers from the bank; thus making the system eventually a mutual one and giving to the borrowers the benefit of the profits of the system. In this way the profits of the system redound to the benefit of the borrowers and serve to reduce the rate of interest which they must pay for their loans.

Under my bill provision is made limiting the profits which the system of banks can make on any specific loan. The farmer borrower can not be required to pay a rate of interest exceeding by more than 1 per cent the rate at which the central bank sells its debentures. This 1 per cent must represent the profit and pay the expense of operation of the local bank, the State bank, and the central bank.

Now, that is 1 per cent, and by way of parenthesis I want to say this: That sounds like a very little bit of profit. The minimum amount of expense incurred by the land-mortgage banks of Europe has been fifteen one-hundredths of 1 per cent. The maximum amount that these systems have ever cost in Europe has been sixty-two one-hundredths of 1 per cent.

Now, when you take into consideration the fact that the country bank can issue bonds of 15 times its capacity, or $150,000, one-half of 1 per cent, which they will eventually get on that amount, alone equals 5½ per cent to the local bank. The State bank can issue one hundred times its capital. Therefore if a State bank in the State of Missouri or in the State of Kentucky has a capitalization of a million dollars, under the provisions of this bill it could guarantee land-mortgage bonds to the extent of $100,000,000.

Therefore you can see what their profit would be at one-fourth of 1 per cent; so that the profit, although it is divided between three holders of stock—the county bank, the State bank, and the central bank—and two-quarters go to the State bank and the central bank and one-half goes to the county bank, yet the profits of the entire system come back eventually to the original borrower.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman pardon me for a question?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. How do you arrive at 15 per cent and 150 per cent?

Mr. HOWARD. It is not 150 per cent; it is 15 per cent. I am glad the gentleman asked that question, because I would like to make myself clear on it. For instance, the small bank in your county gets up $10,000 and joins this organization. They are allowed to guarantee $150,000 worth of mortgages, upon which they are allowed ultimately one-half of 1 per cent profit.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. That is when the system gets to working?

Mr. HOWARD. They do that every year.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Why is not the small bank allowed to do the same thing?

Mr. HOWARD. The reason for that is this: The small bank issues fifteen times its capital. The reason why they are allowed to issue anything more—there is a double liability—the reason why they are allowed to issue the capital stock they have got is because they have behind each loan full value. In fact, only 50 per cent of the value of the loan is accepted.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. I am very much obliged to the gentleman. He will excuse me for interrupting him.

Mr. HOWARD. I was glad to yield. Now I will try to get along.

In the bill this whole plan is worked out in detail, and it is submitted that the system could be promptly and easily organized and would be specially suited to the needs of our farmers.

SENTIMENT AGAINST A CENTRAL BANK.

I recognize that there is some sentiment among the American people, and particularly among the members of the dominant party, against a central bank. This sentiment was strongly developed when we were attempting to reform our currency laws, and many people seem now to think that the country will be opposed to a central bank in agricultural banking.

I can not help but believe, however, that any fear of opposition to a central bank in agricultural banking is unjustified, and that such opposition, if there is any, will promptly disappear upon a consideration of the principles which must control a system of land banks.

The whole theory of the land bank is to give to the individual borrower the benefit of the collective credit of the community, so as to secure for this individual farmer borrower a loan on the best terms and at the lowest interest rate.

I take it that no one will question the fact that the borrower who offers the best and most liquid security will receive the lowest interest rate and the most favorable terms. If this is true, then it follows that the best system of agricultural banking will be the system which offers to the investor a land bond secured in the best manner and having the widest market.

REASONS AGAINST A CENTRAL BANK IN COMMERCIAL BANKING.

Commercial banking consists in gathering together the cash of the community and using this collective cash to meet the needs of the community. A central bank in commercial banking is feared, because the cash resources of all the communities might be brought together into a central bank, to the detriment of some of the communities. The control of this collection of the cash resources of all the communities in the country might be dangerous if not properly exercised. The centralization of the cash resources of the country has been feared, because we all know that the man who controls the actual money of the country can largely control the business of the country, and the centralization of a large portion of the cash might offer to the individuals controlling the central institution too vast a power and too great an opportunity to enrich themselves at the expense of the general public. The danger in centralizing the cash resources exists because of the power which any man must have who controls the cash resources.

REASON FOR A CENTRAL BANK IN AGRICULTURAL BANKING.

Now, agricultural banking is an entirely different proposition. Land banks are not formed to gather the cash resources of the community and then lend out this cash, but exactly the reverse is true. They are intended to bring together the credit resources of the community, and, by combining these credit resources, to borrow from investors, on the best terms and at the lowest interest rate, money for the use of the individual in that community. The individual, with a farm in Georgia, is unable to borrow money locally except at high interest rates and on burdensome conditions. He can not borrow in New York or elsewhere, because his security is not known. But if the Georgia farmer can combine his credit resources with those of his neighbors and have his note or obligation guaranteed by a local bank, then by a State bank, and then by a central bank, the investor will be satisfied with the security offered and will be willing to lend money at lower rates and on advantageous terms.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Does my colleague desire a little additional time?

Mr. HOWARD. I would like a little more time.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. HOWARD. I thank the gentleman. I certainly appreciate it.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HOWARD. If the gentleman will permit me, I think I have everything in this speech except the applause. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURRAY. And the votes.

Mr. HOWARD. Within 10 minutes I think I can finish my argument, and at the end of that time I will be very glad to yield to my good friend from Texas.

NO DANGER OF INORDINATE POWER OR CONTROL IN A CENTRAL BANK IN AGRICULTURAL BANKING.

To speak of exercising any control or power over the farmers because of the existence of a central bank, as planned in my bill, seems to me to be absurd. If that bill were in effect, the investor in New York or Chicago might own a $1,000 bond issued by the central bank, due 30 or 35 years after its date. That bond would be secured by mortgages on Georgia farms, each guaranteed by a local bank in Georgia and by a Georgia State bank. These mortgages would likewise be due in 30 or 35 years, and would each contain an amortization provision providing for their gradual retirement by periodic payments. That is to say, that the Georgia farmer who paid $30 or $35 every 6 months for 30 years would have paid off not only the interest but the principal of his debt at the end of the term. How is it conceivable that the investor, holding the land-bank bond of the central bank, could exercise any influence over the Georgia farmer, whose mortgage falls due 30 years from date and who by paying $30 every 6 months will have paid off the mortgage of $1,000, both as to principal and interest, by the time the mortgage matures?

DISTINCT ADVANTAGES OF A CENTRAL BANK.

On the other hand, by providing for a central bank the individual farmer is given the benefit—

First. Of the collective credit of the community, as represented by the guaranty of his mortgage by the local bank.

Second. The collective credit of the farm-land banks of the State, as represented by the guaranty of his mortgage by the State bank.

Third. The collective credit of the farm-land banks of the Nation, as represented by the guaranty of his mortgage by the central bank.

Each farmer borrower, no matter where he may be, will get the benefit of the collective credit of his community, of the collective credit of the farm-land banks of his State, and of the collective credit of the farm-land banks of the Nation, as represented by the central bank. Can there be any question that, as a consequence, he will be able to obtain money on the best terms and at the lowest interest rates?

The Fletcher-Moss bill, with its system of independent banks, would not give him these advantages. While that bill does not limit the number of banks in any given State, let us assume that only one bank was established under that bill in each State. This would establish 48 banks, each offering their debentures for sale and competing in the money markets of the world for investment money. The investor would have to decide as to the comparative merits of the debentures issued by the bank in Georgia and the debentures issued by the bank in Illinois. Each State bank would be absolutely independent of all the others. Would not the result necessarily be that the States where farm lands are already most highly developed would be benefited to a much greater extent than those where help is most needed? Would not the investor naturally prefer the land-bank bonds of a thickly settled State where farm-land values were higher? And it must be remembered that the purpose of rural banking is not simply to help the man who is already able to help himself. Its purpose is as well, and principally, to help the small farmer who is not able to help himself.

INDEPENDENT BANKS WOULD SEEK THE LARGER COMMUNITIES AND WOULD LEND ONLY IN WELL-DEVELOPED SECTIONS.

Moreover, under the Fletcher-Moss bill it would seem to me that in a given State the banks would be established at large centers and would be disposed to lend only on lands in the well-developed sections of the State. Being allowed to do business anywhere in the State, and being organized purely on the basis of returns—except in cases of cooperative institutions—would they not naturally gravitate to the larger centers and lend their money only in the well-developed and populous sections of the State instead of using their resources to make small loans and build up the waste places?

THE SMALL LOCALITY CARED FOR UNDER THE HOWARD BILL.

Under my bill the limit of operations of any local bank is the county. The local bank is owned, controlled, and operated by local people. It is organized by them for the purpose of improving local conditions. The double liability on the stockholders will insure care in making loans, as will the other restrictions provided. The officers of the bank can readily see to the application of the loans because the loans are made to their neighbors. Their transactions will probably be small transactions. Their loans will be made to the small farmer, but through the system of State banks and of central banks and by means of the plan of guaranties the small farmer borrowing $100 on his land can get the benefit of the collective credit of the whole system and can secure his loan on the most advantageous terms.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. LEVER. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to impose on the committee any longer, but I do want to present just a little comparison of the bill of my distinguished friend [Mr. BULKLEY].

UNREASONABLE DIVISION OF COUNTRY INTO FEDERAL LAND-BANK DISTRICTS BY BULKLEY-HOLLIS BILL.

The Bulkley-Hollis bill, in effect, provides for a guaranty of the individual loan by the collective resources of the country, because it makes each of the 12 Federal land banks responsible for all land-bank bonds issued by any of the 12. I submit, with great deference, that the proposed subdivision of the country into Federal land-bank districts along the lines of the Federal reserve act is purely arbitrary and is not founded on either reason or experience. This subdivision into 12 districts in commercial banking was based on the currents of trade and the movements of business within a given area. No such reason exists in agricultural banking, and the division of the country into 12 Federal land-bank districts for agricultural purposes does not seem to me to be justified.

REASON FOR STATE LAND BANKS UNDER HOWARD BILL.

On the other hand, there is a distinct reason for having State banks limited in operation to the confines of one State.

Our laws in regard to land registration, conveyancing, mortgaging, and foreclosure are State laws controlled absolutely by the States. Unfortunately, these laws vary in the different States. The Federal Government can not change them. The forms of deeds and of mortgages and the methods of foreclosure in adjoining States are often entirely different. The whole problem of land banking is the sale, on advantageous terms and at low interest rates, of farm mortgages. It is natural that in any system the mortgages from one State should be guaranteed by a State bank limited in its operations to that State. It is natural and wise that the mortgages should come from the locality where the land is situated, guaranteed by the local bank to the State institution, and should pass from the State institution, after being guaranteed by it, to the central institution.

Again, the Bulkley-Hollis bill limits the interest rate which can be charged the farmer to the legal interest rate in the State where the land is located. The legal rate of interest in the States of the Union varies widely, and yet the mortgages in the State where the legal rate is 8 per cent are used by the Federal land bank as the basis for land-bank bonds just exactly as are the mortgages in a State where the legal rate is 6 per cent, and in all cases the land-bank bonds issued by one Federal land bank are guaranteed by all the other Federal land banks. The Bulkley-Hollis bill apparently encourages a continuation of the present widely divergent legal interest rates. It offers very small hope to the farmers of a State where the legal rate is high that that rate will be reduced.

Mr. BULKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. With pleasure.

Mr. BULKLEY. The gentleman should not overlook the limitation that is contained in the Bulkley-Hollis bill, that the land bank and the local organization together shall get only 1 per cent per annum, exactly the same limitation that is contained in the gentleman's bill.

Mr. HOWARD. That is true; but you do allow a bank to charge the legal rate of interest within the State, and it can not be more than 1 per cent above that, as I understand it.

Mr. BULKLEY. We allow the local association, which is composed exclusively of borrowers, the same as the gentleman proposes, to charge what it may deem necessary for its own safety; but it can not keep any of that money as profits, but must return it to the borrowers if there are no losses.

Mr. HOWARD. Less 1 per cent.

Mr. BULKLEY. Exactly the same as is proposed by the gentleman.

Mr. HOWARD. On the other hand, my bill and the Fletcher-Moss bill both provide that the rate charged to the farmer shall not exceed the interest rate on the land-bank bonds by more than 1 per cent. Experience has demonstrated in European countries that this is the wisest way in which to secure the best results to the farmer. My bill goes beyond this and holds out to the farmer a hope of further reduction in his interest rate, because the profits of the entire system of banks, after paying the interest and principal of the investment, are to be annually distributed among the borrowers themselves.

SHOULD RURAL BANKING BE CONTROLLED BY FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD?

The Bulkley-Hollis bill provides for the supervision and control of the system by the existing Federal Reserve Board. My bill and the Fletcher-Moss bill provide for separate boards. In my own judgment a separate board is wise, because I do not believe that agricultural banking and commercial banking should be too closely commingled. The plan of the one is practically a reversal of the other. Commercial banking collects cash and lends it out. Agricultural banking collects credit and sells it.

THE STRIKING ADVANTAGE OF THE HOWARD BILL.

But whether the system to be inaugurated is to be controlled by the Federal Reserve Board or by an independent body I still urge that a central bank in agricultural banking is extremely desirable, and that the best results can not be obtained for the individual farmer, except by giving him the benefit of the collective farming credit of the country when he wishes to obtain a loan. I still maintain that loans should be made by local banks within a limited area where the people who own and control the bank know the land, know the borrower, know the needs of the borrower, and can personally see to the application of the loan. I still maintain that with the small local bank, limited in its operations to a county, paying a fair dividend of 6 per cent to its stockholders, with the prospect that the money invested in the institution will ultimately be paid back to the stockholders and that the rates of interest on loans will constantly decrease, the best results can be obtained. I maintain that the system proposed in my bill will appeal to the local pride and patriotism of the farmer himself. It will offer him the opportunity of helping himself and of helping his community at no risk to himself. It will afford to the small and sparsely settled community the same advantages as to the large and rich agricultural section. It will tend to bring about uniformity in land registration, conveyancing, mortgaging, and foreclosure. It will tend to bring about uniformity in interest rates, and lower interest rates.

THE FARMERS SHOULD CONTROL THE RURAL BANKS.

In addition, any great reform that hopes to be successful must usually start at the bottom. I believe that the reform in agricultural banking should start with the local bank organized by the local farmer for his own benefit and for the benefit of his neighbors. If the farmers want a rural banking system, they must operate it themselves. Under my bill the farmers would own the local banks, and through the local banks would own the State banks and the central bank. All the profits of all the institutions would go to the farmers. All the institutions would be controlled by the farmers. The farmers who provide the money for the capital of the banks would receive 6 per cent and would ultimately get back their investments. The balance of the profits would be used to reduce the interest rates to borrowers, and in every case each borrower would get the benefit of the collective credit of the entire system to help him secure money on the best terms and at the lowest rate.

CONCLUSIONS.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not attempt to discuss my bill in any great detail or to make any extended comparison of the separate sections of the bills referred to. I wish to emphasize the importance of a central bank in any system of agricultural banking; the importance of basing a system of agricultural banks on local institutions limited in their operations to a small area and owned and controlled by local people. I wish to emphasize the necessity of limiting in some practical way the rates of interest which can be charged on farm loans, and of providing that the profits from the system shall redound to the interest of the borrower who makes these profits possible, after returning to the investor the amount of his investment and a reasonable dividend thereon. I do not believe that a system of independent farm-land banks is what this country needs, as outlined in the Fletcher-Moss bill. I can not see any reason for the arbitrary division of the country into Federal land-bank districts, as provided in the Bulkley-Hollis bill. I believe the natural and proper subdivision in land-banking is the county, the State, and the Nation. I believe that each borrower should be given the benefit of the collective credit of the whole system, and I believe that the borrower should, as far as possible, participate in the profits which he turns over to the system.

I believe the system should be one which will take care of the small landowner, and which will enable the tenant farmer to become the owner of his farm. A system must be provided which will not make it to the interest of the banks to lend to the well-to-do man or in the well-developed section. It must be a system which offers equal advantages to all and special privileges to none. It must be a system which will tend to build up the waste places of the country, and which will help the small farmer who now can get no help. It must be a system operated primarily in the interest of the farmer borrower, and the profits from the system should be used to better his condition and to lower his burdens. I believe that my bill in its plan more nearly provides for the attainment of these needs than any other bill that has yet been presented; and I respectfully submit that, whatever changes in its details may be advisable, the general principle of a central bank to issue and sell debentures, based on State banks and on county banks, and offering the collective credit of the whole system for the benefit of each individual borrower, is the advisable system for this country. I believe that the rate to be charged the farmer should be limited, not according to the legal rate in the State but by a maximum charge over and above the rate which the bank issuing land bonds has to pay the investor.

The provisions of the bill as to the business to be transacted by each of the banks, as to the supervision and control of the same by the Federal Government, and as to all the details of operation, have been carefully worked out, and will, I believe, receive favorable consideration, as they are fully understood. I believe that the bill is correct in its basic principle, because it enables each farmer to get the benefit of the collective credit of all the farming population; because it permits only one central bank to issue land-bank bonds, thereby tending to standardize the same, and tending toward greater uniformity in interest rates to farmers throughout the country; because it removes competition between individual banks representing different States and sections for investment of money, which must mean higher interest rates for the farmer; and because the system of banking outlined in this bill starts with the farmer and ends with the farmer. He controls the local bank, the State bank, and the central bank. He can not be ousted from the control. He gets the profits. He manages the system and must himself suffer if he mismanages. The system is based on cooperative action of the farmers. If they want improved facilities, they can get them. If they do not want them, they do without. Their personal interest, their work, their money, and their credit must be enlisted. Without these, no system will succeed. Agricultural banks must be owned and run by the farmer in order to succeed—and this is what is provided for in the bill I have introduced. [Applause.]

DETAILED REVIEW OF BILL H. R. 12746.

The general plan of the bill which I introduced in the House of Representatives on January 31, 1914 (H. R. 12746) involves:

1. The creation in the Treasury Department of a division of farm-land banking, to be under the general direction and charge of a farm-land banking board, composed of the Secretary of the Treasury, as chairman, Secretary of Agriculture, and the Comptroller of the Currency, the work of the division to be under the direct charge of a director of farm-land banking, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall serve for five years and be eligible for reappointment. The salary of the director is placed at $7,500, and an assistant director at $6,000 per year is provided for. The director of farm-land banking is authorized to employ the necessary clerks and assistants, and is required to make an annual report to Congress in regard to farm-land banks. The salaries and operating expenses of the farm-land banking board and of the director of farm-land banking, his assistants and employees, are to be provided for in the appropriation for the Treasury Department.

The general duties of the farm-land banking board are to formulate and adopt rules and regulations governing the operations for farm-land banks, and these rules and regulations are to be enforced by the director of farm-land banks. Provision is made that the rules and regulations shall be adopted and the directors shall be appointed within 90 days after the passage of the act.

Power is given to the division of farm-land banking, upon the recommendation of the director, to issue charters for local and State national farm-land banks, as provided for in the act; to exercise supervision and control over all farm-land banks established under the act, under general rules and regulations and under like general rules to withdraw or forfeit the charters of local and State farm-land banks or liquidate them when necessary.

Power is also given the division of farm-land banking, by general rules and regulations, to specify the conditions under which the privileges, or certain of them, authorized in the act shall be extended to local and State farm-land banks, and to provide for the extension of such privileges, or certain of them, only to those local and State farm-land banks operating in those States which have met the requirements of the division of farm-land banking as to the simplification of land-title registration and conveyancing; as to simplification and economy of methods of securing farm loans and foreclosing the same; as to the removal of any taxation upon mortgages; and as to the removal or waiver of any exemptions in regard to farm mortgages.

2. The creation of a system of national farm-land banks, comprising:

(a) Local banks, such as "Doeville National Farm Land Bank," limited in their operations to a county or other small political subdivision of the State.

(b) State banks, such as "Virginia National Farm Land Bank," limited in their operations to a given State, and acting as a clearing house and reserve agent for the local banks in that State.

(c) A central bank, to be known as the "United States National Farm Land Bank," to act as a clearing house and reserve agent for all the State and local farm-land banks, and to alone issue and sell collateral trust bonds or national land-bank bonds. These national land-bank bonds will be the obligations of the central bank, issued against the deposit of mortgages or deeds of trust on farm lands at not more than 50 per cent of the appraised value of such lands, when the lands are improved, and at not more than 40 per cent of the appraised value of other farm lands. The mortgages or deeds of trust, before being used by the central bank as collateral security for its national farm-land bonds, must be in each case guaranteed both as to principal and interest by the local bank of the county or other subdivision where the land is located, and must be then likewise guaranteed by the State bank of that State. Moreover, all such mortgages or deeds of trust must contain a mandatory provision for the repayment of the principal by the amortization plan; that is, by the payment, annually or semiannually, of small amounts on account of the principal, which payments will be sufficient to pay off the mortgages or deeds of trust at their maturity.

The general powers incident to corporations are given to all farm-land banks, including the right to continue for 50 years and reserving the right of change, amendment, or repeal of the charters so granted by Congress, provided that the rights of creditors of such banks are not affected by such action.

The bill enumerates certain general provisions applicable to all farm-land banks, as follows:

1. The capital stock, the income derived therefrom, the mortgages held by said banks, and the national land-bank bonds issued by the central bank are exempted from all taxation.

2. Every bank is prohibited from lending money upon the stock of any other farm-land bank, and no bank is allowed to lend to any one individual more than 20 per cent of its capital and surplus; but this latter provision does not apply to the guaranty of real-estate loans of local and State banks.

3. Each director is required to take a proper oath for the faithful performance of his duties.

4. Examinations by the directors are required by each bank at least once every three months.

5. Examinations of the affairs of each bank by examiners appointed by the director of farm-land banking are provided for substantially as examinations of national banks are provided for under the Federal reserve act.

6. In the case of every farm-land bank the director of farm-land banking is required at the time of organization to designate some individual who is not an officer or director of the bank and who is not objectional to the directors as Federal fiduciary agent, to be the representative in that bank of the division of farm-land banking.

The duties of this Federal fiduciary agent are specifically defined at great length in the case of local and State banks as well as in the case of the central bank. This agent practically acts as the Government representative to see that the requirements of law are complied with as regards farm-land loans:

A. In the case of local banks this agent is required—

(1) To certify that each mortgage or deed of trust is properly recorded and that the same is a first mortgage, and to certify that each note or bond purporting to be secured under such mortgage or deed of trust is so secured.

(2) To have joint possession or control with the local bank of all amortization payments or payments on the principal of mortgages held by the banks so long as such payments remain in the possession of the banks, and to see that proper credits are made upon the mortgages or deeds of trust when such principal payments are received. No disposition of such amortization or principal payments can be made without his consent in writing.

(3) To have supervisory control over all entries in the mortgage ledger where a detailed statement of all mortgages held by the bank as an evidence of long-term loans is kept.

B. In the case of State banks—

(1) To have joint possession and control with the bank of the mortgages sent to the State bank by the local bank after being guaranteed by the local bank.

(2) To have joint possession and control with the State bank of all amortization payments coming into its possession from the local banks. Such amortization payments made on mortgages sent by the local bank to the State bank must be forwarded by the local bank to the State bank.

(3) To have supervisory control of the mortgage ledger kept by the State bank.

C. In the case of the central bank—

(1) To certify to each collateral trust bond or national land-bank bond issued by the central bank against mortgages deposited with it, which mortgages have previously been guaranteed by a local and a State bank.

(2) To have joint possession and control of the mortgages held by the central bank, each of which has been guaranteed by a local and State bank. No mortgages can be withdrawn or changed without his consent in writing.

(3) To have joint control with the central bank of the amortization payments on such mortgages. These amortization payments are forwarded from the State bank to the central bank when the mortgages on which they are made are held by the central bank as a security for national land-bank bonds. The amortization payment under this plan goes from the local bank to the State bank and from the State bank to the central bank, always resting with the last guarantor of the mortgage.

(4) To have supervisory control of all entries in the mortgage ledger kept by the central bank.

D. To perform such other duties as the director of farm-land banking may prescribe. The salary of each Federal fiduciary agent is fixed by the joint agreement of the bank and of the director of farm-land banking and is paid by the bank.

7. The seventh general provision for farm-land banks prescribes what real estate may be purchased, held, and conveyed. The requirements are the same as in the case of national banks.

8. The eighth general provision, relating to farm-land banks, prescribes that the par value of the stock shall be $100 per share. The provisions regarding the stock are substantially the same as in the case of national banks, except that no person can vote in person or by proxy more than 10 per cent of the outstanding stock at any stockholders' meeting.

9. The ninth general provision provides for an increase of capital for any bank substantially as with national banks.

10. The tenth provision provides for a decrease of capital for any bank substantially as with national banks, except that no reduction can be made which will reduce the proportion that the capital and surplus of the bank bears to the outstanding guaranteed mortgages below the proportion provided by the act.

11. The eleventh general provision provides that the affairs of each local and State bank shall be managed by not less than five nor more than nine directors. It also specifies the requirements as to citizenship and residence of the directors, and requires that each director in a local bank must own at least two shares of stock; otherwise the provisions are substantially similar to those in the case of national banks.

12. The twelfth general provision provides for the election of president and vice presidents from the membership of the board.

13. The thirteenth general provision provides for double liability on the part of stockholders of local banks.

14. The fourteenth general provision defines this liability in the case of executors, and so forth, substantially as with national banks.

Sections 10 to 13, inclusive, provide for the incorporation of local banks by any number of natural persons not less than 10. It is specified that the name "National Farm Land Bank" shall be a part of the title of every local and State bank under this act, and that these words shall not be used by institutions other than those incorporated under the act. Local institutions are to be prefixed by a descriptive title and followed by the name of the county and State in which the bank is to operate. The other information to be contained in the articles of association is specifically outlined, and provision is made for acknowledging and filing the certificate.

It is provided that each local bank shall, upon being organized, have the following powers:

(1) To accept and pay interest on postal savings deposits and other time deposits from the National Government; to accept and pay interest on State time deposits, on time deposits of public funds, and on time deposits from individuals or corporations.

(2) This is the principal and distinguishing feature of the farm-land banks: To guarantee the payment of loans upon farm lands located within the county or other political subdivision in which such local bank is operated, provided—

(a) That such loans run for not less than five years.

(b) That such loans are secured by a first mortgage on farm lands located within such county, or are used to retire existing mortgages, so as to make them a first lien. Mortgages on lands outside of the county can be accepted as additional security, and provision is made for loans on land lying partly in two counties.

(c) That such loans do not exceed 50 per cent of the appraised value of productive farm lands or 40 per cent of the appraised value of other farm lands.

(d) That every such loan contain a mandatory provision for amortization by annual or semiannual payments.

(e) That every such loan may be paid off in whole or in part, upon reasonable notice, at any interest period, after such loan has continued for five years under rules prescribed by the division of rural banking.

The local banks are also authorized to sell and trade in mortgages guaranteed by it, and to invest its deposits in short-term farm loans, maturing within five years, which comply with the requirements of (b) and (c) next above. The local bank can also guarantee such short-time loans and sell, buy, and trade in the same.

The local bank can also use its capital stock, surplus, and deposits as a revolving fund for the temporary purchase or holding of long-term first-mortgage loans or short-term first-mortgage loans complying with the above requirements; or it can use the same for the purpose of buying and holding temporarily national land-bank bonds of the central bank, but the capital, surplus, and deposits can be permanently invested only in United States bonds, in bonds of the State in which the bank is located, or in other securities approved by the division of farm-land banking.

The local banks can also do such general banking business as is incident to the foregoing.

Section 14 provides certain limitations upon local banks, as follows:

(1) The local bank can guarantee long-term mortgages not exceeding fifteen times its capital and surplus and short-term mortgages not exceeding five times its capital and surplus.

(2) The capital and surplus of each bank are liable—

(a) For its guaranties on long-term mortgages.

(b) For its guaranties on short-term mortgages.

(c) For its deposits or other obligations.

This provision gives added strength to the long-term mortgages and discourages deposits except as an incident to mortgage loans.

(3) The administration charge or profit on long-term loans is limited to an annual charge of 1 per cent upon the amount unpaid on the loan. This entire 1 per cent may be retained by the local bank if the guaranteed loan is then sold. This encourages the securing of local investment in mortgages guaranteed by the local bank. If the mortgage, so guaranteed, is sent to the State bank, then one-half of this profit goes to the State bank for its guaranty. If the State bank guarantees the mortgage and sends it on to the central bank, then the State bank gets only one-fourth of the profit, the central bank gets one-fourth, and the local bank keeps one-half.

(4) The payments to be made by borrowers must, in all cases, be sufficient to pay the interest upon the loan, the administration charge or profit, and the amortization payments sufficient to retire the loan by the time it matures.

(5) Dividends to stockholders of local banks are limited to 6 per cent. Surplus earnings, after the payment of dividends, are used to create an earned surplus until the same is double the amount of paid-in capital. When the earned surplus is double the amount of paid-in capital, then the capital is bought in by the bank at par and paid for out of the surplus. Thereafter the earnings of the bank go to the depositors and borrowers in proportion to the business done under rules provided by the division of farm-land banking. This means the ultimate mutualization of the bank, the repayment to the stockholders of the money invested in the bank, and reduced interest rate to the farmer borrowers, for after the bank is mutualized the profits go to them. The farmer borrowers have created the surplus out of the interest charges which they have paid. The investor in the stock of the local bank has received 6 per cent on his investment, and the investment is tax free. When the surplus earnings are sufficient the investor in the stock receives back his money, and thereafter the farmer borrower gets the benefit of any profits.

The value of this provision can hardly be overestimated. It will insure to the investor a good return on his money and the ultimate repayment of his investment. It insures to the farmer constantly decreasing interest rates. It appeals to local pride and encourages safe and conservative management, because the farming population itself is ultimately to get the benefit of this management.

Section 15 provides for the appraisement committee, who are to appraise all property on which mortgage loans are made and are to make a written report.

Section 16 provides for insurance on any buildings upon the farm which are considered in the appraisement of the property on which a mortgage loan is made, and further provides that in appraising property for long-term loans buildings and destructible property shall not be valued at more than 20 per cent of the total appraisement.

Section 17 prohibits the operation of branches by local banks.

Section 18 provides for the conversion of existing land mortgage companies and other State institutions into local farm-land banks.

Section 19 authorizes local farm-land banks to receive on deposit postal-savings deposits, and to place as security for such deposits the national land-bank bonds issued against mortgages in the State where the local bank is situated. The local bank is authorized to buy these national farm-land bonds for the purpose of so using them.

This provision creates each local bank as a purchaser of the land-bank bonds issued by the central bank, and thereby helps to create a market for the national land-bank bonds. The purchase of these national land-bank bonds under this provision by the local bank does not exhaust its reserves materially, because such national land-bank bonds are immediately used as security for the deposit of postal-savings funds. In effect, the local banks obtain deposits of postal funds, and use these funds for the purchase of national land-bank bonds, which bonds are then placed as security for such deposits.

It is a serious question as to whether the Government should invest postal-savings funds directly in national farm-land bonds. Under this provision the Government simply deposits the postal-savings funds with the local banks and takes as security therefor the national land-bank bonds issued by the central bank. These national land-bank bonds must be issued against mortgages on lands in the State where the local bank is situated. These mortgages must be guaranteed by a local bank, and the assets of the local banks are primarily liable on this guaranty. The mortgages must then be guaranteed by the State bank and forwarded to the central bank. The central bank issues its land-bank bonds against these mortgages at par. The local bank can then buy these national land-bank bonds and deposit them as security for postal savings deposits with the local banks. The mortgages guaranteed by the local banks are being constantly reduced by amortization payments. As these mortgages are so reduced, the national land-bank bonds issued by the central bank are proportionately retired. The deposits of postal savings must be constantly secured by these national farm-land bonds at such figure or percentage as the postal savings trustees may decide.

Section 20 provides for the reserves to be held by local banks, and provides what proportion of such reserves may be held with the State bank or with the central bank.

Section 21 provides that each local bank upon its organization shall invest 10 per cent of its capital and surplus in stock of the central bank and 20 per cent of its capital and surplus in stock of its State bank. The proportion of capital and surplus so invested must be always maintained, and the stock of the State and central banks so held by local banks must be held as a permanent investment and not sold, collaterated, or disposed of. This stock is to be carried on the books of the local bank at its book value.

By this means the farmers own the local banks, the local banks own the State banks, and the local and State banks own the central bank. Thereby all the profits of the entire system drain back in the local banks. These profits are used—

First. To pay a fair return of 6 per cent, free from tax, to the investors in the local bank;

Second. To repay the amount of their investment to such investors; and Third. After this is done the profits of the local bank go to the borrowers and depositors from the local banks, thereby, in effect, reducing the rate of interest paid.

Section 22 provides for the organization of a State bank in each State as soon as 30 or more local banks have been organized in that State.

Section 23 outlines the details of such organization and the statements to be contained in the articles of association. The minimum capital is placed at $60,000, which would be 20 per cent of the capital of 30 local banks each organized with the minimum capitalization of $10,000.

Section 24 provides for the acknowledgment and preservation of the organization certificate.

Section 25 outlines the specific powers of State banks, as follows:

(1) To act as a clearing house for local banks in that State, to accept deposits from them, and pay the same rate of interest on all such deposits.

(2) To guarantee long-term loans as herein provided which have been first guaranteed by a local bank, provided that the amortization payments on such mortgages so guaranteed are turned over to the State bank, to be by it turned over to the central bank when the State bank sends on such mortgage guaranteed by it to the central bank.

(3) To rediscount short-term farm loans guaranteed by local banks having not more than two years to run; but the rate of rediscount must be the same to all local banks in the State. The State bank can hold such rediscounted short-term loans as a temporary investment, can sell the same with or without its indorsement, and afterwards buy back and resell the same.

(4) To use its capital stock, surplus, and deposits as a revolving fund for the temporary purchase or holding of long-term or short-term mortgage loans guaranteed by a local bank, and to use the same in buying in national land-bank bonds of the central bank. The capital and surplus can not be permanently invested in anything except United States bonds, bonds of the State in which the bank is located, or other securities approved by the division of farm-land banking.

(5) To exercise such general banking powers as are incident to the foregoing powers and to act as broker in selling short-term mortgage loans.

Section 26 outlines the limitations on State banks, as follows:

(1) The amount of long-term loans guaranteed by a State bank shall not exceed a hundred times its capital and surplus.

(2) The administration charge of the State bank for guaranteeing such long-term loans shall not exceed an annual charge of one-fourth of 1 per cent of the amount unpaid on the loan, another one-fourth going to the central bank.

(3) The commissions of the State bank for acting as broker in selling short-term loans and its rates of rediscount to local banks shall be subject to the supervision of the division of farm-land banking.

(4) The amount of short-term mortgage loans which can be guaranteed by a State bank shall not exceed five times its capital and surplus.

Section 27 provides for the investment of 10 per cent of the capital and surplus of the State bank in the capital stock of the central bank, as above outlined.

Section 28 provides for the election of directors for the State bank, each local bank having one vote. It also provides for the election by the local banks from the board of directors of a president and vice president for the State bank.

Section 29 provides for the reserves to be maintained by the State bank and provides what proportion of such reserve must be kept within its own vaults and where the balance may be kept.

Section 30 provides for branches of the State bank within the State and for the keeping of reciprocal accounts with other banks.

Section 31 incorporates the central bank under the name of "United States Farm Land Bank," with a capital of not less than a million dollars, and with the right of indefinite increase. Its principal place of business is fixed at Washington, and its charter continues for 50 years, with the right of renewal and subject to amendment or repeal by Congress, provided that the rights of creditors are not thereby affected.

Section 32 outlines the specific powers of the central bank, as follows:

(1) To act as a clearing house and reserve agent for State and local banks and to pay the same rate of interest on deposits from such banks. Also to receive postal savings and other governmental deposits.

(2) To have general banking powers, including the power to discount short-term farm loans for local banks, maturing within two years and guaranteed by State banks; to trade in short-term mortgage loans and paper guaranteed or indorsed by it; to buy and sell Government and State bonds; and to act as a broker in handling Government, State, county, municipal, and similar securities.

(3) To issue, sell, and trade in its national land-bank bonds provided—

a. That the mortgages against which such bonds are issued have been first guaranteed by a local and State bank.

b. That such mortgages comply with this act.

c. That its national land-bank bonds so issued are subject to call at par at any interest period or after a specified time (not longer than five years from date of issue) as may be provided in such bonds.

d. That such national land-bank bonds shall always be protected by the deposit of an equal amount in face value of first mortgages, maturing not less than five years after that date, and guaranteed by a local and State bank.

e. That all amortization payments on mortgages so held as security for such national land-bank bonds shall be forwarded to the central bank, held in the joint possession of the bank and the Federal fiduciary agent, and used in retiring its national land-bank bonds issued against such mortgages, so that the amount of national land-bank bonds shall never exceed the amount of the mortgages held as security therefor.

f. That as amortization payments are credited upon the mortgages a corresponding amount of national land-bank bonds shall be called in and paid.

g. That the mortgages held as security for such national land-bank bonds shall at all times be in the joint possession and under the joint control of the central bank and of the Federal fiduciary agent for said bank.

h. That the national land-bank bonds issued by the central bank shall be issued in series. All the national land-bank bonds of a given series must be secured by mortgages on lands in one State.

(This provision will enhance the selling value of the land-bank bonds, because the laws governing registration, foreclosure, exemption, etc., of the mortgages securing the same will be the same in the case of such mortgages and because each of such mortgages covers land in the same State.)

i. That no land-bank bonds shall be issued against a mortgage maturing earlier than five years after its date.

(This provision insures the issue of land-bank bonds only against mortgages containing an amortization requirement.)

(4) To use its capital stock, surplus, and deposits as a revolving fund for the temporary purchase or holding of mortgages guaranteed by a local and State bank until land-bank bonds can be issued against same; or to use its capital and surplus for trading in its national land-bank bonds, so as to maintain the price of the same; or to use them in rediscounting short-term mortgage loans guaranteed by a local and State bank, and maturing at not longer than two years, provided that such capital and surplus can only be permanently invested in United States Government securities.

(5) To act as a depository for the National Government, and particularly to receive deposits of postal savings funds and to invest the same or such portions of the same as it may by law be authorized to invest in Government, State, county, and municipal bonds, or in long-term, first-mortgage, farm bonds.

(6) To rediscount for national banking associations farm loans held by them, and to rediscount with such association short-term farm loans held by it which comply with the provisions of section 24 of the Federal reserve act. Such rediscount by a national banking association of short-term farm loans is to be considered and treated as a farm loan under section 24 of the Federal reserve act.

It seems probable that the farm loans authorized under section 24 of the Federal reserve act will probably be small in number and amount, as a commercial bank will naturally not desire to tie up its funds in farm mortgages. This provision enables the commercial banks to rediscount for the central bank, taking short-term farm loans held by it, which have been guaranteed by a local and State bank, and treating these as loans under section 24 of the Federal reserve act. The practical effect of this will be to make available some of the funds in the national banks for the use of short-term farm loans through a system of rediscount; whereas it seems improbable that any large amount of relief will come to the farmers by reason of the direct operation of said section 24 of that act.

Section 33 provides for the reserves to be kept by a central bank.

Section 34 provides for the management and control of the central bank by a board of governors, consisting of nine members. Four of these are appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to serve for life or during good behavior. Vacancies among these four will be filled in like manner. The remaining five governors are selected by the stockholding banks, and arrangement is made for their serving for eight years. The election of these five governors is held by the State bank, each State bank casting as many votes as there are local banks in the State, and each local bank having the right to instruct how its vote shall be cast.

From the five governors selected by them the stockholding banks select two, and also select one of the four named by the President. From these three so selected the President must name one as president and two as vice presidents of the central bank, and a new election for president and vice presidents takes place every eight years. In case of a vacancy in the office of president or vice president, the board of governors fill the vacancy for the unexpired term from among their number.

The salaries are fixed as follows:

Each member of the board of governors, $10,000 per year; each vice president, $12,000 per year; the president of the bank, $15,000 per year.

All governors are required to devote their entire time to the work and are prohibited from being interested financially in any local bank. Each governor is required to give a bond for $100,000.

The foregoing seems to be a fair and just method of selecting the directors of the central bank. The majority of the directors are chosen by the stockholding banks, and each of these directors serves for eight years. A minority is appointed by the President and the Senate and hold office for life. This insures a permanence in office of some of the members, while the control rests with the farmers themselves through the local banks which they own and control.

Section 35 provides that the central bank shall not be permanently organized until at least 12 State banks have been organized. Provision for a temporary organization of a central bank, under the direction of the farm-land banking board, is made in this section.

Section 36 provides for the creation and operation of branches of the central bank, both within and outside of the United States, under the direction of the division of farm-land banking.

Section 37 enumerates certain privileges granted to national land-bank bonds, issued by the central bank, by making them available for the following purposes:

(1) As security for the deposit of postal savings funds in any farm-land bank.

(2) As a local investment for trust funds and estates administered by United States courts.

(3) As a security for loans from national banking associations to farm-land banks under the provisions of section 24 of the Federal reserve act, as above outlined.

But these privileges are extended only to national farm-land bonds of the central bank issued against mortgages on lands located in a State which—

(a) Exempts such mortgages from all State taxation or assessment, direct or indirect;

(b) Withdraws or cancels or waives the right to claim any exemption of such mortgages;

(c) Provides for registration of land titles, for conveyance, and for foreclosure, so as to give reasonable protection to the holders of mortgages in the opinion of the division of farm-land banking; and

(d) Accepts the land-bank bonds of the national farm-land banks, issued against mortgages in its State as a local investment for the funds of saving investors in that State, of trust funds and estates controlled by the courts of that State, and as a local investment for the reserves of insurance companies in that State.

Section 38 provides that any borrower may pay off his mortgage, or any part thereof, on any interest period after the first five years, in cash or by presenting to the bank the national land-bank bonds of the same series as those issued against his mortgages. It also provides that the central bank can buy in its national land-bank bonds, cancel them, and, at the same time, release a corresponding amount of mortgages; but the central bank, when it calls in such land-bank bonds for payment, must pay for them at par.

This provision is obviously fair, and encourages the individual farmer to invest in national land-bank bonds of the series in which his mortgage is used.

Section 39 exempts national land-bank bonds from all taxes, assessments, or charges.

Section 40 places all matters relating to the organization and operation of farm-land banks under the division of farm-land banking.

Section 41 appropriates a million dollars to be temporarily invested in the stock of the central bank until this stock can be taken up by State and local banks. This money is to be repaid to the Treasurer of the United States, with interest at 2 per cent, in amounts of not less than $50,000 each, as and when stock in the central bank is taken up by the local and State banks.

The necessity for first incorporating the central bank before the State and local banks is obvious. Until the State and local banks are organized, the control of the central bank is under the farm-land banking board. As the State and local banks are organized, this money is repaid to the Treasury.

Section 42 appropriates $100,000, to be expended under the direction of the farm-land banking board in organizing the central bank and in helping to organize local and State banks.

Section 43 provides for offenses committed under this act.

Section 44 repeals all acts inconsistent with this act.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMSON].

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I would not detain the committee to-night to make the observations which I have to make, nor would I ask for time at this stage of this last session of this Congress when we are so pressed for time, but would make these observations under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, were it not for the fact that I feel that such observations as I have to make ought not to be made in any other way than on the floor of the House.

Mr. Chairman, on a number of occasions the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] has attacked the Forest Service, which is in the Department of Agriculture, and he has made charges on this floor against the former Chief Forester, Mr. Gifford Pinchot, and has virtually dared some friend of his to arise here and defend him.

Mr. Pinchot needs no defense, in my judgment, against the outcries of the gentleman from Washington. The character, integrity, and far-sighted wisdom of Mr. Pinchot in everything he did as a Government official is well known throughout the country.

To catch the significance of the railings of the gentleman from Washington one must not only know what he says, but must see him say it, for it is only in that way that one may know the animus—the bitterness of the dislike—to use a mild term—in which the gentleman from Washington holds this man, to whom this country is the most indebted for the preservation and conservation of its natural resources.

The gentleman from Washington detests the very word "conservation," and he regards anybody who believes in that policy as little short of simple-minded. What wonder that he explodes at every mention of the name of the man who has done so much to make conservation what it is in our country to-day? It is not surprising to know that this is the attitude of the gentleman from Washington. When we examine his political ancestry and find that he has been educated in the school in which Mr. Guggenheim, of Colorado; Mr. Clark, of Montana; Mr. Benton, of Kansas; Mr. Mitchell, of Oregon; and Mr. Wilson, of his own State, have been masters, it is easy to understand that our friend from Washington has been trained from his political youth to fight all attempts to remove the vast wealth represented in the natural resources of our country from the grasp of the special interests who would gain the monopoly of all of them, if they only could, and to strike down any man, and particularly any official, who might succeed in those attempts.

And, again, the attitude of the gentleman from Washington is made plainer when we recall that in the Pinchot-Ballinger controversy, this same gentleman from Washington was the mouthpiece of Mr. Ballinger here in the House.

On January 5, 1910, in speaking for House joint resolution 102, introduced by himself the gentleman from Washington, referring to Mr. Ballinger, said:

> It is charged that he is not in harmony with the conservation movement. He is accused of permitting certain interests to seize the natural resources of the country. Yet it must be said that instead of following the example of many of the so-called "conservationists," he has done something more than sermonize and talk in glittering generalities that tickle the fancy and mean nothing. For the first time we have presented to Congress a fixed, definite plan to conserve the resources of the country. * * * A plan upon which results can be accomplished.

A plan upon which results can be accomplished! Yes, indeed; the results dreamed about and longed for, and to get which the big special interests planned and schemed; special interests some of which were made up of men of great influence in the West, one group of whom were known as the Seattle crowd, men located in the gentleman's own district!

And the gentleman from Washington was the champion of this official who always leaned toward those interests and away from the interests of the public.

No wonder the gentleman from Washington does not admire Mr. Pinchot, who has always been and is to-day opposed to all the principles, with respect to our public domain, that Mr. Ballinger advocated, and strongly in favor of the public-land policies that Mr. Ballinger opposed.

Although I believe, as I have already stated, that Mr. Pinchot needs no defense, especially against the cry of such an arch enemy of conservation as is the gentleman from Washington, I can not remain silent when he challenges any friend of Mr. Pinchot to get up on this floor and deny his statements, especially when those statements are wholly false, as they are.

Not only are his statements false, but the gentleman must either know them to be false or he has not given the subject matter on which he speaks that investigation which he should give it before making any such wild charges.

On August 18 last, following some remarks I made on the floor here, in which I quoted a statement made by Mr. Pinchot in his testimony before the Committee on the Public Lands in connection with the bill that was then before the House, the gentleman from Washington suffered one of his attacks, during which he made this statement:

> I find that Mr. Gifford Pinchot was appointed June 21, 1898, Chief of the Bureau of Forestry, Department of the Interior.

The gentleman from Washington could not have "found" that for it is not true. Mr. Pinchot was appointed July 1, 1898, Chief of the Division of Forestry, Department of Agriculture. I beg to call the attention of the gentleman from Washington to a few more facts that he could have found if he sought them and if he had not been afraid the truth might have furnished such a state of affairs as would not suit his purposes.

Mr. Pinchot never presided over a bureau in the Department of the Interior in his life. On February 22, 1897, he was appointed to make a special investigation in connection with the forest reserves, directly under the Secretary of the Interior. This investigation consumed about six months. From the time he concluded that investigation until July 1, 1898, when he was appointed Chief of the Division of Forestry in the Department of Agriculture, Mr. Pinchot was not connected with the Government service in any way.

At the time forest reservations were first authorized all matters relating to the conveyance or reconveyance of any of the lands within those reservations was put under the jurisdiction of Division P, General Land Office, Department of the Interior, and the management and control of all those questions has remained in that department to this day. All exchanges under the lieu-land law were under the jurisdiction of the Interior Department, and never under the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture, and Mr. Pinchot had no more to do with those questions than the Chief of the Weather Bureau did.

The Bureau of Forestry never was in the Interior Department. The Division of Forestry was created in the Department of Agriculture by act of June 30, 1886. The purpose of the establishment of this division in the department was to enable the Commissioner of Agriculture to experiment, investigate, and report upon the subject of forestry, and the collection and distribution of valuable economic forest-tree seeds and plants. At this time the creation of forest areas or reserves was not attempted nor contemplated.

With the increasing realization that the Nation's forest resources must be protected, and with the immense growth of irrigation interests in the West, the necessity for retaining permanent Federal control over selected forest areas was recognized. This led to the act of March 3, 1891, which authorized the President to set apart forest reservations, now called national forests. The mere creation and setting apart of forest reserves, however, without providing for their use, proved ineffectual, and Congress passed the act of June 4, 1897, which gave the Secretary of the Interior authority over these forest reservations and provided that they should be administered by the General Land Office. This was on the theory that the management of land, not forests, was involved.

The questions relating to the trees themselves and to the forests, as such, were administered by the Division of Forestry in the Department of Agriculture. By the act of March 2, 1901, the name of this Division of Forestry in the Department of Agriculture was changed to the Bureau of Forestry. Quoting from that act (31 U. S. Stat. L., p. 929) appropriation was made for this bureau—to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to experiment and to make and continue investigations and report on forestry, forest reserves, forest fires, and lumbering; to advise the owners of woodlands as to the proper care of the same; to seek, through investigations and the planting of native and foreign species, suitable trees for treeless regions; to collect and distribute valuable economic forest-tree seeds and plants; * * * for the conducting of experiments and investigations * * * and * * * collating, digesting, reporting, illustrating, and printing the results of such experiments and investigations.

This Bureau of Forestry had nothing whatever to do with the management or control of the land within the forest reservations.

In the management of the land within the forest reservations the General Land Office, in the Department of the Interior, found that the complex, technical problems arising from the necessary use of forest and range demanded the introduction of scientific methods and the use of a trained force, which could not be provided under the system then existing.

The advice and services of the Bureau of Forestry were found necessary, but, under the law, could be but imperfectly utilized.

It became apparent that the various branches of Government forest work must be consolidated, and this step was urged upon Congress by the executive officers concerned and by the President.

This resulted in the passage of the act of February 1, 1905, by the terms of which the entire jurisdiction over the national forests, except such laws as affect—to quote from the act (33 U. S. Stat. L., p. 628)—"the surveying, prospecting, locating, appropriating, entering, relinquishing, reconveying, certifying, or patenting" of the lands, was transferred to the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Bureau of Forestry in the Department of Agriculture was thereafter known as the Forest Service.

It will be noted that all matters relating to the conveyance or reconveyance of the title to forest-reserve lands remained still under the jurisdiction and control of the Department of the Interior, and it is under the control of that department to-day.

Now, a word as to the lieu-land law. The gentleman from Washington has made serious charges against Mr. Pinchot to the effect that certain "land steals" in the West, involving hundreds of thousands of acres of valuable timbered land, have been accomplished without any protest from Mr. Pinchot, and in some cases the gentleman from Washington alleges that these steals were put over with Mr. Pinchot's active assistance.

Every such charge made by the gentleman from Washington is as contemptible as it is false. I doubt if the gentleman would have been as glib with his repetitions of these charges if he were not making them against a man who is without the power to come onto this floor and speak for himself.

In making his charges against Mr. Pinchot, the gentleman from Washington mentions three specific cases. I shall take up each one of those three cases, but before I do so I want to return to the lieu-land law for a moment. That law was passed June 4, 1897. In the creation of the forest reserves it, of course, became necessary in many cases to include lands that had been acquired by entrymen under previous Federal statutes, and a number of railroad and wagon-road grants were also included. In some cases there would be a homestead in a sparsely settled valley around which a forest reserve was thrown. By the creation of the reserve this homestead was isolated, and to give the settler relief was obviously proper and necessary, and this relief could only be given by buying him out or by exchanging the settler's land for a similar tract outside the reserve. But, as is often the case, the just cause of the settlers was used as a mask by certain men. The cry, purporting to come from the settlers over the terrible hardships inflicted by the forest reservations incited, even in those days, the deep suspicion of many. To-day it is well known that this clamor for relief was largely manufactured, not in the humble cabin of the settler but in a great railroad office in the Middle West.

The lieu-land law, as passed, did not confine the relief it afforded to "settlers" or "homesteaders," but allowed "owners" to exchange their holdings within forest reservations for tracts "not exceeding in area" the tracts relinquished within the forest reservations. It will be noted that the law very carefully omitted to say that these tracts outside the reservations were to be of equal value with, or of not greater value than, the tracts inside the reservations, for which they were exchanged.

The result of this law was soon evident. Mountain peaks, barren hillsides, lava beds, swamp lands, and other valueless holdings of great railway companies were released, and the most valuable timber, coal, and oil lands within the public lands were taken in exchange. Secretary Bliss refused to allow railroad grants to be exchanged, but permitted these exchanges in the case of wagon-road, school, and other grants. However, when Mr. Hitchcock became Secretary of the Interior he held that the lieu-land law allowed exchange with any "owner." The bars were let down for wholesale fraud, and a national scandal resulted.

Among other "steals," the ones referred to by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] in making his charges against Mr. Pinchot took place.

The blame for these "steals" is to be laid at the doors of Congress itself, first, because they passed any such law which authorized such exchanges without providing that the land given by the Government in exchange for land relinquished within a forest reserve should not be of greater value than the land so relinquished; and, second, because they neglected for so long to repeal the law after its serious defects became apparent. Further blame for the "steals" is to be laid at the door of the department having to do with the execution of that law, for surely it was within their power to insist that whatever exchanges were made under the law must involve tracts of equal or approximately equal values. But the department did not take that stand; it allowed relinquishments of worthless areas and permitted the relinquishers to take in exchange areas of very great value.

The department that must bear that blame is the Department of the Interior, which had entire control of the administration of the lieu-land law.

Now, the gentleman from Washington wails and gnashes his teeth because Mr. Pinchot, presiding over a bureau in the Department of Agriculture, which had nothing to do with the conveyances and reconveyances involved in these exchanges, and which had not the slightest control or power over them by the terms of the law under which they were made, a man who has never been connected in any official capacity with the Department of the Interior in his life, which department did have charge of these conveyances under the law, did not object and protest against these exchanges made under the lieu-land law, which exchanges amounted to "steals."

I answer the gentleman from Washington:

First. It was not his business to object or protest. The exchanges were made under the sole supervision of the Department of the Interior. Mr. Pinchot was the chief of a bureau in the Department of Agriculture. He had no responsibility of any sort, shape, or kind in connection with these exchanges. It may be contended by the gentleman from Washington that after the passage of the act of February 1, 1905, the Bureau of Forestry had such a large control and jurisdiction over the forest reservations that any proposed conveyance or reconveyance of title to any part or parts of those reservations which might be objected to or protested against by that bureau would not be permitted by the Land Office. If any such contention is made, I answer it by pointing out that the repeal of the lieu-land law, which occurred very shortly after February 1, 1905, expressly excepted any agreements or contracts which had previously been entered into by the Secretary of the Interior with reference to these exchanges. And such of these exchanges as took place after the Bureau of Forestry received its enlarged jurisdiction under the act of February 1, 1905, and which come within these "steals" cited by the gentleman from Washington, were protected by these agreements or contracts so excepted from the act which repealed the lieu-land law.

Second. Mr. Pinchot is not the kind of a man who acts only when he is obliged to, and as a matter of fact he did protest against these lieu-land exchanges.

Within a few months after he became connected with the Bureau of Forestry in the Department of Agriculture, in a public address, Mr. Pinchot strongly urged the repeal of the lieu-land law, and from that time on he actively urged this step on numerous occasions.

The making of such charges as the gentleman from Washington has uttered against Mr. Pinchot on this floor in my hearing a number of times is not anything new or novel. Time after time this faithful servant of the public interests has been slandered and vilified by conservation haters like the gentleman from Washington. Some years ago Senator Beveridge, in answering one of these slanders, used the following language:

I find that it is true, as the Senator from Oregon described, that large tracts of lands in Washington which were worthless had been released and lieu lands taken up in valuable portions of Oregon. But what has this bureau to do with that? What are the facts? Let us be just to everybody. Nobody intends to accuse any man falsely nor condemn any man unjustly.

I am not sure that the Senator would have used these words if he had heard the gentleman from Washington address himself to this question. Senator Beveridge went on to say:

The truth is, that was done under a construction of the law by the Land Office some years ago, and one of the first objections to it that was made within the Government itself was made by the Bureau of Forestry, and personally by Gifford Pinchot, the Chief Forester.

On October 22, 1903, President Roosevelt appointed a Public Land Commission, consisting of W. A. Richards, F. H. Newell, and Gifford Pinchot, to investigate public-land conditions throughout the country. On March 7, 1904, a preliminary report of this commission was made, which recommended action on the lieu-land law. That report reads in part as follows:

LIEU LANDS.

Careful study has been given by your commission to the subject of forest-reserve lieu-land selections. These selections have given rise to great scandal and have led to the acquisition by speculators of much valuable timber and agricultural land and its consolidation into large holdings. Furthermore, the money loss to the Government and the people from the selection of valuable lands in lieu of worthless areas has been very great. There has been no commensurate return in the way of increased settlement and business activity. Public opinion concerning lieu-land selections, by railroads in particular, has reached an acute stage. The situation is in urgent need of a remedy, and your commission recommends the repeal of the laws providing for lieu-land selections.

A partial remedy by Executive action has already been applied by carefully locating the boundaries of new forest reserves and thus limiting lieu-land selections to comparatively insignificant areas. The last annual message to Congress declares definitely that—

"The making of forest reserves within railroad and wagon-road land-grant limits will hereafter, as for the past three years, be so managed as to prevent the issue, under the act of June 4, 1897, of base for exchange or lieu selection (usually called scrip). In all cases where forest reserves within areas covered by land grants appear to be essential to the prosperity of settlers, miners, or others, the Government lands within such proposed forest reserves will, as in the recent past, be withdrawn from sale or entry pending the completion of such negotiations with the owners of the land grants as will prevent the creation of so-called scrip."

There are now lands in private ownership within existing forest reserves, and similar lands must to a limited extent be included in new reserves. Therefore a method is required by which the Government may obtain control of nonagricultural holdings within the boundaries of these reserves. Your commission recommends the following flexible plan: Upon the recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture, when the public interest so demands, the Secretary of the Interior should be authorized, in his discretion, to accept the relinquishment to the United States of any tract of land within a forest reserve covered by an unperfected bona fide claim lawfully initiated or by a patent, and to grant to the owner in lieu thereof a tract of unappropriated, vacant, surveyed, nonmineral public land in the same State or Territory and of approximately equal area and value as determined by an examination, report, and specific description by public surveys of both tracts, to be made on the ground by officials of the Government. When exchange under these conditions can not be effected, lands privately owned within forest reserves should be paid for in cases where the public interest requires that such lands should pass into public ownership. The Secretary of the Interior should be authorized to take the necessary proceedings as rapidly as the necessary funds are provided.

Referring to this Land Commission report, Senator Beveridge in the speech from which I have already quoted said:

The so-called "lieu-land law" which permitted the exchange of lands in forest reserves for lands outside was passed June 4, 1897, before Pinchot, the forester, came into the Government service as Chief Forester. Whether or not its meaning was erroneously interpreted by the Secretary of the Interior so as to extend its action to railroad and other lands not contemplated by Congress is not the question. Without doubt the law was a bad one and worked great injury to the Government. It was recommended for repeal February 13, 1905, * * * by the Public Lands Commission * * * of which this man Pinchot, the Chief Forester, was a member, and it is my understanding that it was upon his initiative that the commission made the report.

Later on in the same speech the Senator said:

I think, perhaps, the first man in the whole department who recognized the bad features of this law, and did it quickly, and who immediately took steps, as he always does, to correct a wrong, whether he committed it or not—and in this instance we all know it was committed in the Land Office—to immediately correct it, was Mr. Pinchot. The Forestry Service never did have anything to do with the wrongs of which you so justly complain, except to suggest and help in correcting them.

Now, I wish to address myself to the three specific cases mentioned by the gentleman from Washington in connection with these baseless charges he persists in repeating. I shall take them up in the order in which he mentioned them in the remarks he made the last time he repeated his attack, which was September 12.

The first case he mentions is the Northern Pacific Railroad case. In the creation of Mount Rainier National Park some of the lands belonging to this railroad were included within the reserve. A large part of these lands were later exchanged under the lieu-land provision for an equal area outside the reservation. The land turned over to the Government by the railroad in this exchange was of little value, while the land secured from the Government by the railroad was timbered land of great value. Why was this "steal," as the gentleman from Washington terms it—and it was a steal—permitted? The gentleman from Washington alleges (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 15205, last session) that it was accomplished with the assistance of Mr. Pinchot. I allege that statement to be an untruth and a base slander.

Let us see what the facts are.

The Pacific Forest Reserve in the State of Washington was created by proclamation issued by President Harrison on February 20, 1893 (Twenty-seventh United States Statutes, page 1063). The Mount Rainier Forest Reserve, in the same State, was created by proclamation issued by President Cleveland on February 22, 1897 (Twenty-ninth United States Statutes, page 896). Both of these reservations were thus created before Mr. Pinchot became connected with the Bureau of Forestry. On March 2, 1897, a Member of this body from the State of Washing, now a Member of the Senate from my State, introduced H. R. 4058, setting apart portions of these two forest reserves, to be known as the Washington National Park. The bill passed both the House and the Senate, but was held up by a pocket veto by President Cleveland. Senator Wilson, of Washington, was the champion of this bill in the Senate. In the following Congress Senator Wilson introduced the same bill, but was unable to secure its passage. In the next Congress Senator Wilson again introduced this bill, S. 2552, and under his guidance it passed the Senate June 8, 1898. It came over to the House and was reported favorably from the Committee on the Public Lands and was passed. It became a law on March 2, 1899 (Thirtieth United States Statutes, page 993). Under this act as finally passed this park was called Mount Rainier National Park.

The third section of this bill expressly gave to the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. the right to select land outside of these reserves in lieu of land within the reserves which had previously been granted to it by Congress. This section reads as follows:

That upon execution and filing with the Secretary of the Interior by the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. of proper deed releasing and conveying to the United States the lands in the reservation hereby created, also the lands in the Pacific Forest Reserve which have been heretofore granted by the United States to said company, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, and which lie opposite said company's constructed road, said company is hereby authorized to select an equal quantity of nonmineral public lands, so classified as nonmineral at the time of actual Government survey, which has been or shall be made, of the United States, not reserved and to which no adverse right or claim shall have attached or have been initiated at the time of the making of such selection, lying within any State into or through which the railroad of said Northern Pacific Railroad Co. runs, to the extent of the lands so relinquished and released to the United States: Provided, That any settlers on lands in said national park may relinquish their rights thereto and take other public lands in lieu thereof to the same extent and under the same limitations and conditions as are provided by law for forest reserves and national parks.

Notice how skillfully that act is worded. The Northern Pacific Railroad Co. had only 18 miles of track in the State of Oregon, running from Goble to Portland. Oregon had some of the most valuable timberland in the public domain at that time. They wanted this act to be so worded that they would not have to be confined to the State of Washington, but could go anywhere where their road happened to extend and reach out and take a part of the public domain.

Note that this act from which I have quoted gave them the right to select lands within any State "into or through which the railroad of the said Northern Pacific Railroad Co. runs."

Those simple little words "into or through which" allowed the Northern Pacific to release the lands in the Rainier National Park and select lands in any of the Western States touched by their road.

There is another interesting thing about that act. It expressly authorized the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. to relinquish their title to lands within the national park and select in lieu thereof other lands "of equal quantity." But those who drafted the act were very careful that it should not provide that these lands selected by the railroad company in lieu of those relinquished by it should be of equal value with the lands so relinquished or not of greater value than the lands relinquished, and Congress in passing the act neglected to put in that provision. Again, the act provided that the lands selected by the railroad company should be nonmineral in character, but they were careful not to put in the act any provision that would interfere with the selection by the company of the richest timbered lands in the United States.

Now, what happened? Within three days after that act became a law the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. released in round numbers 450,000 acres of land to the Government, which had little value, and in lieu thereof they filed on some of the most valuable timberlands in the State of Washington, and then crossed over the line into Oregon and selected other large areas there. It has been alleged that the Weyerhauser interests bought the right of selection from the Northern Pacific Railroad

Co. at the rate of $6.50 per acre, amounting in the aggregate to about $3,000,000.

Now, what connection did Mr. Pinchot have with these transactions? Not one bit more than my baby boy did—no connection whatever.

The forest reserves involved were created before Mr. Pinchot became connected with the Bureau of Forestry. The creation of Washington National Park, or, more properly speaking, Mount Rainier National Park, occurred after he became connected with the Bureau of Forestry; but it was done by act of Congress after repeated attempts to accomplish the same thing by gentlemen representing the State of Washington in this House and in the Senate. And this exchange of lands effected by the Northern Pacific, which the gentleman from Washington now characterizes as a "steal," was specifically authorized by that act of Congress, introduced and put through the Senate by a Senator from Washington, and through the House by a Representative from Washington.

After that act became a law the department was powerless to prevent the railroad company from accomplishing the exchange which the gentleman from Washington now bitterly and correctly assails as a "steal." Remember that the department having jurisdiction of the matter was the Interior Department, with which Mr. Pinchot had no connection whatever.

Now, where does Mr. Pinchot's "assistance" come in? Nowhere. It is a creation of the disordered brain of the gentleman from Washington, conjured up in his eagerness to cast some aspersion on Mr. Pinchot.

The next case mentioned by the gentleman from Washington is the Santa Fe Railroad case; at least that is the way in which he referred to it. All the exchanges made in that instance were made under the act of 1897, known as the lieu-land or indemnity-selection law, passed, as I have pointed out, ostensibly in the interest of the entryman who found himself within a forest reserve, the act allowing him, and incidentally all others who had holdings within the reserves, to release his holdings to the Government and to take up lands elsewhere in lieu of the lands which he might surrender to the Government. It was Mr. Hitchcock, of Missouri, then Secretary of the Interior, who made the ruling that this act included railroad grants. The original act, passed, I believe, as a rider on an appropriation bill, permitted those relinquishing lands within a reserve to go and select other lands anywhere, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, provided only they were vacant and were owned by the people of the United States. The acts of June 6, 1900, and March 3, 1901, also included in appropriation bills, limited the scope of the act of June 4, 1897, and restricted the power of these people and companies who had lands located within the reserves to the selection of land outside the reserves which had been surveyed, in lieu of the lands they were surrendering.

Finally, as I have pointed out, this thing had become so notorious and so infamous in every Western State that a demand went up everywhere that this old indemnity selection law should be abolished and repealed, and it was repealed; but let me call attention to the wording of the repealing act, the act of March 3, 1905. It read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the acts of June 4, 1897; June 6, 1900; and March 3, 1901, are hereby repealed, so far as they provide for the relinquishment, selection, and patenting of lands in lieu of tracts covered by an unperfected bona fide claim or patent within a forest reserve—

And here is the important part—but the validity of contracts entered into by the Secretary of the Interior prior to the passage of this act shall not be impaired: Provided, That selections heretofore made in lieu of lands relinquished to the United States may be perfected and patents issue therefor the same as though this act had not been passed; and if for any reason not the fault of the party making the same, any pending selection is held invalid, another selection for like quantity of land may be made in lieu thereof.

Here was a qualified repeal of the indemnity selection acts that were on the statute books at that time. It excepted from the effect of the repeal those exchanges previously arranged or contracted for through the Secretary of the Interior.

This repealing act was passed a little more than a month after the passage of the act enlarging the jurisdiction of the Bureau of Forestry, in the Department of Agriculture, over which Mr. Pinchot presided. With a cunning, at which the gentleman from Washington is adept, he throws the blame for all these land exchanges or "steals" which followed that date at the door of Mr. Pinchot, then Chief of this Bureau of Forestry, or the Forest Service, as it then came to be called, and having constituted himself prosecutor, witness, judge, and jury, he pronounces Mr. Pinchot guilty of permitting these "steals," and even of conniving at them.

Why has not the gentleman from Washington reminded us at these different times when he has taken it upon himself to advise us on the subject, that the act of Congress enlarging the jurisdiction of the Bureau of Forestry expressly excepted from its terms and withheld from that bureau all matters relating to "the surveying, prospecting, locating, appropriating, entering, relinquishing, reconveying, certifying, or patenting" of these lands? Why has he not reminded us that the repeal of the lieu-land law, which repealing act was passed within five weeks after the passage of this other act I have just referred to, expressly excepted from its terms all exchanges previously arranged for or contracted for through the Secretary of the Interior? And why has the gentleman from Washington cried out in our hearing on this floor against the infamous exchanges that followed the passage of these acts and blamed the Chief of the Forest Service for them, because of the greater jurisdiction given him under the act of February 1, 1905?

Was it because he did not know that that act of February 1, 1905, as a matter of fact, did not extend to the Forest Service jurisdiction over the making and consummating of these exchanges? Was it because he did not know that the act repealing the lieu land law expressly excepted those exchanges contracted for through the Secretary of the Interior previous to the passage of the repealing act, and that those exchanges which followed the date of the repealing act were put through under that exception?

Certainly not. He knows these facts as well as I do, and he knew them all the time. He was a Member of this House when these acts were passed, and he knew perfectly well what was in them.

Why, then, has the gentleman from Washington made the statements which he has made repeatedly on the floor of this House? Because of his hatred for Mr. Pinchot as the chief exponent of the conservation of these resources in this country.

But to come to the cases which I presume the gentleman from Washington had in mind when he referred to the Santa Fe case.

It so happened that citizens of some of the States had petitioned for the creation of certain forest reserves before that repealing act, and, among others, certain of the citizens of Arizona.

The Grand Canyon Forest Reserve, the first reserve established in Arizona, including the Grand Canyon of the Colorado and the Coconino Plateau, was established by President Harrison on February 20, 1893 (27 United States Statutes, p. 1064), following the recommendation of Secretary of the Interior Noble, based solely upon a report by Director Powell, of the United States Geological Survey. This was before Mr. Pinchot was connected with the Government service.

About four years after the creation of this reserve there was presented to the General Land Office a definite and formal expression of public sentiment in favor of the extension of forest reserves to include and protect the watersheds and forests generally in Arizona. This expression was in the form of a memorial by the Legislature of Arizona, dated May 5, 1897, praying that a sufficient area of the unclaimed and unappropriated timberlands in Arizona be set apart to retain needed water supplies, in the interest of irrigation in that Territory. The memorial was accompanied by numerously signed petitions by citizens of Arizona praying for the reservation and protection of the timber in the San Francisco Mountains.

In 1898 there were created in Arizona, on recommendation of Secretary of the Interior Hitchcock, by Executive order issued by President McKinley (30 United States Statutes, 1780–1782), the San Francisco Mountains Reserves and the Black Mesa Forest Reserve. The former contained 975,360 acres and the latter contained 1,658,880 acres.

The following persons and corporations had large holdings within these forest reserves in the State of Arizona:

The Aztec Land & Cattle Co., 127,000 acres, in round numbers; the Saginaw & Manistee Lumber Co., something over 39,000 acres; William F. Baker, of San Francisco, 76,000 acres; Messrs. Robert and E. B. Perrin, 132,000 acres; the Santa Fe Railroad Co., 439,226 acres; and the Santa Fe Pacific Railroad Co., 380,000 acres.

When the question arose as to the creation of the San Francisco Mountains Reserves, the then Commissioner of the General Land Office made a report and recommendation to Mr. Hitchcock, the then Secretary of the Interior, under date of August 12, 1898, and inclosed to him drafts of proclamations to establish the San Francisco Mountains and Black Mesa Forest Reserves. He recognized in this report the great public danger of including in these reserves the private holdings of individuals and corporations and allowing them to be used as the basis for indemnity selection, and particularly called the attention of the Secretary of the Interior to this danger in the following language:

This question of the relinquishment to the Government of private holdings within forest reservations and the selection of unreserved lands in lieu thereof is assuming grave proportions and is a matter that will need very careful consideration by this department. It is showing itself in a number of different aspects, and I am giving the subject consideration with a view to presenting the matter to the department later. In the meantime it is important that the reservations in question should be made without delay. To guard against any complications that might arise by the inclusion of a large area of railroad lands, I deem it advisable that the region which includes lands granted to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad—should be put into separate reservations; I have accordingly prepared a proclamation reserving, in express terms, the even-numbered sections in the townships falling within the grant to the railroads, said reservations to be known as the San Francisco Mountains Forest Reserves, said sections containing a total estimated area of 975,360 acres. This makes a separate reservation of each even-numbered section, all grouped and known under the general name of the San Francisco Mountains Forest Reserves.

The Santa Fe—

The lands below the granted limits of the railroad company I have embraced in a separate proclamation, describing the boundaries in the usual manner, the reservation to be known as the Black Mesa Forest Reserve, and embracing an estimated area of 1,658,880 acres.

It will be seen that in order to avoid this very danger he suggested the "checkerboard" reservation, by means of which the boundaries of the reservation cut in and around private holdings, thus keeping them without the reservation itself, so that such holdings could not be used as the basis for indemnity selection. As soon as this was done the Secretary of the Interior was besieged by owners and other interested parties, who sought to be included within and become a part of the reserve. Negotiations were instituted by the Secretary of the Interior with these owners, the names of some of whom I have given, which resulted in abandoning the "checkerboard" system, the acquirement of private holdings by the Government, and the consolidation of the reserves and the persons and corporations mentioned. The Santa Fe Railroad and others were given the right to make selections in lieu of the lands surrendered by them to the Government.

The exchanges of land in these Arizona reserves for other lands by the Santa Fe Railroad and others were made under this law of 1897, and the control of the exchanges was entirely under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior. Many of these exchanges, it seems, had not been consummated when the act of 1897 was repealed in 1905. Mr. Hitchcock, the Secretary of the Interior, had made certain agreements or contracts with the Santa Fe Railroad and the other owners relative to their right to select other lands outside of the reserves in lieu of the land relinquished by them. It was to protect these alleged contracts that the repealing clause in the act of 1905 excepted the contracts that the Secretary of the Interior had entered into with these private individuals and corporations. Of course, the repealing act did not name these individuals and corporations. That would not have been a good policy, because it would have aroused a protest in and out of Congress against legislation which showed on its face that its purpose was the enrichment of the Santa Fe Railroad Co. and others instead of the protection of the citizens of the country.

Now, the gentleman from Washington asks if some friend of Mr. Pinchot's will please inform the public what he was doing while these transactions were taking place. He was doing his full duty as the Chief of the Bureau of Forestry in the Department of Agriculture, a bureau having to do with the timber and the trees within the forests, but not the slightest thing to do with the conveyance or the reconveyance of the lands included within the forests.

I do not know whether Mr. Pinchot was consulted with reference to the creation of the San Francisco Mountains and Black Mesa Forest Reservations or not, or whether he recommended their creation, if he was consulted. That is quite beside the question. It was deemed proper and necessary to put many areas into forest reserves for the protection of watersheds to conserve the irrigation possibilities of the region, and in making these reservations it became necessary to include within them these private holdings, some of them belonging to railroad companies. It was quite proper to permit those having title, absolute or qualified, to these holdings included within the reserves to relinquish them and either receive their fair value in cash or exchange them for other lands without the reserves of equal area with the lands relinquished and of equal, or approximately equal, value with those lands. But this was not done, and because of the infamous law of 1897 passed by Congress, and the way it was administered by the Interior Department, these land steals in the West were made possible.

The gentleman from Washington intimates that many of these forest reserves were created with malice aforethought and the boundaries were so fixed as to include these large private holdings of worthless land with the deliberate purpose of thus making it possible for the owners of these holdings to afterwards exchange them for rich timbered lands; and he throws out the charge that Mr. Pinchot was present at the conferences when the creation of some of these reservations was discussed, and that he approved and recommended them, and that this recommendation was "for this purpose of exchange." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 16433.) To properly characterize such a charge or intimation made by the gentleman from Washington or anybody else against Mr. Pinchot I would be compelled to use a short and ugly word which is very unparliamentary, and therefore I will not reply further to that unworthy insinuation except to say that it is completely disproven by the fact that from the time Mr. Pinchot became Chief of the Forestry Bureau until this infamous law was repealed he was constantly endeavoring to have it repealed and quite naturally one would not be favoring the creation of reserves for the purpose of these exchanges of land and at the same time be working for the repeal of the law which made those exchanges possible.

I shall now refer briefly to the last of the three cases cited by the gentleman from Washington. This is the Santa Barbara Water Co. lieu-land exchange. In this case the gentleman from Washington alleges that Mr. Pinchot recommended the exchange. That statement is wholly false. Certainly the gentleman from Washington, in making that charge, would have us understand that Mr. Pinchot recommended the lieu-land exchanges that actually were made by the Government in connection with the Santa Barbara Reservation. He did not do so. Mr. Pinchot did favor the Santa Barbara Reservation. He favored it because, as he stated in his letter, which I presume is the one the gentleman from Washington has referred to in his remarks here:

It seems perfectly evident, from what I was able to learn, that the city of Santa Barbara will be very seriously deficient in water supply within two or three years unless the acquisition of this area by the Government makes it possible for the city to acquire a new source from the headwaters of the Santa Ynez River.

Mr. Pinchot also recommended a particular exchange, mentioned in his letter. On this point the letter says:

You will remember that the difficulty in the case has arisen from the lieu-land question. I am informed that Mr. Washburn has agreed to take untimbered land in one of the Dakotas for his holdings back of Santa Barbara. From the condition of the water supply, I am strongly of the opinion that even at the cost of a relatively poor bargain by the Government, which, from the present situation, I apprehend is not to be feared, it would be wise to make the exchange. Water is practically the sole output of the forest reserves in this region; and it appears to me that this action on the part of the United States is precisely in line with the policy which has dictated the setting aside of all the reserves in this region.

Now, what exchange did Mr. Pinchot refer to in that letter? It is, of course, plain to everybody, except the gentleman from Washington, that he referred to the exchange of the holdings of Mr. Washburn in the Santa Barbara Reservation for "untimbered land in one of the Dakotas."

Now, as a matter of fact, when Mr. Washburn's exchange of lands was made it was managed and controlled by the General Land Office in the Department of the Interior, and Mr. Pinchot had nothing to do with it. And what did the Interior Department turn over to Mr. Washburn in exchange for his holdings in the Santa Barbara Reservation? The "untimbered land in one of the Dakotas," contemplated in the exchange recommended by Mr. Pinchot? Not by any means. Mr. Washburn did receive in that exchange 840.05 acres in North Dakota, but he also received 319.26 acres in Colorado, 753.96 acres in Idaho, 31 acres in Minnesota, 13,315.98 acres in Montana, 160 acres in New Mexico, 8,782.42 acres in Oregon, 5,877.82 acres in Washington, and 1,516.47 acres in Wyoming.

When we examine the exchange which Mr. Pinchot did recommend in this case and then consider the charge made by the gentleman from Washington, in which he tries to have us believe that Mr. Pinchot recommended and was responsible for the exchanges that actually were made, and made through the Land Office, we have a good example of the fairness of this broad-minded gentleman from Washington.

The attempt to place the blame for the lieu-land exchanges in the Santa Barbara Reservation at the door of the Forestry Bureau and of Mr. Pinchot personally is simply another case of jumping to conclusions which the facts do not warrant. The records clearly show that the effort to have these exchanges made in the case of the Santa Barbara Water Co. and one J. P. Washburn came from the California delegation in Congress and the citizens of Santa Barbara. Matters relating to these lieu-land exchanges were administered in the Land Office, and the letter which has been quoted from Mr. Pinchot was written in reply to a request that his bureau give information relative to the feasibility of including certain land as a part of the reserve. Together with experts of the Geological Survey, the Forestry Bureau recommended the inclusion of the land in the reserve in order to protect the water supply of the city of Santa Barbara.

So much for the charges made against Mr. Pinchot, the former Chief of the Forest Service, by the gentleman from Washington. They are as base as they are false. I heartily agree with the words of Senator CHAMBERLAIN, of Oregon, which he uttered in a speech made in the Senate in 1912, when he said:

Mr. Gifford Pinchot, former Forester, has been denounced here as a despoiler by one of the distinguished Senators who has discussed this subject. Mr. President, I say to you that instead of criticizing him as a despoiler the American people ought to erect a monument in his honor and engrave his name upon it as the man who originated the idea of placing these resources of the Government—timber, coal, iron, and oil—beyond the reach of monopolistic control, and saving them not only for the generous use of our own generation but for generations yet unborn, because to him more largely than to any other individual in this country it is due that the people of America were first aroused to the fact that our public lands and the things under them, including the water power and everything else, were being taken up and monopolized by selfish interests. He aroused an interest and created a public sentiment that has made Congress do something to protect these natural resources. Therefore, even if I do agree with some of the criticisms which have been indulged in against the administration of the forest reserves, and with others that have been indulged in against other governmental bureaus, I must state that in its larger view Mr. Pinchot and those who have succeeded him have done a work that entitles them to the everlasting gratitude of the people.

To recapitulate on the three specific charges made by the gentleman from Washington:

The forest reserves involved in the Northern Pacific exchanges were created before Mr. Pinchot became a Government official, and by special act of Congress and the exchanges of lands made by that company were authorized and provided for by special act of Congress put through by Members of Congress from the State of Washington after repeated attempts.

The forest reserves involved in the Santa Fe exchanges were in part created before Mr. Pinchot became a Government official and in part after that time, and the latter were created at the specific recommendation of the General Land Office in the Department of the Interior upon petitions made by the Legislature of the Territory of Arizona and the people of that Territory. The exchanges were made under the lieu land law, and those that were consummated after the repeal of that law were made pursuant to alleged agreements or contracts made by the Secretary of the Interior with the holders of the lands, which contracts were carefully protected and excepted from the effect of the repeal of the law, as specifically provided by Congress in that repeal.

The forest reserve involved in the Santa Barbara water case was recommended by Mr. Pinchot, and properly so, in order to adequately protect the water supply of that city. He had been requested by the land office to look over that proposition and give his judgment of it. The exchanges made in that case were not recommended by him.

The lieu land law, together with special acts of Congress, such as was involved in the Northern Pacific case, was responsible for these land "steals," and the blame for those steals rests upon Congress itself and upon the Department of the Interior for the manner in which those who were then in charge of the department administered the law. As an official in the Department of Agriculture, Mr. Pinchot had nothing whatever to do with the administering of the law. Realizing its viciousness he did protest against the law, advocated its repeal, and worked for that result until the law was repealed.

In the face of these facts will the gentleman from Washington repeat his attacks on Mr. Pinchot? I presume he will. Whenever a conservation measure comes before the House, he just has to pour out his wrath on some one, and why not on the greatest conservationist, Mr. Pinchot?

In preparation for the next tirade of the gentleman from Washington, I want to give the House some information about a bill which has been introduced by him in the House, and when the gentleman again cries out in his righteous indignation against the "steals" put over by the Northern Pacific and others, I hope the Members of the House will keep this in mind.

On April 10, 1913, three days after the opening of the first session of this Congress, the gentleman from Washington introduced H. R. 2146. This bill seeks to amend some riders that passed with the sundry civil appropriation act of July 1, 1898, and a later act of March 2, 1901.

The former of these two bills contained a clause providing in substance as follows: Where lands had been granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. and the right of the grantee was claimed to have attached by definite location, and the whole or any part of an odd-numbered section of the same lands had, previous to January 1, 1898, been purchased from the Government or settled upon or claimed in good faith by a qualified settler under color of title or claim of right under any law of the United States or any ruling of the Interior Department, and where upon discovery of this conflict of the two claims, namely, those of the railroad and the settler, the said settler refused to transfer his claim to the railroad, then the railroad was given the right to relinquish what claim it had to this land under its grant, and in lieu thereof could select "an equal quantity of public land, surveyed or unsurveyed, not mineral or reserved, and not valuable for stone, iron, or coal, and free from valid adverse claims, or not occupied by any settler at the time of such selection, situated within any State or Territory into which such railroad grant extends." This act limited the lieu-land selection, in the case of unsurveyed lands, to odd-numbered sections to be identified by survey when made.

All lands relinquished by the Northern Pacific under this act were to revert to the Government, and the settler who had the overlapping claim could complete his title just as though the railroad grant had never been made. This law further provided that the settler who had in good faith and prior to January 1, 1898, settled upon any part of an odd-numbered section within the grant to the Northern Pacific could relinquish his claim and in lieu thereof select an equal quantity of public land situated in any State or Territory into which the railroad grant extended, and the length of the period of residence put in on the first tract would be allowed as to the second.

The act of March 2, 1901, amended this law, extending it and making it applicable "to all instances where land in odd-numbered sections within the indemnity limit of the grant to said company were patented to settlers under the public-land laws, in pursuance to application presented to or proceedings initiated in the local land office at a time when the land was embraced in a pending indemnity selection made by said company in conformity with the regulations of the Land Department, which indemnity selection has not since been waived or abandoned." Now, this law—a rider on an appropriation bill you will notice—as amended, was for the special benefit of the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. and such settlers as might make claim under the land laws to land within the land grants which had been made to that railroad company. It contained all the vicious features of the lieu-land law. It did not confine the selections made in lieu of the land relinquished to the locality or the State or Territory in which the relinquished land was located, but permitted selections to be made in "any State or Territory into which such railroad grant extends." It did not limit the selections made in lieu of the relinquished tracts to land of equal or approximately equal value with those relinquished tracts, nor to nontimbered lands, nor to lands of the same character as the relinquished tracts, but simply provided that the selected lands must be of equal quantity with the relinquished tracts and "not mineral or reserved and not valuable for stone, iron, or coal"—note the careful omission of the word "timber"—"and free from adverse claim and not occupied by a settler at the time of the selection." The selections were not confined to surveyed areas but could be made in unsurveyed areas. That law is in force to-day.

Now, note these facts about the bill pending in the House at this moment, introduced by the gentleman from Washington. It seeks to amend these two laws I have described. It provides that these laws shall be—and they are hereby, extended to include any bona fide settlement or entry made subsequent to January 1, 1898, and prior to January 1, 1913: Provided, That said act shall be, and is hereby, amended and extended so that all lieu selections made under said act may be of either odd or even sections of surveyed or unsurveyed lands of equal area of those relinquished, not mineral and not otherwise appropriated, within the State or Territory where the base land was relinquished or within the District of Alaska or the Philippine Islands, as the selector may select.

Then this bill goes on to provide that where there is a conflicting claim, and the Northern Pacific refuses to relinquish and make another selection in lieu of the one relinquished within 90 days after notice, the settler may relinquish and make selection.

Now, notice that this bill proposed by the gentleman from Washington does not repeal any part of the law as passed in 1898 and amended in 1901, but it adds a whole lot to the old law.

The old law is confined to claims initiated by settlers prior to January 1, 1898. The gentleman from Washington proposes to extend the law to include cases where claims were initiated by settlers after that date and down as late as January 1, 1913.

The old law was confined to conflicting claims made on odd-numbered sections. The gentleman from Washington would extend the act to include such claims made on "either odd or even sections."

Would you not think, after the howl of righteous indignation which has been repeatedly raised on this floor by the gentleman from Washington about the "steals" of timbered land made out in his country by the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. in relinquishing worthless land and selecting in lieu thereof rich and valuable timbered lands—would you not think after all that show of virtue on his part that in introducing a bill seeking to amend a law specifically referring to the Northern Pacific Railroad Co., and permitting that company to make certain selections of public land in lieu of others relinquished, he would have been careful to stop the gaps by means of his proposed amendments and prevent any further steals by this company? Has he done it? No; he has not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Can I get 10 minutes more?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. The original act provides that the lieu selections that can be made by the railroad company or the settler—and I presume the cry will be raised that this is a settler's bill, one for the settler's relief; but it is no more so than was the general lieu-land law itself—must be "of equal area" with the tracts relinquished, but it fails to provide that they must be of equal value or of not greater value. This was one thing that made these "steals" possible. Has the gentleman from Washington shown a real desire to stop that gap, and does his bill provide that the lieu selections shall not be of greater value than the tracts relinquished? No!

The original act provides that the lieu selections that can be made by the railroad company or the settler in these conflicting cases must be of nonmineral land. It permits the selection of timbered lands. This was another thing that made these "steals" possible, because of the great value of the timbered lands. Has the gentleman stopped that gap in the bill he has introduced amending this special act, and provided that the lands selected under it in lieu of lands relinquished must be nontimbered? No!

The original act provides that the lieu selections that can be made by the railroad company or the settler in these conflicting cases may be made "within any State or Territory into which such railroad grant extends." This was another thing that contributed to these land "steals" which the gentleman from Washington has denounced as infamous. In the bill he has introduced has he sought to amend this special law by restricting the area within which the lieu selections can be made to that State or Territory where the tracts relinquished are situated? No! On the contrary, his bill proposes to extend those areas and permit these lieu selections to be made "within the State or Territory where the base land was relinquished or within the District of Alaska or the Philippine Islands, as the selector may elect." And you will notice he is careful not to repeal the provision of the original act to the effect that the lieu selections may be made within any State or Territory into which the railroad grant extends. The gentleman from Washington would not only leave all the public lands in the United States, timbered and otherwise, open for these lieu-land selections, but he would by his bill make available for them all the public lands in Alaska and the Philippine Islands.

Mr. CARY. Will the gentleman pardon an interruption?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. I will.

Mr. CARY. A little while ago the gentleman mentioned the Philippines. Does that give the Northern Pacific Railroad the right to go over to the Philippines and choose lands in exchange for lands worth nothing along their right of way in this country?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. If the bill were to pass, it would.

Mr. CARY. I think that is an outrage.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. I think so myself, and I am about to read from a report from the Department of the Interior which says that very thing.

In a report made by the Department of the Interior December 18, 1913, on Senate bill 2801, this Congress, which is a bill very similar to H. R. 2146, the department says:

> The magnitude of the grant to the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. has frequently been the subject of much comment, but by the terms of this bill its area is not even limited to the States proper, but it is proposed to extend it to Alaska and our insular possessions. It can not be believed that such a proposition would receive serious consideration of Congress. * * * The careful policy heretofore observed, both by the legislative and executive departments, in refusing to subject the Territory of Alaska to the general provisions of our public-land laws until such time as the requirements of the Territory are better understood and can be carefully considered and protected should preclude any possibility of congressional consent to a scheme that could be so easily used to acquire title to the most valuable lands in the Territory.

And that is the sort of a bill that has been introduced by this gentleman, who has repeatedly risen on this floor and with a distressed and sanctimonious look bewailed the loss to the people of his State and other States of valuable, rich timberlands through steals put over by the Northern Pacific Railroad Co., and who wanted to know where somebody else was while these things were going on. And now he, forsooth, would open up to this very same corporation not only everything left in the way of timbered lands in the public lands of the United States but in the Territory of Alaska and in the Philippine Islands.

After a long fight the general lieu-land law was repealed, but this special law tucked away in a sundry civil appropriation bill still lives; and our friend from Washington would have us amend and extend it so that future "steals" will not necessarily have to be confined to Washington public lands or the public lands in other States, but may include lands of great value across the seas in Alaska and the Philippines.

But he will tell us this act only applies to conflicting claims. Quite true. But how many "conflicting claims" do you suppose such an adroit corporation as the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. has shown itself to be could be inspired by it between January 1, 1898, and January 1, 1913, the period of time over which this bill proposes to extend the original act, which it thus seeks to amend?

Oh, consistency! Thy name is not HUMPHREY! With a voice pitched to carry to the far-off State of Washington, has this gentleman stormed and howled about these outrageous and contemptible "steals" put over by the Northern Pacific and others; and amidst the din and clatter of his own noise, he has started the machinery to working to the end that the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. itself may reach out and make these lieu-land selections even in Alaska and the Philippines.

May I remind the gentleman that his actions will cry out even louder than his words and reach quite as far? And may I also suggest to the gentleman that before he again casts baseless charges against Mr. Pinchot, the greatest champion of the people's rights in all our natural resources, that he at least take the precaution to move out of his glass house? [Applause.]

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM].

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, this is a far better time for a farmer to read a good speech than it is for a Member of Congress to undertake to make one.

This is the period of the year when the farmer begins to "take stock" by looking back over the past year to see how he "stands"; he has harvested and marketed his last year's crop and sold his live stock, and having viewed his past work, efforts, and resources he looks forward to the current year to see where and how he can increase his profits or recoup his losses.

If he is a man with a good clear head, sound judgment, good health, strong muscle, plenty of energy, and has applied these indispensable assets for successful farming industriously to the cultivation of his land and management of his live stock, the chances are one hundred to one that he has made some money.

With few exceptions he has realized fair returns for all his products, of which the yield, with the aid of fertilizers, has about equaled the average in recent years. But when he begins to cast up his account he is liable to find that his running or operating expenses have exceeded his expectations, and his annual profits less than he had expected, notwithstanding he has been comparatively economical, his management satisfactory, escaped destruction of any of his property by accident, or serious sickness in his family.

Furthermore he is aware that within the last decade his land values have doubled, in many sections they have quadrupled, in value, and under all the circumstances he is at a loss to discover the leaks and his failure to make better headway.

The flannel-mouthed calamity howler comes along shouting oppressive legislation by an incompetent party in control of national legislation, because it put certain farm products on the free list, namely, lumber—yes; it is on the free list, so are hemp, hides, wool, corn, wheat and other similar serials, except in case of countervailing duties to equal those imposed by foreign Governments, and yet there was never a time when the farmer realized more for each of these products than he does now.

The farmer with the clear head and sound judgment says to himself, "Thou fool," shakes his head, passes on, and looks further. He knows that in none of the older settled States the soil is as productive without fertilizer as formerly, when the land was fresher and cheaper, when his outlay was smaller and his net income larger, considering his investment. The same condition obtained in many of the more recently settled States.

Taxes are continually on the increase. When we were lads what were then luxuries are now prime necessities for the farmer, not including better roads, better schools, better homes, better clothes, all demanding and requiring larger outlays, which ought to mean larger income.

The average size of the farmer's family is just about as large as it used to be, while the size of the average farm is about one fourth, third, or half as large as it was when I was a boy, yet expenses have multiplied as rapidly in an inverse ratio.

The situation is a serious one, requiring and demanding the best thought of every head of a family if the slogan "back to the farm" is to be heeded, much less become attractive.

This brings us to some of the problems that the present-day farmer has to solve. What is the solution? Diversification of crops and intensive farming, greater yield or production per acre, cheaper transportation, better marketing facilities, and greater economy in operating expenses.

The farmer's first concern is the improvement and restoration of his land to its former productive capacity, thereby, in the first instance, escaping his annual outlay for fertilizer, the preservation and conservation of the fertility of his soil, because the soil is his stock in trade. If it deteriorates or is allowed to wash away, his income will fade away.

The destruction of any of his improvements by fire or storm is felt and realized at once, because he knows the cost of their reconstruction, but he fails to appreciate the heavier and more serious loss when the fertile and nutritious portion of his land has been skimmed off and washed away by heavy rains. Every precaution should be taken to avoid this serious and unnecessary loss by proper care for and cultivation of the ground. The most inexcusable negligence of a farmer is his failure to stop deep ruts and gullies on his farm; they are bad advertisements both of the farmer and the farm.

Every lawyer and every doctor knows, and everybody else knows, that when they cease studying their professions that they are going to fall behind and some fellow who does study, dig, and work is going to get the business. The same thing is true of the farmer. He also must study to keep up with the procession and abreast of the improved methods of progressive farming, in order to secure the greatest returns for the least outlay as well as best methods of marketing and transportation.

Producing two, possibly three, crops on the same acre in one year and at the same time improving the quality of your land and marketing your products cheaper requires headwork, but it makes bank accounts grow.

Central Kentucky is far famed as an agricultural section and preeminently adapted to stock raising. The blue grass is native to the soil. It is the habitat of the thoroughbred and standard-bred horses and the short-horn cattle. It is traversed by running streams that are fed by perennial springs.

There was never a better opportunity to resume this industry on a more extensive scale than in recent years. Undue attention has been given to the cultivation of tobacco, which has resulted in impoverishing the land and otherwise causing its deterioration.

No one needs to be told that the extraordinary European demand for horses is certain to enhance their value, especially the types produced in Kentucky. It is unfortunate that the cheap, low-grade western scrubs have found their way into the State. It will pay to preserve the perfect Kentucky standard type. I also take occasion to express my strong condemnation of the unbusinesslike and impractical policy of farming out stallions, inaugurated by the War Department, which has resulted in a very useless waste of money.

The western range is gone forever, and with it the day of cheap cattle has passed.

Central Kentucky is also the section in which the Kentucky hemp and burley tobacco is raised—crops that demand the richest and most fertile lands to produce a profitable yield of these products. The timothy and clover meadows flourish; corn, wheat, rye, barley, and all similar cereals thrive. Crop rotation has been in vogue for years. It is ramified by a splendid system of macadamized pikes. Yet, with all these superior advantages and others not enumerated, there is still room for progress in advanced methods of farming and increased production of profitable crops. I shall venture to refer to and point out some of these possibilities; but before doing so I wish to state that there are very few problems relating to farming, stock raising, and diseases of animals which, if they have not been solved, much valuable information concerning them is available for the asking from the Department of Agriculture. I distribute annually a list of bulletins bearing on all these subjects, which I shall be glad to furnish on request. The tobacco reports are issued by the Census Bureau. Let me know if you want to be put on the bureau's mailing list for them.

The demoralization of the foreign markets for tobacco should be ample warning against a large acreage next season. Tobacco and cotton are two products that have suffered by reason of the European war. While burley is not largely exported, the price is affected by the market for the export types.

It is impossible to gauge the wholesome influence exercised by a good citizen; it is likewise difficult to estimate the far-reaching benefits derived from the example of a thoroughgoing, businesslike farmer.

There resides in the southern portion of Lincoln County a gentleman—Dr. C. M. Thompson—who, when he is not practicing his profession, manages his farm, which he is continually improving in value, on which he raised and harvested last season, in the same field, a crop of red wheat and a crop of buckwheat, the two realizing him much more than he paid for the land, and afterwards secured a splendid stand of clover susceptible of light fall grazing. This gentleman has a clear head, good judgment, strong muscle, good health, plenty of energy, and applies it industriously and intelligently, and consequently is not complaining of hard times. What he has done every other man in the southern half of Lincoln, Casey, and Adair Counties can do, because they have the same kind of soil. The more we have of his type, and the closer we follow the pattern he has marked out, the nearer we reach the solution of the problem.

ALFALFA.

The comparatively recent production of alfalfa in the group of counties adjoining Lincoln County, Ky., was due to the foresight and efforts of Mr. W. P. Givens. He demonstrated the fact that it could be profitably grown in this locality, as well as its superior value as a forage crop. Many have since followed his example with satisfactory results. Others desiring to do so may be assisted by the following facts concerning its cultivation and uses.

"So far as climate is concerned, alfalfa can be grown in every State in the Union.

"A deep, permeable soil should be chosen if possible, as alfalfa is naturally a deep-feeding plant that usually sends its roots down many feet to obtain the plant food materials and moisture which are out of reach of shallow-rooted crops.

"No other foliage crop requires less lime in the soil than does alfalfa.

"Young alfalfa plants are very tender and are apt to be killed by weeds during their early stages of growth.

"The time of seeding alfalfa varies in the different sections of the country, but late summer seeding is best in the East and South.

"Dairy cows require high protein feeds in order to produce profitable flows of milk. The tests showed that with alfalfa hay at $10 a ton and wheat bran at $20 the saving effected by substituting alfalfa for wheat bran is $2.80 for every 100 pounds of butter, and nearly 20 cents for every 100 pounds of milk.

"Alfalfa forms probably the best roughage for fattening cattle, as its lack of bulkiness enables the animal to consume sufficient quantities for rapid gains.

"Alfalfa is an ideal hay for sheep, but is apt to cause bloat if used for pasturage.

"Alfalfa is fed to hogs for the most part in the green state, either as a soiling crop or as a pasture.

"Alfalfa may be fed to horses both in the green state and as hay. Instances are on record where horses have performed heavy work during the summer season on nothing but green alfalfa.

"Alfalfa makes an excellent feed for all kinds of poultry. They can be allowed the range of an alfalfa field during the summer or it can be cut green and fed to them.

"Kentucky blue grass is apt to run out the alfalfa if this grass is used in the mixture in the blue-grass sections.

"The following tabulation indicates the approximate cost and returns per acre:

Plowing	$2.00
Harrowing	1.00
Seed, 2½ pounds at $2	4.50
Seeding	.50
Harvesting, 3 tons at $2	6.00
Total	14.00
Three tons of alfalfa, at $15	45.00
Cost to be deducted	14.00
Profit	31.00

SOME ALFALFA DON'TS.

"Don't fail to provide for ample inoculation; soil from an old alfalfa field is best.

"Don't sow poor or weedy seed.

"Don't sow on a weedy soil.

"Don't sow on any but a sweet, well-limed soil.

"Don't sow on poorly drained soil.

"Don't sow on any but a finely prepared, well-settled seed bed.

"Don't pasture the first or second year.

"Don't lose the leaves; they constitute the best part of the hay.

"Don't seed a large acreage to begin with. Experiment on a small area first.

"Don't give up. Many prominent alfalfa growers finally succeeded only after many failures.

"Alfalfa acts in a manner similar to red clover and other leguminous crops in increasing the yields of the succeeding crops."

SOY BEANS.

Other splendid forage crops that are in the same general class with alfalfa are soy beans and cowpeas, but, unlike it, they can be sown on the land before certain other growing crops have been harvested and at the same time greatly improve the soil, thereby eliminating the expenditure for commercial fertilizer.

If you are making heavy outlays for cottonseed meal with which to fatten your cattle and can not only save this expense, but can at the same time improve your land, is not it good business to do so? Is not the old saying "money saved is money made" still true? The soy bean will turn the trick.

If your land is run down and needs renovating, do not spend all your last year's earning for commercial fertilizer in your efforts to raise another crop when there is a much cheaper and better way. The cowpea is highly recommended for this purpose by experts on this subject.

"As a forage crop, however, soy beans have become of increasing importance in parts of the United States, especially southward. Their culture has greatly increased in recent years, especially in Tennessee, North Carolina, Virginia, Maryland, Kentucky, and the southern part of Illinois and Indiana.

"The soil requirements of soy beans are much the same as those of corn.

"Throughout the South the proper bacteria for soy beans seem to be widely distributed, so that natural inoculation now occurs generally.

"Soy bean hay when cut at the proper stage of growth and carefully cured is excellent, and for dairy cattle at least yields results equal to alfalfa hay.

"The planting should be timed so that the crop can be cut for hay in September, as this month is usually the most satisfactory for haymaking. The cutting may begin as soon as the dew is off the plants and continue for the rest of the day.

"While the hay is dry it should be put in good-sized stacks or under a shed. If it is stacked in the open field it is very essential that some other material, either grass or a canvas cover, be put over the stack, as soy bean hay does not shed rain well. Yields of from 1 to 3 and occasionally 4 tons of cured hay to the acre are secured. The average yield is about 2 tons per acre.

"Soy beans and cowpeas make a very satisfactory mixture for hay purposes.

"In sowing soy beans and cowpeas in mixture about 1 bushel of the former to a half bushel of the latter per acre should be used.

"Soy beans are more commonly grown with corn than with any other crop.

"The growing of soy beans for ensilage has not been practiced very extensively. In a number of instances ensilage has been made of the crop, usually in combination with corn, and it is invariably reported as making an excellent succulent feed.

"Growing soy beans for the grain for use as feed is distinctly profitable if the yield is 16 bushels or more per acre. The feeding value of the grain is very high, being slightly superior to cottonseed meal. The grain is rich in protein, while nearly all the other grains produced on the farm are poor in protein but rich in carbohydrates.

"Throughout much of the region well adapted to soy beans dairy farmers purchase cottonseed meal for a high protein feed. Numerous experiments have shown that soy-bean meal is equal or slightly superior as a feed to cottonseed meal both for cows and for hogs.

"Yields of 20 bushels per acre of soy beans on lands of moderate fertility may confidently be expected in the region where the best medium or late varieties will mature.

THE COWPEA.

"The cowpea is used more than any other crop as a soil renovator in the South. Its use is rapidly increasing, but is yet far from general. During the past few years the high prices of the seed has tendered to discourage more extensive growing. Recent progress in the harvesting of cowpea seed by machinery will doubtless materially reduce its cost. The seed is at present almost entirely picked by hand. The cowpea is characterized by remarkable ability to grow in poor soils and to cover the ground so densely as to choke out most weeds. It usually bears an abundance of tubercles on its roots, whether the soil has been inoculated or not, although in new localities where the cowpea has not been previously grown the tubercles may be absent. In such cases inoculation is necessary, for it must always be remembered that it is through the tubercles on the roots that the beneficial effects of the cowpea or other legume largely depend.

"Cowpeas are very commonly planted between rows of corn at the time of the last cultivation or they are broadcasted upon the stubble of small grains. Cowpeas, however, like other crops, respond remarkably to cultivation, and there is a growing tendency to plant them upon well prepared soil. This practice results in a great increase of the crop, whether grown for hay or for seed.

"Perhaps no single agricultural crop is of greater economic importance to the people of the United States than cowpeas, yet its cultivation is comparatively recent in this country. Each year the crop is better appreciated, and its area is being rapidly extended. While the cowpea is not a true bean, it is a valuable forage crop and a great soil renovator. The seeds are valuable as grain, the hay is equaled only by alfalfa, and as a producer of organic matter for green manuring it is unsurpassed."

ORCHARD GRASS.

The wide fertile bottoms of Green River and its tributaries are as productive as the famous valley of the Nile, and are best adapted to corn raising. The hills of Casey and Adair Counties have splendid range on which stock thrive in spring and summer. Orchard grass will flourish in these counties where the undergrowth is not heavy, and will be of material aid to stock growers who have their lands fenced. The same is true as to the southern portion of Lincoln County.

"It is a bunch grass, and when sown alone forms tufts which in time become large tussocks considerably raised above the general surface of the soil. There is a hindrance to the mowing machine and also a waste of land. For this reason it is recommended that orchard grass be combined with some other grass, for which purpose meadow fescue is recommended.

"Orchard grass is one of the most nutritious and palatable of the cultivated meadow grasses. It thrives in more shaded situations than other meadow grasses, for which reason it is often planted in orchards, hence the name. It withstands drought better than the timothy, and consequently can be grown farther west in Nebraska than can timothy.

"It is true that fields of these grasses usually dry up more or less during the middle of summer, but the same is true of all available pasture grasses, it being necessary to supplement them during this season with green feed, such as cane or corn. On the other hand, orchard grass and meadow fescue furnish green feed in early spring and late fall, seasons when the wild pastures are not available. The seed should be sown in the spring at the rate of about 20 pounds of orchard grass and 15 pounds of meadow fescue per acre. Unless the ground is free from weeds it will be necessary to mow once or twice during the first season to keep the weeds down until the grass is well established. When grown for hay the grass should be cut in blossom, as at a later period the value of the hay rapidly decreases."

It not only behooves the farmer to understand the kind and quality of his soil that he may know what to plant with promise of best returns, but when to harvest and how to preserve and feed his provender so as to obtain the best results.

The silo has become almost as indispensable as the barn, and it may yet be interesting to some to learn what its advantages and uses are.

SILAGE.

"Within the last 30 years silage has come into general use throughout the United States, especially in those regions where the dairy industry has reached its greatest development. Silage is universally recognized as a good and cheap feed for farm stock, and particularly so for cattle and sheep. There are several reasons for the popularity of silage.

"1. More food can be stored in a given space in the form of silage than in the form of fodder or hay.

"2. There is a smaller loss of food material when a crop is made into silage than when cured as fodder or hay.

"3. Corn silage is a more efficient feed than corn fodder.

"4. An acre of corn can be placed into the silo at less cost than the same area can be husked and shredded.

"5. Crops can be put in the silo during weather that could not be utilized in making hay or curing fodder.

"6. More stock can be kept on a given area of land when silage is the basis of the ration.

"7. There is less waste in feeding silage than in feeding fodder. Good silage, properly fed, is all consumed.

"8. Silage is very profitable.

"9. Silage, like other succulent feeds, has a beneficial effect upon the digestive organs.

"10. Silage is the cheapest and best form in which a succulent feed can be provided for winter use.

"11. Silage can be used for supplementing pastures more economically than can soiling crops, because it requires less labor, and silage is more palatable.

"12. Converting the corn crop into silage clears the land and leaves it ready for another crop.

"In all parts of the United States where the silo has come into general use the principal silage crop is corn.

"Some persons have advised mixing clover, cowpeas, or alfalfa with the corn when it is being put into the silo in order to correct this deficiency of protein. Such a procedure is not to be advised, however, if it is at all possible to cure the clover or other crop into hay, and it usually is possible if hay caps are used. Since some dry forage should always be fed along with the silage, the leguminous hay would better be used in this way rather than by converting the crop into silage.

"Corn should be harvested for the silo at about the same time that it is harvested for fodder; that is, when the grain has become glazed and the lower leaves of the stalk have turned brown.

"Sorghum is readily made into silage. The only advantage which sorghum has over corn is that it will sometimes yield heavier on poor ground and that the operation of harvesting may extend over a greater period; that is, it stays in the right stage for harvesting longer than corn. Sorghum, however, makes a poorer quality of silage, being more acid, not so palatable, and less nutritious. Where corn yields well there is no advantage in growing sorghum.

"Clover is a successful silage crop, yielding a palatable product high in protein. It does not pack so well as corn, so great care should be exercised in the tramping of the silage at the time of filling, and the depth of the silo should also receive particular attention. A shallow silo will not prove satisfactory.

COWPEAS, ALFALFA, AND SOY BEANS.

"These crops can all be successfully made into silage by exercising the same precaution as with clover. They should be cut at the same time as for haymaking. However, it is ordinarily preferable, as with clover, to make them into hay rather than silage.

"Other good silage materials are Kafir corn, milo maize, teosinte, and beet pulp."

Many a man has a natural taste for the cultivation of fruits, berries, and vegetables. He knows that it is a profitable business, but he does not know how to make it a success. He knows that when he has plenty of fruit, berries, and vegetables all of his neighbors in the same locality are certain to have the same luck that he has. He has a limited amount of ground, and he can not do extensive farming on a large scale, so he is compelled to fall back on horticulture and truck farming. He is a more fortunate man than he thinks he is. Parcel post has solved his problem. All he needs is a city directory of Louisville or Cincinnati and a few postal cards, and in 24 hours he is in touch with a market representing over half a million people, none of whom can produce what he has for sale and must have what he has for sale in order to live. The schedules of the mail trains in central Kentucky are well arranged for marketing by parcel post.

Shelby and Spencer Counties possess special advantages because of their proximity to a large market in Louisville, to which every producer can haul his own product within a few hours over splendid roads.

POTATOES.

If I am not incorrectly informed, many people in the district I represent discovered, as a result of the drought last year, that it was possible to raise two crops of certain varieties of vegetables—among them potatoes, a wholesome food for all classes, universally used, for which there is always a market and very seldom below the cost of production, because it is a food that is welcome in the laborer's dinner pail, frequently called "the poor man's bread"; and yet it is often a dainty dish on the banquet table.

Trusting that some one will read and profit thereby, I insert an excerpt on this food plant printed in a bulletin published by the Department of Agriculture, as I have and will from other bulletins on different agricultural products:

"The ever-increasing importance of the potato crop makes it highly desirable that more attention should be given to the subject of seed improvement. As yet comparatively little thought has been given to this phase of the potato industry by the American grower. The European grower, on the other hand, recognizes the futility of attempting to grow profitable crops of potatoes without giving the most careful attention to the source of his seed supply. To this end he either buys his seed from specialists in seed-potato production or becomes a specialist himself. The result of this attention to the use of good seed is well attested by the average yields secured. For the years of 1901 to 1910, inclusive, the average per-acre yield in bushels was as follows: Germany, 200; Great Britain, 200; and the United States, 92. It would be absurd, of course, to claim that all of this increase was attributable to good seed, but it is safe to assume that good seed does play a very important rôle and should not be overlooked by the American grower.

"In some sections the same land can be made to produce two crops of potatoes in a single season, thus rendering it a very important and profitable industry.

"Within recent years there has been a marked increase in the use of second-crop potatoes for seed throughout the southern potato-growing sections. This crop is frequently grown on the same land from which the first crop of potatoes was harvested.

"A conservative estimate of the increase that might be expected from the use of high-grade seed is certainly not less than 10 per cent. Such an increase, based on the average of the past five years, would amount to over 34,250,000 bushels, having an approximate valuation of $21,000,000.

"The value of the method is well attested by the crops produced. The average production on an 18-acre basis for the past nine years—1901 to 1909—has been 282 bushels per acre. The highest seasonal yield during this period was 417 bushels, and the lowest 233 bushels. These yields are being secured in a locality where the general average is approximately 150 bushels per acre."

While there is an astonishing and surprising difference in the yield per acre here and abroad, still, at that, if the market price is 50 cents per bushel, $46 per acre is no bad return. You have done worse with other crops.

UNNECESSARY EXPENSE FOR SEED AND FERTILIZERS.

While I am on the topic of seeds, as suggested by the foregoing and following excerpt on seed corn, I can not pass the subject without stating that in my opinion one of the big leaks and unnecessary operating expenses of the farmer are his annual outlays for seeds of all kinds and varieties, though I would not undervalue this importance of good seed.

Why should a farmer every year spend a snug sum for seed when he can with small labor preserve them out of his own crop that he has raised, by selecting the proper types and giving the proper care? Why do not you stop this unnecessary outlay? Too often you do not get as good as you raise, and what you do get is adulterated with all kinds of pests, many of which it is impossible to eradicate or destroy. We have the best lands, why can not we produce the best types? The answer is, we can. Why does not some man in every locality set his head and hands to it and keep this money at home. Look after the balance of trade at home and the foreign balance of trade will take care of itself.

Another thought along the same line. The United States is the richest country on the globe, yet the Government employees in the city of Washington, the Capital, rake up the leaves in the parks and convert them into the best fertilizer known. You burn them up, go to the store and spend your money that you need for other purposes to buy a fertilizer not half as good, notwithstanding you are not as rich as the United States. What do you think of the intelligence of a farmer who will burn an old half-rotted straw or hay rick or fodder shocks in order to get them out of his way when he goes to plow, instead of using it as a mulch to put on the potatoes that he planted in the spring or scattering them on his land? That man is talking hard times and is claiming that the Underwood tariff has ruined him.

SELECTING SEED CORN.

Here is what the Agricultural Department has to say about seed corn:

"At corn-ripening time drop all other business and select an abundance of seed corn—the process is too important to be conducted incidentally while husking. When selecting seed corn give the process your entire attention. Get the very best that is to be had and preserve it well, and your increased yields will return you more profit than any other work you can do on your farm.

"The only proper way to select seed corn is from the stalks standing where they grew, as soon as ripe and before the first hard freeze."

"The average production of corn to the acre for the entire United States is but 26 bushels, yet in practically every section four times that quantity is frequently produced. Improvement of the quality of seed is the least expensive method of increasing the yield per acre. A full stand of plants may be obtained from inferior seed, but the yield will not be the best possible. The loss is due to delay or negligence. It can be prevented by the selection of seed corn in the autumn. Autumn is the time to prepare for a profitable corn crop the following season.

"By far too many consider seed corn simply because it will grow. To be first class seed must be—

"(1) Well adapted to the seasonal and soil conditions where it is to be planted.

"(2) Grown on productive plants of a productive variety.

"(3) Well matured and preserved from ripening time till planting time in a manner that will retain its full vigor.

"The importance of the three requirements just enumerated has been demonstrated experimentally by the Office of Corn Investigations of the Bureau of Plant Industry."

Every common school should have a corn club or a pig club for the boys and a poultry club for the girls. Education and business go hand in hand. The poultry crop exceeds the annual wheat crop in value.

TOMATOES.

The European war is certain to increase the demand for canned goods and consequently the price of all is sure to go up. The canning factories are going to have their inning, and should be made ready for an active season with full steam ahead. There are several factories in the district—do not overlook a good opportunity. You who are in the business ought to know how accurate the following from an agricultural bulletin is:

"Commercial tomato growing in the Southern States is almost exclusively confined to the production of tomatoes at a season when they can not be grown at the North except in greenhouses. On this account the commercial production of this crop is restricted to areas where there is very little, if any, freezing during the winter months. Florida and Texas lead in the production of this crop.

"The yield of fruit in the South, under the conditions mentioned, is much less than it is in regions having the long growing periods characteristic of higher latitudes. Yields vary from 75 to 250 bushels to the acre, but the high price obtained for the fruits which are thus produced at a season when the sole competition comes from the products of northern greenhouses renders the crop when well handled very remunerative.

"The tomato as a field crop is adapted to a wide variety of soils, though a medium clay loam is probably the best. In fact, any soil well adapted to potatoes will grow the tomato to good advantage.

"The cost of production per acre is much less for fruit for canning than in the case of early tomatoes, the chief difference being in the production of the plants. The several items may be classified as follows:

Cost of growing an acre of tomatoes for canning:

Plants	$2.00
Manuring and fertilizers	8.00
Preparation of land, setting plants, and cultivation	8.00
Picking and carting	10.00
Total	28.00

"The yield, as in the case of the early tomato, varies widely, ranging from 5 to as high as 20 tons per acre, even 30 tons per acre having been reported in exceptional cases, although the average for a series of years on average land will probably be under 8 tons. Where all conditions are carefully observed. 20-ton yields are frequently obtained, and at the prices received at the cannery, ranging from $5 to $7.50 per ton, according to the locality, the crop is a fairly good one, and the net profits are quite as large as for other field crops."

ASPARAGUS.

Suppose you had an acre of ground adapted to asparagus culture—and some pluck—let's see what experience has demonstrated and the test shows:

"The popularity which asparagus has achieved during recent years is remarkable. Formerly a luxury on the tables of the rich, it is now, during the season, a vegetable seen daily upon the tables of people of moderate or even of small incomes. It is also frequently recommended as an article of diet for the sick and convalescent.

"The fact that asparagus appears in the market at a time of the year in which few or no other fresh vegetables are available has had much to do with its increased consumption in our cities. It can also be easily preserved by canning, the product in this form being almost equal to the fresh article, and this has increased its use, being, as it were, a lengthening of the season.

"Brinckmeier, in his 'Braunschweiger Spargelbuch,' gives the following three rules for guidance in selecting a location for asparagus beds:

"(1) One should choose, in reference to the ground characteristics, open, free-lying ground, protected to the north and east, of gradual slope, free from trees or shrubbery.

"(2) The field should be exposed to the rays of the sun all day long; therefore a southern exposure is desirable; or, if that is not obtainable, a southwesterly or southeasterly slope, because either east, west or north exposure will cause shadows during a greater or less portion of the day.

"(3) Standing, stagnant ground water, which can not be drawn off by drainage, is to be avoided, the requirements of the plants indicating a somewhat damp subsoil, but not too high ground water.

"From the above it is deduced, and experience corroborates the theory, that a not too porous, but a well-drained, light, deep, sandy loam, with a clay subsoil, is to be preferred to all others.

"A prominent and successful New Jersey grower says:

"I can not give the cost in detail of establishing asparagus beds, as so much would depend upon whether one had roots to buy, and upon other matters. Where growers usually grow roots for their own planting the cost is principally the labor, manure, and loss of use of land for two years, upon which, however, a half crop can be had.

"The cost of maintaining a bed I can only estimate, as at times all the men on the farm may be at work at the asparagus, and at other times none at all, and I do not keep an account of the time put in at the asparagus. I should estimate the cost per acre as follows:

Manure (applied in the spring)	$25
Fertilizer (applied after cutting)	15
Labor, plowing, cultivating, hoeing, etc	20
Cutting and bunching	40
Total	100

"A bed well established, say 5 years after planting, when cared for should for the next 10 or 15 years yield from 1,800 to 2,000 bunches per annum, or at 10 cents per bunch (factory price), $180 or $200.

"This agrees very closely with the actual figures of the yield and receipts of another New Jersey grower, who in 1896 cut 22,584 bunches from 12 acres, all of which were not in full bearing, or 1,882 bunches per acre, and received $2,611 net returns from commission houses, or a fraction over 11 cents per bunch. Of course those getting higher prices or larger yields will exceed this, but it is a fair average for those who sell on commission or to canneries.

"The cost of good 1-year-old plants ought not to be over $4 per thousand, and it requires from 1,800 to 3,600 to fill an acre, depending upon the distance between plants; perhaps 2,500 would be a fair number, allowing surplus plants to fill missing hills, or $10 per acre. The plants can be grown from the seed for half that sum, if that plan be preferred.

"The cost of establishing a bed can be somewhat reduced by planting for the first two or three years some early garden crop between the rows, such as potatoes, peas, beans, onions, strawberries, and so forth, for as the roots are as yet not occupying all the ground there will be no injury to the plants, and the manure and cultivation necessary for the young asparagus will be sufficient for the other crop, hence the receipts for it will be almost entirely net and yield at least the returns of 'a half crop.'

"The estimate above calls for an annual expenditure of $40 per acre for fertilizer and manure, which is a liberal allowance; another estimate requires 2,000 pounds per acre of a mixture containing 400 pounds of muriate of potash, 1,100 pounds acid phosphate, and 500 pounds of nitrite of soda, which at market prices can be secured for less than the above sum. Asparagus is one of the earliest vegetables, especially if the roots are near to the surface or the soil above them has been temporarily removed so that the rays of the sun can easily penetrate to them.

"It is not in the province of this discourse to attempt a description of asparagus canning as practiced in a factory, for such at best would be the detailing of the method practiced at one and might differ widely from the practice of every other, and, besides, it is a business requiring expert knowledge and considerable capital, while domestic canning of asparagus is as simple as for any fruit or other vegetable.

"A lady of experience as a housekeeper gives the following receipt:

"Cut the asparagus the length of a fruit jar, pack the jar closely, fill with cold water, add a little salt, and put the lid on loosely. Place these jars in hot water reaching to the brim and boil for three hours, adding enough hot water to that in the jars to keep them full. Close lids tightly and set jars away to cool."

CABBAGE.

There are approximately 44,000 square feet in an acre. Plant this in cabbage, 2 feet apart each way; it will require 11,000 plants to do so. Say 10,000 mature, if you only get 1 cent a head, that makes $100 per acre. It beats corn or wheat, but suppose you could get 5 cents a head—you can not buy one at the store for less than 10 cents—nothing beats it; if it does, you ought not to want it; be satisfied with from $100 to $500 per acre for any crop.

"In some sections of the United States cabbage is extensively grown as a farm crop.

"According to the last census New York State grew more than 25,000 acres of cabbage, Pennsylvania nearly 11,000, while Virginia grew about 10,000 acres. The three States mentioned outrank all others by at least 2,000 acres. No adequate estimate can be placed on the value of this crop, as it fluctuates very decidedly, both in average and in price, from year to year.

"While cabbage will thrive upon a wide diversity of soil types, the soil which is usually selected for truck-farm operations is what gardeners call a 'quick soil,' one composed of sand with a small percentage of clay.

"Cabbages from the trucking region are chiefly marketed in carload lots. Long-distance shipments of truck crops of all classes are most economically handled in this manner; in fact, it would be impossible to carry on the trucking enterprises of the country on their present scale unless it were possible to ship such commodities in carload lots.

"The truck-crop cabbage business is at present chiefly conducted on a commission basis, although in a few sections crops are grown under contract. Owing to the perishable nature of early cabbage, it is probable that the crop will always be extensively handled on commission.

"An item that should be considered by the grower of early cabbage for the northern markets is the quantity of cabbage placed in storage from the northern fields. A short crop of late cabbage at the North means good prices for early southern-grown cabbages. Low prices and heavy storage of the northern-grown fall cabbage usually mean low returns for early southern-grown cabbage. The importance to the southern truck farmer of keeping close tab on the hold-over crop of the North in order that he may not be the loser is obvious.

"Cabbage is frequently made the basis of such a combination. Sometimes lettuce and radishes are grown between the rows of cabbage. Sometimes cabbage is planted between the rows of early beets, while late potatoes are frequently planted between the rows of early cabbage. The various combinations of such crops are too numerous to be catalogued."

Of course, you know that cabbage could be grown between rows of early beets and that late potatoes could be grown between rows of early cabbage, that beans could be grown between rows of cucumbers, that raspberries would grow between apple trees, that strawberries would grow under and currant bushes between grape vines, but the idea of keeping all the ground real busy at the same time may never have occurred to you.

It might amuse you if some one should tell you there is money in raising cucumbers, but you would never believe it until somebody proved it.

CUCUMBERS.

"The soil best adapted to the cultivation of cucumbers in the open is a light sandy loam, one which responds quickly to the temperature and fertilizer.

"As soon as the cucumbers reach marketable size—i. e., from 6 to 10 inches in length—they are picked from two to three times a week and sorted and graded, so as to place all those which are perfect in shape and uniform in size in one grade, which are usually packed in baskets of the Delaware type holding a bushel or a half barrel.

"The yield of cucumbers to the acre depends on the season, the variety grown, and the skill of the planter. A normal crop, however, may be placed at about 200 half-barrel baskets per acre, the price varying from 50 cents to as much as $2 per basket.

"After the fruit has been harvested and the marketing season has been closed, the vines should be destroyed by gathering and burning or plowing them under, so as not to harbor or breed disease.

"The cultivation of cucumbers to supply the demands of the pickle trade has assumed important commercial proportions in certain sections of the United States. As a rule, this industry is not of long duration in any locality. The salting stations, as they are called, which are the gathering points used by the pickle factories, are in the main of inexpensive constructions, and those parts which are most durable can be moved as necessity requires. The history of the pickle industry in any particular locality does not cover a period of more than 6 to 10 years.

"In general the price paid for cucumbers is remunerative, and the industry, if it could be carried on on an extensive scale, would be a very profitable one. The fact that only a small acreage of cucumbers can be handled by any single grower renders it a less attractive and less profitable crop in the aggregate than it would be if large acreages could be handled. The reason that only a small area can be grown by individual farmers is the great amount of hand labor required to gather the fruits. During the bearing season it is necessary to go over the patch at least three times each week in order to secure the fruits within the range of the sizes which will be accepted by the pickle factories—that is, from 2½ to 4 or 5 inches in length. Few farmers have sufficient assistance to allow them to grow more than 1 or 2 acres. If the pickling of the cucumbers were work which could be carried on by children, it would not present so many difficulties. The fruits are heavy, and the fact that it requires experience to find them under the leaves makes it men's labor rather than that of children."

One of the best paying, easiest managed, requiring less outlay, is the strawberry crop. Always a market for them.

There is a farmer, Ben Lewis, in the southern portion of Lincoln County making a good living raising and selling strawberries. He is buying all the land that joins him, wearing a smile, and it is wrong to give his scheme away.

If you could run upon something equally as profitable, let him alone and try raising beans or onions, or both. Do not be afraid of the smell; it always has worn off. There is always a demand for both vegetables. Armies and navies have subsisted on beans; hence the name "navy bean." Remember there are now 20,000,000 men under arms. Every cornstalk should make a bean pole this year. It will make you some good pin money.

FIELD BEANS.

"The census for 1900 gives the area of the bean crop, including both field and garden beans, as 453,867 acres, and the total product is placed at 5,064,844 bushels, an average of 11⅛ bushels per acre. The total amount received by the producers for the crop was $7,634,262, or an average of $1.51 per bushel. In considering this average it must be remembered that the total includes the products of good as well as of poor cultivators and embraces regions in which the crop was a practical failure, as well as those in which it was a success. For those States which make bean growing an important industry the average yield to the acre is somewhat higher than is recorded in this general average.

GARDEN BEANS—KIDNEY, LIMA, STRING, AND SNAP.

"Under favorable circumstances the best varieties of beans yield very large quantities of pods. It is not unusual to gather 200 bushels of string beans from an acre, the price ranging from $2.50 to 50 cents per half-bushel basket from early in the season until its close for any particular locality.

ONION CULTURE.

"The onion holds third place among the truck crops grown in the United States. In 1908 about 14,000,000 bushels, valued at $10,000,000, were produced, practically all of which were consumed in this country. In addition we annually import about 1,400,000 bushels from Spain, Egypt, Bermuda, and the South Sea islands. The onion is one of the more common crops of our home vegetable gardens, and it is well adapted to growing commercially on a small scale, very little capital being required for a beginning. The market for onions includes practically the entire commercial world, and the demand for a good article continues throughout the entire year.

"As a general average, onions will cost in the neighborhood of $80 when ready to market. This does not include the crates or bags in which to market them.

"An acre of onions will produce on an average 300 bushels, although large tracts are made to yield an average of 500 bushels an acre, at a cost for growing not exceeding $75. The price paid the grower in the field is sometimes as low as 35 cents a bushel, although 45 cents is about the ruling price, taking one year with another. A yield of 300 bushels, at 45 cents a bushel, gives a gross return of $135 an acre, or about $55 with the cost of growing deducted. The more successful onion growers, and they are many, count upon a net profit equal to the cost of growing the crop.

"In districts where the ordinary varieties of onions are planted in rows 3 feet apart and cultivated with horse tools, the yield is generally about 150 bushels an acre and the cost of production is frequently not more than $10 or $12 an acre.

"The quantity of onion seed that can be grown to an acre depends on several conditions. The yield of seed, as a rule, will be about 400 pounds to the acre, although as high as 800 or even 1,000 pounds have been secured.

"The price per pound paid for the seed varies according to the quality, variety, and market demands. For first-class, high-grade seed from specially selected bulbs of desirable types the growers frequently receive as much as $1.25 a pound, but for the general crop produced from bulbs not specially selected, which must be sold in competition with the great mass of seed produced by large growers, the price is generally not more than 40 or 50 cents a pound."

This list of demonstrations should be carried to greater length. However, I can not omit the sweet potato as one of the commodities that make bank accounts grow. If you have not access to a postal savings office, these institutions make money for you while you are asleep; but let us get back to our sweet potato.

SWEET POTATOES.

"With the passing of each year the sweet potato is becoming of greater importance as a commercial crop in the United States.

"Sweet potatoes thrive on a moderately fertile sandy loam which does not contain an excess of organic matter. They are frequently grown upon almost pure sand, especially where the subsoil is a yellow clay.

"To keep sweet potatoes in good condition they must be (1) well matured before digging, (2) carefully handled, (3) well dried or cured after being put in the house, and (4) kept at a uniform temperature after they are cured.

"Wooden houses are preferable, because they are cheaper and easier to keep dry.

"The value of this crop in the United States in 1909 was $34,429,000, 90 per cent of which was produced in the Southern States. The total area devoted to sweet potatoes in the United States increased from 537,000 acres in 1899 to 641,000 in 1909, and the yield increased from 42,500,000 to 52,200,000 bushels. The total value of the crop increased at a much more rapid rate than either the acreage or yield, showing an increase of 78.3 per cent in 10 years.

"One reason why southern farmers have not received good prices for their sweet potatoes is that they have not used proper methods of handling and marketing. In many cases the potatoes are badly bruised and cut in digging, are put in bags or rough barrels without grading, and are rushed on the market when there is an oversupply. The secrets of success in getting high prices are (1) to carefully grade, clean, and pack the product, and (2) to put it upon the market when there is a good demand. The greatest demand for sweet potatoes is, as a rule, from the middle of December to the middle of March.

"The market demands a medium-sized, uniform type of sweet potato, free from bruises or decayed spots.

"The varieties of sweet potatoes that the markets demand should be grown. The potato should be carefully graded, cleaned, and packed in neat and attractive packages.

"Sweet potatoes should never be marketed in bags or in bulk."

Do not forget that all that the fellow who is making money may have is a head and a pair of hands; you have the same.

TRANSPORTATION AND MARKETING.

It is a good rule not to embark on any business until you have considered and figured closely on transportation. Freight is another name for tax, and the carriers still charge all the traffic will bear, and your enterprise will come to grief unless you are granted a living rate by them. Transportation includes freight or express; terminal or switching charges; drayage. There are other elements of cost which must not be overlooked: Commission, jobber's profit, storage charges, distributor's profit, and the cost of growing, packing, and handling to shipping point.

Do not you see what a great advantage the parcel post is to the producer? They can use it more profitably than the mail-order houses if they will only take advantage of it.

It furnishes the best delivery wagon in the country. The rural carrier receives the package at your front gate for a fixed and uniform low charge, and it is delivered for you to the party to whom you sent it, eliminating all of the different transportation charges above mentioned; and no one is going to use the mail to defraud you; you have the best collector in the world—Uncle Sam.

Did it ever occur to you what a cinch a fourth-class post office is to a country merchant? Exclusive of the profit on his produce that he sends to the city he gets the cancellation of the postage required to carry it. A 50-pound package by parcel post is worth 54 cents to the postmaster in the first and second zones, a snug profit in itself. Suppose he had 10 city customers a day, do not you see? And he is benefitting the farmer by buying something from him that the local market would not absorb.

CLUBS.

The next best and only safe plan for marketing is carload lots, f. o. b. at your shipping point. But you are a limited producer; then form a club or association on the cooperative system of marketing, standardize packages, and uniform grades. California, Oregon, and Washington never let a faulty piece of fruit start east. Give your product a standing in the market because of the good faith and fair dealing of the club or association that is behind it as a guarantee. As soon as you form your club ask the department to send you a demonstrator.

No club or association in any locality should embark on a cooperative system of marketing without first establishing some central agency by which accurate forecasts of crop prospects can be furnished as well as the visible supply on the market. One market may be glutted while another may be unsupplied. Cooperation does not thrive on fraternal agreements. Like anything else in the business line, the best results are obtained through a money consideration paid to some one trustworthy and possessing business capacity.

Marketing, shipping, and transportation necessarily involve the question of good roads.

GOOD ROADS.

The most unpardonable wrong and inexcusable injury that every citizen does to himself is his failure or refusal, if required to do so, to put in full time and good work on the public roads. Why, the very reputation of a county or locality for good roads bring buyers into that county or locality and adds value to every acre of land. You can not have a good home or a satisfactory home unless you have a good road leading to it. You are losing money by your failure to improve the road. Yes; you are not only losing money, you are throwing it away; and the other fellow who buys your farm at a sacrifice and then does what you neglected to do—improve the road—finds it where you lost it.

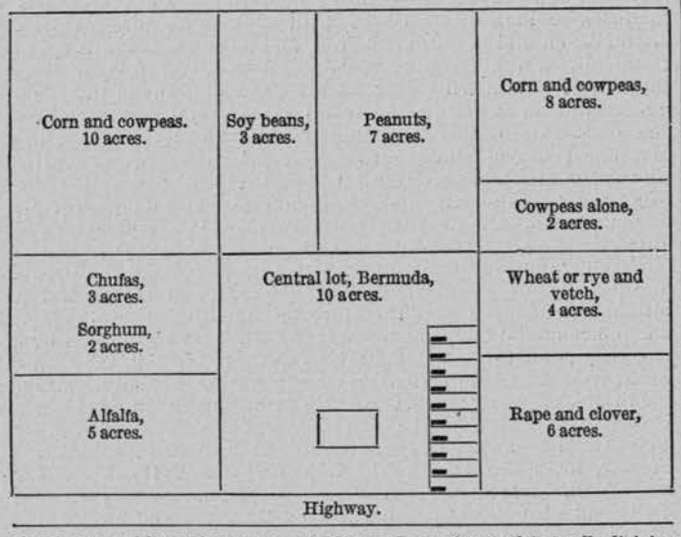
I can not close without registering my protest against what I consider an unbusinesslike practice pursued by certain farmers in selling young calves and pigs. This is like cutting out the crop when the price is very high and very profitable.

A farmer considers an old brood mare that will yield a $40 mule colt a good investment. Why is not an old cow that will produce a $40 calf sooner a better investment? Yet you send the old cows and the veal to the butcher—a double loss. A $15 veal calf will make a $130 New York shipper as a 3-year old. At what business can anyone run $15 up to $130 in the same length of time, unless he is some kind of a gambler?

HOG RAISING.

I simply can not be convinced that it will not pay to feed $3 corn to a $6 pig. There has been too much money made in feeding $1.50 corn to $3 hogs to make me believe that there is not money, and plenty of it, in feeding $3 corn to $6, $7, and $8 hogs. The risk from cholera has been greatly reduced by the serum that has been discovered, and the present appropriation of $500,000 was intended to bring this remedy within the reach of every farmer.

The loss in the United States from diseases of swine during 1913 has been estimated at 7,004,800 head; 90 per cent of this loss is regarded as due to hog cholera. The value per head has been placed at $10.40, which indicates a total loss for the year of $65,564,928. The loss for the past 40 years has been estimated at $50,000,000 per annum. Complete statistics have not been compiled on hog-cholera work done under the present appropriation. Reports, however, covering the treatment of 123,363 head, 106,029 of which were treated in infected herds, show a saving of 89.5 per cent. There is good money and certain money in raising the young stock at present prices. You can not lose.



Cholera hogs should be kept away from running streams of every size, because the stream carries the disease down with the current, thereby spreading the contagion.

"Hog raising is one of the most profitable lines of animal husbandry in the South if wisely managed, and one of the most unprofitable if conducted in the ordinary way; that is, if the hogs are raised without care and fed without knowledge or judgment.

"The best way to make hog raising profitable in the South is to graze the hogs upon pastures prepared especially for them, supplementing the green food by the addition of a small grain ration. Upon this plan hogs can be raised at an average cost of 1½ to 3 cents a pound, depending mainly upon the management of the sows and pigs and upon an economic plan of fattening.

"Prepare a central pasture of Bermuda grass. Adjoining the central pasture should be several small pasture fields, or they may all be in one field, with movable fences for partition as required. The pastures required in addition to the Bermuda are, for winter and spring grazing, wheat and hairy vetch, chufas, early Essex rape, and red clover, where red clover will grow, or crimson clover may be used; for summer and fall grazing, sorghum, cowpeas, soy beans, peanuts, and alfalfa. Adjacent to the central pasture should be a field of corn in which cowpeas are planted at the time of last cultivation. The following plan shows the general field arrangement for a hog-breeding establishment where the hogs are mainly fed on green crops.

Showing central lot with necessary buildings. Convenient outlets to all adjoining lots from central lot.

Details of cropping system for a herd of 10 sows, dropping two litters a year:

"The central field containing the buildings, breeding pens, and water should be quite rolling, so as to thoroughly drain at all times; sandy loam land preferred, well set in Bermuda grass, with some trees for shade.

"Sow a mixture of burr and white clover on the Bermuda sod in the fall. This will greatly improve it for winter grazing. This lot should contain 10 acres.

"On one side of the central field lay off another 10-acre lot, 6 acres of which should be planted in Early Essex rape and red clover; if too far south for red clover, use crimson clover or Japan clover (lespedeza). The remaining 4 acres should be in wheat or rye and hairy vetch.

"On another side of the central field lay off a 10-acre lot, 7 acres for Spanish peanuts and 3 acres for soy beans (large yellow).

"On a third side should be another 10-acre field, allotting 5 acres to alfalfa, 3 acres to chufas, and 2 acres to sorghum. This will leave two 10-acre fields, one at each corner, for corn and cowpeas. This plan can be enlarged without material modification by including the peanut and soy bean field in the central pasture and adding other fields for forage crops. There should be some movable fences so as to divide the pastures for the most judicious grazing.

"Never throw corn for hogs on the ground. It forces them to eat too much dirt.

"It is emphatically necessary to avoid all wallowing holes if the herd is to be kept healthy."

EUROPEAN WAR FARMERS' OPPORTUNITY.

Unless peace in Europe comes as suddenly and as unexpectedly as war came the prospects for the farmer are rosy. No one rejoices that the opportunity comes in the way it has, because everyone deplores war. Still, the opportunity having presented itself, it should not be neglected, but should be grasped.

The plunging of European nations into war almost in the twinkle of an eye meant temporary world-wide paralysis and panic. Gold was locked up and credit was suspended, moratoria declared, debts made uncollectible. The whole business world was dazed; the shock was similar to that which occurs when there is a sudden outbreak of a widespread malignant epidemic, more appalling than the terror inspired by the most gigantic earthquake, more staggering than the world's worst conflagration—a catastrophe second in calamity and destruction only to the deluge; a colossal convulsion that has caused a general tie-up and derangement of business. Millions of men have been called from their avocations to arms; manufactures and mills have been closed, if not destroyed. The destruction wrought by 20,000,000 of men in war defies calculation.

We are now rapidly recovering from this business tie-up and derangement (which has completely dominated commercial affairs at home and abroad), with prospective advantages greatly in our favor. The season bustles with opportunity; foreign trade beckons us. The markets that have heretofore been supplied by the nations now at war must look elsewhere for supplies that can be delivered.

It therefore behooves our farmers to increase their acreage, for this country is the only country that can deliver its supplies, whether from the farm or the mills. Everybody busy; full steam ahead.

The President, having by his wise course saved our country from the frightful scourge of war with Mexico, is eager and anxious to seize every wise considered plan to reach the foreign trade, and is utilizing every legitimate instrument at his command to this end.

Strength to his good arm that he may continue to pilot this Government safely in this the world's greatest and most deplorable crisis since the flood. Let the American people remember that it was a Democratic administration—notwithstanding the charge of incompetency to run the Federal Government—that kept this country out of war with Mexico, while all the wiseacres, high brows, and crowned heads of Europe were plunging their people into war.

Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has already that permission.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back seven minutes.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Chairman, I avail myself of the latitude permitted in debate in the consideration of an appropriation bill to say a few words in regard to various measures now pending having for their object the prohibition of the export and sale of arms, ammunition, munitions of war, and even breadstuffs, if the House resolution 611, which is as follows—

Whereas it is alleged that the manipulations of speculators have caused an abnormal rise in the price of wheat; and
Whereas reports show that wheat prices on the Chicago Board of Trade and similar institutions reached the highest mark in several years on yesterday; and
Whereas there exists no natural cause for the fluctuations in the price of this product: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Attorney General of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed to inform the House of Representatives what steps, if any, he has taken against the Chicago Board of Trade and similar institutions and their alleged interference with the orderly course of interstate commerce.

Resolved further, That the Attorney General of the United States be directed to take such steps as are necessary to protect the consuming public from the manipulators of food prices, with especial reference to the prices of wheat and flour.

Resolved further, That the President of the United States be requested to take the proper course to make effective an embargo upon shipments from this country of wheat and flour if, in the discretion of the President, the operations of the aforesaid speculators can be checked in no other way.

which I had the honor to introduce on the 28th of August last, is interpreted to have that effect, to the belligerent European powers. Most Members of this House are in receipt of many petitions from their constituents asking them to support with their votes House joint resolution 377 and Senate bill 6688, both being intended to put a stop to the traffic in weapons, ammunition, and munitions of war between this ostensibly neutral country and European nations at war. Being a man of peace and believing that the passage of either of the above measures would hasten peace between the warring nations, I heartily support both and hope that they will be enacted into laws. I further say that, in my opinion, these measures go not far enough, and the resolution introduced by me should be added in order to produce the desired result. The American people, not having any interest in the bloody struggle now going on in Europe, should not be compelled to pay extravagant prices for the necessities of life in order to sustain one or more of the European belligerents. The price of our bread should not be raised in order to supply bread to the armies of England and France. But few American farmers derive any benefit from the high prices of their wheat and corn. These benefits are enjoyed by a gang of unscrupulous speculators, who avail themselves of the opportunity given by the war in Europe to squeeze and oppress our own people. The exportation of weapons, ammunition, and munitions of war to the belligerent nations is bad enough, but it is an outrage that the people of this country should suffer on account of the exportation of breadstuffs. Nobody would oppose the exportation of the surplus of our breadstuffs to the belligerent nations alike, but no just man can favor an export of the necessities of life that will increase their cost to our own people.

In this connection I may be permitted to quote Mr. Horace L. Brand, a Chicago journalist, who stands at the head of one of the greatest German newspapers of the country and whom the President refused to receive when he appeared here at the head of a delegation to combat, in the interest of truth, the statements made by a commission of Belgians concerning the alleged atrocities committed by the German soldiers in Belgium. The President severely rebuked Mr. Brand and intimated that he had violated the provisions of his neutrality proclamation. I heartily approve the arguments of Mr. Brand in favor of the joint resolution, No. 377, introduced by the gentleman from Iowa, but I am free to state that this resolution does not go far enough for me. I would not leave the exportation of war material to the belligerent nations to the President's discretion. I much prefer the bill introduced in the Senate by Senator HITCHCOCK, of Nebraska, which absolutely prohibits such exportation.

The joint resolution of the gentleman from Iowa reads as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to prohibit the export of arms, ammunition, or munitions of war of every kind (whether whole or in parts to be later assembled) from the territory or any seaport of the United States until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

I note particularly, and with regret, that this resolution does not include foodstuffs nor any other articles sometimes classed as absolute contraband, nor any articles usually classed as contraband, excepting arms, ammunition, and munitions of war.

The opponents of this measure claim that the United States was suffering from commercial depression before the outbreak of this war and that the large orders given by warring nations to United States manufacturers, merchants, and exporters has brought about a condition of prosperity. The friends of this resolution do not deny that very large orders have been placed in the United States by warring nations; but they affirm that the total amount of money now being spent in the United Sates by warring nations for arms, ammunition, and munitions of war is relatively small compared to the total amount of money now being spent for all the articles purchased by Europe. Thus the greatest part by far of the present uplift in business would not be lost if this resolution would become a law. The exact proportion between the money spent for arms, ammunition, and munitions of war to the total amount spent will soon be published, because the Senate has requested the Department of Commerce to furnish exact figures on this subject.

Another argument made by the opponents of this measure is that if it becomes a law it will lengthen the duration of the war, and in support of this contention they claim that the sooner the belligerent nations obtain the largest quantities of weapons, ammunition, and munitions of war with which to annihilate each other the sooner will the one nation or side be reduced to defeat. The friends of this measure take precisely the opposite view, claiming that this resolution, when enacted into law, will shorten the duration of the war, and in support of this contention they argue that each one of the warring nations will be able for many years to come to obtain sufficiently large bodies of men to carry on defensive warfare. It is not a question of men, they argue, but it is a question of being able to equip the soldiers and sailors properly for waging warfare. They point to the Civil War, during which England fitted out the Alabama and other warships for the Confederates and supplied the southern army with war material of every kind, which caused a prolongation of that conflict. Even if the opponents of this measure were correct, its friends assert that it would be inhuman for a neutral country to furnish to belligerent countries the means by which these nations annihilate each other.

The opponents of this resolution claim that the unrestricted sale of weapons, ammunition, and munitions of war is necessary during all wars, because were the sale of these articles prohibited by neutral nations, it would compel every neutral nation and every nation at peace to manufacture and store large quantities for future wars, on the theory that were this resolution to become a law universally no country at war could import articles needed by it during war after the outbreak of war. The friends of this measure answer this argument by stating that no country in the world has prohibited the unrestricted exportation from its borders of weapons, ammunition, and munitions of war, and still during times of peace every country of continental Europe has manufactured and stored large quantities of so-called contraband of war in preparation for some future conflict. England and the United States of all the great powers of Europe and America have not done so, but the reason for their not doing so is that each is protected by water, making it extremely difficult for the enemy to invade those countries.

The friends of this resolution argue that the present condition is rapidly creating a military clique in this country which will be composed of manufacturers and others interested in the sale of weapons, ammunition, and munitions of war. In many parts of the United States factories are being enlarged in order to carry out the large orders placed by Europeans. When these orders are filled these factories will become idle. A persistent and strenuous effort will then be made by the owners of these factories to induce our Government to manufacture weapons, ammunition, and munitions of war and store them up in preparation for a future conflict. Being possessed of these articles the United States will be agitated by thoughts of military conquests, thus endangering the future peace of the United States. The opponents of this measure say that in order to make it a law the policy of the United States must be reversed, that international law as well as the law of our land does not prohibit the manufacture and sale and exportation of weapons, ammunition, and munitions of war even during conflicts raging abroad. Thus this resolution would be virtually a reversal of our policy and a nullification of international law. The friends of this measure admit that under international law no prohibition is recognized, and therefore the exportation of weapons, ammunition, and munitions of war is both legal and permissible. But they point to the law of 1898, according to which the United States prohibited the exportation of weapons, ammunition, and munitions of war to every country from any point within the United States, and to the fact that under this law President Roosevelt laid an embargo upon the exportation of contraband of war, including coal, to the Republic of San Domingo, thus establishing a precedent, which can not be successfully refuted. To be sure this law was amended by Congress and now stands upon our statute books as a law giving to the President the legal right, in his discretion, to lay an embargo upon the exportation of contraband of war, including coal, to any land which is a part of the North American or the South American Continents. Under this amendment President Taft laid an embargo upon the exportation of contraband to Mexico, and under the same amendment President Wilson raised the embargo previously laid by President Taft.

The opponents of the above resolution claim that it is introduced by the friends of Germany with the object of aiding Germany, and therefore is partial in its inception and would violate the spirit of American neutrality as proclaimed by President Wilson. The friends of this measure admit that it was introduced by an American citizen of German extraction, whose sympathies are with Germany. I dare say that there are other Members of this House in whose veins not a drop of German blood flows. They point to the undisputed fact that England controls the seas, and by its use of that power makes it impossible for an enemy of England to procure any article from the United States which England decrees shall not reach the enemy. It is a condition and not a theory that confronts us. This condition places the United States in a position of partiality, because it can favor only one side to the European conflict, much as the United States would like to favor both sides equally. The opponents argue that the present position of the United States is one of passive indifference, and if that position seems to favor the allies it is through no fault of the United States but, rather, due to Germany's weakness on the seas, and that the above resolution, when enacted into law, would make the United States adopt measures with the result that a decisive advantage would be gained by Germany over the allies, due to the fact that Germany is better supplied with weapons, ammunition, and munitions of war and other articles needed by an army than are the allies. The friends of this measure assert that the above contention may be true and it may not be true, but it remains a matter of opinion whether Germany is better supplied or not, and that neither the citizens nor the Government have official information of sufficient accuracy and reliability to prove the contention that Germany, including its friends, is better supplied to carry on war than France, including the allies. But even if it could be proven, then that proof should in no way influence the action of the United States, because we desire to remain neutral. In the spirit of neutrality we should carry out President Wilson's proclamation, which was to the effect that no act should be committed by citizens of the United States which could in any way be construed as favoring, aiding, or helping the one nation more than the other. This proclamation is in line with the original and first proclamation, issued in 1793 by George Washington, then President of the United States and now revered as the Father of our Country, which contains the following words:

The duty and interests of the United States require that they should, with sincerity and good faith, adopt and pursue a conduct friendly and impartial toward the belligerent powers.

To be impartial is to favor no one party more than another. But the acts of selling weapons, ammunition, and munitions of war are construed as favoring those nations which are the purchasers. Therefore the friends of this measure argue that it should be made a law, so that no acts could legally take place consisting in the sale and exportation of weapons, ammunition, and munitions of war, and therefore could not be construed as acts of favoritism to any nation. Therefore, too, the friends of this measure claim that its enactment into law is a necessity in order to prove to all the world that the United States is neutral in spirit as well as in proclamation and is friendly and impartial to all the belligerent nations.

The last and probably the strongest argument in favor of the enactment of this resolution into law is the following: President Wilson proclaimed Sunday, October 4, as the day upon which our Nation should pray that peace may come to the warring nations of the earth. Our people did so. On the other hand, a few unpatriotic American citizens labor six or seven days in the week to manufacture and sell for profit those articles, particularly weapons, ammunition, and munitions of war, to the warring nations, knowing full well that they are intended to prolong the war and to annihilate human beings. Into this position of national hypocrisy the United States is now placed. It is the duty of every patriot to do his share to take from his country the stain of national hypocrisy now placed upon it because of the grasping commercialism of some of its citizens.

The friends of this measure know full well that England can not raise enough food to feed its peoples; nevertheless this measure does not include a prohibition of the exportation of foodstuffs. This is done, I presume, upon the ground of humanity. But in this I beg to differ with the author and the friends of this resolution. We have a duty to perform to our people. Owing to the demands of England and other European countries now at war for our breadstuffs the price of the same has risen to a height that precludes many of our own people from obtaining their just share of God's bounty. I believe not only in an embargo on all articles that will help to prolong the war, but also in an embargo on all foodstuffs in order to make them cheaper to our own people and bring this unholy slaughter to a close.

I heartily agree with the gentleman from Missouri who a few days ago said in this House that the war would be ended in 30 days if the belligerents were unable to obtain supplies of war material in this country. I believe that the American people could end this war in 10 days by simply saying to the belligerents, "You shall receive no arms, no ammunition, no wheat, no corn, no flour, nothing from us that will enable you to keep this war up a single day longer." By supplying some of the belligerent nations with arms and food we are particeps criminis in the greatest slaughter of human beings the world has ever seen. Furthermore, we are inconsistent. With one hand we feed the Belgian orphans made by the war and with the other hand we manufacture and sell the things that will make orphans of another nationality. The President has discouraged the loaning of money to the belligerents, and he has indicated that he would prevent the exportation of submarines in parts to be assembled abroad. Now, what is the difference in helping a belligerent, either with money, with arms and ammunition, with submarines, or even with breadstuffs? We are helping him to the detriment of the other fellow, and that is all there is about it. We are not neutral and impartial, as we ought to be. For the very reason that Germany and Austria being unable to obtain supplies from us we should refuse these supplies to England and to France if we would be strictly neutral and impartial. If all the belligerents were able to obtain these supplies from us, then there might be an excuse for us to furnish these supplies.

While the war may help a few manufacturers and speculators in this country, while it may stimulate a few industries and provide employment for a very small part of our workingmen, the war has caused us untold misery, and threatens even the peace of our people. With hundreds of thousands of workingmen idle in our large cities, owing to the war and to the economical policies of the Democratic Party, we may at any time hear of serious bread riots. The war has caused far more factories to close than to open, and many more will close when their supply of raw material runs out. By refusing to sell arms and ammunition, breadstuffs, and gasoline to one group of belligerents we will shorten the war and help to bring about peace, thus giving again employment to our own people, and at the same time we will prevent starvation that stares many of our people in the face, on account of our exportation of breadstuffs. A wheat famine is to be expected, and with a wheat famine will come the bread riots. Now is the time for Congress to step in and protect our own people by prohibiting the exportation of breadstuffs as well as of ammunition and arms. In closing my remarks I may be permitted to quote from the writings of Mr. Edward T. Devine, one of the foremost social workers of the country. I fully agree with him, but I even go further than he does, as I said before. Mr. Devine writes:

We should cease to export munitions of war. It is not a question of what we have the right to do as neutrals under international law. No doubt Jefferson believed that we had a perfect legal right to export guns and ammunition, just as our bankers had a perfect right to disregard President Wilson's wishes and make loans to belligerent nations. We are not discussing whether any nation could properly demand that such exports cease. Can anyone deny that the manufacturers would have a right to cease to manufacture and sell to belligerents as the bankers declined to make loans? Can anyone deny that if public opinion demands it, we can by legislation forbid the exportation of arms and ammunition as Congress authorized the President to forbid such export to Mexico? Just as we had a right to repeal the Panama Canal tolls act, because it seemed to us better to err, if at all, on the side of interpreting our agreements to our own disadvantage rather than to run the risk of failing to keep them, so it is always open to us to do more than the letter of international law requires on the side of neutrality and peace.

The simple and appalling consideration which should control our decision is that if the cannon, armor plate, copper, powder, motor cars, and gasoline, with which the war is carried on, are supplied by this country, we are responsible for its continuance. We might easily find ourselves literally more responsible for it than any nation engaged on the battle field. If American capital comes to have a large stake in the war, inevitably the American conscience will be seared, American eyes blinded, American influence for peace paralyzed, American judgment on the issues discredited, American neutrality a byword, American prayers for peace a blasphemy. It is said that it would have been very well if we had taken this position at the outset, but that to change our policy now would be taking sides against the nation which controls the seas. But has not that nation and her allies profited most by whatever part this country had in supplying war materials in the past six months? Are we to put no faith in the assurance of England, expressed through every channel of public opinion, that while she values our sympathy she does not ask us for material assistance? Is it true that the resources of England and her over-sea dominions, of France and Russia and their less powerful but by no means contemptible lesser allies are insufficient to carry on the war against Germany unless we furnish the arms and ammunition? If that is so, there is more force in the claim of superior German ability, as the friends of the allies are wont to admit.

It is not as if it were a question of the first few days or weeks of war when a peace-loving nation might be taken by surprise. Something might be said for coming directly to the rescue of such a people with loans of money, supplies of war materials, or even with an expeditionary military force. But the time for any such argument is past. Our motive in selling war supplies is of no such character. The Germans believe themselves to be fighting for national existence. The English declared war in support of treaty obligations, so they say. Americans at a safe distance, in cold blood, make fighting possible for cash alone, coining American brains and the strenuous toil of men, women, and children into a form fit only for destruction. If 1915 does not end the war, let it at least end America's ignoble part in it.

In such a policy the dictates of humanity are coincident with true national economic interest. No nation ever prospered in any real or lasting sense by diverting its industry into destructive and wasteful channels. What contributes to life and well-being is economically profitable and nothing else. Every dollar invested in the manufacture of rifles and ammunition for export to Europe under present conditions is a dollar of American capital worse than wasted. Every such dollar means death and wounds and devastation. Every such dollar, however it may proclaim a trust in God upon its lying face, is but the devil's own coin, cursing capitalist and laborer and middleman and customer. The end of industry is wealth, not profit or wages; more and better life, not export trade.

If this seem like idealism rather than economics, the argument may be pushed on a lower plane to the same end. We are facing financial and industrial uncertainty. Already the distress from lack of employment is serious and is likley to be much greater before it is less. The lack of available capital is the one certain and obvious cause of this condition. Capital put into the manufacture and distribution of fuel and food and clothing, into the provision of homes, of the necessities and comforts of life, is so invested as to relieve this condition. It is turned over rapidly and keeps industry healthily alive. Capital put into a city which is about to be burned to the ground is not more surely lost for every purpose of sound national economy than capital put into the manufacture of munitions of war for the foreign trade, especially when these are to be paid for by the sale of American securities at a sacrifice or by the issue of foreign governmental obligations.

The manufacture for sale in time of war indifferently to any buyer who may be able to carry away is on a par with the reckless manufacture and sale of bombs or poisons alike to the insane, to children, or to those bent on criminal acts. Slavery, brigandage, and piracy are comparatively respectable. But the manufacturers are not at fault above others. The bankers needed a lead from Washington. While this trade continues without condemnation or protest we are alike responsible.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa if he has anyone to go on now?

Mr. HAUGEN. I have not.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAMLIN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 20415 and had come to no conclusion thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 8 o'clock and 9 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned to meet to-morrow, Saturday, January 23, 1915, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting with a letter from the Chief of Engineers reports on preliminary examination and survey of Minneapolis Harbor, Minn., with a view to increased harbor facilities, including a turning basin (H. Doc. No. 1512); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of Labor, reporting an accumulation of papers in the Department of Labor not needed or useful in the transaction of current business, nor of historical value, asking authority for disposition of the same (H. Doc. No. 1513); to the Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting letter from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, submitting abstracts of proposals received during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1914, for materials and labor in connection with works under the Engineer Department; to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 19116) to grant certain lands to the city of Grand Junction, Colo., for the protection of its water supply, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1308), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 2518) granting to the town of Nevadaville, Colo., the right to purchase certain lands for the protection of its water supply, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1309), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. SIMS, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 20933) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Arkansas & Memphis Railway Bridge & Terminal Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River at Memphis, Tenn.," approved August 23, 1912, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1310), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20939) granting an increase of pension to Charles Black; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 20837) granting a pension to John C. Rowland; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 19868) granting a pension to Anderson M. Beck; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 20706) granting a pension to Maud S. Hayes; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BORLAND: A bill (H. R. 21121) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River near Kansas City," approved June 17, 1914; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. FERRIS: A bill (H. R. 21122) to validate certain homestead entries; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BROCKSON: A bill (H. R. 21123) for the relief of the estate of John R. Black, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 21124) for the relief of George E. Megee and others; to the Committee on Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 21125) for the relief of Georgia Hallman and Margaret J. Tyson; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BULKLEY: A bill (H. R. 21126) to authorize the change of name of the steamer General Garretson to S. H. Robbins; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. CARY: A bill (H. R. 21127) granting a pension to Veronica Werner; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. DUPRÉ: A bill (H. R. 21128) granting a pension to Edmond Harvey; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HELVERING: A bill (H. R. 21129) granting an increase of pension to Athel House; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 21130) granting an increase of pension to Collins Washburn; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 21131) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of William B. Stanford; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KAHN: A bill (H. R. 21132) for the relief of the estate of Rudolf Axman, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 21133) granting a pension to Ryan V. Eichelberger; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 21134) granting an increase of pension to John Campbell; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PAIGE of Massachusetts: A bill (H. R. 21135) granting a pension to Sarah A. Farnsworth; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SLEMP: A bill (H. R. 21136) granting an increase of pension to Thomas J. Turner; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER (by request): Memorial of Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, Walnut Grove Methodist Episcopal Church, Topeka, Kans., favoring the passage of the Gillett resolution relative to abolishing slavery in the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. AVIS: Resolution of members of Norodovia Polsky Society, Group No. 838, of the Polish Alliance of West Virginia, and of Wolnosc Society, Group No. 1070, of the Polish Alliance of West Virginia, protesting against the passage of the Smith-Burnett immigration bill; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. BAILEY: Petition of Local Union No. 1848, United Mine Workers of America, Saxman, Pa., favoring Kern-Foster bill, to establish experiment mining stations; to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

By Mr. BARTHOLDT: Petition of Pride of the West Lodge, No. 308, of the International Association of Machinists, of St. Louis, Mo., in favor of an investigation by the Government of affairs of the Wabash Railroad Co.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petitions of Evangelical Zion's congregation, of Des Peres; of Missouri State League of German Catholics; of Robert Kiessling, P. A. Schulze, and E. N. Schluer, all of St. Louis; of S. Buckmueller, of Wellston; of Claus Luehrs, of Blackburn, all in the State of Missouri; and M. G. W. Aurora, of Newark, N. J., favoring observance of strict neutrality by the United States; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petitions of Federation of Evangelical Brotherhood of St. Louis, Mo.; German-American Association of St. Petersburg, Fla.; German-American Alliance of Los Angeles, Cal.; Pueblo German and Austrian Widows' and Orphans' War Sufferers Association, of Pueblo, Colo.; German-American State Alliance of Kentucky, Covington, Ky.; St. Anthony Branch of Catholic Union; State League of Missouri, of St. Louis, Mo.; Macalester College Alumni Association, of St. Paul, Minn.; Charles Uhden, Karl Hesse, Carl Medrow, and J. A. Reshoft, of Spokane, Wash.; A. M. Toboczypf, of Cleveland, Ohio; University of Minnesota, of Minneapolis, Minn.; St. Agatha Branch of Catholic Knights of America, of St. Louis, Mo.; J. Flottmann, of Ferguson, and 23 citizens of St. Louis, Mo., in favor of bill prohibiting the manufacture and sale of arms and munitions of war to the belligerent nations of Europe; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. BEAKES: Petitions of Jacob Laubengayer and 16 citizens of Ann Arbor; William F. Wegner and 82 citizens of Riga; Louis Andres, of Waltz; and 52 citizens of Wayne County, all in the State of Michigan, protesting against the export of munitions of war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. BURKE of South Dakota: Petitions of sundry citizens of Aberdeen, Delmont, Hazel, Hecla, Hoven, Orient, Redfield, Seneca, Turton, and various towns in Codington and Deuel Counties, S. Dak., favoring House joint resolution 377; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin: Resolutions passed by the Stadtverband, of Portage, Wis., representing 102 members and signed by A. Zienert, president, and J. Schnell, secretary, asking for the passage of a resolution at this session to enable the President to levy an embargo upon all war material, excepting foodstuffs only; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition of E. G. Strassburger and 204 other citizens of Cedarburg, Wis., asking for the passage at this session of House joint resolution 377, to prohibit the sale or exportation from this country to European countries now at war of war material; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition of G. R. Rousseau and 62 other citizens of Theresa, Wis., asking for the passage at this session of House joint resolution 377, to levy an embargo upon and prohibit the exportation from this country of war material to the European countries now at war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. CARY: Petition of Common Council of Cudahy, Wis., favoring civil-service retirement bill; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

Also, petition citizens of Wauwatosa, South Milwaukee, and Cudahy, Wis., favoring House bill 5308, to tax mail-order houses; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of A. F. Kurth, Henry Groth, Ram Stuart, Robert Plogt, Mrs. Mayer, Herman Mittag, Ole Olsen, Bruno Arndt, Edward Paulus, August Tetschler, and 192 others, all residents of Milwaukee, Wis., urging the passage of House joint resolution 377; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. CLARK of Florida: Petition of W. B. Rodgers and other citizens of Miami, J. J. Oetjen and other citizens of Gotha, and H. Falk and other citizens of Delray, Fla., favoring bill forbidding export of arms; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. COPLEY: Resolutions adopted by Branch No. 52, St. Hedwig's Society, of Downers Grove; Magdalene Society, of Joliet; and Polish National Alliance, of Aurora, all in the State of Illinois, protesting against the enactment of the proposed immigration restrictions requiring educational tests; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. DALE: Petition of W. G. Taylor, of New York City, against Fitzgerald amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. DILLON: Petitions of citizens of Flandreau and Hartford, S. Dak., favoring passage of House joint resolution 377, relative to export of munitions of war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. DONOVAN: Petition of citizens of Danbury, Conn., favoring House joint resolution 377, to forbid export of arms; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. ESCH: Petition of A. H. Buelow and 57 other citizens of Loganville, Wis., urging passage of House joint resolution prohibiting export of munitions of war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition of Albert Stroota and 43 other citizens of Abbotsford, Wis., protesting against allowing the Menace the privileges of the mails; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. GERRY: Petitions of Rev. Leroy L. Daniels, of Providence, R. I., urging the passage of the Palmer-Owen bill; to the Committee on Labor.

Also, petitions of Arthur Carney, Patrick J. Burke, John J. Shanley, Thomas M. Casey, and Herbert F. Croghan, of Providence, R. I., urging protection for Catholics in Mexico; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. GILMORE: Petition of Polish National Alliance, of Brockton, Mass., against Smith-Burnett immigration bill; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. GOEKE: Petition of William N. Emch and 38 others, of Fort Recovery, Ohio, favoring passage of House joint resolution 377, to prohibit export of munitions of war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. GORDON: Petition of citizens of Cleveland, Ohio, favoring passage of House joint resolution 377, to prohibit export of war material; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition of board of trade, village council, and citizens of Put in Bay Island, Lake Erie, Ohio, and the George Worthington Co., of Cleveland, Ohio, protesting against the passage of the seamen's bill in its present form; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. KAHN: Papers to accompany the bill for relief of estate of Rudolf Axman; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island: Petitions of Thomas M. Casey, Herbert F. Croghan, and James J. Daly, of Providence, protesting against treatment of Catholics in Mexico; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. KONOP: Petitions of citizens of the ninth congressional district of Wisconsin, favoring the passage of House joint resolution 377, to prohibit export of war material; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. LOBECK: Petition from 251 citizens of Pender, Nebr., indorsing the Hitchcock bill for prohibiting the shipment of arms and ammunition to the warring countries of Europe; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition of citizens of Papillion, Springfield, Fort Crook, Benson, and South Omaha, Nebr., and the German Farmers' Mutual Fire Insurance Co., of Douglas County, Nebr., favoring bill to prohibit export of arms; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition of 189 citizens of Omaha, Nebr., favoring civil-service retirement bill; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

By Mr. LONERGAN: Petition of Stanislaw Cendrowski, New Britain, Conn., and J. B. Kulas, of Suffield, Conn., protesting against the Smith-Burnett immigration bill (H. R. 6060); to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. NEELY of West Virginia: Papers to accompany House bill 16432, for the relief of Francis M. Hockenbery; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. J. I. NOLAN: Petitions of sundry citizens of San Francisco, Cal., favoring the passage of House joint resolution 377, to prohibit export of war material; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. O'HAIR: Petition of citizens of Kankakee, Danforth, and Crescent City, Ill., favoring House joint resolution 377, to place an embargo on contraband of war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. PAIGE of Massachusetts: Petition of citizens of Clinton, Mass., favoring passage of bill prohibiting export of munitions of war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. STEENERSON: Petition of citizens of Perham, Dent, and Bluffton, Minn., favoring House joint resolution 377, to forbid export of arms; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. VOLLMER: Petitions of 13 citizens of Muscatine, Iowa, and 1,032 American citizens, favoring bill to prohibit export of war material; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. WALLIN: Petitions of German Evangelistic Synod of Amsterdam and the German Catholic Society of Schenectady, N. Y., favoring House joint resolution 377, relative to export of munitions of war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 23, 1915.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Ancient of Days, our God and our Father, before whom kings, peasants, the rich, the poor of all ages have prostrated themselves, seeking consolation, hope, and guidance, so we come in all faith and confidence, praying for the uplift of Thy spirit to guide us on our way, that we may serve Thee in whatsoever our hand findeth to do. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I call up from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 19422) making appropriations for the support of the District of Columbia, and ask unanimous consent that all of the Senate amendments be disagreed to, and ask for a conference.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I desire to reserve a point of order on the present procedure. I may not make the point of order, but in order to be on the safe side I reserve it.

Mr. MANN. It can only be done by unanimous consent. There is no point of order that can be made.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I ask unanimous consent. I assume that the procedure is orderly.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] can object, or anybody else.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. In the first place, I reserve a point of order under Rule XX as to the present manner of considering this bill, but probably I will not make it.

Mr. MANN. But, Mr. Speaker, there is no point of order against a unanimous consent.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I reserve also the right to object to the request for unanimous consent, for the purpose of asking the gentleman from North Carolina, who will have charge of the bill in conference, as to whether or not the House will be given separate votes upon some of the amendments made to the bill by the Senate.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Will the gentleman designate the particular amendment he has in mind?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I desire the conferees to permit the House to vote upon the Senate amendment numbered 1 and Senate amendment numbered 51, and——

Mr. MADDEN. What do those amendments refer to?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The Senate amendment numbered 1 refers to what is known as the Johnson amendment, that of using first the revenue derived by the District of Columbia for the support of the District of Columbia, and after that having the Federal Government supply whatever else may be needed, not exceeding one-half of the total expense.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Well, Mr. Speaker, I will say in regard to this amendment, the House having placed this amendment in the bill by a vote of practically two to one, the conferees would not feel that they were warranted in receding until the House had had an opportunity to pass upon it, and the conferees will be disposed to give the House that opportunity.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will they be sufficiently disposed to do it to do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes. So far as I may speak for these conferees, they will do it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. And as to amendment numbered 51, Mr. Speaker, that is a Senate amendment appropriating $18,000 for a convenience station—a privy. There is not a residence in my entire district that cost that much money, and inasmuch as the Senate has shown a disposition to waste money—throw it at the birds—in order to eat up the amount of money that the District of Columbia has on hand I would like to see a separate vote had on that also.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Well, Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that the House subcommittee and the House committee were very much opposed to this amendment and did not put it in the bill, and before passing on it I will agree with the gentleman from Kentucky that the House shall have an opportunity to pass upon it before we agree to it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Then, as to Senate amendment numbered 110, in reference to what somebody has chosen to designate as the "Gallinger Hospital," I would like to have a separate vote on that.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, the current District of Columbia bill carried a provision appropriating $15,000 for the preparation of plans to be submitted in contemplation of the erection of this hospital. The House committee did not place an item in the bill in connection with it, largely for the reason that no plans had been prepared, and no additional information had been furnished relative to this proposed enterprise, and in so far as my information goes, none has been furnished to this date. Personally, I shall oppose the adoption of this amendment, and I will agree to give the gentleman and the House an opportunity to pass upon it before it is agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Then, Mr. Speaker, as to Senate amendments numbered 121 and 122, which relate to the proposed reformatory near Occoquan and the extensive manufactory which it is proposed shall be established there, I should also be glad to have the House permitted to have a separate vote upon those amendments.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Well, I would like to ask the gentleman, Mr. Speaker, a question as to that. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] is very much interested in these two amendments, and I think he has reached a State of mind where this matter can be settled, possibly without coming back to the House. It may be settled in conference. To be entirely frank, the gentleman will recall that the present provision of law provides that this institution can sell its products only to the District of Columbia. The provision carried in the House bill as it went to the Senate enlarged this by including the Government of the United States. The amendment numbered 121, to which the gentleman refers, was placed in the bill in the Senate. It was offered by Senator KERN, and it strikes out the present provision of law, as well as the enlargement carried in the House bill. I am inclined to think an agreement might be reached in conference upon this proposition satisfactory to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN]. As to whether or not it would be satisfactory to the gentleman from Kentucky, I do not know. If the gentleman insists, that item would come back, but possibly it would resolve itself into the adoption of the present law. If the gentleman insists, in order to get the bill to conference and expedite its passage I will make another promise, but I think that is hardly necessary.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman from North Carolina has addressed himself more particularly to amendment numbered 122 rather than that numbered 121. I am informed that the Department of Justice views with grave apprehension the possibility of error in Senate amendment numbered 121. I am not fully prepared to discuss that amendment just now, but it should be discussed, and from the information I have as to the position taken by the Department of Justice, and the reasons given by the Department of Justice for the position it takes, I believe that amendment ought to come up for full consideration before the House.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I will say that the gentleman was correct in saying that I had in mind by my former statement amendment numbered 122, but I have no objection to saying that the conferees will give the House an opportunity to vote on amendment 121.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I shall not insist, over the protest of the gentleman from North Carolina, relative to Senate amendment 122; but that is fraught with danger and with robbery, as the authorities of the District of Columbia have been construing some laws heretofore passed, in this, that I apprehend they will treat the receipts from the sale of brick as a revenue, and that the Federal Government will be called upon to match dollar for dollar those receipts, notwithstanding the fact that the Federal Government furnishes 50 cents on every dollar with which the brick are made.

Day before yesterday the auditor of the District of Columbia was in my office and admitted to me that at the Georgetown market house they have some old street lamp-posts stored upon their own property; that the District of Columbia is charging the District of Columbia about $70 a month rent for storing those old lamp-posts; that $70 a month rent which the District of Columbia collects from the District of Columbia is treated as a revenue; and, as against that $70 a month, the Federal Government is putting up $70 a month.

The Federal Government owns the market-house property down here on Pennsylvania Avenue. Under the act of May 20, 1870, the Federal Government gave the rental from that property to the District of Columbia, to be used for the poor of the District of Columbia. It was never used for the poor of the District of Columbia, and for 44 years the District of Columbia has taken $7,500 a year which came from the rental of that property as a gift of the United States, and has treated it as revenue; and against that $7,500 a year for 44 years the Federal Government has put up and contributed an additional $7,500, and that notwithstanding the fact that a portion of that property is to-day being rented to the District of Columbia as an armory for the National Guard, at $8,000 a year, and I am advised by the president of the market company that they now propose to charge $12,000 a year. For 44 years it has cost the Federal Government $15,000 a year to make the District of Columbia a present of $7,500 a year on account of its property at Seventh Street and Pennsylvania Avenue.

In addition to that, the District of Columbia has collected a large tax on that property, and that tax also has been treated as a revenue during all these long years, and the Federal Government has matched that tax, dollar for dollar, as an additional present to the District of Columbia, and during a great portion of that time has, in addition, been contributing one-half of the $8,000 that has been collected from the District of Columbia for only a part of the premises.

I see in this brick proposition another instance where just that thing can be repeated. The Federal Government, the goose that lays the golden egg for the District of Columbia, is being imposed upon most flagrantly and outrageously in this kind of thing. I hope the gentleman from North Carolina will not insist that the House shall not have a separate vote upon the Senate amendment 122.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I am, as the gentleman from Kentucky realizes, having charge of the bill—I am not in a position to insist upon the House not having a separate vote, because his right would give him that now if he chooses to exercise it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I dislike to demand the right over the gentleman's protest.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Rather than delay the bill going to conference, I will say that I have no objection to saying that the House shall have an opportunity to vote on this amendment as well as the other.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the discussion of this bill has brought out a question that arises every year, and that is the question as to how much of the District taxes should be paid by the Federal Government in proportion to the amount paid by the District Government. I think it is clearly the sentiment of this House that the Federal Government should bear a proportion of the taxes to run the District on account of the large amount of property that the Federal Government owns here.

But no one in the House, outside of the committees that have the matter in charge, are informed, or have information that they are willing to rest upon, as to what is a fair distribution of the burdens of this Government. I know that I have not, and I have been here a good many years. I find one place that looks like it was a very flagrant abuse of the power. Another proposition is made that looks like it would be an imposition on the District. I have never seen yet coming from one committee a proposition that clearly demonstrated to the House what was a fair and equitable distribution of this question of taxation. I ask the gentleman why is it that we can not have a commission—a commission settled it 40 or 50 years ago, but that settlement may be out of date—why can not we have a commission appointed, or some other way of ascertaining all the facts from top to bottom, and lay them before the House in a report so that the House may be informed.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman's question as to why we can not have a commission go into the whole matter and make a report to the House, I want to say, in the first place, that I do not think any serious effort has been made on the part of anybody to bring about this result so far as the House is concerned; and as to why the other legislative body did not see fit to do it, perhaps the gentleman will get some enlightenment in the fact that they rejected that proposition on this very bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman think the question will ever be settled until the House is given full information?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I do not desire to engage in any controversy about this matter at this time. The gentleman from Alabama made the statement a moment ago as to the lack of information on the part of the House generally outside of the committee who had the matter in charge. My reply would be that the membership would be absolutely as ignorant after as they were before unless they took up and studied the report made by the committee. If the House had studied the hearings, possibly, and other information that has gone into the RECORD coming from gentlemen on the committee who have the matters in charge, the Members might have been able to reach an enlightenment of mind that would give them conclusion as to what ought to be done.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that I do not know the value of the property owned by the Government and I do not know the value of the property outside. There are a good many questions of that kind on which I would want information in order to reach a conclusion.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. That matter as to the relative value of the property of the Federal Government and the District of Columbia has been placed in the RECORD by several gentlemen, taken from reports of the officers of the District of Columbia. My judgment is that the work of the committee, if it were appointed to make a report on this matter, would be largely confined to getting together of information that already exists in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and other documents that have been printed as House documents.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, it would be assembling it so that the average Member of the House would have an opportunity to get hold of it and understand it. What I suggest to the gentleman is that I think it is a great waste of time of this House, and it is not fair to the Government or to the District of Columbia, not to have this question settled. I think myself that the Government ought to bear a portion of the burden of this District, because I think it is the National Capital, and we ought to have a Capital that we may be proud of.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I most heartily and entirely agree with that statement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I made the statements that I have not to interfere with the gentleman's bill, but because I think the time has come when an effort ought to be made by the committees having these matters in charge to settle this question finally.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Speaker, I want to suggest to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that at the last session of Congress I introduced a bill which has received the favorable recommendation of the committee and is now on the calendar ready to be heard at the first time we can get an opportunity. I may say that I have been waiting around here watching with a good deal of care to find an opening, but for some reason, on almost every pretext, the affairs of the District of Columbia are shoved aside for some other supposedly more important matter.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I think I am familiar with the bill that the gentleman has in mind. That is not what I was talking about. The gentleman is asking for legislation, and I am asking for information.

Mr. PROUTY. But I have introduced a bill for the appointment of a joint commission, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House, the President of the Senate, and the President of the United States.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, that is not the bill I had in mind.

Mr. PROUTY. I thought the gentleman had not observed that yet. I shall make an effort to bring it to the consideration of the House at the very first opportunity.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] very frankly admits what the House has several times observed—that he knows nothing about this subject. He is still asking for the appointment of a commission. The gentleman either does not know or forgets that there have been several commissions on this very subject, and the recommendations of no single commission have ever been adopted by Congress. The commission made up in 1876, which has frequently been referred to as a commission of "statesmen," partial as they were to the District of Columbia and forgetful as they were of the interests of the United States in this question, recommended to Congress that the District of Columbia pay 60 per cent of the expenses of the District of Columbia and that the Federal Government pay 40 per cent. That recommendation was ignored, and the 50 per cent, or half-and-half, plan was adopted in lieu thereof. Again, we had a commission in 1878. The result of the work of that commission was the introduction of a bill in February, 1878, and in that bill there was a provision that the District of Columbia should have its local legislature, elected by the people of the District of Columbia, and that no money belonging to the people of the District of Columbia should be expended upon any public improvement until that local legislative body had approved that piece of work, and that no more money than was approved by that local legislature should be expended. Yet the work of that commission was thrown to the wind, and because it was we are here to-day in clash over this proposition.

We hear the assertion that no one knows the extent to which the Federal Government is contributing in District affairs. Does not everyone know that there is no piece of public work done by the District of Columbia in the District of Columbia of which the Federal Government does not pay half? In addition to that, does not everyone know that every other piece of public work done in the District of Columbia is paid for entirely by the Federal Government? Are we not now expending four and a half million dollars to acquire a park between the Capitol and the Union Station without a dollar of contribution from the District of Columbia? Are we not now expending $2,000,000 upon the Lincoln Memorial in Potomac Park to beautify Washington when the District of Columbia is not contributing one farthing to it? Have we not just concluded the erection of the National Museum at Federal expense to beautify Washington without the District of Columbia contributing one dollar toward it? Have we not just built the new post office, the new Agricultural Building, and the new building for the Bureau of Printing and Engraving all at Federal expense? I can name many more instances where the city is being beautified by the expenditure of Federal millions without participation by the District of Columbia.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Kentucky yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I was going to suggest that if we are going to discuss this proposition, then we ought to discuss it; but if we are to vote upon it, we ought to vote upon it.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I presume I have the floor?

The SPEAKER. That is true.

Mr. MANN. I am going to ask for the regular order whoever has the floor. I am perfectly willing to have the matter discussed if it is to be acted upon, but I do not believe we ought to take the time to discuss it now unless we are going to vote upon it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, did I understand the gentleman from North Carolina to say, as one of the conferees, that he was willing to let the House vote on Senate amendments 121 and 122?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I suggested that I would give the House an opportunity to pass on those amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] to take this bill from the Speaker's table, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair announces the following conferees, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina, Mr. SISSON, and Mr. DAVIS.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. SINNOTT, for three days, on account of illness in his family.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Army appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 20415, the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 20415, the Agricultural appropriation bill, with Mr. HAMLIN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 20415, the Agricultural appropriation bill, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20415) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STEDMAN]. [Applause.]

Mr. STEDMAN. Mr. Chairman, for a long time I have been interested in the future of the people who inhabit the Philippine Archipelago. I have been attracted to them by their love of liberty, by their attachment to their homes, by their heroic struggle against Spain in behalf of freedom, by their pathetic appeals for justice to this Republic when exhausted by the hopeless struggle against its overwhelming power, they have begged of us that treatment they had a right to expect from a Nation whose theory of government, whose traditions, and whose declarations forbid the exercise of sovereignty over a weaker nation against their will by armed force.

My attention has been called to the hearings recently had before the Senate Committee on the Philippines, which had under consideration the Jones bill—H. R. 18459—which has passed the House and is now being considered by the Senate. I was not present when this bill was under discussion in the House, having been called home by sickness in my family, but I returned before it was finally disposed of and voted for its passage.

I am gratified that the opportunity is offered me and this privilege granted to express my views with reference to this bill, and especially to portions of the testimony before the Senate committee. In the main, it has been highly favorable to the contention of those who favor the bill. Impartial witnesses who have had every opportunity to form a correct estimate of the traits of the Filipinos and of their ultimate fitness to maintain a stable form of government credit them with very high qualities, especially with a love of truth, a love of home, respect for law, a conscientious observance of all contracts entered into—characteristics which go to the basis of all character in every land, occidental and oriental.

As an American citizen profoundly attached to the institutions of my country, rejoicing in its glory as well as its grandeur of government, I wish to see its integrity forever unquestioned, its honor forever unsullied; I wish to see its promises made to the Filipino people sacredly kept. But aside from all this I wish also to express my unqualified dissent from the views expressed in unmistakable terms and without qualification by the minority leader on this floor [Mr. MANN] when the bill was under discussion which recognized the moral and legal right of this Government to hold an alien people in subjection against their will forever, if desired. I was consternated when views were expressed recently by ex-President Taft before the Senate committee which practically, so far as the Filipino people are concerned, agree with those advocated by the minority leader, for whilst ex-President Taft did not in express terms claim this right he advocated the holding of this people for 60 years, if necessary, to give the experiment of testing their capacity for self-government a full and fair trial. This means forever, for we all know that if this Republic controls those people for 60 years it will never voluntarily release its dominion.

I shall refer to the views of Mr. MANN, minority leader, and of ex-President Taft more fully before I conclude.

Strange as it must appear to all who have the slightest acquaintance with the history of the Filipino people, an endeavor has been made by some, regardless of the array of facts to the contrary, to create the impression that they are indifferent to their independence and, in fact, that they would prefer to live under the control of this Government.

The history of the nations of the world, strong and weak, can furnish the record of no race, of no people, whose lives and conduct have shown a more passionate desire for liberty regardless of consequences to themselves from the time when they first learned the true meaning of freedom and realized that it was a blessing which belonged to them as an inalienable right vouchsafed by Providence to all men who prove themselves worthy of its blessings.

For three centuries they bore the burden of Spanish misrule, ignorant of their rights and of the blessings which come to a free people. When education advanced the light of liberty dawned upon their minds and grew stronger and brighter until with them it has become an inextinguishable flame. They conquered the islands from the Spaniards, and although they knew the fight was absolutely hopeless they made it against the unlimited power and resources of this Republic, and from first to last it required 120,000 American soldiers and three years' time to end the struggle. The war began February 4, 1899; the official announcement of its end was July 4, 1902, as will be seen from the report of Secretary ROOT for 1902. When finally they yielded they had every reason to suppose that their independence would be granted when they had shown themselves to be capable of maintaining a stable form of government. To engage in and maintain a conflict knowing that the result will be certain and adverse requires the highest type of courage, and this was manifested by the Filipino people. The love of liberty is a prerequisite to capacity for self-government. Wonderful as it must seem in the face of these facts, we are told by some, but by very few, I am glad to say, that the people of the Philippine Archipelago are not especially desirous of independence for which they have faced death and have suffered privation, want, and misery in many manifold forms.

It would seem to be a waste of time to discuss such a statement. Every municipality and Province in the Philippine Islands has declared in favor of independence; every one has declared in favor of the Jones bill now pending except three, and those three, whilst they declare for independence, prefer that a definite date be fixed, and they are right. I prefer the original Jones bill, which names a definite date—eight years—when independence should be given to them. I read that bill carefully several times and studied its provision. It is a model for the purpose for which it was intended. Prepared by its eminent author, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs, with great care, it will ever remain a monument to his ability, his sense of justice to the Filipino people, his disinterested patriotism as an American citizen. The only change I should have made in that bill would have been to have shortened the period of time fixed for independence. I should have preferred four years, or even two, instead of eight, and I go further and say that the interests of both the people of this country as well as of the Philippine Archipelago would be served by granting their appeal for independence without any delay. Such a course would be in accordance with the theory of this Republic which never contemplated holding an alien people in subjection against their will. I, however, give my support unhesitatingly to this bill, inasmuch as the chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs and others greatly interested in seeing justice done think it best for all to do so.

Mr. Taft, in his testimony before the Senate Committee on the Philippines, when speaking of the purpose of our being in the islands at all, said: "The first purpose of being in there was to get out." But to "get out," to correct the terrible mistake of ever going in, he suggests a line of retreat which would reflect no credit upon this Republic and which never would have been considered in our earlier days. Our fathers would have said to these people, "Go your way in peace and enjoy the blessings of liberty." The ex-President, before he concluded his testimony, was badly stranded, as I will show you later on. His line of retreat brought him in direct conflict with the Declaration of American Independence and the traditions of this Republic.

If you would know the sentiments of any people upon any great question affecting their aspirations, their happiness, their fortunes and very existence, find the man whom they have recognized as their highest ideal; visit their homes, upon whose walls hang his portrait; listen to the voice of the father as he tells his child to imitate his example, to the mother as she whispers his name as a lullaby to her infant; then find out the mental characteristic of that man which marks him above his fellows, which has been the guiding star of his life, which he has ever followed with unwavering devotion, and you will know with unerring certainty the sentiments of those whose firesides and altars are consecrated to his memory.

Dr. José Rizal won this place amongst his countrymen. In the history of the Filipino people his name will forever live as the evangelist of liberty. He was the leader in thought of his countrymen. His life stood for self-sacrifice, for lofty thought, for supreme devotion to liberty. The anniversary of his execution has been made a national holiday throughout the Philippine Archipelago. His martyrdom will stir the hearts of men in every succeeding age as they read the story of his life. The night before his execution in a dungeon in Fort Santiago, when the shadow of death was all around him and about him, with no voice of friend or comrade to cheer him, he composed a poem and sent it to his people—his farewell message. For lofty sentiment, for tender pathos, for high resolve, for devotion to liberty there will be found not one anywhere, even amongst the most intellectual nations of the world, which will more enlist the sympathies and touch the hearts of brave men in every land where freedom lives and liberty has a home. I will read it:

MY LAST THOUGHT.

[Poem written by José Rizal, the national hero of the Philippines, a few hours before he was executed by the Spaniards on December 30, 1896.]

(Translation.)

Land I adore, farewell! Thou land of the southern sun's choosing!
Pearl of the Orient seas! Our forfeited Garden of Eden!
Joyous, I yield up for thee my sad life, and were it far brighter,
Young, rose-strewn, for thee and thy happiness still would I give it.
Far afield, in the din and rush of maddening battle,
Others have laid down their lives, nor wavered nor paused in the giving.
What matters way or place—the cypress, the lily, the laurel,
Gibbet or open field, the sword of inglorious torture—
When 'tis the hearth and the country that call for the life's immolation?

Dawn's faint lights bar the east, she smiles through the cowl of the darkness,
Just as I die. * * *

Vision I followed from far, desire that spurred on and consumed me!
Greeting! my parting soul cries, and greeting again! O my country!
Beautiful is it to fall, that the vision may rise to fulfillment.
Giving my life for thy life, and breathing thine air in the death throe;
Sweet to eternally sleep in thy lap, O land of enchantment!

If in the deep rich grass that covers my rest in thy bosom
Some day thou seest upspring a lowly, tremulous blossom,
Lay there thy lips, 'tis my soul. * * *

And if at eventide a soul for my tranquil sleep prayeth,
Pray thou, too, O my fatherland! for my peaceful reposing!
Pray for those who go down to death through unspeakable torments;
Pray for those who remain to suffer torture in prison;
Pray for the bitter grief of our mothers, our widows, our orphans;
Oh, pray, too, for thyself on the way to thy final redemption.

When our still dwelling place wraps night's dusky mantle about her,
Leaving the dead alone with the dead to watch till the morning,
Break not our rest and seek not to lay death's mystery open.
If now and then thou shouldst hear the string of a lute or a zithern,
Mine is the hand, dear country, and mine is the voice that is singing.

When my tomb, that all have forgot, no cross nor stone marketh,
There let the laborer guide his plow, there cleave the earth open.
So shall my ashes at last be one with thy hills and thy valleys.
Little 'twill matter, then, my country, that thou shouldst forget me!
I shall be air in thy streets, and I shall be space in thy meadows.
I shall be vibrant speech in thine ears, shall be fragrance and color,
Light and shout, and loved song, forever repeating my message.

Idolized fatherland, thou crown and deep of my sorrows,
Lovely Philippine Isles, once again adieu! I am leaving
All with thee, my friends, my love. Where I go are no tyrants;
There one dies not for the cause of his faith; there God is the ruler.

Farewell, father and mother and brothers, dear friends of the fireside!
Thankful ye should be for me that I rest at the end of the long day.
Farewell, sweet, from the stranger's land, my joy and my comrade!
Farewell, dear ones, farewell! To die is to rest from our labors!

[Applause.]

When days of peril come to any people, when the skies are dark with evil portent, when all which they hold dear—their very existence—is at stake, whom do they select as their leader in the crisis? They ever choose those whose hearts beat in unison with theirs, whose sentiments are their sentiments. In the hour of their trial whom did the Filipino people select to present their claim for justice; whom did they choose as their representative to this Government, which is the arbiter of their destiny? They selected a young man who had already become conspicuous as the advocate and champion of their freedom. Well did they make their choice. I take this occasion to say that Mr. MANUEL QUEZON, who twice has been unanimously elected by the Philippine Assembly as Resident Commissioner in this Capital, is entitled to their lasting gratitude. [Applause.] He has made the fight for the liberty of his people with fidelity, with ability, with courage, and with a rare discretion which has won for him the respect of the Representatives of this Government and has proved himself worthy of high rank amongst the foremost advocates of liberty in any assembly in any land. [Applause.]

Independence is the dominant idea of the Filipino people. Above all others it is their absorbing thought. The men connect it inseparably with the happiness, the prosperity, and the glory of their native land. The women teach the lesson to their children. The schoolboy selects it as the subject of his speech. The Filipino girl makes it the refrain of her evening song.

Vice Governor Martin, in speaking of their earnest desire for independence, says:

I will explain it in this way: I have made two trips over the islands for the particular purpose of visiting the schools and looking into agriculture, because agriculture is in my department. I was usually in company with the director of education and the director of agriculture, with the governor of the Province we were in, and some other people, and usually they decorated the roads, especially through their villages and everywhere and in every part of the island where I was, with the word "Independence," and where a schoolboy made a speech of welcome he could not get away without referring to independence and what he hoped I would do for him. And wherever a presidente, a mayor of a town, made a speech welcoming us to a town he invariably had his petition for independence.

But it is said that the people of the Philippine Islands have no capacity for self-government, nor can they maintain a stable form of government. In answer thereto it is well known that those people have given actual demonstration to the contrary. During the year 1898 they captured every city and town in the Philippine Archipelago from the Spaniards with the exception of Manila, which was occupied by the United States Army. From June, 1898, until February 4, 1899, the people of the Philippines had a government of their own with a constitution framed with ours as a model, a President of their Republic, a Congress, courts and municipal governments throughout the islands. This government was the de facto government and responsible for the lives and property of all the people of the archipelago excepting Manila, and it is admitted by all of those who traveled throughout the islands that order was maintained and life and property protected to the satisfaction of all. It must not be forgotten that this de facto government, the adoption of the constitution, and establishment of national and municipal governments, were all without help of any foreign Government or without any assistance from any foreign element whilst the war with Spain was yet unfinished and the war with the United States threatening.

John Barrett, at that time minister of the United States to Siam, witnessed the operation of this government and spoke of it in terms of high commendation.

Admiral Dewey, who witnessed the workings of this de facto government, stated that the Filipinos were more capable of self-government than the Cubans. Gen. Merritt, the first commander of the American Army in the Philippines, likewise so stated.

Gen. Nelson A. Miles, then Commanding General of the United States Army, in a book written by him, states that the Filipino people are entirely capable of administering the affairs of their country.

President Schurman, of Cornell University, and a member of the first Philippine Commission, has recently expressed the same views. Judge James H. Blount, who served in the Philippines as a captain of Volunteers, and was afterwards a judge, and also Gov. CURRY, of New Mexico, a Member of the Sixty-second Congress, who also served as a captain of Volunteers, favor Philippine independence.

Testimony of many impartial witnesses who are acquainted with the conditions surrounding the Filipino people, and who have witnessed their achievements and affairs of government, leave no doubt as to their ability to maintain a government of law and order.

Judge Elliott, a member of the Philippine Commission appointed by Mr. Taft, gives this testimony:

I never had any sympathy with the party which opposed the retention of the Philippines. But the Filipinos have been promised independence and have been led to believe that American occupation was temporary and only for the purpose of training them for self-government. They are competent to-day to conduct a fairly good government, such a one as they desire to live under. They can maintain law and order and can protect the lives and property of foreigners, and that is about all we can expect or rightly demand. I am therefore in favor of keeping the faith with these people and passing a law somewhat similar to the Jones bill.

Capt. Hatch, of the Eighteenth Infantry, who served in the islands and was brought in contact with thousands of the people, said:

They are a temperate, sober people. During a year's residence among them I never saw a drunken Filipino. They are a cleanly people. They are hospitable, and they are generous in their hospitality. They are not an ignorant people. Their intelligence and educational progress are apt to be underestimated because of failure to understand them. The Filipinos are not so much different from other people. Their customs, habits, hopes, and aspirations are deep-seated. Their leaders are shrewd, bright men of much ability; the masses are earnest in their loyalty.

Mr. Southworth, in a letter to Hon. W. A. JONES, December 9, 1912, said:

With a strong religious sentiment underlying the lives of these people, a virtuous womanhood from whom must spring their future citizens, a high regard for law and official authority, a fair amount of general education now, and a wonderful aptness for learning, and a patriotism which is so lofty and pathetic that it should touch the heart of every unselfish American in the islands, there is no reason on earth why these people should not be granted independence.

Senator SHAFROTH made the following statement:

I regard the seizure of the Philippine Islands by our Government as perhaps the darkest blot upon our national history, and nothing but the restitution of the character suggested will restore us in the eyes of the world as the leader of all movements in behalf of liberty and freedom.

Secretary Taft, after observing the sessions of the Philippine Assembly for three weeks, on leaving in 1906 used this language:

From the first I had full confidence in the legislative assembly—a confidence which has been justified by its actions. So far it has taken a conservative form, and I have no doubt it will continue its useful and patriotic and diligent course. I have yet to see or hear a single member who does not apparently feel a full sense of the responsibility of his duties toward his constitution and country, and I am sure that conservatism rather than radicalism will continue to mark the official conduct of this body. I leave the Philippine Islands with renewed confidence in the future of the islands.

That brave man, that loyal American citizen, beloved by all his countrymen, Hon. CHAMP CLARK [applause], the Speaker of this House, expressed his sentiments as follows:

The Philippines should be given their independence guaranteed by the United States and such other powers as are willing to join us. If no other powers are willing to join us, I think our own guarantee would be sufficient, but I am for freeing them regardless of what the other powers do.

But we are asked, Are not the people of the Philippine Islands exceedingly illiterate? I answer not so illiterate as the people of many other lands. The World's Almanac of 1913 gives the following table as showing the illiteracy of countries named:

Philippine Islands	55.5
Portugal	73.4
Bolivia	82.9
Brazil	85.2
Costa Rica	80.2
Guatemala	92.7
Mexico	75.3
Peru	86.5
Cuba	56.8

Some of the testimony cited by me is taken from the hearings before the Senate committee and a part of it is derived from other sources as stated in my remarks. Has not the time been reached when all this subterfuge called by some altruism should cease lest we incur the contempt of the civilized world? I commend to those who desire to retain the Philippine Islands the frank language of Senator LODGE in his speech as presiding officer of the Republican convention at Philadelphia in 1900:

We make no hypocritical pretense of being interested in the Philippine Islands solely on account of others. While we regard the welfare of these people as a sacred trust, we regard the welfare of the American people first. We see our duty to ourselves as well as to others. We believe in trade expansion.

But when you consider alone the welfare of the American people and examine statistics you will find that your unholy greed for gain has carried you far amiss.

Hon. WILLIAM A. JONES, chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs—the best-informed man in this country as to all matters connected with the Philippine Islands—estimates the cost of holding them in subjection at $40,000,000 a year, which exceeds the total annual value of the commerce between the Philippines and the United States.

Can you find anyone anywhere—one competent to judge—military expert or otherwise, who will not say that in the event of war with a first-class power these islands would be a source of weakness to us and a constant menace to the prestige of the American flag. In this connection I wish to call the attention of ex-President Taft to the language of ex-President Roosevelt, taken from January Everybodys Magazine, 1915. It is well worthy of his consideration, as he has before heard of ex-President Roosevelt, and ought to pay careful attention to his heedings.

The Philippines, from a military standpoint, are a source of weakness to us. The present administration has promised explicitly to let them go, and by its actions has rendered it difficult to hold them against any serious foreign foe. These being the circumstances, the islands should at an early moment be given their independence, without any guaranty whatever by us, and without our retaining any foothold in them.

Why should I trespass further upon your time and patience by elaborating the testimony. Much was said by other witnesses at the hearings before the Senate committee to correct the gross injustice which has been done the people of the Philippine Islands. Amongst those testifying were Brig. Gen. McIntyre, chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, War Department; Mr. Ferguson; Mr. Lang; and others, but I pass them by that I may notice the testimony of ex-President Taft. But before I do so, I will first call your attention to that section of the preamble to the Jones bill to which he is so much opposed. It reads as follows:

Whereas it is as it has always been the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein.

It does not mention self-government, and let us not forget that freedom for any people does not mean the best government as an abstract question. It means the government best fitted to the people governed. I do not suppose that any of us think the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands are as capable to form and maintain a government suited to our conditions and surroundngs as would be our own people, but beyond question, according to the testimony taken as a whole, they are capable of establishing a stable government of law and order suited to their own interests and calculated to bring them contentment and happiness.

Mr. Taft said before the Senate committee:

Therefore when you ask me what time I will put on the question of producing self-government out there in making those people over so that they can know self-government and understand the object lesson that they are having, I put the time as will give to those people an opportunity to learn English, so that they can become an English-speaking people, and that will certainly take more than one generation, and probably two, if you count a generation as 30 years.

He thus places the time at 60 years when he thinks they would be capable of self-government. He makes a strange medley of self-government, of constitutional government, and of stable government, and during his testimony quoted from President Wilson's book on Constitutional Government to show what he meant by self-government, stated truthfully and accurately that no one had defined it with more force and more clearness than had President Wilson. I have read President Wilson's book with great care and pleasure, and I say without hesitation that there is not one line in it taken in connection with its proper context, nor one idea expressed, which conflicts in the slightest degree with the justice and wisdom of the passage of the Jones bill. No words ever came from the lips of Woodrow Wilson, nor was a line ever penned by him, which dealt a blow to the liberties of any people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He has given expression to more lofty sentiment which has exalted the love of home and of country and created in the hearts of men patriotic heroism than any man who dwells to-day upon the American continent. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I call the attention of Mr. Taft to the last four lines in Mr. Wilson's book on Constitutional Government in the United States, which reads as follows:

A people who know their minds and can get real representatives to express them are a self-governed people—the practiced masters of constitutional government.

I also refer him especially to these words, taken from Mr. Wilson's book, which appear on page 4, where he will find discussed and analyzed the Declaration of American Independence:

Its chief justification of the right of the colonists to break with the mother country is the assertion that men have always the right to determine for themselves, by their own preferences and their own circumstances, whether the Government they live under is based upon such principles or administered according to such forms as are likely to affect their safety and happiness. In brief, political liberty is the right of those who are governed to adjust government to their own needs and interests.

And Mr. Wilson adds to the above:

That is the philosophy of constitutional government.

Mr. Taft has the reputation of being a great lawyer; and if he is attached to the institutions of our country, as I believe him to be, I would recommend to him to sit at the feet of Mr. Wilson and learn the true theory of this Government and the accurate meaning of the Declaration of Independence. He would not be injured thereby. His lectures on constitutional law would be embellished and would be made more attractive. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Again he says:

I do not care a cent about the Government of the United States having power out in the Philippines. I would be glad to get out of the Philippines, but what I am concerned about is those poor people out there.

Again he says:

The difficulty about training the Philippines to self-government under the plan outlined in that statement of mine and that I have outlined before the committee is that in making such a promise as that you utterly rob your experiment—

And so forth. And further:

After you have labored 13 years, as I did, to make that government a useful one, it grates on you to have it hit with an ax.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think that Mr. Taft bears malice toward any man under the sun, not even ex-President Roosevelt, but when he says, "But what I am concerned about is those poor people out there," he deceives himself. He is concerned about that "experiment," which has brought no credit to himself or to the Republican Party. Mr. Taft is a magnanimous man, and so great is his attachment to the "experiment," of whose paternity he seems to be proud, that in speaking of the Benguet Road he said:

Now, I am responsible for that road, and I do not hesitate to take the responsibility.

Although an Army engineer by the name of Meade, according to Mr. Taft's own testimony, made a survey and reported that it was possible to build the entire road for from seventy-five to one hundred thousand dollars under the government of the "experiment," this road, which Mr. Taft says was 20 miles long, cost, according to his testimony, more than $2,000,000. In justice to Mr. Taft, however, it must be said that Mr. Worcester stated before the committee that the road was 28.7 miles long and cost $1,961,847.05, and that repairs on the road cost $792,434 up to May 1, 1913.

One witness actually placed the cost of this road, according to Mr. Taft's testimony, as high as $9,000,000. There was no necessity for the ex-President to assume the responsibility of this road. It is one of the most disgraceful items connected with all that unhappy business with the Philippine Islands. Tell me, pray, what would be thought of the capacity of the Filipino people for establishing a stable form of government if after an estimate had been made placing the cost of the Benguet Road at $100,000 they had made an appropriation and spent over $2,000,000 to build it. And let it not be forgotten that this dirt road built to a watering place was designed at first chiefly for the amusement, benefit, and health of American officials at the expense and from the funds of the Filipino people.

Mr. Taft was unwilling to say that this Government had promised those people independence, but was willing to concede that the Democratic Party had done so. He could have paid no higher compliment to that great party, which has ever been the defender of human rights and the advocate of liberty for all people.

In its platform of 1900 it declared the Nation's purpose, first, for a stable form of government for the Philippine Islands; second, their independence; and third, protection from outside interference.

In its platform of 1904 the Democratic Party declared it to be our duty to do for the Filipinos what we had already done for the Cubans—set the Filipinos free and independent to work out their own destiny.

In the platform of 1908 it again favored declaration of the Nation's purpose to recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands as soon as a stable form of government could be established.

In the platform of 1912 it reaffirmed its position, which had been announced thrice before.

There can be no question that the people of the Philippine Islands have a perfect right to suppose that they have been promised their indeepndence by this Government, by everything done and said since we "blundered into colonization," if I may adopt a most appropriate phrase used by Mr. Taft himself when he was Secretary of War in 1905, in an address before the National Geographic Society in Washington, and quoted in the National Geographic Magazine, August, 1905. In discussing this promise to the Filipinos Mr. Taft said:

Of course what the people of the United States think, we sometimes make a mistake about, I agree.

Mr. Taft is a thoroughly sincere man; no citizen of this country has ever more mistaken the views of its people than has Mr. Taft, as its political history will show.

Mr. MANN, the minority leader upon this floor, when discussing the Philippine question, said:

I am opposed to giving the Philippine Islands independence. Now we have the Philippine Islands. They came to us not by our taking away their independence. We did not seize them. We took them from Spain. It is our business not only to keep them under our flag but to make them want to stay under our flag.

Strange and remarkable words to be heard in a free Republic when all the facts as to our acquisition of the Philippine Islands are so well known to the entire world. Memorable words spoken by a recognized leader of a great party and indorsed in principle, if not in express language, by an ex-President of a free Republic, elected by the same party. Not memorable because they carried cheer and comfort to a helpless people 10,000 miles away, who had a right to expect a different message; not memorable because they reflect the sentiments of the American people; the truth is far to the contrary; not memorable because they ignore and trample upon the traditions of this country, regardless of party; but memorable in that they mark a new epoch in the history of the Republican Party, the era when it says farewell to the glorious history of the past, bids good-by to the memories of the lessons taught by our fathers; memorable because they mark with unerring certainty the rapid decadence of the Republican Party, when two of its most distinguished leaders, if to be judged by their statements, regard trade expansion and colonial empire as above a nation's promises and its most sacred honor. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If this Republic could not live half slave and half free, tell me how it will fulfill the high destiny for which it was intended by Providence with millions of men 10,000 miles away held in bondage against their will, with no voice in the Government which controls them.

I know of no greater responsibility which any man in this Republic can assume before the bar of posterity than the denial of liberty to any people. If the judgment of the minority leader on this floor and of ex-President Taft as to what national policy will best promote the grandeur and glory of our common country is to be best tested by their views as expressed upon this question, it will be found far from correct.

The greatness of the American Republic does not rest upon the accumulation of colonial possessions, however alluring to some they may seem to be. Within itself it is a mighty empire, the wonder and admiration of the world.

Great and wonderful as are the material and natural resources of our country, its chief excellence will not be found in them, but it will be discovered in the Constitution of our common country and in its legal institutions, which give every man the same advantages and opportunities for advancement in life. This is its chief excellence, the most radient jewel in its crown of glory. Long may it survive, and may its greatness in the ages to come be recognized by the equal diffusion of its blessings amongst all its people, by its justice in dealing with weaker nationalities, by the good it has wrought, and by the happiness it has brought to all humanity.

In conclusion I give as my answer to the gentleman who filed the minority report, which declares that a discussion as to what disposition should be made of the Philippine Islands at the present time is not only impolitic but unwise in the extreme, the words of Woodrow Wilson, in his address at Flag Day exercises in this city:

So it seems to me that it is my privilege and right, as the temporary representative of a great Nation that does what it pleases with its own affairs, to say that we please to do justice and assert the rights of mankind wherever this flag is unfurled.

[Loud applause.]

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from North Carolina to yield back his time.

Mr. STEDMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back 17 minutes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, at the request of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON]. [Applause.]

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, on the 1st day of last August the working balance in the Treasury of the United States exceeded $120,000,000. This morning, and for some mornings past, the Treasury statement shows that that balance has been hovering around $60,000,000. This statement but feebly expresses the story of Democratic extravagance and efficiency of the last 18 months. We are facing the necessity of finding new subjects of taxation or issuing bonds. Despite the imposition of an income tax upon all incomes in excess of $4,000, despite the repeal of the exemption of $5,000 in favor of the small corporate businesses of the country, notwithstanding the imposition of a war tax imposing a burden upon policies that insure the crops, the homes, and the lives of our citizens—in spite of the imposition of annoying taxes upon everything, from quinine pills to toilet soap, from marriage certificates to coupon bonds; despite the overrunning of the country by a horde of tax-gatherers; despite all of these annoyances and impositions in time of peace, the balance in the Treasury has decreased month by month and day by day. That decrease has averaged up to date about $10,000,000 a month.

From the beginning of the present fiscal year, while our revenues have been decreasing the expenditures of the Government have increased more than $12,000,000 compared with last year, and those expenditures month by month have exceeded the receipts of the Government by more than $14,000,000 per month. And yet in the face of this decrease of revenue we are confronted again in this Congress by estimates for appropriations equaling or exceeding the amounts appropriated for the last fiscal year. Take, for instance, the bill under consideration. The estimates submitted by the department for the fiscal year 1916 exceed the estimates for the current year by $1,644,000. They exceed the appropriations for the fiscal year 1915 by $841,000, and the appropriations for 1914, the last appropriation made during a Republican administration, by $2,719,000. Now, Mr. Chairman, of course the Congress is, in the last analysis, responsible for the expenditures of the Government, and yet the Congress is not wholly to blame for these increases. It can not be expected to hold down the appropriations for the expenditures of the Government within reasonable limits so long as the administration and the departments present estimates for expenditures of the Government exceeding year by year the expenditures of the preceding year.

I was one of the youngest men who ever wiped his feet on the "welcome" mat in front of the Capitol when I came here four years ago. As I look back upon those four years I do not regard my youth and inexperience altogether as a liability, for I recognize now that my very youth enabled me to receive some impressions which I should otherwise not have received, and which experience has ripened into sound conclusions and logical convictions. I remember very distinctly my first impression of the Government departments. It was very much like that I received when I first saw those tremendous locks at the Panama Canal. It was not altogether an impression of the wonderful genius that conceived and operates those great machines; it was not wholly an impression of the wonderful intricacy of that machinery, but it was an impression of its great size and tremendous inertia; of the constructive and operative difficulties that its size alone presented. Sometimes when I pick up one of these books of estimates I have something of the same feeling. Here is a book of estimates of expenditures for the Department of Agriculture. It contains some 200 pages of facts and figures, and yet I defy any man in this House to say from a study of this book and from all the hearings before the committee whether we are getting our money's worth from any one of the appropriations contained in the pending bill. The task is too big and the information too little correlated. Some elements for the determination of a conclusion are missing.

Now, economy is of two kinds, that which consists of cutting down expenditures and consequently curtailing activities either in number or extent; the other kind is that which consists of greater efficiency, better results, or, to put it in the terms of commercialism, increased profits from the same expenditures. I have always thought that it was unfortunate that the economy of Congress must always be of the first kind, for, try as we may, it is a practical impossibility for us to so direct the activities of any department of the Government as to secure greater efficiency. The reason for this is quite obvious. It is that there is in the operations of the departments no incentive to profit, and there is consequently no way of determining, except in the opinion of the individual, whether the department is actually expending the money appropriated for it in such a way as to procure the best results. The operation of the department is administrative. Congress can not control this operation. It can only furnish the funds. The fact of the matter is that we are obliged to, and do, take nine-tenths of these estimates on faith. I am making these statements because I am a little bit tired of hearing men place the entire responsibility for extravagance upon the Congress, whereas it belongs, in a very large measure, to the administrative departments of the Government.

Mr. BORLAND. Does the gentleman care to be interrupted there?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will be very glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BORLAND. I agree to a great extent with what the gentleman is saying. I think the obligation to economize and to get greater efficiency and greater results out of the money expended is more heavily placed upon the executive departments than upon Congress. I regret very much that we have to frequently cut down the executive departments below the estimates. But does not the gentleman realize, and I think in fairness he will state, that most of the officials of the Agricultural Department are not the choice of the present administration but are men who have been there in service for a number of years and are all of them "hold overs" from the previous administration?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will say to the gentleman that I am not particularly criticizing the Agricultural Department. I use it as an illustration, because I am more familiar with it than any other department.

Mr. BORLAND. Of course, his remarks were directed more particularly to that bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. What I am trying to say is that the psychology or, if I may use that term, the philosophy of the departments with respect to expenditures is such that it tends toward asking and insisting upon increased appropriations without regard to the condition of the Treasury.

Mr. BORLAND. I fully agree with the gentleman.

Mr. ANDERSON. Appropriations for activities that are impracticable and that do not bring results.

Mr. BORLAND. I am very glad to hear that statement made. I realize, as the gentleman does, that the departments ask for a great deal more than they have a right to expect and a great deal more than they do expect, and ask for enlarged activities when we have not the money with which to discharge the existing activities. I realize all that, and I hope the gentleman will emphasize it as fully as possible.

Mr. ANDERSON. Congress is in a difficult situation. As I said in the first place, the only way it can bring about economy is by cutting down expenditures. It can not direct the activities of the department in such a way as to get greater efficiency for the same amount of money, and if it does cut down the expenditures it lays itself open to the charge of curtailing activities which are necessary. In other words, it has to take a chance.

I was about to say that when I was a boy I had a very distinct inclination toward mathematics, and so these estimates for appropriations have furnished me with a number of interesting studies. I have compiled a table making a comparison of the estimates for the coming fiscal year, both as to the total appropriations, the amount expended for the fiscal year 1914 and proposed to be expended for salaries under the estimates for this bill, and the amount expended or proposed to be expended for traveling expenses. I have done this for the purpose of determining in a general way the trend of the increases asked for by the department. The first comparison contains a compilation of the estimates of the expenditures for various activities of the Government, some 12 in number. These include crop estimates, plant quarantine, agricultural-land classification, and others.

The total of the estimates of appropriations for these activities for the fiscal year 1916 is $1,878,861. The amount expended for the same activities for the fiscal year 1914 was $1,139,000. Of the amount proposed to be appropriated for the coming fiscal year $1,171,000 is for salaries and $465,000 for traveling expenses. Of the appropriations for 1914, $771,000 was for salaries and $231,000 for traveling expenses. To make the trend of the expenditures clearer to the mind it is perhaps better to state them in terms of percentages. The increase in the total in the estimates for 1916 over the amount expended in 1914 was 64 per cent, and the increase for salaries was 51 per cent, while the increase for traveling expenses was 101 per cent. In other words, while the estimates for salaries have increased 50 per cent, the estimates for traveling expenses have increased 100 per cent.

Now, I have here another table containing some nine activities of the Government, including the appropriation for the dairy industry, pathological laboratory, the investigation of fruit diseases, and several others. I will not undertake to give the figures, but merely the percentages of increase. The estimates of appropriations for the fiscal year 1916 show an increase over the expenditures for 1914 of 5 per cent only in these particular activities. Although there is an increase of 5 per cent in the total amounts proposed to be expended, 10 per cent less will be expended for salaries than was expended in 1914 and 68 per cent more will be expended for traveling expenses.

While I recognize that figures do sometimes lie, and that it is possible to draw conclusions from compilations of figures which are not wholly justified, at the same time it is, I think, a fair conclusion from these figures that there is too much sending out to California, and to Washington, and to Minnesota, and Nebraska, to have the employees of the department come into Washington and talk things over. I think there is too much tendency to send men from the department out into Montana, Wyoming, and Texas to talk and look things over. The estimates were not pared as closely as it seems to me the condition of the Treasury required. There certainly is not the natural increase in the cost of traveling in the last two years which would justify any such increases for traveling expenses as are proposed in these estimates. Some of the proposals with respect to traveling expenses are, if anything, incongruous. Take, for instance, the estimates on page 13 for farm-management work. The expenditures in 1914 were $366,000. The amount was reduced under the present estimates to $240,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota 10 minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. ANDERSON. I thank the gentleman for the extension. I will endeavor to get through in that time.

Of the $366,000 expended in 1914, $286,956 was spent for salaries and $51,859 for traveling expenses, while of the $240,000 to be spent in 1916, only $146,516 will be spent for salaries and $65,000 for traveling expenses.

To make it a little plainer: $140,000 less will be spent for salaries and $14,000 more for traveling expenses.

These examples are by no means unique.

The increases proposed by the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year 1916 as compared with the expenditures of that department for the fiscal year 1914 are not confined to traveling expenses. There have been numerous increases of salary allowed and paid out of the lump-sum appropriations carried in the bill. For instance: In 1914 27 salaries of $1,500 or over were paid out of the appropriation for dairy investigations. The present estimates provide for 39 salaries of $1,500 or over to be paid from that appropriation. Again, in 1914, 8 salaries of $1,500 or over were paid out of the appropriation for investigation of cotton and truck-crop diseases. The present estimates contemplate the payment of 16 salaries of $1,500 and over from the appropriation. In 1914 there were paid out of the lump-sum appropriation for field investigations under the Bureau of Crop estimates, 15 salaries of $1,500 or over, while the present estimates contemplate that 43 salaries of $1,500 and over will be paid out of that appropriation. There are many other similar increases, either effective or proposed, which do not seem to be justified by the present financial conditions of the country. And I could go through these various estimates one by one and show where the same incongruity occurs time and time again. What I am trying to point out is this, that with estimates of this sort before the committee and before the House, it is absolutely impossible to expect that the House can exercise such supervision and control over the expenditures of the department as will result in greater economy, more efficiency, and better results.

A year ago the department proposed a reorganization of its various activities, with a view to securing a greater coordination and cohesiveness of its various branches. In a speech I made at that time I said that some of us had felt for sometime that there was something wrong with the management of the Agricultural Department, and that I was very glad the department itself had come at last to recognize that some reorganization of its activities was desirable. But I expressed the doubt then that any reorganization which it might propose would effect any very great economy or any very considerable increase of efficiency.

This bill is based upon the reorganization proposed by the department. I think it may be fairly said with respect to this reorganization that it entirely confirms the doubts which I expressed a year ago. It has not resulted in reducing the number of employees of the Government by one. It has not resulted in reducing the estimates for the expenses of the department by a single dollar. On the contrary, we are confronted by the same old proposal for an increase.

I am frank to say that I do not know just how we are going to redirect the activities of the department so as to secure at one time decreased estimates and greater efficiency, and yet I have an impression, confirmed by experience, that there is a very great necessity for a reorganization which will direct the activities of the department into more practical lines.

I am inclined to think that too much money is spent in investigational work and too little, proportionately, in carrying the practical information developed by these investigations to the farmer. I have a notion that too often the investigations and experiments of the department are carried out under such artificial conditions as to make the conclusions, experience, and methods drawn from them useless when they are applied to normal conditions. In other words, that the farmer can not duplicate the artificial conditions under which the experiments or demonstrations are carried out and therefore can not hope to get the same results.

I feel that the department itself can do a great deal to make its activities useful to the farmer in a more practical way, and should be able to reduce the amount required for its services by a careful reorganization of its work, with a view to promoting economy of administration. But Congress will be able to do very little toward reducing the aggregate expenditures of the Government until the departments and the administration are brought to a realization of their joint responsibility with the Congress for its expenditures and some system is devised which will insure that proposed expenditures will bear some relation to expected receipts.

I am not particularly advocating at this time a curtailment of the appropriations for the Department of Agriculture. I do not think it would be possible to pick out a time when it would be less expedient to curtail the appropriations for the department than now. The conflict now being waged in Europe means that upon America particularly will fall the burden of feeding the world, and we shall have need during the next year for the exercise of all the genius of mind and of hand, for the exercise of all the strength of intellect and of body which the American farmer can put forth. We will need all the help the department can give us in this task. I have merely tried, in a somewhat philosophic way, to point out the necessity for a general change of attitude on the part of the department itself toward the activities in which it is engaged and toward the Congress, which must supply the funds for these activities. It would not be fair to give the impression that the Department of Agriculture is any more extravagant or remiss in the amount and character of its estimates and expenditures than other departments of the Government, and I do not intend to convey that impression.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. ANDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. LEVER. I think I fully understand the position of the gentleman from Minnesota; but I had a fear in my mind that probably some one, listening only casually to his remarks, might get the idea that his criticism went to this particular bill. As I understand, the gentleman's criticism goes rather to the manner of conduct of the Department of Agriculture, and not to the terms of this bill?

Mr. ANDERSON. Quite so. I am not criticizing the committee or the bill. The committee has made a very honest effort to keep the expenditures down just as closely as it could without curtailing the activities of the department unduly. I think it could have done more if it had had greater cooperation from the department in its efforts to exercise economy.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. BOOHER. Has the gentleman discovered in this bill any attempt on the part of the committee to correct some of the abuses of which he has been complaining?

Mr. ANDERSON. Well, of course the gentleman knows that legislation is not in order on this bill, and besides we have not the information at hand upon which to base such legislation.

Mr. BORLAND. As I understand the point that the gentleman makes, it is that the department ought to exercise a greater supervision over its expenditures and estimates and furnish the committee with information upon which a change could be made, and that the conduct of the department has been quite the reverse of that.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is exactly the point I make.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON. Under leave to extend my remarks, I append the following table, from which the figures in my remarks are taken:

Page.		Total appropriation.		Salaries.		Traveling expenses.
		1916	1914	1916	1914	1916	1914
142	Crop estimates, Field Investigations	$148,356	$101,100	$76,740	$63,979	$69,100	$33,751
156	Farmers' cooperative demonstration	666,020	375,000	546,991	289,945	106,240	64,647
173	Marketing and distributing farm products	301,465	50,000	131,280	31,077	96,970	7,592
178	Plant quarantine	50,000	40,000	25,115	22,218	13,930	7,098
135	General experiments, Biological Survey	13,320	8,377	3,250	8,377	1,000	373
134	Biological investigations	26,500	15,000	17,361	11,418	7,500	3,482
133	Food habits of birds and mammals, Biological Survey	95,000	45,000	42,720	30,083	28,000	8,276
128	Preventing spread of moths, Entomology	310,000	300,000	215,000	214,218	70,000	60,082
124	General experiments, Entomology	69,000	50,000	34,500	33,655	17,500	10,709
109	Miscellaneous investigations, Bureau of Chemistry	14,000	36,000	11,000	26,396	1,000	264
96	General experiments, Forest Service	85,000	53,558	34,000	21,843	25,500	15,451
95	Agricultural land classification, Forest Service	100,000	64,356	34,000	20,000	29,000	19,307
	Total	1,878,661	1,139,291	1,172,057	770,209	465,740	231,023
13	General experiments, Farm Management	240,000	366,200	146,516	286,956	65,000	51,859
33	Dairy industry, Bureau Animal Industry	258,000	177,900	143,745	119,461	73,120	35,222
52	Pathological labortary, Bureau Plant Industry	37,000	30,000	27,001	23,308	4,200	2,317
53	Fruit diseases, Bureau Plant Industry	58,255	40,675	39,700	27,887	12,500	7,663
53	Forest pathology, Bureau Plant Industry	67,950	29,510	42,175	17,310	22,775	6,212
54	Crop physiology, Bureau Plant Industy	47,040	33,380	24,000	19,197	12,650	7,825
60	Cereal investigations, Bureau Plant Inrustry	94,505	74,925	67,407	58,852	15,520	8,392
63	Beet-sugar investigations.....d	41,495	38,495	21,140	25,840	14,355	7,781
68	Foreign seed and plant introduction	75,400	83,000	33,327	50,730	18,000	13,877
	Total	919,645	874,085	545,011	629,541	238,120	141,148

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, I make no pretensions to being an authority upon agricultural matters, but I am deeply interested in them and have given much effort to an attempt to know something of them. I am especially interested in developing a rural credit system and better methods of marketing farm products. At this time I want to direct the attention of those who have assumed the responsibility of writing a rural-credit bill to some of the dangers which beset that undertaking. Recently we sent a commission to Europe to study rural credits, and the country has been filled with statistics gleaned from the experiences of the European organizations; but, Mr. Chairman, there can be no question but that the economic, industrial, and social conditions which obtain in America and those which obtain in Europe are so dissimilar that it would be disastrous to accept the European experience as a guide for the construction of our system. We do not so much need to go to Europe for information as we need to get into the very life of the farmers of America, to know their difficulties and what part of the general task they may be trusted to discharge. The German system of rural credits is presented to us as the best among the European systems, and it is; but, Mr. Chairman, the German system of cooperative farm credits rests upon a foundation not one stone of which can be found in America. The German and other European systems rest upon community and class solidarity, permanency of residence, centuries of training in cooperation and conservation, and a system of laws and a condition of public sentiment which will not tolerate failure to discharge contracted obligations. Speaking generally, not one of these obtain in America.

Mr. JACOWAY. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SUMNERS. Yes.

Mr. JACOWAY. I will ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that in Germany, when default is made, there is practically no delay in divesting the party in default of title?

Mr. SUMNERS. That is true, but I am endeavoring to direct the attention of Members to those differences between Germany and the other European countries, on the one hand, and America, on the other, differences which must not be ignored, nor can a substitute for European conditions be supplied by enactments of legislative bodies. They are differences fundamental and fixed upon which rest the whole superstructure of their laws and institutions. In Germany, for instance, the inhabitants of the rural communities have lived in their respective communities all their lives and their ancestors before them for generations past. The whole community is bound together by ties of relationship and of intimate association. When a man changes his place of residence he must get his clearance papers before leaving and report to the police department at the place to which he goes. There is practically no property exemption from payment of debt; my impression is there is none. Besides, a man who fails to pay his obligations and throws the burden upon his neighbors, except in a case where unavoidable misfortune has incapacitated him, would become a social outcast, with no place in his native land where he could hide his shame. The spirit of conservation has been bred into the very bone of that people, minimizing the danger of loss of productiveness of land during the period of amortized payments. These people live in villages; their units of land tracts are strips of from 50 feet to 200 or 300 feet wide by some 450 feet long. A man owning 50 acres may have 20 or more disconnected tracts with different abutting ownerships, of course. I have seen strips 100 feet wide have as many as three different farm crops growing. These people, therefore, live close together; they work side by side, each one coming into close touch with his neighbors. In home life they cooperate and in the culture and harvest of crops they cooperate. But there is something more potent than all this; these people are peasants; their class isolation drives them back upon each other into class solidarity. When testing the value of European experience we must not lose sight of the dissimilarity of conditions. Mr. Chairman, I am not undertaking an analytical discussion of the great subject of rural credits. That subject is so comprehensive that it is impossible to analyze it in the time which the House could afford to allow to a single discussion by any Member. Therefore instead of dealing with the entire subject I am undertaking to give the committee my view of some of the more vital things to be considered in shaping this legislation. The foundation of the whole scheme and life-giving force of the whole scheme in this country must be the local organization.

The local organization will come in direct contact with the individual borrowers, negotiate with them for the credits, sell this credit, and be the first guarantee thereof and the final payor in the event of default upon an uncollectable claim. These local organizations must furnish, in addition to all the business, not only capital to margin all credits sold but the capital of the organizations above them resulting from a confederation or association of organizations. Yesterday the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] in the discussion of his bill made many good suggestions. His bill has many good features, but it contains one provision which, if retained, would absolutely destroy all chance of success in Texas. He proposes to limit the dividend to stockholders to 6 per cent. In Texas and in many other States the current interest rate is as high as 8 per cent. Under his bill the stockholders would have no advantages over non-stockholders in procuring loans. Therefore the farmers of my State would not invest money which now brings 8 per cent in this stock which would only earn 6 per cent and would carry with it an additional liability equal to the amount of stock. All the bills provide that this initial capital stock shall be paid for by individuals. Their subscription must be a voluntary act, of course. The stockholders will be taking the risk, putting up their money and, in addition, their credit to the amount of the stock as security for the debts of others; and they will not do it with a limit of 6 per cent dividend.

Mr. Chairman, one of two things must be done. The rate of dividend must be raised to at least the current rate in the several sections where the organizations are to be located or the subscription for stock in the local organization must be made a condition precedent to procuring a loan through it.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman has selected the very weak point that I myself thought I found in the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia, and I do not think he is very much wedded to that 6 per cent limitation; but I want to suggest to the gentleman from Texas that a better cure of that defect, instead of requiring each borrower to become a stockholder, would be to take off that limit of possible profit that might come to the stockholder by way of dividends until such time as the organization might buy back its stock.

Mr. SUMNERS. I thank my colleague for the suggestion, and am glad to note that my opinion is supported by his judgment as to the danger at this point. While I realize that there must be a reasonable profit upon investments in stock in order to attract the necessary money to their purchase, I am equally certain that all possibilities of speculative gain must be eliminated so that those who patronize the association will derive all the benefits from its operation above a reasonable revenue as a dividend upon the money invested in the capital stock of the association.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Will my colleague yield there?

Mr. SUMNERS. With pleasure.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I thought one of the fundamental principles underlying this legislation was to find some system of lowering the rate of interest to the man who wants to borrow the money, and if you are going to build up a system which raises the rate of interest to the current rate, how is that going to benefit the men who need to be benefited?

Mr. SUMNERS. I am glad my colleague asked that question, because if there is any misunderstanding about that on the part of gentlemen present it ought to be corrected. The rate of interest I speak of is not the rate of interest which the borrower will pay, but the rate of interest which is to go to the man who puts up the money for the capital stock of the local organization, which money is really a fund to secure or margin the loans sold. The gentleman from Texas will remember that as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] outlined his plan yesterday it provided that the loans with a local institution may procure may be fifteen times the total capital of the local organization. Now, somebody has to put up the capital of the local organization and take the chances on its loss and, in addition, a chance on having to pay an amount equal to this capital, because some one else defaults.

You can not compel the individual farmer to do this. You can only induce him to do it by giving him a promise of satisfactory return. No man will take his money out of an investment that is paying 8 per cent interest and put it into an investment that will pay him 6 per cent, and carries a liability besides. But I want to direct the attention of Members of the House to the facts that when you figure it out, if the loans are fifteen times the total capitalization, the difference in the rate to the borrower when the dividend is 6 per cent and when it is 10 per cent, even, would be about one-fourth of 1 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, I want to direct attention to one more vital point in this legislation. If the benefits of this proposed law are not limited to home builders, and we succeed through it in getting cheaper loans, as we hope to, it will work just the opposite result to that which the friends of this legislation want, and violence will be done to the Government philosophy which justifies this legislation. The man to whose help our patriotic duty calls us is the one struggling to get a home. We want to be careful that in an attempt to help we do not increase his difficulties. Let me illustrate the danger. A man in Texas owns 1,000 acres of land, worth $40 per acre, in a section where the interest rate is 8 per cent. There is an adjoining 1,000 about to come on the market. Ten families each expect to purchase 100 acres of this tract. We enact this law without limitation as to borrowers, and let us say 5 per cent money is made available. This land would advance probably above $50 per acre. The man owning the 1,000 acres could borrow 50 per cent of its value at 5 per cent, pay this amount down on the other 1,000 acres, and borrow the remaining 50 per cent on this land, thus paying for it entirely with 5 per cent money, whereas those not landowners would have to invest 50 per cent of 8 per cent money, less some reduction incident to cheapening of real estate loans, and that, too, in land much increased in value because of general opportunity to get cheap money on land security. I am certain, Mr. Chairman, that if the whole system did not break down under the demand resulting from a riot of speculation in land, the value at which it would sell would make it more difficult than now for a poor man to get a home. There is no demagoguery in this gentleman. The man I want to help is the fellow trying to get a home.

Mr. TRIBBLE. If the gentleman has not time to make a full explanation at this time, I wish he would extend his remarks and explain it, because I do not understand how a man can invest his money in an institution and draw out 12 per cent on it, and loan that money to the farmer at 4 per cent, to save my life.

Mr. SUMNERS. Let me take another try at it. The 8 per cent interest is not on the loan to the farmer. That money is but a small part of that loaned to the farmer, and in this plan is not considered primarily as loanable capital. It is put up to margin or further secure the loans that are sold for the farmers through the organization. When these loans have been margined by this capital-stock investment, they go into the market and are sold for as low a rate of interest as the market will permit.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman from Texas yield for a suggestion by way of answer to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. SUMNERS. I yield.

Mr. HARDY. It seems to me that as we all understand, the stockholders of the national banks to-day received on their investment more dividends than the rate of interest charged by the bank. The bank may charge only 8 per cent interest, and yet every stockholder may receive a dividend of 20 per cent, because the bank loans the money several times over, and that would be the case here.

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS. I will.

Mr. HULINGS. Is the gentleman in favor of Government aid? I want to suggest that if the gentleman is opposed to Government aid in a system of farm loans, it means that you go to the money-lending class to get your money, and if you do that, will not you have to pay the money-loaning class the going rate of money?

Mr. SUMNERS. No doubt about that, but it is true that the going rate of interest for securities put upon the markets under the restrictions and safeguards provided by each of the bills introduced should be less than the individual borrower now pays, but not as low as the rate would be with the aid which the Government could safely render. I believe every Member must agree to that. What ought the Government to do? What is the correct viewpoint from which to consider the Government's duty? Certainly we do not approach the consideration of rural-credits legislation as we did the enactment of the Federal reserve act. There we were constructing the financial machinery to facilitate commerce, and so forth. We gave aid then. Now we are considering legislation which reaches to the foundation of the Nation. I believe every student of the philosophy of government will agree that the home—not the rented home, the ties with which can be severed at another's will—is the foundation upon which governments rest. There are but few great outstanding revelations made by history. One of the greatest is that no civilization has decayed or government gone to wreck when its lands were lived upon and cultivated by the people who owned them. Therefore when a nation comes to enact legislation which will help men to get homes for themselves it is legislating not for the individual but for the nation itself.

Mr. JACOWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS. Yes.

Mr. JACOWAY. We understand that there are three great classes of credits—speculative, consumptive, and productive. Under the gentleman's theory of a bill of this kind, would he loan money on any kind of credit except productive credit?

Mr. SUMNERS. I would not hesitate to lend on vacant land being purchased for occupancy as a home, for while it would not be actually productive, it would be potentially productive. But I would not lend on all productive lands, as I have tried to make clear. Pretty nearly all I have is invested in a farm. I love to dream of the day when I can live there. But I never will, so long as I am in Congress, give my vote to any legislation which would tend to increase land ownership by nonoccupants in this country.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS. I will.

Mr. PLATT. Does not the gentleman think that if the Government lends money to farmers at a lower rate of interest than the going rate, that that would increase the value of the land and benefit the landowners?

Mr. SUMNERS. It would incidentaly benefit the landowners, but if you limit the direct benefits of this bill to the man who wants to buy a home to occupy it or who, having purchased, wants to improve it, you will reduce to a minimum the benefit to the landowner.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I would say in answer to that, suppose I owned a thousand acres of land and wanted to sell it. It would be very easy for me to arrange some scheme by which I could sell a lot of that land to my workmen, in a nominal way, at a higher price than I could get in any other way, if they could borrow money at a lower rate of interest than anyone else could borrow it.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman can help his workmen to get a home and, incidentally, get a little more value for his land, I would have no objection to it, but when this bill is finally written I am going to offer an amendment, if the provision is not already in the bill, which will put in the penitentiary every man who undertakes to steal the benefits of the bill. I am willing that the gentleman should get his incidental benefits, but I want the home builder to get the direct and chief benefits from this legislation, not because I have any prejudice against the landowner, but because my duty to the American Nation demands that this legislation be fashioned so as to give the benefits to the home builder.

Mr. OGLESBY. The gentleman means the speculators that undertake to steal.

Mr. SUMNERS. Yes.

Mr. OGLESBY. And not the home buyer.

Mr. SUMNERS. Oh, he is not stealing. The man who builds a home renders the greatest service to this Nation that anyone can render.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I would like to have him explain to the House, if he can, how you contemplate in all these bills that have been introduced here securing money through organized farm-loan banks in communities that are desperately in need of money? How are you going to make a wig without hair? If those farmers were able to organize banks, they would not be paying 8 and 10 and 12 and 15 per cent interest upon loans in this country as they are in many places to-day.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, I believe that there is enough local capital in my country, in each community, to organize a bank, but not enough money to purchase the credits which may be offered for sale. Powerful influence may interfere in the markets where these credits will be offered. Ought the Government to render aid, I have been asked? I hope the gentleman who asked the question will pardon me for attempting to establish a proper viewpoint from which to consider the Government's duty before answering the question.

Mr. Chairman, I am speaking deliberately when I say that I believe Government aid will be necessary and that the Federal Government and the States ought to go to the limit of necessity to make this thing a success. The condition of public sentiment now presents a supreme opportunity to the Government. You know that the census of this country shows that the relative number of home owners is being reduced. It shows that the people out in the productive areas are being relatively decreased, and in proportion as the number of home owners in any country is reduced, the foundation upon which government rests is weakened. This is not a theory; it is a clearly demonstrated fact. Yesterday we appropriated over a hundred million dollars for the Army. I declare to you gentlemen, with the support of human experience, that a citizenship of home owners is a greater protection against internal and external dangers than a mighty standing army.

Mr. QUIN. Did the gentleman ever hear of a man going out and fighting from a boarding house or a rented farm?

Mr. SUMNERS. I do not know but that perhaps some of them did; but the man will not fight as he would when he is fighting for his own fireside.

Mr. Chairman, I have been trying to touch the high points in this rural credit system, as I understand it. I have about exhausted my time, but before resuming my seat I want to direct the attention of the Members present to the fact that this demand for rural credits is only one manifestation of the general demand for the improvement of the economic conditions which surround the business of agriculture. No system of personal credits can be developed in America save as it is developed in connection with an improved system of marketing farm products. I can not discuss that now. That is a fact, however. An improved system of marketing farm products is the most urgent need now presented to the American people and a recognition on the part of the people who live in the cities that this is not a problem of the farmer only, is a thing soon to come.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS. I wonder if I have two minutes more.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, the time has come when the people in the cities must pay the people in the country as much net profit as they could get in any other business. I can not elaborate that now. In addition to the high interest rate you must pay every dollar of the value of the millions and millions of dollars' worth of stuff that rots on the sidetracks, where it has become stranded while engaged in a fruitless search in the dark for a purchaser. You must pay in the price of the stuff you eat for that which is destroyed, and you had better come along and help those of us who represent the boys in the forks of the creek to work out a system that will get to you these things that are produced in the country. Just one other thing. The time is not far distant when you are going to go to the cupboard and find that there is nothing there for breakfast. The fact that the surplus which we brought over from the days of community independence is being eaten ought to arouse the country from one end to the other. Your cattle and hogs are being decreased and everything you have to eat is being decreased, and still the population is moving with tremendous velocity toward the great centers of population. In trying to improve marketing conditions I am not working only for the farmers of my country but for the teeming millions in your cities. These are problems of great magnitude and great difficulty pressing urgently for solution. As I said before, we do not know how to solve them yet, but we have no time to spare. We must marshal this information. You know a little something about it and I know a little something about it. We must get it together; we must forget that we are Democrats and Republicans, forget that we live in a city or in the country, and remember only that we are American citizens and have a great service to perform for this country of ours.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like the gentleman to defer that for a moment, in order that I might yield to some one on this side.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Very well.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN], I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to features of this bill which have always attracted considerable discussion here when the appropriation bills for agriculture have been before the House in the past. On page 22 is an item—

> For the purchase, testing, and distribution of new and rare seeds; for the investigation and improvement of grasses, alfalfa, clover, and other forage crops—
>
> And so forth, aggregating $119,000.
>
> Then, again, on page 23—
>
> For purchase, testing, and congressional distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, etc., $252,540."

Which is known as the congressional distribution of seeds. The chief trouble with the distribution of garden and flower seeds is that the farmers and others who receive them get something of only nominal value, something which they could buy at the nearest town for a few cents, and there is no question of superior quality involved, nor is there any question of convenience involved in it. I want to call particular attention to the fact that the money spent in the past by the department under appropriation items for the distribution of new and rare seeds has resulted in giving to a number of farmers in each district seeds of special value, seeds which they could not otherwise get, seeds which are not for sale ordinarily in the towns and villages and sometimes not even in the cities. A good illustration of that is the Durham wheat, which the department a number of years ago secured abroad and distributed. It took some little time for that wheat to find its place, but now it brings the highest price of any wheat on the market in the United States. Now, to one who has not given any particular thought to this question and the cost of sending out these small, inexpensive packages to the farmers and those living in towns, he would be surprised that it costs the Nation $252,000 yearly. For a number of years the annual reports of the Secretary of Agriculture contained recommendations that this distribution be dispensed with. I do not find it in the present report of the Secretary of Agriculture, but that may be on account of the fact that he has ceased to have any hope or faith that Congress will ever discontinue the distribution of the flower and garden seeds.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. With pleasure.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Do I understand the gentleman to intimate that the expenditure of $252,000, out of more than one billion dollars that is expended annually by this Government, for seed to be distributed among the people who live in the little towns and the farmers of the country is money thrown away? Does not the gentleman think that brings the Government a little closer to thousands of people who otherwise would not realize that the Government is doing anything for them? Thousands of school children are furnished seeds by Members of Congress for planting in their trial gardens. The requests of different kinds sent to Members of Congress for seeds show that the $250,000 is not entirely thrown away or wasted. I think it is an education to some of the people and brings them closer to our Government.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Well, Mr. Chairman, of course it would not be fair to say that the flower and garden seeds which are sent out are without value to those who receive them, but the point I am making is this, That each one who receives a package of seeds gets only what he could buy for a quarter at the nearest town or village. It seems to me the money would be much more wisely expended if we would add what we expend for that purpose now to what we spend for new and rare varieties of seed for the purpose of introducing new things to be grown by the farmer, and thus help to enrich and make agriculture more profitable.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I yield.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I quite agree with the last proposition of the gentleman. I only wanted to suggest, and this the gentleman might consider in answering the gentleman from Washington, whether it was very likely that the people of this country first woke up to the use and were now being encouraged in the use of seed simply because some politicians here in Washington had brought it to their attention.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes; this may have been true of our intellectual predecessors of the dim past, but it is up to us now to be leaders and not trailers, and every farmer in the country can get at trifling cost as good seed as we send to them. I believe we should try to keep abreast with or catch up with the farmers in our districts, who, if they were here, would insist upon our placing in their hands new and rare varieties of seed so that they can develop their lands and make them more valuable.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Absolutely so; and the distribution of these inferior commonplace seeds everybody knows is a waste of money, time, and energy and a misapplication of the purpose of the Government.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. An imbecile proceeding, in my judgment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not know how it is in the gentleman's district, but in my district I know that hundreds of people are requesting these seeds, and they write back that the seeds are not inferior but that they are superior in quality. [Applause.]

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I do not criticize the quality of the particular seed sent out; I believe they are as good seeds as can be had in the market; but I do believe that they are ordinary varieties and that the farmers can buy seed of a similar quality at a very small cost and without any inconvenience in their own localities.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the gentleman allow me to interject another remark in his speech?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I came to Congress prejudiced against these garden-seed distributions. The part of the country I came from is a very rich country and the people there would not give a snap for them and they would not raise enough garden truck to be sufficient for a harvest crew for one meal, but after having been here, from the dryer and newer parts of the country, from the poorer people, I got dozens and hundreds of letters begging for these seeds, and I find out that they think they are valuable to them, and that has induced me to change my ideas in that respect quite a little.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I assume from the gentleman's statement, in his district the farmers as well as the people in towns who raise a garden and have a flower patch out next to the house are not going to change their custom in that respect, no matter what we do here.

I think we can assume that they are going to continue to have their gardens and their flower plots, and now the question is whether we are going to help them get new and rare field varieties of seeds which will make their farming more profitable. It seems to me, at least, that that is the question to which we should address ourselves.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] said something to the effect that the distribution of these seeds brings the United States Government close to the individual; that he feels the Government is doing something for him. Is it the gentleman's experience that the man who receives seeds considers they come from the Government of the United States or that they come from the individual Congressman whose name is on the frank? How does the average recipient of seeds regard that?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. That is a question to which I never gave any particular thought. I do not believe that the receipt of a small package of garden seeds by the average citizen in my district is going to excite him very much. I do not think that there is anything in the receipt of that little package of seeds, costing a few cents, that is going——

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FIELDS). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota (continuing). That is going to inspire, upon the part of the recipient, a greater devotion to or love for his country. Upon the contrary, the thoughtful citizen is apt to consider it an unnecessary, if not an unwise, expenditure of money.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Is not this distribution of seed by Congressmen politically a liability instead of an asset, as often suggested?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. My impression is that it is a liability. There is an increasing number of men in my district who consider the distribution of garden seeds either a waste of public money or a senseless proceeding, viewed from the standpoint of its being a substantial aid to agriculture. I recall that last year the editor of the Jamestown Capital told of his experience with Government garden seeds, and he presented what seemed to me unanswerable arguments against the governmental distribution of such seeds. If I had this editorial here I would quote from it, to show how silly and indefensible the whole proceeding seemed to him. Other editors have also expressed themselves, and I have learned to rely upon the newspapers of my district as reliable sources of information or reflectors of the views of the people upon public questions. So, in further reply to the gentleman [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] I want to quote from another editor, Mr. Miller, of the Minnewaukan Siftings. In a strong editorial he wound up with these words, and gentlemen should weigh his words, for I believe he expresses the views of a surprisingly large percentage of the voters of this country:

> Government seed is to-day just a donation—

Says Mr. Miller. Continuing he says:

> It represents something for nothing, and that is always attractive, even if there is only a quarter's worth of it. That is what it is, and that is how it is regarded. The system is attractive to a few Members of Congress who are able by its use to keep in touch with some of their constituents. The Congressman is not to be blamed for using it in this way. So long as the stuff is bought it might as well be sent out, and every Congressman should see that he gets his share for distribution. The people who receive the seeds are not to blame for doing so. The seeds are paid for with public money, and let every man get his share if he can, and if he has any use for it after he gets it.

And notice this—

> But there is blame attaching to Members of the United States Congress who, knowing perfectly well the utter uselessness of this distribution of a petty gratuity, persist in making appropriations for it year after year, and who make the plea in extenuation that they are doing something for the farmer.

Mr. Chairman, our duty seems clear. So far as I am concerned, I shall vote against the appropriation of any more money to buy garden or flower seeds for free distribution. Instead I shall vote to use the money so appropriated in the past for the purpose of introducing new and rare varieties of field seeds to be procured upon this continent or from across the seas. If those of us who believe that way and vote that way are outvoted, and if money is voted for free garden and flower seeds in spite of our votes, then I propose that the people of my district shall have their share. It is of small value, it is true, but so long as this Congress votes money for anything, even if against my vote, I propose that my district shall have its rightful share.

But, Mr. Chairman, is it not about time to lay rough hands upon this venerable imposter, this miserable farce, and costly humbug?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, before I discuss cotton, diversified farming, and the necessity for a banking system for the farmers of America, I want to say a word in reply to gentlemen who continue to criticize the Department of Agriculture for its efforts to send valuable farm and vegetable seeds to the farmers of the country. Dr. B. T. Galloway gave great attention to this matter, with the view of selecting the very best seed obtainable, and he succeeded in getting a splendid quality, and the seed now being sent out by the Department of Agriculture are doing good and they are much appreciated by the people who receive them. [Applause.] And I trust that the time will soon come when these gentlemen will consume the time of this House in making suggestions for the practice of economy along other lines rather than that of trying to take the pitiful amount for seed distribution away from a class of people who bear more than their fair share of the burdens of government. [Applause.]

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I will.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Does not the gentleman really think that this criticism that is being used for political purposes is largely a mistaken idea; that, instead of being an asset to a Congressman, they are, in fact, a liability in the sending of them out?

Mr. HEFLIN. The gentlemen opposing the anuual distribution of the best variety of seed that can be obtained by the Department of Agriculture are certainly not representing any considerable number of farmers in this country.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I will for a question.

Mr. ANDERSON. The contention, I think, of those who oppose this particular appropriation is not that it does not do any good, but the money might be expended in other directions which would do a great deal more good.

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not agree with them. The small amount that we expend for seed, Mr. Chairman, could not be used to better advantage. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words about the situation in the South. The European war has injured business in every section of our country, but it has injured the cotton industry of the South most of all; but, Mr. Chairman, our people have just been taught in the school of hardships and bitter experience that the one-crop idea is an evil standing between them and genuine prosperity, and they have registered a vow to break the chains that have bound them to the rock of the old system. I want to say to my Western and Northwestern friends that in refusing to lend us aid last October, when the cotton producer in his distress appealed to Congress for relief from conditions created by war, you threw away a golden opportunity. The South had been content to produce cotton with which to buy your mules, your hay, and corn and wheat and oats.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. HEFLIN. I will.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think that while these people who opposed the measure, to which he refers now, in the last session of Congress may have injured, as he says, their own future, that by doing so they have contributed very greatly to the future prosperity of the South?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; Mr Chairman, that is the thought that I had in mind. The cotton producer had furnished you a market for all these things, and you had it in your power to join us and prevent the sacrifice of his cotton; but, alas! you refused, and in refusing threw away a golden opportunity. [Applause.] If you had helped us to obtain the relief necessary, we would have gone on producing cotton with which to buy your western produce, but your failure to help us has produced conditions that impel the southern farmer in large measure to curtail the production—reduce his cotton acreage for the purpose of producing the very things that he has so long been buying from you. [Applause.] Why should the farmers of Alabama buy corn from the western farmer when Alabama holds the record for producing more corn on 1 acre of ground than any other State in the Union? And, Mr. Chairman, this record-breaking yield was produced in Tallapoosa County, in my district, by Walker Dunson, a 15-year-old boy. [Applause.] Let me say just here, that the largest sweet potato grown in the United States was produced in Autauga County, in my district, last year. Mr. Chairman, we are just beginning to realize the vast possibilities that are ours in this new field of diversified farming. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, this is the dawning of a new day for the South. The agricultural army of the cotton belt is declaring its independence of the one-crop system. That system has demanded a fearful toll at the hands of the farmers of the South. It has stood between them and all the blessings and benefits that come with crop rotation and diversified farming. [Applause.] It has injured every State, every county, and every community in the cotton belt, and, Mr. Chairman, it has injured the cotton farmer most of all. [Applause.] For years our farmers and merchants felt that cotton was the panacea for all the ills that agriculture is heir to. They thought that cotton alone could make the South blossom as the rose, and spread prosperity and happiness amongst our people. But at last we have seen the utter folly of producing cotton with which to buy corn when we can produce that corn cheaply and to advantage. [Applause.] At last it has dawned upon us that it is foolish to produce cotton with which to buy wheat when we can grow that wheat successfully; and, Mr. Chairman, we acknowledge with embarrassment that we have toiled to produce cotton with which to buy oats and peas and hay when we can produce all of them cheaply and in abundance on the southern farm. [Applause.] We have produced, at great expense, cotton with which to buy mutton, pork, and beef when we can produce them all on every cotton plantation in the South. [Applause.] At last, Mr. Chairman, the cotton farmer has realized that when he has labored to increase the production of cotton with which to pay for all his farm necessities that he has placed in the hands of others a club with which to beat down the price of cotton. He has at last realized that if he would make the farm self-sustaining, derive a profit from his labors, and have a voice in fixing the price of cotton he must abandon the one-crop system that has enslaved him, and so fortify himself through diversified farming that he can be the master of his own business and hold or sell his cotton just as he deems best in the premises. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly.

Mr. QUIN. Does not the gentleman think that this Government ought to establish some sort of system by which those farmers raising that grain and stuff could market it and get the full value of it?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes, sir; it ought to render every assistance possible, and the Office of Markets that I helped to establish in the Department of Agriculture will be of vast advantage to our farmers.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. HEFLIN. I had rather not be interrupted any more. My time is short.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. The war in Europe has cost the cotton farmer dearly. It has brought to him a bitter experience, but out of the wreck and the ruin of cotton prices he will come employing his intellect and using his energies in the processes of diversified farming, and who knows but that his costly experience with cotton in the fall of 1914 will be of advantage to him in the years to come. [Applause.] From one end of the South to the other, Mr. Chairman, cotton fields have been planted in oats and wheat, and millions of acres more await the coming of the plowman in the spring for the planting of corn and peas and other forage crops. More farmers are preparing to raise their own meat and corn, their wheat and oats and hay, than ever before in the history of the South. All this foretells the day of deliverance for my people from the one-crop system that has cursed them. [Applause.] With corn in his crib, meat in his smokehouse, wheat in his bin, and fodder and hay in his barn the farmer can hold his cotton and sell at will. The farmer must prepare for the day, and he has it in his power to hasten the coming of that day when he can sell or refuse to sell his cotton, just as he thinks best. Diversified farming in the South will usher in that blessed day. The cotton farmer who would protect himself against the evil darts of the bear speculator must build his fortifications with corn and oats, peas and hay, with meat and wheat and potatoes. And here encamped at the base of these supplies and speaking from this stronghold the Southern farmer can and will dictate cotton prices to the world. [Applause.] Then will the producer use the power derived through diversified farming to give King Cotton his rightful place in the markets of the earth. Instead of being the only product of the Southern farmer he will be one of a multiplicity of products. He will no longer be a burden to the producer, nor will he be longer compelled to undertake the impossible task of doing for the farmer the work that corn and meat and oats and wheat and peas alone can do. [Applause.]

The southern farmer realizes now that his ability to hold his cotton and sell when it suits him must come through diversified farming, and he also realizes that he can get more money for a small crop of cotton than he can for a large crop; and the farmer that produced 20 bales of cotton and sold it for 6 and 7 cents per pound sees now that it will be vastly to his advantage to produce 10 bales at 12 cents per pound and grow corn and oats and peas on the land that produced the other 10 bales at 6 cents per pound in the year 1914. Of course the war took us by surprise and caught us utterly unprepared for the conditions that it created. Cotton had sold around 13 cents per pound in 1913, and was 13 cents during the planting season in 1914, and the farmer had the right to believe that the price would be good in the fall of 1914; and it would have been but for the war, for cotton was 14 cents per pound on the 30th of July, 1914, the very day the war commenced in Europe. Now, suppose that every farmer, or the great bulk of the farming class, had produced sufficient corn, oats, wheat, peas, hay, potatoes, meat, and sirup to supply his wants for the year 1915. What would have been the situation? Why, the farmer would have said, "The price of cotton does not suit me; it is below the cost of production, and mine is not for sale at this time." If the farmer had been able to do that, cotton never would have gone below 10 cents; and I believe that it would have remained above 12 cents; and why not? Cotton goods to-day warrant the farmer in demanding 12 cents and more. [Applause.] It is true, Mr. Chairman, that the cotton crop of 1914 is larger than the crop of 1913, and it is also true that more American cotton was consumed last year than ever before; more spindles were in operation here and abroad—about 3,000,000—than ever before. We exported last year nearly 9,000,000 bales of cotton, and the American cotton mills consumed nearly 6,000,000 bales. The reports of raw cotton consumed by the spinners does not include that used in the manufacture of woolen goods, felts, batting, mattresses, and other miscellaneous cotton products. So, Mr. Chairman, with the great reduction in cotton production this year, the farmer will be in a position next fall to demand a reasonable price for his cotton, and by producing farm necessities at home he will be in a position to enforce his demand. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest to my friends from the South that there is another change necessary in the conduct of the cotton producer's business. He has fallen into the habit of allowing his fertilizer debts to be made due and payable in October and November. Yes; they are payable at a time when the cotton producer should not be pressed from any source to sell his cotton. These papers should not be made payable before the middle of December. From the time the cotton opens until the middle of December the farmer should be absolutely free to do as he thinks best with regard to selling his cotton. He ought not to be tied up with guano notes and mortgages coming due right in the heart of the cotton-selling season, when somebody else can force him to sell whether he wants to sell or not. [Applause.] This system in vogue all over the South forces upon the market hundreds of thousands of bales of cotton at a time when it may not be wise to sell and when the farmer would not sell if he were not compelled to do so to meet obligations coming due at such an unreasonable time. When the farmers are forced by this unwise custom to unload upon the market vast quantities of cotton, regardless of whether the price suits them or not, they are injured, and the bear speculator takes advantage of the coming in of cotton from all over the South at these stated times when the farmer is settling for his fertilizers, and he immediately uses this to depress the price. For instance, he will say that the farmers are selling freely and that a great deal more cotton was sold on October 15 than was sold in two weeks before. They try to induce the public to believe that the farmer is selling of his own accord because he thinks the price is good enough and because he fears that the price will go down, when the truth is the farmers often bring in their cotton at these unreasonable times because the fertilizer net is drawing all through the South at that time and bringing them into the market with their cotton. [Applause.] It may be that the farmer's judgment was against selling; that he wanted to hold his cotton, but alas! he has innocently put into the hands of bear gamblers the very power that they needed to beat down the price. Between August 15 and December 15 is the time of all times when the cotton producer should be his own master, free to use his own judgment as to whether or not he should sell. [Applause.] If he were free to do as he saw fit with his cotton from August 15 to December 15, and he should sell when the price suited him, cotton would be on a stable basis by that time and the farmer would have some say in the matter of fixing the price, and the law of supply and demand would govern.

Mr. Chairman, I want to mention another thing at this time. I know some other people who refused the opportunity to help themselves by helping us. The cotton spinners of America could have purchased their cotton supply at 10 cents per pound, and then have helped to put the price up to 12 cents, so that the foreign spinner would have to pay that price for his supply, the remainder of the crop. At 10 cents the spinners here would be getting their supply nearly 4 cents per pound cheaper than they paid the year before, and then by helping to put the price up they would gain the advantage in the matter of competition with the foreign spinner in the markets of the world and at the same time have helped the cotton producer.

Mr. Chairman, the farmers of America produced last year nearly $7,000,000,000 worth of agricultural products, and if cotton had brought its fair value, you could add a half billion dollars' worth more to that amount. Seven billion dollars' worth of agricultural products and thirty-odd millions of people engaged in the farming industry, and yet the sad fact confronts us that they have no credit system and no banking establishment suited to their particular needs. [Applause.] The commercial banking system does not supply their wants; it does not meet the requirements of the agricultural classes. The short-time loans and the high interest rates of the commercial banking system have been millstones about the necks of the farming class of our people. [Applause.] When we consider the difficulties and disadvantages under which farmers have struggled in their efforts to buy farms and build homes, the wonder is that they have succeeded as well as they have. Instead of getting money on land at a low rate of interest for a long period of time, the farmer has been unable to borrow at all on real estate at national banks, and in the absence of a farm-credit system he has been without banking accommodations, and the indirect aid that he has received through the commercial banking system has not been at all satisfactory. He has not been able to obtain loans at a reasonable rate of interest and he has been unable to get sufficient time in which to complete his undertakings. Through commissions and fees he has been compelled to pay interest rates ranging from 12 to 30 per cent and sometimes more. The short-time loan and the tremendous interest rate of the commercial banking system have stood between the farmers of America and homes and farms paid for and in their names. [Applause.] Thousands of the best farms in this country are those bargained for by industrious, ambitious men who longed to have homes and farms of their own, but they were overtaken by some misfortune, drought, or maybe sickness in the family, and were unable to comply with the short-time contract with its burdensome interest rates, and unable to get banking accommodations or an extension of time, they were driven to the wall and forced to give up the land with all its improvements and move away. There are thousands and tens of thousands of instances of this kind. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, there are many men in this country who have made their fortunes by selling land to farmers on credit for a short time, charging high interest rates, receiving a payment or two, and taking the land back and selling it over and over again. I rejoice that the President has included in his legislative program the proposition to establish by Congress a rural-credit system in this country. [Applause.] The man with land ten times the value of some man's commercial paper has been unable to borrow money through the commercial banking system, while the man with commercial rating has been able to borrow from the same banking system, on commercial paper, based on transactions with the farmer. So here is a banking system, Mr. Speaker, that accommodates the man with commercial paper, but denies aid to the man whose products make that commercial paper valuable. [Applause.] The short-time loan and high interest rate and the demand for commercial paper by the commercial banking system are not helpful, but distinctly hurtful to the business of the farmer. The agricultural business of this country is too big and too important to allow it to be hindered and handicapped by a banking system that does not supply its wants and meet its requirements. Every section of the country feels the need of a banking system suited to the business of the farmer. All agree that a rural-credit system with low interest rates and long-time loans is necessary, and the farmers of the South feel just as keenly, if not more so, the need of such a system. [Applause.] The farmers of the South, with farm products, land, and other property worth billions of dollars, were unable to borrow money with which to keep their cotton away from a market demoralized by war. I know of instances where the farmer offered to this commercial banking system mortgages on property many times the value of the amount desired, but he did not get the accommodation that he wished and was forced to sacrifice his cotton. This Government owes it to the farming class of our people to provide a banking system suited to the business of the agricultural industry. France and Germany have provided such a system, and land bonds in Germany bring a higher price than the bonds of the German Government. Such a system as I have suggested will be the means of greatly increasing the number of home-building and home-owning people in America. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I see that my time has expired. I will have more to say on this subject at a later date. In conclusion I want to assure you that I stand ready to vote at the earliest day possible for a farm-credit system in keeping with the dignity and the business of the farmers of our country. [Loud applause.]

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, how much time have we remaining on this side?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 2 hours and 15 minutes.

Mr. LEVER. How much has the other side used?

The CHAIRMAN. The other side has used 1 hour and 40 minutes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I have been very much interested in this subject of rural credits. I have had some knowledge of the efforts that have been made in the committees of the House and Senate upon that topic, but I honestly believe that they are proceeding on wrong lines.

We have been told by the President of the United States that the new currency system provides in quite a considerable way for the needs of the farmer; and yet it must be apparent to everybody who knows anything about commercial banking that the farmer, who usually requires, as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] says, long-time loans, will be the last man to be accommodated at the commercial banks. He never can expect to get his loan there as long as the commercial borrower is ready to take short-time loans. So there is no substantial relief in that direction for the farmer.

The bills that have been introduced into the House, proceeding upon the line that the farmers will get together, that they will furnish the capital to organize banks, that the local banks will furnish the capital to organize district banks, that the district banks will issue a system of debentures based upon the mortgages of the farmers, that these debentures can be taken into the open market and sold, so that the farmer may procure his loan, will require a vast machinery of organization, a big salary list, based primarily on the cash to be furnished by the farmer.

Now, that bond must find its purchaser among the money-lending class. That bond never can be sold to anybody who can employ his money at higher interest in any other investment, and for that reason I am satisfied that the system is bound to fail. It may help the farmer who is able to pay for stock in the bank, but the farmer who has no money to buy bank stock, who most needs help, will not be helped at all.

Well, you say, what will you do? I say that because agriculture is at the basis of all human activity the public welfare is involved in its prosperity, challenging the attention and invoking the aid of the Government. It becomes not a question of aiding a class, but of promoting the public welfare. If you can organize a system by which the Government will lend its credit upon proper conditions to persons engaged in farming, so that the farming interests may be able to secure long-time loans at reasonable interest, encouraging the building of farm homes, and relieving agriculture from the enormous burden of interest charges that it is now staggering under, you will promote the public welfare in the highest degree.

Well, you say, why not aid the butcher and the baker and candlestick maker, and let the Government provide loans for everybody at 4 per cent? That seems to be quite a cogent plea. The farmer as a farmer has no more right to Government aid than the butcher, but aid to agriculture, an industry in the prosperity of which every other industry is deeply concerned, is altogether another matter. If we look at the banking business, we will find that because a sound banking business is of the greatest importance to the general welfare of itself the Government has extended and is extending its credit and powerful aid. We find that the Government has been extending aid in an enormous amount for the last 50 years to the money-lending class—the banking class—and there is not much said about that, because not the banker as an individual but the banking business, by reason of these aids, promotes the general welfare.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I will yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. HULINGS. I appreciate the gentleman's courtesy. Half a dozen persons who have Government bonds conclude that they will start a bank. They deposit those bonds in the Federal Treasury and collect their interest on those bonds right along, but the Government issues to them the face value of those bonds in national currency. They take that currency and go back and start their bank and lend it out for what they can get. It is not suggested that the banks pay anything for that accommodation. The national-bank system has been organized and promoted and established to the special interest and advantage of the money-lending class. It is not suggested that they pay anything for that accommodation.

Why, then, should not the 12,000,000 farmers employed in our greatest industry, that certainly is of equal importance to the banking industry in its contribution to the general welfare—why should not an association of farmers, by putting up adequate security, secure loans or the aid of Government credit upon the payment of 3 per cent or perhaps 3½ per cent interest for the use of the loan or aid? There is no question at all in my mind, Mr. Chairman, that a system can be organized somewhat on the lines of the building and loan associations, that have been thoroughly worked out and are so greatly beneficial to the country, but turned tother end to, so to speak, because building and loan borrowers put their little dribs in every month and at the end of 140 or 150 months, something like that, they take down the whole capital invested. The farmer is not in the situation to make his contributions from month to month, but the proposition is to furnish him the loan at the start, upon putting up proper security, and allowing him to pay off this debt in dribs from year to year during the period of 15, 20, or 25 years by a system of amortized payments. I believe that system can be established in this country very quickly. I do not believe the system that is suggested in the bills that have been introduced will do that. I believe any of the proposed bills, if enacted, will develop in this country a great political machine, the employment of an army of clerks, the expenditure of vast quantities of money in order to install and conduct the system, which is entirely unnecessary if this other simpler and more effective and less expensive system is adopted.

One of the bills would attach the whole system of farm credits to the Federal banking system. It would be attached and practically put the enormous volume of farm loans under the banks' control, just as the commercial or business credits of the country are given into the control of the banks by the Federal reserve act, but with this difference—Government aid is withheld from the farmers. Oh, no; that would be aiding a class, while it is provided by law that the banks can take the notes of Tom, Dick, or Harry and have them rediscounted and secure Government currency.

The Federal reserve act placed the commercial business of the country absolutely in the control of the money lenders. Let us not go further and throw farm loans into the same control.

Your bills all would employ a vast, expensive, unnecessary machinery, salaries, and so forth, and the farmer would foot the bills.

Give the farmers the same chance you give the bankers. Require of them fully adequate security, then lend them the aid of the Government. Let them pay for this aid. Do not give it to them for nothing, as you have given it to the banker.

It is worth while on the score of the public welfare to relieve agriculture from the 7⅞ per cent interest charge which the average farmer in the United States is paying.

I have little faith in any of your systems that deny Government aid. If the whole country is interested in prosperous agricultural conditions, and no intelligent person will deny it, then the aid of organized society—that is, the aid of the Government—is justifiable.

The real question is whether Government aid will be extended; all other projects will fail in the working. You can not make a wig without hair.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I was much interested in the speech made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], in which he told us of the awakening in the South; that the people there have come to appreciate their advantages, and are improving them, engaging in general agriculture instead of confining themselves to the production of one crop, as in the past—the cotton crop. He attributes that condition and that awakening to the fact that this Congress refused to grant to the South the relief asked during the stringency or trouble about their cotton market growing out of the war in Europe. He is losing sight of the fact, Mr. Chairman, that this Congress has done a great deal in the last few years to bring about that very result in the South, namely, the development of general agriculture. Every bill that has been prepared by the Committee on Agriculture and passed by this Congress since I entered the House has carried immense appropriations for the purpose of assisting the people of the South along these very lines, and the bill we are now about to consider carries upward of $2,000,000 exclusively for that purpose and for that section of the country. There is an appropriation of $230,000 for farm management, of which the States of the South will get their share. There is an appropriation of $398,000 for the purpose of eradicating the cattle tick, which is peculiar to the South—an encouragement to them to engage and to progress in the cattle-raising industry. There is an appropriation of $50,000 to be used by the Bureau of Animal Industry to assist and encourage the raising of live stock in the areas free of the cattle tick, an appropriation particularly for the States of the South. There is an appropriation of $60,000 to assist and encourage the development of new lines of agriculture in the sugar-cane sections of Louisiana to take the place of or because of the destruction of the sugar-producing industry in that part of the country. There is an appropriation—or it is suggested in the bill—of $10,000 to assist the State of Georgia, put in at the request of the distinguished gentleman representing one of the districts of that State, Mr. PARK, to help the people or encourage them in the better use of the sugar cane. There is an appropriation suggested in the bill of $666,000 to carry out and devise means of meeting the ravages of the boll weevil; and a similar appropriation, not quite so large as in this present bill, has been carried in every bill for years. Under the guise of combating the ravages of the boll weevil $500,000 or $600,000—this year, $666,000—have been used and are appropriated for the encouragement of general agriculture in the South. There is an appropriation of $59,000 to study the diseases of crops grown in the South; another appropriation of $15,000; but I shall not undertake to give the exact amounts of other appropriations, because the fact that they are in the bill has occurred to me only since I made this memorandum, and I may not be exact as to the amounts, but I venture to say that altogether this bill carries not much, if any, less than $2,000,000 for the purpose of assisting and encouraging the growing of crops peculiar to the South and for the development and encouragement of general agriculture in that section of the country. It has been the policy of Congress for years to make those appropriations and to suggest to the South the desirability of engaging in those lines, and to offer this material assistance that they might engage in those lines.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] says that the South has suddenly received help, suddenly seen the light, and suddenly been awakened to the necessity of general agriculture on account of the injustice which it recently suffered at the hands of Congress. What did the South ask?

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes.

Mr. POWERS. Is it not a fact that these appropriations have been going on for years to assist the South?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I said that, or intended to, that amounts similar to these have been carried in every bill that I know anything about, at least during the last eight years.

What did the South ask? Mr. Chairman, I had occasion during the closing days of the last session to call the attention of the House to some of the measures that were being urged by gentlemen from the South for the relief of the cotton situation. I summarized those bills and stated to the Congress that the aggregate money asked by them was not much, if any, short of $2,000,000,000, to be issued by the Government of the United States, or under its auspices, or along the lines which Congress had provided, to be placed in the banks of the South, and the loaning of that money was to be made compulsory on the banks in which it was placed, to be loaned to the cotton growers of the South, or practically for the purchase of cotton—not at 5 or 6 cents a pound, the market price of cotton at that time, but at 10 or 12 cents a pound; and those bills contained the express provision that the cotton thus purchased by the Government—the title acquired under the guise of a loan to the cotton owners—should be held by the Federal Government "until spot middling cotton should sell on the open market at Savannah, Ga., at 15 cents a pound." This Congress was asked to enact laws of the most outrageous and ridiculous character, ostensibly for the protection and the relief of the cotton situation in the South. That is what Congress refused to do. It was right in refusing it. If that action has contributed in any measure to the splendid situation that the gentleman from Alabama points out; if the South has awakened to the necessity of general agriculture and in the near future is going to supply the needs of the entire country and put the farmers of the North and West out of business, there will be no just cause of complaint. The South is evidently striving for some measure of advantage to which it is entitled. Its people are to engage in lines of business in which they should have engaged years ago. Their climate and soil are suitable and invite industry to these lines. They have been blind to their opportunities in the past. I congratulate them that their eyes are opened and that they are to take advantage of their opportunities now. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used up five minutes.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY]. [Applause.]

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not purpose to address myself to the bill under discussion, but, as others have done, I shall discuss a related subject, that of rural credits. I have recently introduced a bill for the relief of farmers, H. R. 20841. I shall briefly review it.

Not only does our national prosperity but our industrial existence rest upon our farmers. Legislators who fail to grasp this fact do not appreciate conditions as they exist. Ever since government began laws have been enacted to promote the prosperity of people engaged in the professions, manufacture, or trade, but for the farmer, nothing. The belief seems to have existed in all ages, as it seems to exist now, that if other classes are made to prosper the farmers are able to care for themselves. We are now engaged in trying to find a solution of the so-called "high cost of living" and to solve the problem of the "unemployed." Both these questions are of comparatively little importance as compared with the enactment of laws that will enable the farmers of this land to ply their calling, unhindered by hostile laws and unhampered by unjust conditions. When he shall have been unfettered, his industrial bondage ended, the other questions of the cost of living and the opportunity to work will have solved themselves. Legislators are beginning to realize this, and therefore recognize that the greatest question before the Congress to-day is the question of a solution of farmers' credit.

In the short time allotted to me to-day I wish to discuss a bill, H. R. 20841, introduced by me on the 12th day of January, 1915. In my judgment, its provisions will solve this problem. It will enable the performance of all the functions that can be rightfully performed by government in this case, which is to bring together the parties who have money to loan at a low rate of interest and on long time and those who wish to borrow money under those conditions and have ample security therefor. The bill seeks to put in touch the farmers of all sections of this country with those in any section of it who have money to loan under these conditions, and its service to the farmer is the same in every State and Territory under our flag. It does this without disturbing the commercial or banking conditions in any community. It will neither affect the interest rate nor the deposit of money that have heretofore been used in industrial or commercial enterprises; and, above and beyond that, it extends the advantages of the provisions only to those who are actually engaged in producing agricultural products, and under no conditions lends itself to the speculator or absentee landlord, because no one can borrow money under its provisions unless he actually resides upon his land and is engaged in the work of agriculture. It will also make improbable the accumulation—I say improbable—of large landed estates, because the amount of the loan to be made under its provisions will not in any case exceed the sum of $5,000; but inasmuch as money under these provisions may be borrowed at a very low rate of interest up to that amount, it will render it unprofitable for one not a farmer who has money invested in lands on which he owes, or for which he can find an investment in other channels for its money value at a reasonable commercial rate of interest, to either acquire or hold the lands.

That is, since a farmer under the definition of this bill and under its provisions could borrow money with which to purchase lands at not exceeding 3½ or 4 per cent it will make it unprofitable for those who are compelled to pay a commercial rate to buy lands for speculative purposes or, owning lands, to retain them as against the price one could afford to pay who is in a position to take advantage of the provisions of this bill, because under its provision, as I said, a farmer will be enabled to borrow money at not exceeding 3½ or 4 per cent, and therefore economic laws will force the lands out of the hands of those who hold them for investment or speculative purposes and into the hands of those who reside upon them and cultivate the soil. It will make owners of land out of the great army of men who are now the tillers of rented farms.

To procure a loan under the provisions of this bill all the machinery for its operation is local. The farmer desiring a loan would apply to his postmaster, who would appoint two committees of people residing in his community, and these committees would appraise the lands at their fair value, and the improvements would also be appraised at their fair value, but separately. These appraisements would be turned in to the postmaster, and the postmaster and the chairmen of the two committees would revise the appraisement and forward to the commission at Washington, and from that appraisement the amount to which the applicant is entitled would be determined. The title to the lands would be determined by an abstract furnished by the applicant and examined without cost by an agent of the Government. If the Torrens system of registration of land title prevailed, the certificate of the State is made, under this bill, sufficient evidence of title. Inasmuch as that system is so much cheaper and safer than abstracts and title guarantees, this bill would hasten the day when all States would adopt that system of land registration. The loans are to be guaranteed by the Government, though the Government would put no actual capital in the system. It guarantees the repayment of these loans as it guarantees the circulating medium of the national banks and Federal reserve notes. It does under this for the farmer only what it has done for the merchant, doctor, banker, lawyer, and manufacturer in the banking laws as they are now written. An applicant for a loan under the provisions of the bill does not name the rate of interest, but his securities are placed on the market and sold at par to the one who is willing to accept them at the lowest rate of interest, thereby putting the farmer in touch with trust funds and savings-bank accounts and all moneys that are seeking an absolutely safe long-time loan and would procure for the farmer as low rate of interest as the bonds of our Government command in any market of the world. Not only will it attract domestic capital, but foreign capital willing to invest in our Government bonds would be willing and anxious to invest in these securities and at the same rate of interest. In addition to the interest that the farmer will be compelled to pay, he will pay some per cent to be determined by the commissioners as an amortization fund, which fund will be a trust fund held in the Treasury, to be deposited in banks or loaned, as the commission may prescribe. The holders of the securities may cash their interest coupons at interest-paying dates at any post office or national bank in any State or Territory of these United States.

These funds are exempt from taxation in exactly the same way and for the same reason that the Federal reserve act exempts from taxation the resources of the regional and member banks. The security upon which the loan rests will have been taxed in the community where it is situated, and to tax the loan would be double taxation, and therefore increase the rate of interest the farmer would be compelled to pay.

The bill provides, further, that the loans shall be issued in series of 5, 10, 15, 20, 25, or 30 years, at the option of the borrower, but where a loan is for a period greater than five years the borrower has the right at any interest-paying period to pay the entire indebtedness or $100 or any multiple thereof, and on the sums so paid all interest payments will cease. The reason for making the amortization fund a common fund instead of an individual fund is to enable the Government, through the commissioners, to meet promptly any interest that may be due from any individual borrower or to pay any loan that may become due upon the date of its maturity. In the event default has been made the Government may seize the lands and to recover from the sale of the lands the money that the borrower has failed to pay at maturity.

Mr. JACOWAY. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. JACOWAY. In the event that contingency arose under the provisions of your bill, would it in any way handicap or hinder the man who held the coupon from going to the bank and getting the money on it?

Mr. CARAWAY. That is what I was trying to say. It would not. The plan provides the amortization fund shall be a common fund out of which any indebtedness owing by anyone of these borrowers may be paid. A creditor having an interest coupon, and the borrower failing to pay it, files his coupon with a national bank or first master and it is paid out of this common fund. The agent of the Government then seizes the land and has the equity of the borrower sold to reimburse this fund.

Mr. JACOWAY. Then all the burden of the foreclosure would fall upon the organization and not upon the man?

Mr. CARAWAY. It would be charged to the expense of administration and would not fall upon the individual who made the loan.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. How is the land seized? Arbitrarily or through court proceedings?

Mr. CARAWAY. Through court proceedings in the Federal court. It is seized in this way: All district attorneys are made to perform without additional pay the services in connection with the seizing and condemning and selling of lands. Complaints would be filed in court and decree entered as in other foreclosure proceedings. The provision is that the lands shall not be sold in the sense that the indebtedness existing upon them shall be paid. The court orders sold the equity of the borrower. Some one buys it and steps in and pays the amount of his default and assumes the obligation and continues the system.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. If the land when sold brings more than the indebtedness, the overplus is returned to the owner of the land?

Mr. CARAWAY. To the holder of the equity.

Mr. JACOWAY. And all the overhead charges—the charges that carry all this out—fall upon the Federal officials?

Mr. CARAWAY. Upon the system itself. The Federal officials, however, act without charge, and the foreclosure is without cost.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. In case of foreclosure, which I take it is the plan you have, foreclosure would be carried on under the law of the State wherein the loan might be made. Would the right of redemption remain the same?

Mr. CARAWAY. The right of redemption is fixed in the bill at one year.

Mr. McKENZIE. One year?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes, sir. I do not think it would be fair to deny the right of redemption to anyone who has been so unfortunate as to be unable to meet an interest payment.

Mr. McKENZIE. Would the exemptions provided for under the laws of the different States remain intact, or would you try to make this law superior to the laws of the respective States?

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not understand that in any State a man has any exemption right against a mortgage. The bill provides, if you will pardon me, that the indebtedness shall be secured by a mortgage executed by the borrower, and the party named therein as the payee shall be the agent and trustee of the Government, and the title will vest in him for the benefit of this common fund, this amortization fund.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. I will.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I understand the gentleman to say that the Government, the holder of the security, would step in and foreclose on the property at the default of one interest payment?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Would you dispossess the owner of the property for failure to make payment of one interest?

Mr. CARAWAY. If he does not pay, the Government can seize his property through a court proceeding. He has the right to pay during the pendency of the suit, and for one year after the property is sold to redeem.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Does not the gentleman think that that penalty is severe on one who has defaulted in the payment of a small interest?

Mr. CARAWAY. That is possibly true; but it is necessary to preserve this amortization fund in which every borrower has an interest, and we must repay it by some process if a borrower makes default.

Mr. McKENZIE. In case of sale by the Government where the land did not bring the amount loaned upon it, would the Government be a loser in that fund? How would you provide for that?

Mr. CARAWAY. The mutual fund created by the amortization of all the borrowers would be the loser. I can not concede, however, the possibility of the lands failing to sell for a sufficient sum to reimburse this fund for any payment which the commission may have been compelled to make out of it.

This plan, inasmuch as the security at all times will be ample, will enable the commissioners safely to pay the interest or the loan itself out of this common fund and as promptly as the interest is paid upon Government bonds. The Government guarantees all payments and pays all interest and principal out of the common fund, and therefore the creditor can have no interest in where the security upon which the loan is based may be situated. This will render the rate of interest the same in all sections and afford the farmer an equal opportunity to borrow in any State or Territory.

The bill provides further that if one holding lands shall transfer the title to some one who is not a bona fide farmer, all loans upon said lands are to become due and payable, or if one acquires lands upon which the loan is in excess of $5,000, the excess shall become due and payable. These provisions are in the bill for the purpose of making it impossible for a speculator to acquire large holdings of lands upon which these loans have been placed or to speculate in lands enjoying the low rate of interest procurable under the provisions of this bill.

When this bill shall have been enacted into law, and it will be, I hope, one carrying its main provisions, our farmers will have been freed from their bondage to banks, and the banks will have lifted from their shoulders the burden of caring for the farmers' credits, and each will have been set free to pursue unhampered the legitimate avenues of his individual and proper function. But not until then will it be possible for the great number of tenant farmers to become the owners of the lands they till and the American farmer once again come into his own—the proud owner of the lands his hands shall cultivate, the possessor of the wealth his industry shall create.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to have printed the bill I have introduced as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by including a copy of the bill to which he has been referring. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] is recognized.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have the privilege of extending my remarks in the RECORD in relation to the shipping bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in relation to the shipping bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to a great deal of the discussion on rural credits with considerable interest, and, at the same time, it seems to me that the agitation in regard to this subject throughout the country has been, to say the least of it, somewhat unfortunate. In some sections of the country the farmers have been practically told that miracles can be worked by a system of rural credits, that they will be released from bondage, and various other things of that sort, and that the earnings of a living, and even of large profits, will become a very simple and easy matter just as soon as a rural-credit system is established.

Of course all that is nonsense, and it seems to me that the party in power should have learned a little something from its experience with the Federal reserve act. We were told by the leader of the majority on the night the conference report was adopted on the Federal reserve act that the moment the bill was signed the wheels of industry would begin to hum, when there was not a line in that act calculated to start up the wheels of industry. And the President of the United States, when he signed the bill, said something very much of the same character, calling it a "charter of freedom," or something of that kind. There is a good deal in the act that would prevent a panic, but there is not anything in the act that would create a demand for goods, and that is what starts the wheels of industry.

Now, something can be done with a good system of rural credits. Something has been done with such systems in Europe. Nevertheless the farmers there have to work hard, and the farmers will have to work hard under any system of rural credits here. The only thing that can be done, in my opinion, is to make a farm mortgage a liquid asset, which will sell alongside of other high-grade securities, and can be put up at the banks as collateral for loans.

Let me read a few lines from the financial page of the New York Sun of this morning on "Money and exchange." I read:

MONEY AND EXCHANGE.

Commercial paper conditions were unaltered. Rates were 3½ and 4 per cent for 60 to 90 day bills, and for 4 to 6 months—best names; 4½ and 5 per cent for others.

Time money was unchanged. Rates were 2½ and 3 per cent for 60 and 90 days and 4 months; 3½ and 3½ per cent for longer maturities.

Call money on the floor of the stock exchange yesterday ruled at 2 per cent—high, 2 per cent; low, 1½ per cent.

Now, one thing that it was confidentially announced the Federal reserve act was going to do was to prevent Wall Street from having cheap money; and yet here, we see, with the Federal reserve bank in existence for two or three months that Wall Street still has altogether the cheapest money in the country. It has particularly cheap call money, and will continue to have it in ordinary times. "Time-money rates," which are also based on stock-exchange securities, you will notice, are a little lower than commercial-paper rates. The Federal reserve act has not yet made commercial rates lower than collateral rates, and it will not, in my opinion. But a rural-credit system could make farm mortgages as liquid as bonds and stocks, so that they could be easily borrowed on, and could pass from hand to hand. And that is all that it is necessary to do.

It seems to me that is what the Moss bill does. It will not perform miracles. It will not create at once a great system all over the country. It will have to grow naturally and be organized where people have got some capital to start it with. But if we should pass the Moss bill these institutions will be started and will extend to other localities.

I am a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency and of the rural-credits subcommittee, and I have given considerable study to the subject. I did a great deal of work in connection with preparing the Bulkley bill, but I think it is entirely wrong in its Government-aid features. I do not think Government aid is either wise or necessary. I think if we should pass a bill with Government aid in it it would simply have the result of raising the value of lands, so that the home-seeker, that we talk so much about here, if he got the money to buy, paying a lower rate of interest on it through Government aid, would have to make it up by paying a higher price. I think if we should enact a rural-credit bill of the right kind it would simply give farmers a better chance—the chance that many of the merchants now have—to borrow money on a little better terms than they have been borrowing on heretofore.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman two more minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield to him five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. There are, of course, lots of people in the country who have some capital who are willing to invest it in anything in the way of good security that pays 5 per cent and more who would be willing to invest it in good securities that would pay 5½ and 6 per cent interest.

Mr. PLATT. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MANN. Is there any way by which farm mortgages can be made so secure in the knowledge of the people who have money to invest that they will be willing to buy farm mortgages very generally in place of railroad bonds or municipal bonds at a reasonably low rate of interest? Of course I know that is done very largely now through private individuals——

Mr. PLATT. And guaranty associations——

Mr. MANN. Yes; and guaranty associations. But lots of people are not willing to trust the guaranty of a guaranty association, which guarantees an immense quantity of paper and which does not have very large capital. In other words, is there any way by which the Government can aid in practically insuring the security of a farm mortgage for some slight compensation, which will probably more than equal the losses?

Mr. PLATT. I am not sure whether there is any way by which the Government could guarantee the individual mortgage.

Mr. MANN. I do not ask the question as to whether the Government itself shall guarantee it, though that is to be considered; but is there any way by which, through legislation, we can provide that there shall be some form of guaranty which will insure the payment?

Mr. PLATT. The Government could establish an institution which would take farm mortgages, and have its own capital back of them, as well as the security of the farms, and issue bonds on the security of those mortgages and its own capital; and those bonds, I believe, would sell just as readily and at just as low interest rates as railroad bonds and other securities of that kind. They do in other countries, and there seems to be no reason why it should not be done here. It depends largely on the matter of appraisement. If an institution like a farm-mortgage bank of some kind is carefully managed and has its appraisement committees go to the farms and see that not too much is being loaned on them, the land ought to be the best security there is. If the loans are carefully made, it ought to be possible to make bonds secured in that way absolutely liquid and just as marketable as any other securities.

Mr. MANN. I should suppose that for a difference of one-half of 1 per cent, possibly less on the average, they could pay the cost of handling and also lay by an insurance fund, which would secure the payment of the mortgages, unless there was a case of universal bankruptcy; but I do not profess to know.

Mr. PLATT. I think that is a rather lower rates than has usually been paid for handling and guaranteeing and insuring.

Mr. MANN. I mean a difference of one-half of 1 per cent a year in the interest rate. Of course that would amount to 2½ per cent on a five-year loan and more on longer loans. I should think there would be a great many people who would be willing to buy farm mortgages on a basis of 5 per cent, where they draw 5½ per cent, if they could feel secure of the repayment of the principal in the end.

Mr. PLATT. I believe that is entirely true, but the bonds have the added advantage of being in uniform lots of $100 and $500 and $1,000.

Mr. MANN. I know, but they do not have any special security, and many people who would be willing to take a farm mortgage, secured upon a particular piece of ground, where they own the mortgage, might not be willing to take the bond of some company which may blow up, as 'most of them have blown up.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. PLATT. There might be a feeling on the part of a good many investors that they would like to know that there was a certain piece of ground back of their mortgage. If I am not very much mistaken, in Italy the savings banks actually do issue mortgages or mortgage bonds in uniform amounts of $100 or $500 or $1,000, each secured by a certain piece of property, and they guarantee those mortgages and put them on the market, and they sell at very low rates. It seems to me that is not an impossibility here, but at the same time I doubt whether it is the best way to handle a rural credit system. It seems to me a bank supervised by the Government can take farm mortgages and have its own capital back of them and issue bonds on them in such a way as to make the bonds entirely salable, and to give the farmers a lower rate of interest than they are getting at present. In general that is the plan of the Moss bill, and I do not see any reason why such institutions should not be organized all over the country.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back three minutes.

Mr. LEVER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss].

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I was much interested in the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and that is the reason that I have asked for time. I know that the gentleman from New York is a close student of this banking question; but I should also like to give an answer to the question which the gentleman from Illinois has asked. Mortgage credit, as the words "rural credit" usually define that term, is a well-organized scheme to insure land values to the lender of money. It is superimposing commercial capital upon definitely ascertained land values. Rural credit at its very best is simply a question of insurance, and the most perfect scheme of insurance is the best system of rural credit. You may take 100 farmers and let them mortgage their farms; 99 of them may be able upon every interest day to meet their obligations, but one of them may not be able to do so. Hence there is a hesitancy about purchasing real estate mortgages for fear that the purchaser would get the one on which the borrower would not be able to meet his obligation. This difficulty is sought to be overcome by creating an organization and permitting it to hold the 100 mortgages and pledging its own capital, or a certain proportion of it, to guarantee the prompt payment of all contract obligations. It is thus made entirely possible for a person to invest his money in farm mortgages and to be absolutely certain of payment at the hour and the minute when the obligation falls due. You have thus the best security in the world, because you have, first, the security of land values, which have been carefully and accurately appraised; second, you have secured the judgment of an association organized and supervised under the law, which is usually officered by men of large business experience; third, the cash capital and reserves which are made a trust fund under the law to meet any default in payments by the debtors; and, finally, the liability of the stockholders, which is usually equal to the cash capital. In this manner all risk is eliminated absolutely. The natural result is to give to such security the lowest rate of interest that obtains in the investment world. By exempting these credit instruments and the capital, which is held as a surety fund, from taxation, a further reduction in interest rates is made possible.

So, after all, then, the question of rural credits is simply a question of mutual insurance; or if it is not mutual, then it is an insurance by men who are trained in investment banking and who are willing to put up their own money as security to those who may become their clients by purchasing their securities. The question asked by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] goes right to the center of the question of rural credits. It is, after all, a question of 100 or 1,000 or 100,000 men who desire to lend and to borrow coming together through a central association and by eliminating the weakness of any one of their number give strength to all. This is possible because agriculture is the one undertaking among men that must be successful or civilization must cease. If this work of organization be well performed failure is impossible. Therefore Government aid is not necessary and in the end can not be effective. I am glad to be permitted to offer this reply to the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], which, in my opinion, goes to the very center of the subject. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS].

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY].

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD on rural credits.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] 10 minutes.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, on the 11th day of this month our former colleague, Mr. Willis, was inaugurated governor of Ohio. In the course of his first official message to the Legislature of Ohio he used the following language:

> No doubt the secretary of state will have important recommendations to make touching amendment of the election laws. At this time I desire only to suggest for your consideration the advisability of providing by legislation for a system of registering and voting by mail. Such a law must be most carefully drawn in order to prevent fraud and preserve the purity of the ballot. Its enactment would preserve the right of franchise to thousands of our voters who now by the exigencies of their vocations are prevented from registering and voting. In this connection I also recommend that the so-called students' voting law providing for the disfranchisement of students, once vetoed by Gov. Harmon, but subsequently placed on the statute books, be repealed. Ohio can not afford to place a penalty on desire for knowledge.

I think the question of absentee voting is a question in which every Member of this House must be greatly interested, not only because it concerns very directly his own convenience and comfort, but also because of the tremendous importance that the thousands of uncast votes have or may have on the result of every election in each State of the Union.

As some Members of this House know, certain progressive States have already adopted legislation permitting voting by mail when any voter is necessarily away from his usual voting place on election day. I do not know just how many States in the Union there are that have such laws, but some of the Members of the House may be able to extend my list of such States. Such testimony as there is upon the matter points definitely to the conviction that such a law is working well and is likely to work well wherever it has been or is being tried. There are only four States that I actually know of where this legislation is now on the statute books. These are Kansas, Nebraska, Missouri, and North Dakota.

I took occasion within a few weeks to write to the secretary of state of each of these States to get his opinion upon the working of the law in his State. Secretary of State Roach, of Missouri, wrote me that he believed that the central thought in the Missouri law was meritorious, although there was a distinct weakness in the details of the bill, which would undoubtedly have to be corrected at an early session of the legislature.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I will.

Mr. BOOHER. I want to say that the Missouri law did not provide for registration by mail. The legislature now in session is working on a bill to correct the weakness of the present law and to extend registration by mail.

Mr. ROGERS. Is it not a fact that there was a joker in the law, so that it applied only to St. Louis County?

Mr. BOOHER. No; it applies to the whole State. There was some talk at one time that it only applied to the city, but it applies to the whole State. In my county, with a city of only 3,000 people, several citizens voted who could not come home to vote.

Mr. ROGERS. Does the gentleman care to express an opinion as to how the law is working?

Mr. BOOHER. If it is perfected, it will work admirably. It is a good law and ought to be enacted by every State, so that a man away from home can vote if he wishes.

Mr. ROGERS. Secretary of State Hall, of the State of North Dakota, writes:

> From every source we have received indications that the law has been very successful in its working, and the approval of the press has been general. It franchised a great number of voters who would otherwise have been deprived of the right to vote, and there have yet appeared no opportunities for fraud or illegal voting in its use.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I desire to add to the words of the secretary of state of North Dakota that he is a man who has been in public life for a long time and for many years was a newspaper man. Mr. Hall is a very thoughtful student of questions of this character. We have had two elections under this law—one the primary election of June last, and the other the general election in November. I have yet to hear a single criticism of the law; it has worked perfectly.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. POWERS. May I inquire of the gentleman what power would Congress have to enact laws along the line suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. ROGERS. I am not advocating a Federal law at all; I am simply putting before the House certain facts which I have collected bearing on the working out by certain enlightened States of the problem here involved. I do this for this reason: Although it is essentially a State and not a Federal matter, as far as legislation goes, nevertheless it is a matter in which every Member of Congress should be preeminently interested to see that it is worked out effectively in his own State. [Applause.]

I wrote also to the secretary of state of Kansas, but he apparently did not care to express his opinion as to the working of the law. Such conversations as I have had, however, with the Members of Congress from that State on the floor would indicate that the Kansas law also has received general approval.

The secretary of state of Michigan writes me that the State adopted last November an amendment to the constitution providing that students, while attending college, and commercial travelers shall not be deprived of their votes by reason of absence from their home precincts. Secretary of State Martindale, of Michigan, whose opinion is confirmed by Michigan Members of this body, writes me that "undoubtedly an enabling statute will be passed at the coming session of the legislature, which will convene January 6." That was written just before the legislature actually convened.

A good many people, without much accurate knowledge of what the proposal really involves, seem to feel that this law represents the fanatical and wild notions of a few men, and, while perhaps all right in theory, is one which could not, and would not, work out well in practice. I refer at this length to States that already have the law, where it is working well, to show that measures of this kind are not the dreams of reformers, but are, in at least four States, an accomplished fact, doing effective and salutary service.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I have heard statements made in respect to the law which the gentleman refers to that in order to prevent fraud it is necessary to lay so many safeguards around the votes by mail that it is practically a dead letter. Has the gentleman any information in regard to that?

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, none of the replies which I have received has revealed the number of actual votes cast under these laws. I do not know whether or not the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] can give us any enlightenment on that point. He has given me a set of North Dakota absentee ballots and documents which he obtained last November, at a time when he expected to be away from his home precinct on election day, and I have looked through those with some care. It did not seem to me that they were especially complex or beyond the ready intelligence of the ordinary voter. I should expect that they would represent, in a general way, at least, the form which would be adopted in the various States which will pass on this law in the immediate future.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, it is a very simple proceeding. Any voter can write a postal card to the county auditor and say that he wants an absent voter's ballot; then the auditor sends him the ballot and gives him instructions how to use it.

Mr. ANDERSON. The voter does not have to go before a notary public?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Oh, yes; but to initiate the matter is a very simple thing. All he has to do is to write a letter or a postal card saying that he wants the vote, and then he gets the instructions, which he can take to the notary, and the notary can comply with them.

Mr. ROGERS. Complaint is often made by people who have not looked into this type of measure that it will result in uncertainty of elections; that the result of the election will not be known at once, because these ballots must get back from wherever the absent voter is at the moment, so that they will be delayed in reaching the polling place. So far as I know, however, it is always required in the law that the ballot shall be in the hands of the proper election official at a moment not later than the closing of the polls on election day. Of course that is necessary, because we can not have a stream of ballots trickling in for days after the election is over and, in a close election, very likely changing the result half a dozen times.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. I will ask the gentleman to yield me five minutes more.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. I wanted to ask one question. One of the ways of perpetrating election fraud is for a man to take a false name and register the name of a man who does not exist or falsely personate another man. Elections are often very close. For instance, a Member of Congress in the city of Buffalo once was defeated by one vote. What would be the great difficulty in 10, or a dozen, or 15, or 20, or 30, or 40 men making false affidavits in other States and sending them in, in form strictly in accord with the requirements of the statutes of the State in which the election is held, these affidavits and votes getting into the polls before the polls are closed, each of them a forgery, with no one there competent to say that they are forgeries or that there is false personation involved? You might not discover the fact of this false personation or fraud for a month or six weeks after the election, after the result has been announced.

Mr. ROGERS. Is it not an answer to the suggestion of the gentleman that precisely the same condition is possible, and I fear in some cases probable, under the present system? There are false personations, we all know, occasionally. Men sometimes vote on dead men's names. As a matter of human probability, however, would the percentage of fraud be greater than to-day, even assuming that it is theoretically possible under an absentee voting provision? It is undoubtedly possible now under the present system. Perhaps the requirement that a photograph of the absent voter should accompany the ballot might reduce the danger. That is to-day the rule of the State Department in issuing passports.

Mr. COOPER. I do not know what the possibilities of the two systems are, but where there is false personation, with the modern system of registration so thoroughly understood and political organization becoming so perfect, with a list of voters in each precinct, the records can be easily looked up and the name of the man ascertained in a case that looks suspicious. A voter gives a place of residence, and with the telephone system it takes only a fraction of a minute under a well-organized political system to find out whether any such man lives there or not; but if these men make affidavit at a distance of a thousand miles or two thousand miles in a community that does not know them, and the affidavit and votes are sent in by mail, the men at the polling booth could not tell anything about it.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I just want to suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin that there is a man in Louisville who told me he voted 157 times in one election down there.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to one or two more points. As I said a moment ago, it is sometimes suggested that this is a revolutionary doctrine. I wonder if the membership of this House generally realizes that during the Civil War in practically every Northern State of the Union absentee voting was legalized for soldiers and sailors in the service of the United States. At least 16 Northern States of the United States had a law of this kind, and proxy voting, so called, has been common in the United States from early colonial times, especially in the States of New England.

A very interesting article appeared in the December or January Harper's Magazine, setting forth from the diary of John Hay certain hitherto unpublished reminiscences of his service as Secretary to President Lincoln. John Hay describes in his diary how, in the election of 1864, he and Mr. Lincoln sat together in the White House and watched the returns coming in by State groups from the various Union armies in the field. I refer to this incident simply to illustrate how well-established the practice which is sought in this legislation is in the history of the United States.

Of course, I can not give any accurate estimate of how many men in the United States as a whole would be potentially enfranchised as a result of this legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. ROGERS. I have, however, prepared an estimate of those who to-day are or may be disfranchised in Massachusetts, because of the nature of their occupations. Such men, for example, as actors, commercial travelers, students in higher institutions of learning, civil-service employees, and so forth. I find that there are 80,000 men in Massachusetts alone who are engaged in occupations such as these who are likely, because of absence from their homes on election day, to be disfranchised.

Of course, I do not claim that all of these 80,000 men will in fact be disfranchised under the present system, but it is safe to say that at least 25 per cent of them will be so prevented by absence from voting. Hence, in the State of Massachusetts alone, my best judgment is that there will be upward of 20,000 voters enfranchised as a result of enabling legislation of this character. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. ANDERSON. I understand the traveling men are advocating a change of the day of election from Tuesday to Monday.

Mr. ROGERS. Yes; that is true in Massachusetts.

Mr. ANDERSON. Does not the gentleman think that will probably reach all of those persons of our populations, and do it with less danger of fraud?

Mr. ROGERS. I think it will care for only a very small portion; but of course that is a matter on which the gentleman's opinion is just as good as mine.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. The Australian ballot system obtains in most of the States in a somewhat modified form. In that way the voter is protected and the world does not know how he votes nor the election officer. Now, under this system would not his vote be known, a matter which heretofore was a matter of privacy to him alone?

Mr. ROGERS. No; because these ballots must be dropped in the ballot box just like any other ballots. No one is going to know, in a given case, whose ballot it is or what the contents of the ballot are.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. I supposed that the officials would see the way the man voted.

Mr. ROGERS. I understand not. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROGERS. On the 12th day of January I introduced into the General Court of Massachusetts a resolution calling for the creation of a commission to consider in all its aspects the question of absentee voting. I herewith quote in full the resolution:

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, 1915.

A resolution to provide for the creation of a commission to consider the feasibility and desirability of permitting, under suitable safeguards, restrictions, and conditions, absentee voting in the elections of the Commonwealth.

Be it resolved by the senate and house of representatives, in general court assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

Resolved, That a commission, consisting of the secretary of state of the Commonwealth, the attorney general of the Commonwealth, and the chairman of the State ballot-law commission and State board of voting-machine examiners of the Commonwealth, shall consider the feasibility and desirability of legislation which shall permit, under suitable safeguards, restrictions, and conditions, absentee voting in the elections of the Commonwealth, such commission to report its findings and to submit to the general court a draft of a proposed bill or, if it deem it necessary, of a constitutional amendment, permitting such absentee voting, not later than the second Wednesday in January, 1916.

On the very day I thus introduced this measure into the Massachusetts Legislature our former colleague, Frank B. Willis, who had tendered his resignation from this body but three days before, was reading to the Ohio Legislature his first message as governor of that great State and was making use of the language relative to absentee voting which I quoted at the beginning of my remarks.

What is this absentee voting and precisely what does it seek to accomplish?

The opinion is rapidly growing in the United States that there is neither justice nor excuse for the present virtual disfranchisement of hundreds of thousands of voters because their occupations oblige them to be absent from their legal residence on election day. To remedy this situation, a number of progressive States have already enacted what is known as an absentee voting law—that is, a law which permits, under suitable safeguards to prevent fraud, error, or delay, a voter, who for business reasons is unable to cast his vote in the usual way, to be duly and legally recorded.

Perhaps enough has already been said to indicate that such a measure is by no means a theoretical one, but that it is in use in several States to-day and is meeting the undoubted approval of those familiar with it.

There is, as I have said, nothing revolutionary in the idea of absentee voting. During the Civil War, as I shall presently show in greater detail, at least 16 of the Northern States of the Union enacted laws enabling qualified voters engaged in military service of the State or of the United States to cast their votes even though absent from their States. Proxy voting was common in Massachusetts and the rest of New England from early colonial times.

It can not be asserted that the evil sought to be remedied is a slight or a fanciful one. Hundreds of thousands of qualified citizens of the United States who desire to vote are annually unable so to do, because of their necessary absence from their homes on election day. Take the State of Massachusetts alone—probably twenty or thirty thousand qualified voters are thus virtually disfranchised at every State-wide election. I have assembled, mainly from the 1910 Census of the United States, a list of occupations engaged in by Massachusetts men and likely to entail their absence from home on a given date. This list follows.

Fishermen and oystermen	5,946
Lumbermen and raftsmen	949
Locomotive engineers	2,082
Locomotive firemen	1,552
Conductors (steam railroad)	1,887
Canvassers	537
Brakemen	2,944
Commercial brokers and commission men	927
Commercial travelers	9,474
Soldiers, sailors, and marines	2,519
Showmen	677
Actors	673
Sailors and deck hands	1,707
Captains, mates, masters, and pilots	1,181
Civil-service employees in District of Columbia alone	852
Total	33,907

There are, of course, many other occupations which may well entail absence from home on election day, some of which are—

Cranberry bog pickers	1,129
Farm laborers (working out)	21,976
Quarry operatives	2,192
Building contractors	8,778
Structural ironworkers	585
Chauffeurs	4,428
Students (registered in higher institutions of learning all over the United States)	8,249
Total	47,337

In addition to those enumerated in the foregoing tables there are many in other occupations whose duty or pleasure may result in absence from home on election day—Senators and Members of Congress, noncivil-service Government employees, travelers for pleasure, and so on.

As previously stated, I do not contend that all the upward of 80,000 above specifically enumerated are deprived by the present system of voting of their right to cast the ballot; many of them undoubtedly find themselves able to vote in the ordinary way, others are not registered voters at all, and still others are under 21 years of age. Nevertheless, it would seem that 25 per cent, or about 20,000, was a very conservative estimate of those excluded from the privilege of voting. In all probability the number would far exceed this suggested minimum. In addition to those who are actually disfranchised there are many others who, often at a very considerable sacrifice of time and money, are in the habit of going from whatever place they find themselves to the place of their legal residence for the single purpose of casting their vote on election day. There seems no good reason why good citizens like these should be so heavily penalized.

I think I need not further emphasize the inherent right and importance that these thousands of citizens should be given the privilege of the ballot. The remedy proposed is simple, inexpensive, practical, and just. It seems to me clear that it should be adopted.

It is doubtless true, as Gov. Willis points out to the Ohio Legislature, that any such law must be most carefully drawn in order to prevent fraud and to preserve the purity of the ballot. It is almost equally important that whatever law is enacted should require that the ballot of every absentee voter be in the hands of the election officers of his usual voting place at an hour not later than the closing of the polls on election day. Obviously it would be neither wise nor practicable to have the result in a close election kept uncertain, perhaps for days, while a stream of "absentee ballots" was dribbling in. These points, while of great importance, are, after all, but matters of detail in connection with the drafting of the measure.

In view of the underlying legal questions, of the possibility that a State constitutional amendment may be necessary, and of the fact that this being a highly technical matter, it is important that the enabling legislation be carefully and accurately drawn, I am suggesting the appointment of an unpaid commission to investigate the whole matter and report to the Massachusetts Legislature of 1916, this commission to consist of the secretary of state, the attorney general, and the chairman of the ballot law commission.

I append a list recently furnished me by the Commissioner of Education of the United States, showing residence of students of Massachusetts who are attending the specified higher institutions of learning.

Students, resident of the State of Massachusetts, registered in educational institutions.

Massachusetts Agricultural College, Amherst, Mass	499
Amherst College, Amherst, Mass	141
Boston University, Boston, Mass	1,020
Boston College, Chestnut Hill, Mass	384
Brown University, Providence, R. I	163
Catholic University of America, Washington, D. C	32
University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill	39
Clark University, Worcester, Mass	24
Clark College, Worcester, Mass	110
Columbia University, New York City	89
Cornell University, Ithaca, N. Y	80
Dartmouth College, Hanover, N. H	469
Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass	2,068
Holy Cross College, Worcester, Mass	313
University of Illinois, Urbana, Ill	21
Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Boston, Mass	953
University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, Mich	36
Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute, Troy, N. Y	22
Rhode Island State College, Kingston, R. I	36
University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, Pa	73
Trinity College, Hartford, Conn	8
Tufts College, Tufts College, Mass	732
Wesleyan University, Middletown, Conn	46
Williams College, Williamstown, Mass	188
Worcester Polytechnic Institute, Worcester, Mass	350
Yale University, New Haven, Conn	207
Georgetown University, Washington, D. C	109
George Washington University, Washington, D. C	37
Total	8,249

The North Dakota absentee-voters' law, which may be taken as typical, is as follows:

ABSENT-VOTERS' ACT.

(Chap. 155, Laws 1913.)

An act to provide a method of voting at any general or primary election by electors absent or anticipating being absent on the day of such election from the county in which they are electors.

SECTION 1 (Absent voter who may vote). Any qualified elector of this State, having complied with the laws in regard to registration, who is absent from the county of which he is an elector on the day of holding any general or primary election, may vote at any such election as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2 (Application for ballots, made when). At any time within 30 days next preceding such election, any voter expecting to be absent on the day of such election from the county in which his voting precinct is situated may make application to the county auditor of such county for an official absent-voter ballot, to be voted at such election.

SEC. 3 (Absent-voter ballots, how printed). For all elections, either general or primary, there shall be prepared and printed for each precinct official ballots, to be known as absent-voter ballots, which ballots shall be prepared and printed in the same form and shall be of the same size and texture as the regular official ballots, except that they shall be printed upon tinted paper of a tint different than that of the sample ballots.

SEC. 4 (Absent-voter ballot, form of application for). Application for such ballot shall be made on a blank to be furnished by the county auditor of the county of which the applicant is an elector, and shall be in substantially the following form:

I, ———— ————, a duly qualified elector of the township of ————, village of ————, or of the ———— precinct of the ———— ward, of the city of ————, in the county of ————, and State of North Dakota, and, to my best knowledge and belief, entitled to vote in such precinct at the next election, expecting to be absent from the said county on the day for holding such election, hereby make application for an official absent-voter ballot to be voted by me at such election.

Date, ————. (Signed) ————. Post-office address, ————.

Provided, That if the application be made for a primary election ballot such application shall also give the name of the political party with which the applicant is affiliated.

SEC. 5 (Application blank, how obtained). Such application blank shall, upon request therefor, be sent by such county auditor to any absent voter by mail, and shall be delivered to any voter upon application made personally at the office of such auditor.

SEC. 6 (Ballots sent, how; affidavit of voter and certificate). Upon receipt of such application properly filled out and duly signed, or as soon thereafter as the official absent-voter ballot for the precinct in which the applicant resides has been printed, the said county auditor shall send to such absent voter by mail, postage prepaid, one official absent-voter ballot, of (or) if there be more than one such absent-voter ballot to be voted by an elector of such precinct, one of each kind, and shall inclose with such ballot or ballots an envelope to be furnished by such auditor; which envelope shall bear upon the front thereof the name, official title, and post-office address of such county auditor, and upon the other side a printed affidavit in substantially the following form:

STATE OF ————, county of ————, ss:

I, ————, do solemnly swear that I am a resident of the township of ————, or the village of ————, residing at ———— in said city, county of ————, and State of North Dakota, and entitled to vote in such precinct at the next election; that I expect to be absent from said county of my residence on the day of holding such election, and that I will have no opportunity to vote in person on that day.

———— ————.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this —— day of ————, 19—; and I hereby certify that the affiant exhibited the inclosed ballots to me unmarked; that he then, in my presence and in the presence of no other person, and in such manner that I could not see his vote, marked such ballot and inclosed and sealed the same in this envelope; that the applicant was not solicited or advised by me to vote for or against any candidate or measure.

———— ————.
———— ————.

Provided, That if the ballot inclosed is to be voted at a primary election the affidavit shall state the name of the political party with which the absent voter is affiliated.

NOTE.—If such absent voter is unable to sign his name, he shall make his mark (X), and the officer taking such affidavit shall sign such voter's name and shall state the reason for such affidavit being signed in such manner in his certificate attached to such affidavit.

SEC. 7 (Manner of marking ballot). Such absent voter shall make and subscribe the said affidavit before an officer authorized by law to administer oaths and who has an official seal, and such absent voter shall thereupon, in the presence of such officer and no other person, mark such ballot or ballots, but in such manner that such officer can not see the vote, and such ballot or ballots shall thereupon, in the presence of such officer, be folded by such voter so that each ballot shall be separate and so as to conceal the vote, and be in the presence of such officer deposited by said voter in said envelope and the said envelope securely sealed. Said envelope shall be mailed by such absent voter, postage prepaid.

SEC. 8 (Care of ballot by auditor). Upon receipt of such envelope such county auditor shall forthwith inclose the same, unopened, together with the written application of such absent voter, in a larger envelope, which shall be securely sealed and indorsed with the name of the proper voting precinct, the name and official title of such auditor, and the words, "This envelope contains an absent voter's ballot and must be opened only on election day at the polls while the same are open," and such auditor shall thereafter safely keep the same in his office until the same is delivered by him as provided in the next section.

SEC. 9 (Transmission of ballot to election inspector). In case such envelope is received by such auditor prior to the delivery of the sealed package containing the official ballots to the inspector of elections of the precinct in which such absent voter resides, such ballot, envelope, and application sealed in such envelope shall be inclosed in such package and delivered therewith to the inspector of such precinct. In case the official ballots for such precinct shall have been delivered to such inspector of elections at the time of the receipt by the auditor of such absent-voter ballot, such auditor shall immediately inclose such application and such ballot with the envelope containing such ballot, unopened, in a larger envelope, which shall be securely sealed by him and indorsed on the front with the name, official title, name of precinct, and post-office address of the inspector of elections of the precinct in which such absent voter resides, and the words, "This envelope contains an absent-voter ballot and must be opened only on election day at the polls while the same are open," and forthwith mail the same, postage prepaid, to such inspector of elections.

SEC. 10 (Manner of voting; void or rejected ballots). At any time between the opening and closing of the polls on such election day the inspector or judges of election of such precinct shall first open the outer envelope only and compare the signature of such voter to such application with the signature to such affidavit. In case the judges find the affidavit is sufficient and that the signatures correspond and that the applicant is then a duly qualified elector of such precinct and has not voted at such election, they shall open the absent-voter envelope in such manner as not to destroy the affidavit thereon and take out the ballot or ballots therein contained, and without unfolding the same or permitting the same to be opened or examined, and having indorsed the same in like manner that other ballots are indorsed, deposit the same in the proper ballot box or boxes, showing by the records of such election such elector to have voted. In case such affidavit is found to be insufficient, or that the said signatures do not correspond, or that such applicant is not then a duly qualified elector of such precinct, such vote shall not be allowed, but without opening the absent-voter envelope, the election inspector or judge of such election shall mark across the face thereof, "Rejected as defective" or "Rejected as not an elector," as the case may be. The absent-voter envelope, when such absent vote is voted, and the absent-voter envelope, with its contents, unopened, when such absent vote is rejected, shall be deposited in the ballot box containing the general or party ballots, as the case may be, retained and preserved in the manner as now by law provided for the retention and preservation of official ballots voted at such election.

SEC. 11 (Elector may vote before leaving county). The provisions of this act shall be construed so as to permit any qualified elector of this State who is present in this (his) county after the official absent-voter ballots of such county have been printed, and who has reason to believe that he will be absent from such county on election day as before provided in section 2, to vote before he leaves his county, in like manner as absent voter, and any qualified elector who has marked his ballot as hereinbefore provided, who shall unexpectedly return to his precinct before or on election day, shall be permitted to vote in person, provided his ballot has not already been deposited in the ballot box.

SEC. 12 (Ballots furnished auditor, when). It shall be the duty of the secretary of state, county auditor, or any other officer by law required to prepare any general or primary election ballot, to prepare and have printed and delivered to the county auditor, at least 15 days prior to the holding of such election, a sufficient number of absent-voter ballots provided for in section 5, for the use of all voters likely to be absent from such county on the day of such election.

SEC. 13 (Penalty for violations). If any person shall willfully swear falsely to the affidavit in section 6 provided for, he shall, upon conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of perjury and shall be punished as in such case by law provided. If the secretary of state or any county auditor or any election officer shall refuse or neglect to perform any of the duties prescribed by this act, or shall violate any of the provisions thereof, or if any officer taking the affidavit provided for in section 6 shall make any false statement in his certificate thereto attached, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $100 or by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding 30 days, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Approved March 12, 1913.

The front of the North Dakota absentee voter's ballot envelope reads as follows:

[Copy.]

ABSENT VOTER'S BALLOT ENVELOPE.

To ——— ———,
County auditor of ——— County,
——— ———, North Dakota.

The back of the envelope reads as follows:

[Copy.]

STATE OF ———, County of ———, ss:

I, ——— ———, do solemnly swear that I am a resident of ——— precinct, township of ———, village of ———, the ——— precinct of the ——— ward, in the city of ———, residing at ——— in said city, county of ———, State of North Dakota, and entitled to vote in such precinct at the next general election, November 3, 1914; that I expect to be absent from the said county of my residence on the day of holding such election; and that I will have no opportunity to vote in person on that day.

(Sign here.) ——— ———.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this ——— day of ——, 1914; and I hereby certify that the affiant exhibited the inclosed ballots to me unmarked, that he then, in my presence and in the presence of no other person, and in such manner that I could not see his vote, marked such ballots, and inclosed and sealed the same in this envelope. That the affiant was not solicited or advised by me to vote for or against any candidate or measure.

———.
———.

During the Civil War the States named below enacted laws enabling qualified voters engaged in military service of the State or of the United States to cast their votes even when absent from their States.

The second column gives the reference to the volume of the session laws for each State in which such enactment is found. The third column indicates whether or not these laws are still in force; if so, reference to the latest revision of the State laws is given.

State.	Laws.	Remarks.
California	Laws 1863-64, ch. 383	Not found in Deering's Gen. Laws 1909.
Connecticut	Laws 1864, May, ch. 37	Limited to the Civil War.
Illinois	Laws 1865, pp. 59-63	Not found in Hurd's R. S. 1913.
Iowa	Laws 1862, extra sess., ch. 29, sec. 30; amended by Laws 1864, ch. 28.	Not found in Annot. Code 1897.
Kansas	Laws 1865, ch. 59	Still in force in Dassler's Gen. S. 1909, 3154-3165.
Kentucky	Laws 1863-64, ch. 572	Repealed in Laws 1865-66, ch. 370.
Maine	Laws 1864, ch. 278	Not found in Rev. St. 1903.
Maryland	Laws 1865, ch. 124	Not found in Bagby's Annot. Code 1911.
Michigan	Laws 1864, Feb., extra sess., No. 21, pp. 40-52.	Not found in Howell's Annot. St. 1912.
New Hampshire	Laws 1864, ch. 4030	Not found in Public St. and Sess. Laws in force 1913.
New York	Laws 1864, ch. 253; repealed by being replaced by Laws 1865, ch. 570.	Repealed entirely by laws 1866, ch. 524.
Ohio	Laws 1863, 2d sess., pp. 80-85.	Not found in Page & Adams Annot. Ohio Gen. Code 1910.
Pennsylvania	Laws 1864, extra sess., pp. 43-52.	Still in force in Purdon's Digest 1903.
Tennessee	Laws 1865, 1st sess., ch. 16, sec. 5.	Not found in Shannon's Code 1896.
Vermont	Laws 1863, No. 5; amended by Laws 1864, No. 8.	Declared unconstitutional in re Opinion of the Judges, 37 Vt., 665.
Wisconsin	Laws 1862, extra sess., ch. 11; amended in Laws 1863, regular sess., ch. 59; again amended by 1865, regular sess., ch. 88.	Not found in Wisconsin Statutes 1913.

In Massachusetts a resolve was adopted in May, 1865, which referred to the next general court a proposal to amend the State constitution to secure the elective franchise to voters of the Commonwealth absent therefrom in the military or naval service of the United States (Acts and Resolves, 1865, p. 695); but apparently this was not agreed to by the next general court, for it is not found in the acts and resolves for the following year.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WHITACRE]. [Applause].

Mr. WHITACRE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to a resolution introduced by Mr. MANN (No. 688) and a bill introduced by him, providing for a tariff commission. I am speaking as a Democrat from the State of Ohio, where there is a newspaper in every house every day—and read; where a man must show some reason for voting the Democratic or Republican ticket—some other reason than the fact he was born a Democrat or born a Republican. The people of Ohio are independent in politics. In 1905 the Republicans were dissatisfied with their candidate for governor, and they joined with the Democrats and elected a Democratic governor, and all the balance of the ticket was Republican. In 1908, again, the Republicans were dissatisfied with their candidate for governor and with their candidate for State treasurer. They joined with the Democrats, defeated their candidate for governor and their candidate for State treasurer, and elected all the Republican ticket, including Mr. Taft. In 1914 the Democrats had their chance to prove their independence. Many thousands of them were dissatisfied with their candidate for governor, and they joined with the Republicans and elected Mr. Willis, late a Member of this House. [Applause.] In one of the districts, represented by Mr. ASHBROOK, he carried the district by eight thousand and some odd, and Gov. Willis carried the district by 3,300, showing that Democrats of that district were independent politically. So that I am maintaining the proposition that the people of Ohio must be shown and can be shown, and when they are shown in the right way they are willing to follow any political party. Now, I call attention to the first paragraph of Mr. MANN's resolution 688:

Whereas the Democratic free-trade tariff law refused to give due protection to American industries and brought hard times upon the country, which caused an industrial depression such as has not existed since the free-trade days of President Cleveland.

That is the first paragraph of Mr. MANN's resolution. Along the same line and voicing the same sentiment I read an interview published in the New York Times the first Sunday of this month with Judge Gary, who is the head of the Steel Corporation, in which he said:

I can only judge conditions relative to other losses of business by conditions which apply to our own. In 1913 our employees numbered 246,000. At the present time they number only 150,000, notwithstanding we are using every reasonable effort to keep the largest number possible at work by cleaning up our plants, making repairs, and doing other work which would not be done to the same extent at this time except for the peculiar conditions of our men.

And again he says:

It is claimed by many, and it may be true, that business can be accustomed and adjusted to extreme changes in legislation, and it is to be hoped that we may become prosperous even with the law as it now stands.

Referring to the tariff law:

It is, however, certain that business has been depressed during the last year, hundreds of thousands of men have become idle, and that among big business men generally the reasons I have given are some of the influential factors in bringing about these conditions.

Now, in my home town, Canton, Ohio, two weeks ago 500 steel workers were brought together by the superintendent of the plant and they were told by Mr. Cline, the superintendent:

That as the men are paid at present, the new scale will mean a cut of about 14 per cent in wages.

Supt. Cline told the men of the depression in the iron business all over the country, and said that if the men did not care to accept the new scale the mills would close down for the present, for there was enough stock on hand to last a long time. On yesterday Mr. Perkins testified before the Industrial Commission in New York and gave expression to this thought in these words:

Just now for the first time in the history of the corporation we have no profits to divide. The men know it, and so far there has been no complaint. The men know the tariff is responsible for this condition and that we'll not continue under our present tariff.

You hold the tariff responsible for the depression in the steel industry?

Yes; and for a large part of the general depression throughout the country.

Why do you think we will not continue under our present tariff?

Because I believe we are bound to come to a tariff worked out on a scientific basis.

When a man like Judge Gary states the fact, when we have conditions like these existing in Canton, Ohio, in the steel business, it is time for the Democrats to take notice that it is a condition and not a theory which confronts them.

And, of course, in the language of Mr. Perkins and in the language of all Republican orators and politicians, some statesmen, and some near statesmen, it is all on account of the tariff. Here are the Democrats tinkering with the tariff. Here are the men out of work. Post hoc, ergo propter hoc—after this, therefore on account of this. You can not argue with a man on a street corner or in a hall when a third or a fourth or one-half of men are out of work. Men are moved by conditions and not by ideas, and the fact of the depression in business following the tariff law is conclusive in their minds. Judge Gary offers another reason, to which I desire to direct your attention for the purpose of proving to you something that I could not prove to men out of work, that the tariff is not really the cause of the present depression in business. Judge Gary says, in that same interview:

Rightfully or wrongfully capital has become impressed with the idea that business is not receiving and could not expect to receive fair treatment. It is a common thing for men of large means to discuss these things, and almost invariably the statement was made that until public sentiment forced the change in the attitude mentioned of antagonism to capital and men in business capital would be withheld from investment in enterprises calculated to restore business.

Now, on the same day that this Gary interview was published, in the same paper was published an interview with Mr.

Forgan, the head of the First National Bank of Chicago, and the present head of the National Reserve Board, in which he made this statement:

Bankers should continue to conserve their resources until the ultimate effect—

Referring to the war in Europe—on American securities is fully realized. Nothing could be more unsound than to attempt to boom domestic industry by undue expansion of credit until we find out what may be required of us in caring for our foreign indebtedness and for our securities which may be thrown on our home market. I do not mean by this that we should not proceed with business in the normal way and take advantage of our opportunities as they arrive. It will, however—

Coming from Mr. Forgan, every banker in the country will take notice—

It will, however, be prudent on the part of the banks to conserve their strength and husband their resources under the present world-wide conditions.

In the January issue of United States Securities and Government Finances, issued by the National City Bank of New York, I find this paragraph:

Over against these encouraging conditions, there looms up the European situation. No calculations for the future can be made without regard for the influence of the war, and as there is no knowing how long the war will last, large undertakings, which involve public financing, and commitments for the future are not likely to be begun. Moreover, it will have to be an exceptionally promising new enterprise that can make a stronger appeal to capital than the old and seasoned securities and government bonds that for a long time will be available on unusual terms. This is the underlying weakness of the industrial situation.

It will have to be an exceptionally promising new enterprise that will make a strong appeal to capital while the securities that were held in Europe are thrown back in this country on account of the war. Here are two statements, one by Mr. Perkins and one by Mr. Gary, that the cause of the depression in the United States and this reduction in wages is the tariff, and the other is the statement of Mr. Gary that it was because of the fact that business felt they could not and would not receive fair treatment, and therefore were withholding and would continue to withhold capital. They are also advised by Mr. Forgan and the National City Bank to withhold capital because of the war.

Now, to prove that capital has been withheld it is only necessary to call your attention to what the railroads did last year. There was published in the Evening Star of this city last Saturday what purports to be an extract from the Railway Age, which shows that the passenger cars ordered in 1914 were 80,264 against 146,732 in 1913. Locomotives ordered were 1,265 in 1914 against 2,467 in 1913. Freight cars built in 1914 were 104,541 as against 207,684 in 1913. Now, in this connection I desire to call your attention to a pamphlet which was published by Mr. E. P. Leigh, of Chicago, the president of the Chicago Railway Equipment Co., in which he maintains the proposition that railway purchases are a true index of business prosperity; that when the railroads cease purchasing then general prosperity goes down, and when the railroads resume purchasing general prosperity always goes up. Why? Because he says that from 40 to 50 per cent of iron and steel is directly or indirectly consumed by the railroads. If they are the consumers of steel in this country to the extent of 50 per cent of the entire production and they reduce their purchases one-half, then the iron and steel business would lose 25 per cent of its trade, because that is the amount of their trade.

Now, the figures bear that statement out. The pig-iron production in this country last year was 25.3 per cent under that of 1913. There were 22,934,000 tons produced as against 30,738,494 tons of the year before. The loss of steel orders was 30.6 per cent, so that the loss the steel and iron industry has suffered in this country is exactly the loss they sustained by the railroads refusing to buy. That is a general answer for the Democrats; but that will not do in Ohio when men are out of work, as they will be in 1916. You can not go onto any street corner or into any hall in a town and make an explanation of these things. There is the fact of the empty dinner pail and the reduced pay envelope, and what answer have the Democrats? You can not put your hand on any one item of this tariff and tell which item is the most affected. Mr. Gary in this interview says depression is caused by manufacturers in Europe, with cheap labor, cheap raw material, dumping their surplus products into this country; but if he were asked in what particular line of industry that was happening he would be hard up for an answer, because the figures show, so far as the importations are concerned in the iron and steel industry, that in 1912 the total importations were $23,185,000; in 1913, $28,292,000; and in 1914, $24,947,000; so that we have suffered a loss of imports of iron and steel of over $4,000,000; that is, we have imported $4,000,000 less. So it was not the surplus of iron and steel that came in here that caused it. But the Democrats are not able to defend their proposition as to any one item that the tariff did not injure. Here is the fact of a general depression, and it is very easy to say it is caused on account of the tariff.

The Democrats charged the Republicans with extravagance, charged them with being a billion-dollar Congress, but when they had their own Congress it was more than a billion-dollar Congress. You could not lay your hand on an item that you would cut out. If you challenge them to lay their hands on any particular industry where the imports have closed up the factories, they can not do it.

Take the pottery industry. When the Democrats were about to revise the tariff, in 1913, the manufacturing potters made an announcement in their home newspapers down in my district that, on account of the threatened revision of the pottery schedule about to be made by the Democrats, at the forthcoming meeting with the potters' union they would demand a large reduction in wages.

They were all prosperous at that time, and they are now. Acting through the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, at my suggestion Mr. Redfield sent some accountants to East Liverpool, and the very moment they landed there all talk of a reduction of wages stopped. Mr. Wells, representing the pottery manufacturers, came before the Committee on Ways and Means and made a statement which was absolutely true, that the general average earnings of the potteries were only about 6 per cent. But these accountants when they got into the potteries found as follows:

SUMMARY OF RESULTS.

EARNINGS AND LOSSES.

1. The net earnings of eight American potteries on capital invested were from 15 to 21 per cent, and their average rate of earnings was 17.87 per cent. Their average rate of earnings on the value of their product was 14.32 per cent. These eight potteries produced 45.65 per cent of the total value of the product of all potteries investigated and their capital was 40.73 per cent of the total capital invested.

2. Two establishments had net earnings of from 10 to 15 per cent on capital invested. Their average rate of earnings on capital invested was 12.75 per cent and upon the value of their product 11.30 per cent. Their proportion of the total capital invested was 5.5 per cent and of the total value of product 5.57 per cent.

3. Nine establishments had net earnings of from 5 to 10 per cent on capital invested. Their average rate of earnings on capital invested was 6.29 per cent and upon the value of their product 6.22 per cent. Their proportion of the total capital invested was 31.16 per cent and of the total value of product 28.32 per cent.

4. Six establishments had net earnings of less than 5 per cent on capital invested. Their average rate of earnings on capital invested was 2.52 per cent and upon the value of their product 2.36 per cent. Their proportion of the total capital invested was 13.25 per cent and of the total value of product 12.73 per cent.

5. Three establishments had losses. Their average rate of losses on capital invested was 4.68 per cent and upon the value of their product 5.09 per cent. Their proportion of the total capital invested was 9.36 per cent and of the total value of product 7.73 per cent.

6. The average rate of turnover for all establishments was 111.35 per cent. In all but seven the rate of turnover was over 100 per cent, the lowest being 62.58 per cent and the highest 149.6 per cent. The pottery industry is not a seasonal one, and the product is turned out with great rapidity and regularity.

COST OF PRODUCTION.

7. For all materials and all expenses except labor the difference in manufacturing costs of production between the average of the six English and of the six American potteries was 2.05 per cent. These costs combined were higher in the United States by that percentage.

For the highest-cost potteries in both countries the combined cost was 2.69 per cent higher in the United States. Comparing the two lowest-cost establishments in both countries, the combined cost was 14.76 per cent higher in the United States. The combined cost of all materials and expenses except labor in the highest-cost pottery in England was 20.33 per cent higher than in the lowest-cost pottery in the United States.

8. The average labor cost of production was 81.8 per cent higher in the six American potteries than in the six English potteries. It was 69.1 per cent higher in the United States, when the two highest-cost potteries were compared and 103.97 per cent higher in the United States when the two lowest-cost potteries were compared. Comparing the lowest-cost pottery in the United States with the highest-cost pottery in England, the labor cost of production was higher in the United States by 48.21 per cent.

9. The total cost of manufacture, including all materials, labor, fuel, and office expenses, for the six establishments in the United States and in England, was higher in the United States by 38.43 per cent.

In the highest-cost establishments it was 30.85 per cent higher in the United States In the lowest-cost establishments it was 56.47 per cent higher in the United States. Comparing the highest-cost pottery in England with the lowest-cost pottery in the United States, it was higher in the United States by 14.63 per cent.

Now, as to this pottery schedule, the Democrats can lay their hands on that report and say that they did not injure the industry, and here are the figures. You can say to the pottery manufacturer, "Your men do not suffer any loss of wages, because the Democrats, so far as that tariff is concerned, have given you three times as much as the best factory over there requires."

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

Mr. WHITACRE. Yes.

Mr. ASHBROOK. How much was the pottery schedule lowered?

Mr. WHITACRE. The old pottery schedule was 50 and 55 per cent for plain ware and 55 and 60 per cent for decorated ware. This reduction was to 30 and 35 for plain and to 40 and 45 for decorated ware. But the point of it was that the competition comes in china that is made in England; the best ware, made in Germany and France, known as high-grade china, which comes over here and was competing with our earthenware. But that rate is 50 and 55 under the present tariff.

This is the only item, however, in the entire schedule, so far as I know, where the Democrats can challenge the Republicans and say, "We did not injure you by a reduction." I can not go to the miner and tell him, or the iron man, that the tariff did not bother them. I can not go to the cutlery man and tell him that the tariff did not bother him, because I can not prove an item.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. WHITACRE. Yes, sir.

Mr. COOPER. So far as statistics are concerned, I am not an expert, but I will give the gentleman this instance: Mr. Moore, of the firm of Moore & Jones Hardware Co., a gentleman of high business repute in my city, whose word is unquestioned anywhere, told me that about a year ago he was in Pensacola, Fla., and went into an establishment there and saw some steel, and he said, "Where did you get this?" And they said, "We got this from Belgium," and told him the figures. He said, "Is it possible?" They said, "Yes," and they showed him the invoice. They said, "We can get this cheaper from Belgium than we can get it from Birmingham, Ala."

Mr. WHITACRE. That is exactly what I am fighting. Here is the point that I make: The Democrats put on themselves the burden to revise the tariff without injury. We went out to the country and said, "We can and will reduce this tariff downward, but we will not injure anybody." Now, that putting on ourselves the burden of doing it without injury was self-imposed. We held ourselves out as capable of doing that. My proposition is now that, so far as the pottery industry is concerned, we have done it, and we can prove it.

Now, then, if you accept the proposition of Mr. MANN'S bill, or any other similar bill, and let a real, genuine tariff commission be appointed, it will do the same thing for all the industries that are complaining that they have been injured, in a spirit of fairness, and get the truth. Then when a man comes around and has a legitimate claim for injury we can say, "Let us see whether or not you have been injured. If you have been injured, we, as Democrats, following our promise and finding you have been injured, are willing to make reparation." [Applause.]

Now, when you go before the people of the State of Ohio with a proposition of that kind, you will let them know that you at least are honest and that you are willing to find out what the truth is.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. WHITACRE. Yes.

Mr. BARNHART. Does the gentleman know that near the close of the session of 1910, when the tariff bill was pending, I offered a provision to the bill providing that a tariff commission should be appointed—one member by the majority side of the House, one member by the minority side, one member by the majority side of the Senate, one by the minority side, and the fifth man by the President—and that it was defeated by the Republicans?

Mr. WHITACRE. Yes; and it is to your credit.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman never did that.

Mr. BARNHART. You will find it in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman may have inserted something of that kind in a leave to print.

The CHAIRMAN. No gentleman can interrupt a speaker on the floor without getting his consent.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. WHITACRE. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Along the line of the gentleman's suggestions, does not the gentleman think that a tariff commission composed of experts is much to be preferred to one composed of membership of this House appointed by either side of this body?

Mr. WHITACRE. Assuredly. These men who went down to East Liverpool were given free access to every book in every factory. They went to England, and were given free access to the books of the factories in England—six of those factories. They went through every item carefully, and found out exactly what the facts are, and you do not need to guess. You might make a tariff in that way without any guesswork. This other method is patchwork and guesswork.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITACRE. Yes.

Mr. ADAIR. Does the gentleman understand that the manufacturers of England will turn their books and records over to an American commission to investigate their business?

Mr. WHITACRE. I know that six factories over there did do it.

Mr. ADAIR. I am not disputing the gentleman's word, but it is a matter of surprise to me that an English factory would do that.

Mr. WHITACRE. Yes; they did that.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. WHITACRE. I do.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. As to seeking the difference in cost of production here and abroad, that is in accordance with the Republican idea of the tariff, is it not? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WHITACRE. That is exactly in accordance with the Democratic platform on the tariff, to revise the tariff without injury. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITACRE. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Then, if I understand the gentleman, he is willing that we should enact a law levying a tariff duty that will equal the difference between the cost of production in this country and abroad?

Mr. WHITACRE. So long as we agreed to revise the tariff without injury to any industry we have got to get that difference in the cost of production. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GOOD. And that is what the gentleman is in favor of, is it not?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will be given more time, and that he will be allowed to go ahead without other gentlemen wasting his time.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 63 minutes.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. WHITACRE. Now I come to the remedy. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has introduced a bill which provides that the majority of the Ways and Means Committee shall appoint one member, and the minority of the Ways and Means Committee shall appoint another member, and that the majority of the Finance Committee of the Senate shall appoint a member, and the minority of the Finance Committee of the Senate a member, and the President one, and that these shall constitute the tariff board. Now, I introduced a bill in 1913 providing for a tariff commission to be appointed, three members by the Ways and Means Committee, three by the Finance Committee of the Senate, and one by the President, a similar proposition, differing only in the number.

Suppose we had a law like that now, and suppose this concern in Canton, Ohio, had reduced the wages of the men 14 per cent, and had said, as Mr. Perkins says, that the men understand it is on account of the tariff. Suppose we could find out the exact truth, and could ask them to come here and tell the truth, or allow your men to go there and get the truth. Then, if that tariff is too low, and those men have been thrown out of employment for that reason, or their wages reduced on account of that tariff, the fact would be discovered, and the Democratic promise would be kept by revising that particular schedule.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. WHITACRE. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman then proposes to have a tariff that shall not injure an American industry?

Mr. WHITACRE. That is the Democratic platform.

Mr. COOPER. That means to protect. Now, you have had one Democratic platform which said that a tariff to protect an American industry, levied for that purpose, was unconstitutional, and that we had no right to pass it.

Mr. WHITACRE. I am not responsible for what some man, at 2 o'clock in the morning, put in a platform. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. ADAIR. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WHITACRE. Yes.

Mr. ADAIR. Does the gentleman believe that a tariff levied sufficiently high to cover the difference in the cost of manufacture between this and foreign countries would raise enough revenue to run the Government?

Mr. LENROOT. It always has.

Mr. WHITACRE. I am not an expert, you see. That is the objection I have to the present method of framing tariff bills. I recognize the fact that the House of Representatives must do this work, of course, but what gentleman here, if some member of his family were sick, would blindfold himself and grope his way out of the house and downstairs onto the street, and grab the first man he met, with the expectation of finding a physician? He would get a gravedigger, more likely. [Laughter.] So I say, however much you may know about the tariff items, you should know enough about the subject to revise the tariff without injury, and unless you have aid you can not do it; and so long as that is in the Democratic platform, neither the Ways and Means Committee nor anybody else has any right to disregard it.

Now, there is another way of doing this. The President claims that the Trade and Commerce Commission about to be appointed have this authority. I can not find it in the law, but I have introduced a bill—H. R. 20848—which provides in so many words that they shall be given this authority by adding another subdivision, I, to section 6, providing that this commission shall be authorized to secure information for the Ways and Means Committee and the Finance Committee. That is another way to do it.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WHITACRE. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. How do you propose to require a manufacturer to open his books to a Government expert? Where do you get any law for that, authorizing a Government agent to go into a man's business and look at his books, if a man does not want him to?

Mr. WHITACRE. Why, the Government has that authority now, authorizing the Department of Commerce to do that. That was how they went into the potteries at East Liverpool and got the facts. That is the law now.

Mr. GORDON. Suppose I was running a business, and I refused to allow the Government agent to go in and examine my books. Will you tell me where he would get any authority to do it?

Mr. WHITACRE. He would simply lay down the law to you.

Mr. GORDON. I would lay the Constitution down to him.

Mr. WHITACRE. What is there in the Constitution which prevents it? You would have to go to the courts to find out whether the Government has any such authority or not; but there is such a law on the statute books.

Mr. GORDON. I do not think the Government has any such right.

Mr. WHITACRE. I point to what the Government has already done.

Mr. GORDON. You are talking about a law that Congress had no right to pass. Of course nothing can be done under such a law as that.

Mr. WHITACRE. I think I have said enough to make plain what I think is the duty of the Democrats.

You can go down into Alabama or Louisiana, and you can tear up the railroad tracks and throw them into the Gulf; you can destroy the sugar plantations, and the people will still vote the Democratic ticket; but you can not go to Ohio and close up any factory and continue to elect Democrats to Congress. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BROCKSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITACRE. I will.

Mr. BROCKSON. Did the gentleman vote for the passage of the Underwood tariff law?

Mr. WHITACRE. I did.

Mr. BROCKSON. Does the gentleman think it has had a fair trial?

Mr. WHITACRE. I do not think so.

Mr. BROCKSON. Then why change a law until it has had a fair trial?

Mr. WHITACRE. I do not want to change the law until we find out what is right.

Mr. BROCKSON. The gentleman can not point to any item that is wrong until you have had sufficient time to try out the working of the law.

Mr. WHITACRE. I have made the argument that you can not show that the general depression is due to the tariff law. You take the barber and the grocery man and the men who work in these factories, and they believe that to the tariff law is due the reduction of wages, whether it is or not, and I want to prove that it is not, and I say that this is the method to prove it.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER].

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART].

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, a good many times within the seven years that I have been a Member of this House the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has seen fit to sneeringly refer to statements that I have made on the floor of the House. He has sometimes openly denied statements that I have made, not especially to his credit, as I understand it. I have always tried to be gentlemanly and honest, but within the last 15 minutes the gentleman from Illinois, leader of the Republican Party, saw fit to dispute my statement that I had attempted to get a nonpartisan commission amendment to the Republican tariff bill of January, 1911.

I want to call the gentleman's attention to page 1699 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 30, 1911. In the last column of that page, in the center of the page, the RECORD says:

> Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.
> The Clerk read as follows:
> "Strike out all after the word 'appointed,' in line 5, page 1, up to and including the word 'office,' in line 6, page 2, and insert the following:
> "'One by the President, two by the Presiding Officer of the Senate, and two by the Presiding Officer of the House of Representatives; the membership of the two leading party organizations in each branch of Congress to each nominate and certify one Representative, who shall be appointed by said presiding officers. The Members appointed under this act shall continue in office from the date of qualification for the terms of two, three, four, five, and six years, respectively, from and after the 1st day of January, 1912, the term of each to be designated by the President; but their successors shall be appointed, as hereinbefore provided, for terms of six years, except that any person chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the Member whom he shall succeed. The majority of the board shall designate a member to be chairman thereof during the term for which he is appointed. Any member may, after due hearing, be removed by the President for neglect of duty or malfeasance in office.'"

To that amendment I offered some remarks, and was very strongly opposed by the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. Hill, whose remarks appear on page 1700. By reference to the second column of page 1700 it will be seen that on this vote there was a division, and the ayes were 130 and the noes 149, almost, as I remember it, a solid Republican membership voting against the amendment and the Democrats voting for it. [Applause.] I do not need any apology from the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana yields back two minutes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana, who is exceedingly touchy about every proposition that he introduces, said that I denied that he offered such a proposition. I did not. I shall not change my statement that was made in the RECORD. I said that the Republicans never heard of it. Well, technically, I may have been incorrect. The gentleman offered the amendment on the floor of the House and said that he explained it. Either his explanation was not listened to by the Republicans or was so very ineffective that no one understood it. Mr. Hill made a speech against it.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Hill must have understood it, then.

Mr. MANN. And this is what Mr. Hill said. Let us see whether, after I read it, the gentleman from Indiana will say that he understood it. Referring to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Hill said:

> The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] would do what? It would take what is now a Republican board and what is proposed to be made a Republican and Democratic board of impartial investigators and turn it into a board of five members, all of one party, if it should happen that in the future the House of Representatives and the Senate should be again in harmony politically. I am opposed to that as a Republican. I do not want to see this impartial board of tariff investigators all Republicans. I want to see both parties fairly represented.

Will my friend from Indiana now claim that Mr. Hill understood the proposition? If the gentleman was proposing a tariff board all of one party, if that was the gentleman's amendment, I never read it. If that is the gentleman's amendment, he can stand for it; certainly the Republicans would not stand for it.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BARNHART. I read the amendment, and it is there before him. If the gentleman did not listen to it, it is not my fault. I tried to read it distinctly.

Mr. MANN. I am not criticizing the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BARNHART. It does not depend upon the question of whether the gentleman understood it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman said that Mr. Hill understood it, and I read what Mr. Hill said. Does the gentleman claim now that Mr. Hill understood it?

Mr. BARNHART. I do not know whether he did or not.

Mr. MANN. No other Republican referred to it on the floor. The amendment was offered like a lot of other amendments to which no one listens, or else the explanations are so mixed up that no one can understand it. Now the gentleman says that the Democrats voted for it, and I assume that he claims that they understood it. Well, if they voted for it and provided for a tariff commission along the same lines, or very much the same lines, as the bill which I have introduced, are they now ready to vote for that? It is immaterial how they voted two years or three years ago. It is material how they will vote and act now. The Democrats then were in the minority. Now they have a two-thirds majority of the House. If they were in favor, or are in favor, of a tariff commission composed of men selected by the membership of both parties in the House and the Senate, let the Ways and Means Committee bring in a bill and we will pass it at the drop of the hat. [Applause on the Republican side.] Quit your four-flushing and attend to business.

I introduced a tariff commission bill providing that one member of the tariff commission should be selected by the majority of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, removable at their pleasure, one man selected by the minority of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House, one by the majority of the Finance Committee of the Senate, one by the minority of the Finance Committee of the Senate, and one by the President. That would, if now enacted into law, give the Democrats three members and the Republicans two members, and both parties would have the right to have confidence in the members whom they had selected; and whether the majority or the minority of the tariff commission should have their opinions followed, if we came into power, as we will, we would have confidence in the report of the members of the tariff commission appointed by the Republican members of the House and the Senate committees, and the Democrats would have confidence in the reports of the members selected by them. If they should agree upon a report, it would be overwhelming; and if they did not agree, the parties respectively appointing them would probably have confidence in their judgment.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, is the gentleman reading that from my remarks? If he is not, he will find them right there.

Mr. MANN. I am not, because they are not here.

Mr. WHITACRE. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman made any effort to have the Ways and Means Committee report his bill?

Mr. MANN. I have.

Mr. WHITACRE. Any success?

Mr. MANN. Not yet.

Mr. PETERSON. Mr Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. PETERSON. The gentleman has been in this House a great many years. Has he ever made any effort to have that kind of a bill passed while the Republicans were in power?

Mr. MANN. I never did. Even I learn by being in the House. That can not be said of many Democrats. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the gentleman understand that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART], which the gentleman is now discussing, was an amendment striking out a provision for a real tariff board and inserting the proposal which he recommends?

Mr. MANN. To tell the truth, I never heard of the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana. I do not think anybody on our side of the House did. Officially I suppose we were informed, but practically we were not; but I commend the efforts of the gentleman from Indiana to secure a nonpartisan, or rather a by-partisan, tariff board.

However, Mr. Chairman, I did not get time for the purpose of discussing this question to-day. There is another little thing that I want to call to the attention of the House, in good humor, and I say in good humor because it is almost an offense in this House nowadays to refer to the last Democratic platform. You will remember that the last Democratic platform closed by saying:

> Our platform is one of principles which we believe to be essential to our national welfare. Our pledges are made to be kept when in office as well as relied upon during the campaign, and we invite the cooperation of all citizens, regardless of party, who believe in maintaining unimpaired the institutions and traditions of our country.

Just before the Democratic convention met at Baltimore, the gentleman from Alabama, now Judge Clayton, had introduced into the House, and had reported favorably from the Committee on the Judiciary, a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing that no person who has held the office of the President shall be eligible to hold that office again. This resolution had just been reported into the House. It was reported to the House on June 13. The Democratic platform was erected within a month after that time, and contained this plank:

> We favor a single presidential term, and to that end urge the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution making the President of the United States ineligible for reelection, and we pledge the candidate of this convention to this principle.

Mr. Chairman, if I had the time I might refer to other planks in the Democratic platform not one of which do they pretend to keep, but here is a plank where they pledge the candidate to the principle of one term for President. It is true that the Democrats abandoned the resolution of Judge Clayton for one term, but the abandonment of that by the Democrats in the House does not excuse the President who was pledged to the principle of one term upon a platform which says:

> Our platform is one of principles which we believe to be essential to our national welfare. Our pledges are made to be kept when in office as well as relied upon during the campaign.

Yet I notice on every side that the distinguished gentleman who is now President of the United States is building up a personal machine, as far as he can, to secure his renomination. With such eminent officeholders as Judge Folk and Mr. Davies in prominent positions, mainly engaged in trying to build up a personal organization for the President, with the President quarreling with the joint appointing power at the other end of the Capitol, with the President constantly refusing to listen to advice of Democratic Members of this House unless they agree to do what he wants, I ask you gentlemen whether you think he is following the pledge of the Democratic convention in respect to the principle of one term? He has it within his power to keep one plank of the platform safely at least. Will he do it? He has repudiated the other planks. You have refused to carry out the other planks. Will the President, having accepted an election and a nomination on the principle of one term, keep even one plank in the Democratic platform? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman begins, will the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in furtherance of what I read a while ago by inserting remarks I made in favor of a tariff commission in January, 1911.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman consent in extending his remarks to insert the original text of the section of the bill to which he offered this amendment?

Mr. BARNHART. I will gladly do it, and I will ask to insert the remarks of the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. Hill, and of Mr. GRAHAM and of Mr. UNDERWOOD, which, with the vote of 279 on the amendment, conclusively proves that the amendment was fully considered.

Mr. LENROOT. With the understanding that the gentleman will insert the original text of the bill——

Mr. BARNHART. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I am very glad to see my friend from Indiana come down from the pedestal that he usually stands upon in reference to other people inserting matter, not only recopied from old copies of the RECORD, but from newspapers, and so forth, and it illustrates how necessary it is at times to do those things. If it was anybody else, he would object.

Mr. BARNHART. Oh, no; I would not.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARNHART. The original text of the bill is as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That a board is hereby created, to be known as the tariff board, which shall be composed of five members, who shall be appointed by the President. The members first appointed under this act shall continue in office from the date of qualification for the terms of two, three, four, five, and six years, respectively, from and after the 1st day of July, A. D. 1911, the term of each to be designated by the President; but their successors shall be appointed for terms of six years, except that any person chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the member whom he shall succeed. The President shall designate a member of the board to be the chairman thereof during the term for which he is appointed. Any member may, after due hearing, be removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office. Not more than three members of said board shall be members of the same political party. Three members of said board shall constitute a quorum. The chairman of said board shall receive a salary of $7,500 per annum and the other members each a salary of $7,000 per annum. The board shall have authority to appoint a secretary and fix his compensation, and to appoint and fix the compensation of such other employees as it may find necessary to the performance of its duties.

To this, Mr. Chairman, I offered an amendment which, with the proceedings thereon, were as follows, as shown on pages 1699 and 1700, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 30, 1911:

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Strike out all after the word 'appointed,' in line 5, page 1, up to and including the word 'office,' in line 6, page 2, and insert the following:

"'One by the President, two by the Presiding Officer of the Senate, and two by the Presiding Officer of the House of Representatives; the membership of the two leading party organizations in each branch of Congress to each nominate and certify one Representative, who shall be appointed by said presiding officers. The members appointed under this act shall continue in office from the date of qualification for the terms of two, three, four, five, and six years, respectively, from and after the 1st day of January, 1912, the term of each to be designated by the President; but their successors shall be appointed, as hereinbefore provided, for terms of six years, except that any person chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the member whom he shall succeed. The majority of the board shall designate a member to be chairman thereof during the term for which he is appointed. Any member may, after due hearing, be removed by the President for neglect of duty or malfeasance in office.'"

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I will not detain the House with a long argument in support of this amendment, but I want to call attention to two or three features of it that I believe might be accepted with advantage to the bill by the Members on both sides of the House. We heard in the recent campaign a great deal of talk about tariff commissions and the independent press, the magazines, the newspapers, and the political-economy authorities—in fact, everybody of an independent turn of mind has been advocating the theory that a commission or a board that would secure, in a nonpartisan way, facts to be presented to the Ways and Means Committee of the House to aid them in securing or adopting a tariff bill that would be advantageous to all the interests of the country.

It has been stated on this floor that the entire campaign in Indiana was conducted this year for and against a tariff commission. This statement is partly right and partly wrong. In many places in the State, as in my own district, the campaign was waged against the doctrine that the President of the United States ought to have the partisan right to name all the members of a tariff commission. On the other hand, it was urged that if a tariff commission was necessary it ought to be established on a bipartisan basis.

I have discovered that the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee, after a conference on this bill, have succeeded in influencing the Republicans to consent that the membership of this committee shall be bipartisan, and that it shall report to the House instead of to the President. I think I understand what the word "bipartisan" means, but I am not quite ready to admit that the present President of the United States is able to comprehend fully the word "bipartisan." I believe a President who will name a Dickinson and a MacVeagh as members of his Cabinet and denominate them Democrats is not competent authority to name a bipartisan board of any kind.

I want to call special attention to the fact that this amendment provides that the membership shall be appointed one by the President, one by the minority side of the House, one by the majority side of the House, one by the minority side of the Senate, and one by the majority side of the Senate, which will constitute a board composed of three Republicans and two Democrats.

There are two other features of the amendment I want briefly to call attention to. One is in line 2, page 2, where it provides that the President shall appoint the chairman of this board. I would have it provide that the membership of the board itself shall select its own chairman.

In line 5, page 2, the provision is there set forth that the President may remove any of these tariff board members for inefficiency. I believe that is entirely too broad, and that the word "inefficiency" should be stricken out, for the reason that a radically and intensely partisan President might remove any member of the board, however efficient he might be, for alleged cause of inefficiency, notwithstanding he might be qualified, in the opinion of the people of the country. I trust that the spirit of fairness on that side of the House and the spirit of self-preservation on this side of the House may influence you all to let this amendment prevail. [Applause.] It is fair, the country will so regard it, and anything else than a fair arrangement of a tariff board will not be satisfactory to the welfare of the country, which we ought to serve. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman rise to oppose the amendment?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No; I am in favor of the amendment.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose the amendment. So far as my vote is concerned, in the committee or on the floor, it has been cast and will be cast in favor of a perfectly fair proposition to honestly ascertain the facts in regard to the present tariff law or any future revision and have those facts laid honestly before Congress. I made the motion, at the request of the Democratic members of the committee, to permit the House of Representatives to instruct the board to furnish information on any subject whatever. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] would do what? It would take what is now a Republican board and what is proposed to be made a Republican and Democratic board of impartial investigators and turn it into a board of five members, all of one party, if it should happen that in the future the House of Representatives or the Senate should be again in harmony politically. I am opposed to that as a Republican. I do not want to see this impartial board of tariff investigators all Republicans. I want to see both parties fairly represented.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I decline to yield. I want to say that this would be entirely unfair to you gentlemen, if we should win the control of the House of Representatives two years from now. It would leave it unfair to us if you should elect a President two years from now, and I believe, partisans though we are—and I am one—that in a matter of this kind we want to be fair, and that the American people will see that we are fair, whether we want to be or not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. With pleasure.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from Connecticut evidently does not understand the amendment.

Mr. HILL. The amendment, as I understand it, makes the Speaker of the House appoint two, the Presiding Officer of the Senate two, and the President of the United States one.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman's amendment provides that one of the men who is appointed by the Speaker shall be nominated to him by one of the political parties in control of this House and the other one by the other political party, and the same thing in the Senate; so of necessity it will always require two different political parties.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, one word more. When the Chicago platform was made, laying down the principle of Republican protection, it seems to me it compelled, from the very nature of the platform, a tariff board or a tariff commission or a board of nonpartisan or bipartisan investigators. I have heard many statements on the floor this afternoon that the Denver platform did not require it, and that it did not need a board of impartial investigators in order to make a tariff for revenue only. I call the attention of the gentlemen on the other side of the House to the Denver platform, in which there are three propositions that you must take care of in making your tariff. First, that articles entering into competition with trust-controlled products shall be free. How are you going to know about it? Second, that the articles especially competing with American manufactures that are sold abroad more cheaply than at home shall be free. How are you going to know about it? Finally, that you shall not make a tariff for revenue only, but that you shall gradually reduce your tariff to a tariff for revenue. You need abundant information to do that.

I saw in the paper the other day that the new Ways and Means Committee would meet immediately after the 4th of March, and that they were to conduct these investigations, and that the Democratic national committee was to pay the bills. I believe as a Republican that you have just as much right that the Government should pay your bills as we had two years ago when we came into the House of Representatives and asked that the Government should pay the expenses of the Ways and Means Committee then, and that you have the right to go to the President of the United States and ask him to order this bipartisan board, fairly constituted, to give you such information as you need, and when you meet here next fall, if we can riddle your tariff for revenue only, then let the country decide against you, and if we can not, let them decide against us.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I would if I had the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on the pending amendment.

The SPEAKER. But time for debate is exhausted.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I think the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana ought to prevail. There is a principle involved in it which is fundamental and which I want to suggest to the House before the vote is taken. It is not on any partisan lines, it is deeper than that; neither is it that the President might not appoint a bipartisan board, which I think very likely, and in that I do not blame or reflect upon him; but, Mr. Speaker, the work which this board is being appointed to do is very largely of a legislative character. Its chief function will be to gather information for the purpose of basing wise laws on that information. This information is to be utilized by the legislative branch of the Government. Now, in order to preserve the balance which exists between the coordinate powers of the Government, I take it, sir, that it is not wise to put into the hands of the Executive so much power as the appointment of this board would give in the work of enacting legislation. It is for the Congress to make laws. The Constitution as it stands now gives the power to the President to recommend in a message to those bodies which constitute the Congress, and it also gives him a veto power, and his connection with or power over legislative matters ends there. This law, if enacted, would put it in the President's power to select the five members of this board who would go out into the world, who would gather statistics which would be the basis for new legislation. Now, it would be out of the power of any five men, at least three of them of one political party, not to have some partisan views as to the work they were doing, and they would naturally find statistics which favored most the theory which they favored. The President, then, would have the power under this provision to select five men, three very strong ones representing his own party views, and two others, possibly not so strong, and possibly representing his views more or less also, and in that way these men, representing the Executive, report to Congress information which is to be the basis of legislation. I say, Mr. Speaker, in giving the President this power we are invading the powers of the Congress and transferring to the Executive power that the Constitution never intended that he should have. [Applause.] I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BARNHART. Division!

The House divided; and there were—ayes 130, noes 149.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I propose to make a few remarks on the subject of rural credits and introduce the resolution which I send to the desk and ask to have read in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 58) declaring for a special session of the Sixty-fourth Congress to consider rural-credit legislation.

Resolved, by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That should the Sixty-third Congress adjourn sine die without having enacted proper rural-credit legislation, it is hereby declared to be the sense of the Congress that the Sixty-fourth Congress should be convened in extraordinary session at an early date to consider the subject of agricultural credits with a view to enacting laws which will provide the farmers of the United States at the earliest date possible with better credit and cheaper interest.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I propose this resolution in perfect good faith. I shall have it referred to the Rules Committee. I hope it will soon be reported back to the House for consideration. I am in favor of an extra session of Congress for the consideration of rural-credit legislation. I believe it is my duty to use all appropriate means in my power to bring this about. I assume that the Sixty-third Congress may appropriately express an opinion upon the propriety and necessity of an extra session of the Sixty-fourth Congress. The Constitution gives the President the authority to convene Congress in special session on extraordinary occasions. The President is the judge of what circumstances and conditions constitute an extraordinary occasion. The passing of this resolution would not in any way interfere with or invade the prerogatives of the Chief Executive of the Nation under the Constitution. This resolution merely expresses the sentiment of Representatives and Senators of the Sixty-third Congress. By passing this resolution we would not in any sense coerce the President. It would be in the nature of advice. I have no doubt the President would like to know what the Congress thinks about the matter. In reaching a conclusion on the advisability of calling an extra session of Congress the President naturally seeks light and information from all legitimate sources. He is, or should be, ready to listen to the public press, to the sentiment of all kinds of commercial, financial, and business organizations. He no doubt consults with members of his Cabinet, with Members of Congress, and I have no doubt the President would give respectful hearing to the views of any private citizen, whatever might be his business, position, or station in life. But the President is too much occupied and his time is too precious to listen to Members of Congress individually, but by bringing this resolution to vote every Representative and Senator may express his opinion on the subject. In addition to this, the discussion of this resolution in the House and the Senate will be of great value. It will give an opportunity to ascertain the public sentiment of the country and for the farmers of the country to express their views.

WITHOUT AN EXTRA SESSION NO CERTAINTY OF RURAL-CREDIT LEGISLATION IN NEXT CONGRESS.

There is no certainty that the Sixty-fourth Congress in the entire two years of its existence will enact rural-credit legislation unless called in special session for that purpose. Should Congress adjourn the 4th of March, unless called in extra session, it will not convene until the 6th day of December following. Nine months of valuable time will intervene between the final adjournment of this Congress and the convening of the first regular session of the Sixty-fourth Congress. This is too much time for Congress to remain idle when there is important legislation pending of such vital interest to the greatest industry of our land and to the farmers of the United States, who constitute about 40 per cent of our population.

TIME RIPE FOR ACTION.

The time is now ripe for legislation on rural credits. The subject is now before Congress. The public press is interested. The subject is before the country. The public mind is centered thereon. The various agricultural organizations are pressing the matter. The farmers have been studying the subject. They are anxiously waiting for Congress to act. There are differences of opinion, of course. There are many divergent views. We disagree as to policy and principles. We differ in both fundamentals and in details. So it will be in the end. Action should not be delayed on this account. We would never enact an important piece of legislation if we waited for perfect agreement, if we waited for unanimity, if we waited for unity in views, ideas, sentiment, and opinions.

I therefore urge the leaders of the majority in this House, I appeal to those who speak for the administration in power, I ask those who represent the Democratic Party of the Nation, upon which the responsibility of legislation rests, to exert their influence and use every proper and legitimate means within their power to have the Sixty-fourth Congress convened in an extraordinary session at the earliest date possible for the purpose of adopting some system, some policy, some method or means to provide proper agricultural credit for this country and to give our farmers access to the great fountains of credit, now unhappily largely controlled, dominated, and monopolized by our great manufacturing, commercial, and transportation interests.

DEADLOCK BETWEEN CONGRESS AND THE PRESIDENT.

In determining whether or not there should be an extra session of Congress to consider the question of rural credit we should take into consideration the apparent deadlock between our Chief Executive and Democratic Members of Congress. The Democratic majority has the power and responsibility of legislation in this Congress. That majority, however, seems hopelessly divided on rural-credit legislation, and the President and his Secretary of Agriculture do not agree with the apparent dominant sentiment of the Democratic majority in this House as represented by the subcommittee on rural credit in both the Senate and the House. In the House the Democratic membership is divided into three divisions. One division, represented by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. DOOLITTLE] are in favor of the National Government loaning money directly to farmers upon farm-loan mortgages. Another division, led by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], are in favor of using the Government funds, or the Government's credit, if necessary, to provide a system of rural credit. Still another division is led by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss], who apparently is opposed to the use of the Government's credit or the Government's funds to aid in the extension of agricultural credit, or to reduce interest charges to the farmers. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss] undoubtedly represents the views of the President and the Secretary of Agriculture. This is shown by the speech he delivered in the House on the 2d day of January, 1915, by the declarations of the President in his message to Congress of December 2, 1913, and by the views expressed by the Secretary of Agriculture in his annual report for 1914.

President Wilson, in his message to Congress on December 2, 1913, when urging rural-credit legislation, said:

The farmers, of course, ask and should be given no special privilege, such as extending to them the credit of the Government itself.

The Secretary of Agriculture, in his annual report for 1914, in discussing rural credits, says:

There seems to be no emergency which requires or justifies Government assistance to the farmers directly through the use of the Government cash or the Government's credit.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss] in his speech in the House January 2, 1915, said:

The Bulkley-Hollis bill is not acceptable to the administration in so far as it includes the priniciple of grants of public money and grants of the public faith and credit of the United States to sustain the selling price of their securities.

The issue is thus joined. I yield to no man in my desire to give the American farmer every legitimate advantage which can flow from wise legislation, but I am willing to take my stand with the administration.

The Democratic Party has never promised subventions or subsidies to any class of the American people, and the rank and file will gladly support the responsible leadership of the party in its refusal to yield to demands for a violation of our fundamental principles.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] in his speech in the House on December 19, 1914, took issue with Mr. Moss and strongly advocated the use of direct aid of the Federal Government in the use of Government money in establishing our systems of rural credit. In this speech he said:

The use of the public credit to support farm-mortgage loans is justified by the experience of all the nations which have established land-mortgage systems in the interest of the small borrower, and these countries comprise the greater part of the civilized world.

Without such Government support as is provided by our bill it is fair to predict that the land-credit system will be slow and uncertain in its beginnings and incapable of giving substantial relief for many years to come; it is fair to say that success is doubtful and that there is not at hand in all the history of the world a single example of the success of a land-mortgage system on the long-time amortization plan for the benefit of small borrowers which has not had public financial aid.

Mr. Moss was a member of the commission appointed by the President under authority of Congress to visit Europe for the study of rural credits, and Mr. BULKLEY is the chairman of the subcommittee appointed by the House Committee on Banking and Currency to investigate the subject of rural credits and prepare and introduce a bill for the consideration of the House.

We have a right to assume that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], the chairman of the Subcommittee on Banking and Currency, represents the majority of the Democratic membership of the House, at least upon the broad principle of using the Government funds or the Government's credit to aid rural credit. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss] represents the present Democratic administration opposed to this policy. The situation is this: The disagreement between the President and the Democratic majority in Congress has prevented rural-credit legislation. As a result rural-credit legislation has been postponed at least two years; in the meantime the farmers of the country must expend many millions of dollars in excessive interest charges, and agricultural development must be delayed for an indefinite time.

EXTRA SESSION REQUIRED TO SETTLE CONTROVERSY.

This controversy among the Democratic forces in Congress, and in which the executive branch of the Government is participating, can not be settled properly except in a special session of Congress, when there will be ample time for the antagonistic forces to thrash out their differences. Mr. Moss declares "the issue is thus joined." The indications are that neither side will relinquish their views or recede from their positions without a long struggle and a fight to the finish. No regular session of Congress will afford an opportunity for the proper settlement of this controversy. There should be ample time for the great body of the membership of both Houses of Congress to give profound study to this question. There should be ample time for discussion and full opportunity for amendment. This can not be given or secured during the regular session of the Sixty-fourth Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I ask the gentleman to give me five minutes more.

Mr. HAUGEN. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield the gentleman 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for 10 minutes more.

IMPORTANCE OF AGRICULTURAL CREDIT.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. In deciding whether or not an extra session of Congress shall be called to consider agricultural credit we should take in consideration the importance of this great industry, the number of people directly supported thereby, the amount of wealth it adds to the country annually, the vital interest which all our nonfarming population have in an adequate and ever-increasing supply of food products, the intimate relation which agriculture bears to the strength and greatness of the Republic, and the part which agriculture plays in giving employment and support to the people engaged in all other industries and avocations.

There are two great industries in this country—agriculture and manufacturing. These two industries in 1909 employed over 23,000,000 persons; 12,500,000 were employed in agriculture, 10,500,000 were employed in manufacturing and mechanical pursuits. All other industries, occupations, and professions employed less than 16,000,000 people. In round numbers, the total annual products of this country are valued at $32,000,000,000; $30,000,000,000 of our annual products out of a total of $32,000,000,000 come from our farms and factories. Our annual manufactured products are valued at $21,000,000,000 and our annual farm products are valued at $9,000,000,000. Our manufacturing plants consume annually $12,000,000,000 worth of raw material. To ascertain the net wealth added annually to our country by our manufacturing establishments we must deduct the cost of raw material used. Doing this we find that our manufacturing establishments add to our national wealth annually about $9,000,000,000 and that agriculture is adding annually about an equal amount. Fully 40 per cent of the annual wealth produced in this country comes from our farms. What a magnificent gift the tillers of the soil annually contribute to the Nation and its people. Manufacturing industries already have access to the national supply of credit. This great industry is in the hands of corporations. Their stocks and bonds are found in all the great money markets. Nearly $4,000,000,000 of manufacturing and industrial stocks were listed on the New York Stock Exchange December 1, 1914. These constituted one-fourth of all the stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange at that time. Manufacturing, commerce, merchandizing, and transportation have largely monopolized the credit power of the Nation. January 1, 1914, the corporations of this country had $64,000,000,000 in capital stock and $37,000,000,000 in bonded and other indebtedness, a total in stocks and bonds of $101,000,000,000. They had a net taxable income of $4,339,550,008, amounting to 4.3 per cent upon all their stocks and bonds and other indebtedness. The report of the Comptroller of the Currency for 1914 shows that the banks had in loans secured by stocks and bonds and in investments in stocks and bonds of all kinds the sum of $9,711,000,000.

Finally, in deciding whether or not an emergency exists which justifies the calling of an extra session of Congress to consider the subject of rural credits, we should take in consideration to what extent the credit power of the Nation is controlled by the commercial, manufacturing, and transportation business. We have in this country about 27,000 banks. Twenty-six thousand seven hundred and sixty-five reported to the Comptroller of the Currency in 1914. These banks have resources of $26,971,398,030.96. They have $2,132,074,073 in capital and have $2,276,517,370 in surplus and undivided profits. They have in loans and discounts and in investments $20,873,282,169. Only $542,115,491 is loaned upon land. Only 2½ per cent of their loans and investments are loaned on farm lands. Our banks place $97.50 in other securities for every $2.50 invested in farm mortgages. But this is not all. The banks have extended larger credit upon city real estate than upon farms. The comptroller's report shows that our banks have loaned upon real estate other than farms $2,965,844,145. In round numbers our banks have loaned on town and city real estate three thousand million dollars and only five hundred millions upon farms. For every dollar they have loaned upon farms, they have loaned $6 upon urban property. All this in face of the fact that farm mortgages are the safest investment obtainable. The Secretary of Agriculture, in his annual report for 1914, says that from the best data gathered by his department the State, private, and savings banks have loaned to the farmers on short-time loans $1,000,000,000, and the national banks have loaned to the farmers on short-time loans $750,000,000, or a total of short-time loans to farmers of $1,750,000,000. Add to this the amount of farm-mortgage loans by banks, and we have a total of $2,250,000,000 the banks have loaned to the farmers. Eighteen billion dollars is loaned to other interests. The farmers add to the Nation about one-half of the annual wealth produced; they own one-third of the wealth of the Nation; they constitute over one-third of our population; but the banks extend them but one-tenth of the credit.

But it is not so much in the amount of credit extended that gives our farmers just cause for complaint, but in the excessive interest charged. Taken as a whole, the farmers pay a much higher rate of interest than is paid by merchants, manufacturers, and the corporate interests of the country. They have less credit and pay a higher rate of interest. The lack of ample credit dwarfs and hinders the development of their business, and thereby restricts, limits, and lessens their profits. The high rate of interest deters them from using credit for the enlargement of the farming operations and imposes annually upon them a tax of immense proportions.

I believe the public interest will be subserved if an extra session of Congress shall be called to consider this subject, in case this Congress shall adjourn without action thereon. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Oklahoma will be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, an examination of the last Democratic platform at Baltimore shows that practically every declaration of that platform has been enacted into law except one. To my mind the one declaration remaining undisposed of is the most important of all; that is to say, the declaration on rural credits. That this has been delayed is due to no inactivity of the Democratic Party in regard to the subject, but due to the platform declaration itself, which provided that an examination be made of other systems before we embark upon a system of our own. The platform declaration is as follows:

> Of equal importance with the question of currency reform is the question of rural credits or agricultural finance. Therefore, we recommend that an investigation of agricultural-credit societies in foreign countries be made so that it may be ascertained whether a system of rural credits may be devised suitable to conditions in the United States; and we also favor legislation permitting national banks to loan a reasonable proportion of their funds on real estate security.

We have already carried out the letter of this provision of the platform. In the currency law we have permitted national banks to lend money on real estate, and we promptly sent a commission to Europe to study foreign rural-credit systems, and that committee has made to Congress a splendid report on the systems that they examined abroad and have collated much valuable information serviceable to the Congress and to the country in deciding upon a proper law in the premises. A number of plans have been introduced on this subject. The first was introduced by Mr. BATHRICK, of Ohio, on January 19, 1914.

THE BATHRICK BILL.

Mr. BATHRICK's bill has a double purpose. One is to lend money to farmers at a low rate of interest by the Government directly, and the other is to devote the profits upon the business of lending of such money to the building of roads. Evidently Mr. BATHRICK's idea was that the best measure for the farmers would be to cut out the middlemen. I do not know that I am competent to criticize the bill, but from the investigations that I have made it seems to me that there are a number of defects. The first is that we ought not mix up the question of farm credits with the question of road building; second, that the machinery of the bureau as arranged in the bill is complicated and somewhat confused; especially does it leave too much to the discretion of the officers created by the bill; third, so far as I may be able to judge, the provision for the obtention of the money on bonds of the Government are, in a general way, in accordance with the plan to have the Government borrow the money and lend directly to farmers; fourth, the methods by which the money is to be lent to farmers are not specifically set forth and should be more specifically set forth where the Government goes into the business as large as this will necessarily be; fifth, the method of making the loans through "farm-credit associations or designated financial associations, acting as agents of the bureau," introducing another feature in the bill which should not be introduced; in other words, if the Government is going to lend money to farmers, it should do it directly.

On the whole the plan of Mr. BATHRICK is, in my judgment, essentially the correct one, but the bill is not artificially drawn so as to carry out the plan. I have read Mr. BATHRICK's testimony in the hearings, and I do not think that there is anyone in Congress who is so thoroughly familiar with the question or who discusses it more intelligently. He is a pioneer in the work and understands it fully.

THE MOSS BILL.

Mr. Moss of Indiana, for the commission which went to Europe, he being a member thereof, on January 29, 1914, introduced a bill for the establishment of national farm-land banks.

Getting my information secondhand from books and other literature, and knowing that Mr. Moss has not only great ability but has received his information largely first-hand, it is indeed embarrassing for me to attempt to criticize his bill. From the standpoint with which the question is viewed by him, I doubt if the bill is subject to serious criticism.

My difference with Mr. Moss is fundamental. My idea is whatever legislation we undertake should have in view directly only the interest of the farmers. The benefits of the rest of the country must be indirect and arise out of the benefits received by the farmer, he being the source of practically all our wealth. The bill has for its professed purpose the establishment of national farm-land banks. There are no such banks now. If such banks were profitable in themselves they would be established by private effort. If we do not establish such banks we hurt no one. If we do establish such banks, we establish a distinct class of people who do not produce and who have to exist by taking a part of that which we wish to accord to the farmers. The Government has already done and is now doing a great deal in the aid of banks and bankers. A rural credit system, according to my view, should be for the aid of the farmers. To put what I mean in another way, if the Government with its powerful resources is able to borrow money at 3½ per cent and can lend it to farmers, after paying all expenses for lending it, for 4½ per cent, and it is its desire to aid the farmers by giving them money at the lowest rate of interest, why should it deliberately go about the matter by organizing a distinct class of middlemen and give this distinct and favored class an equal part of the benefits with that it gives to the class of farmers which it peculiarly desires to favor? I do not believe that Mr. Moss's bill is a workable measure for a number of reasons: First, it is doubtful if any national farm-land banks would be organized under the act; second, that the system by which these banks lend money and issue bonds on its mortgages is complicated, and the bonds, if they were salable at all, would be at such a high rate that it would not do the farmers much good; third, these banks are given all the power of the ordinary commercial banks, and I do not believe it would be wise to mix the two propositions; fourth, the consolidation of existing land-mortgage companies, building and loan associations, and the like into farm-land banks, as provided in the bill, would be impracticable and, in my judgment, would do no good in reducing the rate of interest to farmers; fifth, requiring the trustees of the postal savings fund to deposit the same in these banks under the provisions of this bill would be unwise; lastly, the bill does not provide for Federal aid, but merely for Federal supervision.

There is but one way the farmers can be guaranteed a lower rate of interest, and that is by the Government aid, either directly or indirectly. Recently the Government tried this indirect aid, and we know Mr. McAdoo had to get in the game directly in order to make the banks do right.

THE BULKLEY BILL.

The Bulkley bill is substantially the same as the Moss bill, except that it is more artificially drawn and that it provides for Government aid. Section 30 of the bill shows the controlling difference between this bill and the Moss bill. This is the section that provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall buy not exceeding $50,000,000 of the bonds of the Federal land banks when called upon by said Federal land banks. The Bulkley bill is a banker's bill. Any gentleman who should desire to go into the land-bank business ought to be able to make good profits out of this system of banks, and doubtless there would be some banks organized under it, if enacted into law, though I do not believe it would be a successful working measure.

THE HOWARD BILL.

Mr. HOWARD, of Georgia, on January 31, 1914, introduced a very elaborate and carefully worked out plan of aid to farmers through national farm-land banks. Under Mr. HOWARD'S bill a new system of land banks is provided for. There are three kinds of banks—local national farm-land banks, State farm-land banks, and United States farm-land banks. The system is to be under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Comptroller of the Currency. It is as quite an elaborate system of banking as that of the recently passed national reserve system, and, so far as I am able to judge, as a system of banking it is a very meritorious bill; but my belief is that what is necessary for the farmers is not a new system of banking to make profits out of him, but a system of rural credits which will give to him money on his farm at a low rate of interest without the intervention of any more middlemen than can be avoided.

THE KELLY BILL.

Recently, on September 1, Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania introduced a double-header bill for the establishment of a land-bond bank in the Department of the Treasury and a farm-loan bureau in the Department of Agriculture. One bureau is for the purpose of issuing bonds and the other is for the lending out of the money thusly received. The business of the lending bureau is to lend out the money to farmers, but no other definite scheme is presented by the bill.

THE M'KELLAR BILL.

On September 3 I introduced a bill to establish a farm credit bureau in the Department of Agriculture, with the object and purpose of having the Government through this bureau lend money on farm first mortgages directly to the farmers. Generally speaking, it establishes a corporation in the Department of Agriculture, having a board of trustees of five, with the Secretary of Agriculture as president of the corporation and four other members to be appointed by the President. One of these is to be general manager of the corporation, another secretary, the third treasurer, and the fourth general counsel, who shall have charge of the title department of the bureau.

The loans are to be limited to farmers; that is to say, men or women actually engaged in the business of tilling the soil, as shown in section 2. It shall only be made for the purpose of paying, in whole or in part, for agricultural lands or lands capable of being made agricultural lands, or for the satisfaction of encumbrances on said lands, or for the cultivation of lands, or repairs or maintenance of irrigation works, or for the purpose of fertilizing, buying machinery, seed, implements, or animals, or labor to be used for agricultural purposes, or for any other similar purposes of the farmer, including planting, raising, cultivating, or harvesting the crops. In other words, the bill cuts out all speculative purposes, and the benefits of the act go alone to those engaged in tilling the soil, and this only for purposes connected with such tillage.

The bureau is, in fact, a corporation, and issues bonds in the same way that the land-bank associations are to issue them under the Bulkley bill. Of course these bonds have the backing of the Government and will sell much more readily, and for a much less rate of interest than would the bonds of the banking association. Indeed, in my judgment, having the special backing of these lands on a 60 per cent basis, they will be the best-known Government bonds ever issued, and ought to sell on the smallest rate of interest.

Virtually the same provisions for the use of the postal savings and for the Secretary of the Treasury to buy $50,000,000 of bonds per year, which provisions are in the Bulkley bill, are to be found in this bill.

COMPARISON OF THE TWO BILLS.

The essential difference between the two bills is that one is a direct and businesslike way, by which the Government may secure and lend money directly to farmers at a low rate of interest. The Bulkley bill is a cumbersome and expensive way of doing the same thing, the Government being quite as much behind one bill as the other.

In my way the farmer gets the benefits of the low rate of interest. In the Bulkley bill the class of bankers organized thereunder is the better beneficiaries. Under my plan the amount of money thus put out and other features of the situation, for which the Government is responsible, are in the hands of the bureau. In the Bulkley bill they are in the hands of the land-banking association, and the Government becomes responsible for $50,000,000 per year. In my plan the bonds, in my judgment, will be quickly salable, and no bonds will have to be bought by the Government. In the Bulkley plan the bonds issued by the land-banking association will be of doubtful market value and probably can not be sold to individuals at all. In my plan the bureau can try 100 mortgages in each State, or can try one mortgage in each State, and if the system is found to be a good one it can be developed at the will of the bureau, without injury to the Government or to financial conditions generally. In the Bulkley plan the mortgages can be taken by the land-banking associations in the various States, and the Government is to take at least $50,000,000 a year, whether or no. If it is a success, well and good. If it is a failure, the Government pays the deficiency in the end. My plan is for the farmers. The Bulkley plan is for the land bankers, who are not now in existence, but which separate and favored class is to be created by the bill.

In my plan the Government controls the situation. In the Bulkley plan the favored class of land bankers control. In my plan the cost of putting the machinery in motion is reduced to a minimum. In the Bulkley plan the cost of putting the machinery in motion is expanded to a maximum. In my plan the bureau becomes a competitor of all private farm-loaning companies or individuals. Under the Bulkley plan the Government becomes associated with the other loan companies. In my plan all the good features of the Bulkley bill are retained. All its bad features are excluded. In my plan all the profits go to the further security of the bonds issued by the bureau, making them even more gilt-edged. Under the Bulkley plan all the profits go to the land bankers to be created by the bill.

These are some of the distinct differences between the two plans.

THE POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT IN THUS DEALING WITH THE QUESTION.

It is claimed by many that the Government ought not to go into the land mortgages or loan business in competition with other loan companies; that this is not the province of government. It is claimed that it is virtually socialistic. It is claimed the Government should not grant special favors to any class of its citizens. It is claimed that the whole scheme is undemocratic. Looked at from a theoretical standpoint, these claims are probably well founded. Looked at from a standpoint of governmental practice, they can not be sustained.

THE GOVERNMENT IN BUSINESS.

From time to time since its foundation the Government has engaged in business. When railroads came in vogue and it was deemed wise to build up railroad systems in this country, the Government spent untold millions in land and in money in the building up and creating of railroads. The Government has also been in the banking business, and the banks and bankers who will probably for the most part be opposed to this bill have been the greatest recipients of governmental favors and benefits. The Government has been in the banking business from the beginning, sometimes in competition with private banks, but at all times virtually backing the whole system of banking in this country.

The Government has also gone into the irrigation and reclamation business, and has spent untold millions in reclaiming barren lands and irrigating them and selling them to purchasers on long time.

We have actually gone out and bought silver and issued certificates thereon as money, thus aiding the silver miners and those engaged in that business. We have gone into the canal business and spent $400,000,000 in building the Panama Canal. We have gone into the railway business in Alaska by appropriating $35,000,000 to build a railroad there. We have recently gone into the insurance business, and are now insuring ships. We have gone into the parcel-post business, and have thus come into competition with the express companies and railroads.

We have actually gone into the farm-loan business in the Philippine Islands. So far as I am informed, the system is working well. In other words, we are doing more for the Philippine farmers than we are doing for our own farmers.

In our tariff law we have benefited manufacturing interests throughout the land at the expense of the farmers largely. We have passed innumerable laws for the benefit of labor, and we have acted wisely in so doing, but practically no legislation for farmers.

Agriculture is the basis of all our wealth and prosperity, yet we do little to encourage it. We make the farmer pay more for his plows, his harrows, his rakes, his reapers, his binders, his machinery of every kind, nature, and description, and the benefits of this legislation go into the hands of the manufacturer. We tax every article that he uses, or did do so until the Democratic Party recently passed the tariff law. We tax the most of what he eats or wears, or did do so until the Democratic Party came into power and passed the recent tariff law. These taxes all went to the favored class, but the farmers do not get the benefit.

THE SITUATION OF AGRICULTURE.

Now what is the result? The result is agriculture has been steadily on the decline during the past 30 years of our history. Between 1900 and 1910 the increase of population in the United States was 21 per cent. In the same census period great farming States like Ohio, Indiana, Iowa, and Missouri actually lost in rural population. Vermont and New Hampshire also lost in rural population. In great farming States like Minnesota, Wisconsin, Michigan, Illinois, Kentucky, Virginia, Maryland, and even the great State of New York the rural population increased only an infinitesimal per cent. On the other hand, every State in the Union increased in its city population. The effects of uninviting rural life and conditions and the consequent removal of rural population to the city is strikingly shown in the production of farm products. Take the production of cattle, for example. Nearly all the great cattle-producing States, like Texas, Iowa, Kansas, and Oklahoma, produced a greater number less of cattle in 1910 than they produced in 1900. During a period of 30 years the increase of cattle in this country was 36 per cent, while during the same period the population increased 83 per cent. In 1900 there were 52,000,000 cattle raised in the United States and in 1910 only 53,000,000, practically no increase, while the population of the United States increased 21 per cent.

The decrease in hog raising was even more marked. In 1900 there were 62,000,000 hogs raised in this country and in 1910 only 58,000,000. Sheep and goats were about the same—39,000,000 in each year. In 1900 there were 250,000,000 poultry in this country and in 1910 only 293,000,000, an increase, but a much smaller increase than that of population.

When we consider these figures two things are apparent, first, one of the striking causes of the high prices of these foodstuffs; and, second, the absolute necessity of making farm life more attractive and keeping your young men on the farms, and giving them the best, fullest, and cheapest means of producing the necessities of life.

In my own State of Tennessee we had an increase of population between 1900 and 1910 of 8.01 per cent. This increase was wholly in the cities and towns. The rural population of Tennessee decreased over 10,000 people. I mean that part of the State outside of towns of 2,500 people and over. I have four counties in my district. In Shelby County, where Memphis is, the increase of population was 15 per cent. Fayette County gained 556 people in 10 years. Hardeman County gained 35 people in 10 years. Tipton County actually lost 186 people in 10 years. Just about one-half of the counties in the State lost in rural population. Great counties like Lauderdale, Weakley, Henry, Carroll, Maury, Giles, Lincoln, Rutherford, Wilson, Sumner, and even Davidson, where Nashville is, all decreased in their rural population.

What is the cause? The cause is the lack of cheaper money to do the farm work, and of cheaper money to enable the farmers to make country life agreeable and successful. Recently the Department of Agriculture and a subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee made an investigation to ascertain various facts about rural conditions. One of the subjects investigated was the rate of interest in rural communities. It was found that the average rate of interest paid by the farmers throughout the country was something like 8 per cent exclusive of the commissions paid. When these commissions are added the average rate will be in the neighborhood of 10 per cent. These were on land loans. On chattel loans to farmers the average rate was about 10 per cent without commissions. Naturally it was difficult to get the real rate paid, because the lenders did not care to state the rates and the borrowers were in much the same position. There were some States of the Middle West and Northwest that paid very much smaller average rates, or, rather, some sections of these States; but, generally speaking, it can be safely said that the farmer pays an average of 10 per cent for his money.

When we recall the fact that the gamblers in the leading financial centers of our country borrow money at about 5 per cent upon which to gamble on the various exchanges, and realize that the farmers, who are the bulwark of our Nation, who furnish its lifeblood, who are creators of more than 75 per cent of its wealth, who furnish us very nearly every necessity of life, and find that under our system that they pay 10 per cent for all their borrowed money, while the gamblers in the very products that are created by the farmers pay only 5 per cent for their money, then we must see that the system is wrong. It is perfectly apparent to any thinking man also that the system can be changed by governmental action, and that action must be direct. We can not hope to change the system by adding another class of middlemen to the system. What we must do is to see that the farmers, who are the source of all our wealth, shall receive equal treatment with those of us who, economically speaking, are but leeches upon the body politic.

Lawyers, doctors, bankers, legislators, stock brokers, merchants do not create wealth, though they serve most useful purposes. Economically speaking, they are the leeches who thrive on what others have created. It should be our purpose to see that the producers of our wealth are simply put upon an equal basis with those who consume wealth.

The Democratic Party has stood for this principle on all questions of labor in the sense that the term is ordinarily used. It should complete the program by standing by the farmer as a farmer and helping to place him on an equal footing with labor and with the middleman.

THE REMEDY.

To-day the farmer is suffering from two very serious ills: First, the inadequate money supply, and, second, the high rate of interest he has to pay.

The remedy for these evils is direct loans by the Government. In many parts of our country we find our farms poorly fenced, poorly drained, and poorly kept up. We find the farmhouses out of repair, oftentimes unpainted, the barns in a bad condition. The reason for this is not lack of industry in the farmer, as is often stated, but it is the fault of a bad financial system.

THE PRESENT SYSTEM.

I speak now of the small cotton farmer, with which system I am best acquainted. He may own in his own right a hundred acres of good land with a pair of mules, some cows, hogs, and chickens, and one or two negro tenants on the place to help him work. Probably his whole farm outfit is not worth over $1,500 or $2,000, and under the ordinary State exemption laws all of this, probably including the land, is exempt from execution. Under these circumstances, of course, he has no standing at a bank. He can not go to a bank and borrow money with which to make his crop. What does he do? He goes to a commission merchant in his nearby town or city and makes arrangements with him to furnish the money and provisions with which to make his crop. The first thing the commission merchant requires of him is to give a mortgage on his land, teams, and the crop that is to be raised. He lets him have provisions, if he is in the provision business, at a large cost. He begins to let him have money in the spring of the year at a heavy rate of interest, usually not less than 10 per cent, and he charges him 10 per cent whether the farmer pays him back in September or keeps it a year. The merchant requires him also to sign an agreement by which the farmer is to ship the merchant in the fall of the year ordinarily one bale of cotton for every $10 borrowed. If the farmer borrows $250 he agrees to ship and pay commissions on 25 bales of cotton, though he may make but 10. These commissions are but another way of charging exorbitant rates of interest. This is the present banking system of innumerable farmers in the South.

Naturally, under these circumstances the farmer does not borrow any more money than he is obliged to have with which to make his crop. If he could mortgage his farm to the Government and get money at 5 per cent, he could well afford to improve and keep up his farm. It is no wonder that our country boys are not attracted to this kind of farm life. It is no wonder that many of them who would make splendid farmers leave the farms and go to the cities and work on street cars as motormen and conductors and engage in almost every work that will bring in a steady salary. No wonder, under these circumstances, the rural population has continuously decreased. No wonder we see broken-down fences, ill-kept farms and farmhouses, poor schoolhouses, and bad roads.

THE OBLIGATION OF THE GOVERNMENT.

All other civilized governments have recognized the obligation to furnish banking facilities for rural communities. Their situations, however, are different from ours. The European Governments dealt with the system of land banks that were already in existence. We have no such system, and the inauguration of such a system would not remedy the evils. On the other hand, it would simply create another class of middlemen who would toll governmental aid to the farmers. Any thoughtful person, I believe, will agree that this system could best be started in a bureau of the Federal Government. It would be far less expensive, far more direct and efficacious.

If it is the duty of the Government to aid in building railroads, nay, even building railroads of its own for the purpose of developing portions of our country, if it is the duty of the Government to aid manufacturing establishments by taxing the people in their interest, if it is the obligation of the Government to appropriate immense sums of money to irrigate arid lands in parts of our country and sell them cheaply to farmers, if it is the obligation of the Government to expend huge sums in cleaning out rivers to benefit the commerce of our country, if it is the obligation of the Government to go into the ship business or in the insurance business for the benefit of those engaged in trade and commerce, if it is the obligation of the Government to lend money to Philippine farmers—and all these things have been done by our Government—then how much greater is the obligation of the Government to furnish a financial system that will give to the producers of practically all our wealth sufficient money at a reasonable rate of interest to do well the work that they must do in order that all might prosper.

LESSON OF THE WAR IN EUROPE.

The present titanic war in Europe ought to serve as an object lesson. Those nations now engaged in war have been preparing for it for years, each one taxing their people to the limit in preparation for war. The most of their public revenue has been spent that way for many years. In this country, unfortunately, we have been following their example. We are the richest Government in the world. We raise over $1,000,000,000 by taxation annually. What an immense power for prosperity would this be if properly expended. Let us suppose for a moment that we spent it for the peaceful pursuits of agriculture, for the development of the products of our mines, for developing our waterways, for better road building, for the education of our youth, and for training them to make intelligent, industrious, and patriotic citizens. If such were done, the prosperity and wealth of our country would absolutely know no bounds.

Under our present system for these objects we spend only a very small portion of our public fund. Exclusive of what we spend for our Postal System, we spend less than $200,000,000 for the ordinary purposes of peaceful government. The great bulk of this enormous income is spent for hideous war, past, present, and future. Over $200,000,000 are spent annually as rewards for killing men in battle. One hundred and fifty millions of dollars are spent for our Navy, which is used for the purpose of killing men. Over $100,000,000 are spent for the purpose of keeping up our Army for the purpose of killing men. Over $50,000,000 more are spent for various other war purposes.

Thus we see that we spend more than $500,000,000 annually for the purpose of killing men and for the destruction of their property in war. What a travesty upon civilization!

We spend $2,000,000 for the education of our youth in certain agricultural schools, but this is for their military education. We spend $500,000,000 annually to kill men. We spend $20,000,000 for agriculture and $500,000,000 for war.

Under present conditions we can not afford to cut down our Navy, but we should cut down our Army and our appropriations for war.

THE ADVANTAGES OF MY PLAN.

To sum up some of the advantages of my plan I might say: (1) It does not plunge the Government at enormous expense into any untried system of land banks. (2) The limitations found in section 14 of the bill prevent any action injurious to financial conditions of the country by sale of bonds by leaving the amount and extent of loans entirely in the discretion of the bureau. (3) It enables the bureau constituted by the act to go into the farm-loan business on a conservative and safe basis and gives the bureau the power to expand with the growing needs of the country. (4) If it is found necessary in the development of the system to have financial agents or even local banks in the various communities of the country, then these may be organized later as the system develops. (5) It does not attempt to institute a full-grown and fully developed system at one blow. (6) The banking system created by this act is in the Department of Agriculture, where it ought to be. (7) It reduces to a minimum the cost of making the loans. (8) It cuts out the profits of the middlemen not because profits to middlemen are unjust but because middlemen would have to be created by the act, as none now exist. There is no use to create a class of business men who are to divide the benefits that ought all to go to the farmers. And, finally, it will give to the farmers loans on their farms at probably not exceeding 4½ per cent on long time, where they have heretofore had to get this money at at least 10 per cent on short time.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HOWARD having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2337) to create the coast guard by combining therein the existing Life-Saving Service and Revenue-Cutter Service.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to furnish to the House of Representatives, in compliance with its request, a duplicate copy of the bill (S. 2334) for the relief of S. W. Langhorne and the legal representatives of H. S. Howell.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read, if no one else desires to be heard.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Salaries, Office of the Secretary of Agriculture: Secretary of Agriculture, $12,000; Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, $5,000; Solicitor, $5,000; chief clerk, $3,000, and $500 additional as custodian of buildings; private secretary to the Secretary of Agriculture, $2,500; stenographer and executive clerk to the Secretary of Agriculture, $2,250; 1 appointment clerk, $2,000; 1 chief, supply division, $2,000; 1 inspector, $2,750; 1 law clerk, $3,250; 1 law clerk, $3,000; 3 law clerks, at $2,500 each; 9 law clerks, at $2,250 each; 1 law clerk, $2,200; 6 law clerks, at $2,000 each; 3 law clerks, at $1,800 each; 3 law clerks, at $1,600 each; 1 expert on exhibits, $3,000; 1 telegraph and telephone operator, $1,600; 1 assistant chief clerk and captain of the watch, $1,800; 3 clerks, class 4; 10 clerks, class 3; 13 clerks, class 2; 21 clerks, class 1; 1 auditor, $2,000; 1 accountant and bookkeeper, $2,000; 7 clerks, at $1,000 each; 8 clerks, at $900 each; 1 clerk, $840; 15 messengers or laborers, at $840 each; 11 assistant messengers or laborers, at $720 each; 1 chief engineer, $2,000; one assistant chief engineer, $1,400; 1 assistant engineer, $1,200; 2 assistant engineers, at $1,000 each; 8 firemen, at $720 each; 10 elevator conductors, at $720 each; 1 construction inspector, $1,400; 1 superintendent of shops, $1,400; 1 cabinet-shop foreman, $1,200; 4 cabinetmakers or carpenters, at $1,200 each; 2 cabinetmakers or carpenters, at $1,100 each; 9 cabinetmakers or carpenters, at $1,020 each; 3 cabinetmakers or carpenters, at $900 each; 1 electrician, $1,100; 1 electrical wireman, $1,000; 1 electrical wireman, $900; 3 electrician's helpers, at $720 each; 2 painters, at $1,000 each; 4 painters, at $900 each; 5 plumbers or steam fitters, at $1,020 each; 1 plumber's helper, $840; 2 plumber's helpers, at $720 each; 1 blacksmith, $900; 1 lieutenant of the watch, $1,000; 2 lieutenants of the watch, at $960 each; 2 watchmen, at $840 each; 42 watchmen, at $720 each; 5 mechanics, at $1,200 each; 2 skilled laborers, at $960 each; 1 janitor, $900; 22 assistant messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $600 each; 1 carriage driver, $600; 21 laborers or messenger boys, at $480 each; 1 charwoman, $540; 2 charwomen, at $480 each; 15 charwomen, at $240 each; for extra labor and emergency employments, $12,000; in all, $352,280.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 4, page 3, after the word "cabinetmakers," strike out the word "of" and insert in lieu thereof the word "or."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I will say it is only a typographical error in the print of the bill.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, what is the necessity of increasing watchmen? There is apparently an increase here.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, as he may remember, the department has moved a good many of its bureaus to the building southeast of the old building, an eight-story building, and they need these watchmen in order to take care properly of that building.

Mr. MANN. But they abandoned other buildings?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. You would think it requires fewer watchmen in one large building than in half a dozen small buildings.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman from Illinois knows that these men work in eight-hour shifts, and it takes this number of men to properly care for that building and for one or two of the other offices.

Mr. MANN. We were told when we proposed to rent this new building that it would considerably reduce expenses. Now, the first thing we meet is where we transfer from a number of small buildings into a modern office building they need more laborers, more watchmen, more carpenters, and more of this and that to do the work than they had before. That is contrary to usual experience.

Mr. LEVER. The statement of the officials representing the Secretary's office was——

Mr. MANN. You have increased the number of elevators, but that is explainable by the fact that the old building did not have elevators. Now, you go into a new building that has elevators. I do not understand why you need more cabinetmakers and more carpenters and more watchmen.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that we have not increased this roll in the way of cabinetmakers. We have only increased it in the way of elevator conductors and a couple of watchmen, and the explanation of the department is that they want them in connection with this new building.

Mr. MANN. We have now eight cabinetmakers or carpenters at $1,020 each, and this provides for nine; and we have two cabinetmakers at $900 each, and this provides for three.

Mr. LEVER. Let me explain to the gentleman that those additions are transfers from the lump sum of the Secretary's office to this roll, and the lump sum has been reduced in proportion, with the exception of $2,000.

Mr. MANN. Of course, it is one of the difficulties where they make these lump-sum appropriations that the department immediately proceeds to employ laborers, cabinetmakers, and carpenters out of that; and after a while they come along and put them on the statutory roll, and it is seldom, although the gentleman says it is in this case, that the lump sum is reduced.

Mr. LEVER. According to the statement of the officials of the department, and according to the investigation of the committee, these lump sums have been reduced except in one or two instances, which we will call attention to when we get to them. I would like to say to the gentleman from Illinois, along the line of his suggestion, that I think every member of the Committee on Agriculture will agree with him that one of the most difficult things to do is to keep up with this lump-sum roll and these transfers they insist on making from time to time. It makes more trouble and confusion than all the other parts of the bill put together.

Mr. MANN. And that is particularly true of the Agricultural Department.

Mr. LEVER. I hope it is not true of any other committee.

Mr. MANN. This is the only committee outside of the Committee on Appropriations that carries appropriations for departmental help in Washington. And the Committee on Appropriations would not submit to this for a minute.

Mr. LEVER. I can say to the gentleman that the committee has investigated these various transfers, and in every instance they have found, except the ones we will mention at the proper time, that the lump sum has been reduced.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the chairman pardon the suggestion, that the departmental help has been very largely increased?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from South Carolina be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. What cause has there been for the large increase?

Mr. HAUGEN. The new buildings. The building referred to that was intended for the use of the Forestry Service, but on account of the increase of the department it is necessary to use the large building for the force in that department outside of the Forest Service.

Mr. MANN. Where does the increase come from?

Mr. HAUGEN. We made an increase in the appropriation of last year and added to the number of employees by the hundreds.

Mr. MANN. We made some increases in the last year's appropriation, and these sums are larger this year than last year.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman had walked through the department, he could have seen the reason.

Mr. MANN. Do not say "if." I have been through every building the Department of Agriculture makes use of, and I expect more than even members of the committee have.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I merely wanted to observe that the chairman of the committee having the bill in charge has properly said that this is about the hardest appropriation to regulate. There is a constant tendency in all the executive departments to take men who have been employed under a lump-sum, or possibly on a per diem, basis and recommend to the committee the estimates and that these men be put upon the statutory roll.

Mr. LEVER. There is no question about that.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I am very sorry the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture has yielded to that pressure coming from the Agricultural Department, because, as he says, it brings about confusion, and I dare say now that the gentleman, the chairman of the committee, and the members of the Agricultural Committee do not know for a certainty whether or not you have reduced the lump-sum appropriation from which these men were paid. You may have reduced some lump-sum appropriation, but it may not be the specific appropriation from which these men were paid before you put them on the roll and classified them under a salary.

Mr. LEVER. We have the statement of the officials of the department to that effect, and in some instances we verified those statements, and in every instance where we investigated we found the statements true.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I will say to the chairman that in the appropriation bill that comes under my charge—the District of Columbia appropriation bill—there are a number of employees put on the per diem basis. There has never come since I have known anything about it from the officials of the District of Columbia—the commissioners—an estimate wherein they did not ask that at least half of these men that were being paid on a per diem basis be put on the statutary roll at a salary, possibly not increasing the pay they were getting. But we have steadfastly refused to transfer any of these people, not that it would save money but it enabled us to keep up specifically with the lump-sum appropriations, that ought to be avoided if they can be avoided.

Mr. LEVER. The policy of the Committee on Agriculture is to accept every transfer from the lump-sum to the statutory roll for the purpose of keeping our eyes on the statutory roll.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. But the gentleman runs a very great risk when he undertakes to do that. While he may keep up with the statutory roll, he is very apt to have it put over on him as to the lump-sum appropriation, and I dare say that it happened, in spite of the fact that he thinks it has not.

Mr. LEVER. I think not.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I wish to say that we took that matter up with the subcommittee and investigated it very thoroughly. We checked up these various items, and in addition to that, as I have said, the committee itself took up that matter very specifically.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Will the gentleman point out the particular reduction in the lump sum from which these salaries were taken in this bill; that is, the specific cases?

Mr. LEVER. We shall do that at the proper time. The Secretary explains in his statement to us that the lump sum was reduced, but the committee undertook to reduce his emergency appropriation by $2,000. There was an increase in the statutory roll of the Secretary's office to the extent of about $10,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition in my own right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. There were certain increases made in this statutory roll under the office of the Secretary, were there not?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. What is the aggregate amount of those salaries, of those increases made?

Mr. LEVER. The new places in the Secretary's office are these: Two elevator conductors, at $720 each——

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. That is $1,440.

Mr. LEVER. Yes. One electrician helper, $720; 2 watchmen, at $840 each, amounting to $1,680; 4 watchmen, at $720 each, making $2,880; 2 laborers or messenger boys, at $480 each, amounting to $960; making in all $7,680 of new places.

Mr. MANN. That is not all.

Mr. LEVER. Then there were transfers from the lump-sum fund for extra labor of the Secretary's office, which fund has been partially reduced, consisting of 1 superintendent of shops, at $1,440; 1 cabinetmaker or carpenter, $1,020; 2 painters, at $900 each, $1,800; and 1 carriage driver, at $600; total, $4,820. I remember the carriage driver. He is the carriage driver of the Secretary. We decrease the emergency fund in the Secretary's office by $2,000, which practically leaves $2,820.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. So that there is an actual increase of more than $10,000 in this salary roll, in spite of the reduction you have made in the lump-sum appropriation?

Mr. LEVER. Yes; there is an actual increase of $10,200; but most of those increases are due to transfers. We have transferred many people to the Secretary's office in the reorganization of the department. These are represented by transfers with corresponding reductions in the lump fund.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. And it shows a corresponding reduction elsewhere in the bill?

Mr. LEVER. Yes; it does all the time.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries, office of farm management: Two clerks, class 3; 1 clerk, class 2; 6 clerks, class 1; 1 clerk, $1,020; 5 clerks, at $1,000 each; 6 clerks, at $900 each; 3 clerks, at $840 each; 4 clerks, at $720 each; 1 messenger or laborer, $720; 1 messenger, messenger boy, or laborer, $660; 3 messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $480 each; 1 messenger boy, $360; 1 messenger boy, $300; 4 charwomen, at $240 each; 1 photographer, $1,400; 1 photographer, $900; 1 map tracer, $720; in all, $36,080.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, how does this list compare with the list of expenses in this department last year?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I may say now, because it may save a good many questions as we go along with this bill, that there has been somewhat of a reorganization of this department within its various bureaus and offices, necessitating a great many transfers from bureau to bureau, and apparently in some of the bureaus increasing the amounts very largely.

The matter to which the gentleman is referring now represents the transfer of the farm-management work, which has heretofore been carried in the Bureau of Plant Industry, from that bureau to the office of the Secretary. The various clerks represented in this roll heretofore were carried in the Bureau of Plant Industry. This makes an apparent increase here of some $36,080, but there is no actual increase. All of these men heretofore have been employed in the Bureau of Plant Industry, and have been transferred to this item without any change whatever in salary or numbers.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman tell me what the Farm Management Bureau does?

Mr. LEVER. The Farm Management Bureau is regarded by the Secretary himself as one of the most important lines of work in his entire department, and for that reason he had it transferred from the Bureau of Plant Industry to his own office.

Mr. MADDEN. What does it do?

Mr. LEVER. The Farm Management Office undertakes to study the farm as a unit, to study it as a business proposition, to study it in all of its phases, from the standpoint of profit making and the like of that, as a whole.

Mr. MADDEN. Who studies it? These clerks and the charwomen and the photographer?

Mr. LEVER. Of course the charwomen do not. These clerks and the photographer represent the overhead expenses of this work.

Mr. MADDEN. Who are the men in this bureau who make this study?

Mr. LEVER. The chief of this bureau is Dr. William J. Spillman.

Mr. MADDEN. What use do they make of these studies when they have finished them?

Mr. LEVER. The object of this bureau is to get information. This is a great bureau or office whose agents go out into the country to gather information relative to farming as an economic proposition and bring it here to Washington, collate it, and then, through other agencies, notably the extension service of the Department of Agriculture, carry it out to the people.

Mr. MADDEN. What kind of information do they get, and where do they get it, and to whom do they give it after they get it?

Mr. LEVER. Let me read this extract from the report of the committee last year. I read:

This item includes a study of the cost of producing farm products under varying farm conditions, a determination of the profitableness of farm enterprises, the relation they bear to each other, their requirements, best way of organizing, and the devising of suitable methods of farm-cost accounting; conducting farm-management surveys which have to deal with the different types of farms, their profitableness, distribution of investment, and the relative returns from the different systems of management, including a study of the size of the farm, distance from market, farm tenure, and other economic factors and their relations to the profits received; ascertaining previous experience in farm management in this and other countries, in order that modern study may have the benefit of past experience; an investigation of the adaptation of available farm equipment and the encouragement of the production and use of improved types, the development of plans, and building of better farm dwellings; a study of tenant farming in the United States to bring about a better contract between landlord and tenant; a study of the cheapest and most effective method of eradicating weeds and cultivating the soil; a study of the practice of growing hay in its relation to other crops on the farm, the handling of meadows and pastures, and to investigate the practicability of curing hay artificially; to determine the most practicable means of maintaining profitable pastures in the various parts of the country; to determine the relation existing between the various types of farming and the maintenance of soil fertility; to study the relation of geographic factors, such as rainfall, temperature, frost, water influence, air drainage, topography, location with reference to markets, social conditions, etc., to agricultural enterprises, such as dairying, stock raising, grain production, etc.; to study the farm home in its relation to the farm in regard to location, convenience, plan of construction, sanitation, water supply, sewerage, and other comforts of the family; the organization of boys and girls' clubs; investigating the possibilities of the prickly pears and other cacti; a study of the native pastures as to the recovery of overstocked and depleted natural ranges of the arid and semiarid regions of the Southwest, the normal carrying capacities of these ranges, and methods of range management as influenced by the natural forage.

Mr. MADDEN. Can the gentleman tell us of anybody anywhere in the United States who has ever made a dollar, as a farmer, as the result of any study made by these people in this branch?

Mr. LEVER. We think that the gathering of scientific information by the Department of Agriculture——

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman call this scientific information?

Mr. LEVER. Of course it is. We believe that the gathering of scientific information by the Department of Agriculture and disseminating that information among the people has been of great value to this country.

Mr. MADDEN. I never saw any of this information disseminated anywhere.

Mr. LEVER. For example, here is a farm in the State of Illinois, a two-horse farm, that is being exceptionally well run, that is producing a splendid profit. The idea of this work here—one idea of it—is to study that farm, to study the methods pursued on that farm, to study the various things that enter into the profit and loss of that farm; and then by gathering data as to a number of such farms, and putting that information into shape and the conclusions, to disseminate them to the people. We regard this as exceedingly valuable work.

Mr. MADDEN. How much is the total cost of this bureau?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. The total cost of this work is $235,000. It has stood at that sum for several years.

Mr. MADDEN. Can the gentleman cite or refer me to any report that that bureau has ever made?

Mr. LEVER. Yes. They issue a number of reports.

Mr. MADDEN. To whom do they issue them?

Mr. LEVER. They issue a number of farm bulletins and reports to experiment stations, and they answer numerous inquirers, and furnish extension workers with valuable information.

Mr. MADDEN. Experiment stations are not farms, are they?

Mr. LEVER. True, they are not; but they are collectors of information, which in turn is distributed to the workers in the field.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think there is a farmer in the United States who has ever made a dollar as the result of this expenditure.

Mr. LEVER. I think the gentleman is badly mistaken.

Mr. MADDEN. My colleague [Mr. McKENZIE] wishes to ask a question in my time.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is not this the bureau that has charge of the men who are sent out in the different States to cooperate with the State boards of agriculture in teaching practical farming?

Mr. LEVER. No; this is not the bureau.

Mr. McKENZIE. That comes under another bureau?

Mr. LEVER. That work is carried under another item in the bill, which comes later on.

Mr. McKENZIE. This is done by bulletins, is it?

Mr. LEVER. No; it is not done by bulletins entirely. The purpose of this bureau is to study the work of the farm as a whole. Other bureaus study it in various phases, but this is to study the farm as a unit, and to get such information as can be had as to types of farms that show a profit.

Mr. McKENZIE. How is the information disseminated? I do not agree with my colleague, however.

Mr. LEVER. It is disseminated by way of bulletins, but more largely by the force of the extension teachers in the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. LEVER. I ask unanimous consent for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman from South Carolina will proceed for one minute.

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERWOOD. How many of these bulletins are there supposed to be for the benefit of the 9,000,000 farmers, on an economic proposition?

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that I do not know just how many of the various bulletins are to be printed.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Is this information to be disseminated through farmers' bulletins?

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that the dissemination in the future will be largely not so much through farm bulletins as through the local itinerant teachers who are carried under items further on in the bill.

Mr. MANN. I move to strike out the last word. May I ask the gentleman from South Carolina who is at the head of this Office of Farm Management?

Mr. LEVER. Dr. W. J. Spillman.

Mr. MANN. Where is his salary carried?

Mr. LEVER. His salary is carried in the lump sum of $230,000.

Mr. MANN. The committee stopped the segregating of specific salaries, then, when it got through with charwomen and messengers, did it?

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the policy of the committee and of the department in reference to lump-sum appropriations and the statutory rolls is this: All scientific employees and all temporary employees are carried under the lump-sum appropriation, as a rule. All clerical positions, pure and simple, and charwomen and employees like that, and all positions that have become permanent in their very nature, are carried on the statutory roll. That is the line of demarcation between the two.

Mr. MANN. What do you call the head of the Weather Bureau—a scientific position?

Mr. LEVER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MANN. What do you call the head of the Bureau of Animal Industry? Is that a scientific position?

Mr. LEVER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MANN. What do you call the head of the Bureau of Plant Industry? Is that a scientific position?

Mr. LEVER. Unquestionably.

Mr. MANN. What do you call the Bureau of Chemistry?

Mr. LEVER. Scientific.

Mr. MANN. Are those men paid out of the lump-sum appropriation?

Mr. LEVER. They are not. They are exceptions.

Mr. MANN. I do not say there are none, but I do not recall any that are paid out of the lump-sum appropriation.

Mr. LEVER. Not only are the men referred to by the gentleman scientific men, but their positions are administrative positions also.

Mr. MANN. I only call the attention of the gentleman to that because he has just stated that all the heads of bureaus who were scientific men were paid out of the lump-sum appropriation.

Mr. LEVER. I said scientific men. That is the general rule. Of course, these are exceptions.

Mr. MANN. I think that is not the general rule as to the chiefs of bureaus.

Mr. HAUGEN. No; not the chiefs.

Mr. MANN. Now, of course it is easier to increase a salary when it is paid out of the lump sum. Here is a newly created bureau, the total expense of which, in its lump-sum appropriation, is $235,000. The cost of running the office, not including the chief, is $36,080. That looks to me like a very large overhead charge. I notice that there are seven messenger boys. Is not the most of this work done outside of the city of Washington?

Mr. LEVER. The messengers here referred to are over in the department; they naturally need some messengers.

Mr. MANN. They may naturally need some messengers, but if we had the same proportion of messengers here according to our numbers, we would have to hire extra room or put up a notice of "Standing room only," because they would not have room enough to sit down. Where is the work performed?

Mr. LEVER. It is largely performed in the field; but, necessarily, a part of the overhead charges in administration of the field work must be carried on in the city of Washington, as in the Forestry Service and the Bureau of Animal Industry; the work is collating reports, arranging them, writing the bulletins, attending to the correspondence, and that is all done in Washington.

Mr. MANN. It looks to me like a very large overhead charge.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. That is not all of the overhead charges. The chairman of the committee has stated that the head of the division is paid out of the lump sum.

Mr. LEVER. The salary of Dr. Spillman is $4,000. The total of the overhead charges is set out fully in the Book of Estimates, covering more than a page, showing the various salaries of the men. There are two agriculturists at $3,000, two at $2,760, one at $2,300——

Mr. MANN. Those are not overhead charges. That is the expenditure of money, or should be, for work in the field.

Mr. LEVER. These expenditures come from the lump-sum fund of $235,000. The statutory roll is spent in the city of Washington.

Mr. MANN. I have great respect for the Agricultural Department, but I confess that I can not see how they can have so large overhead charges, requiring so many clerks, charwomen, and messengers, in order to spend $235,000 in the field.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I do it for the purpose of asking the gentleman from South Carolina if the salary of the head of this division is fixed by statute?

Mr. LEVER. There is a fixed limitation by law as to the amount of salary that can be paid to scientific men in the Department of Agriculture. The old salary was $4,000 a year. The Congress last year increased it to $4,500 at the urgent solicitation of the Secretary of Agriculture, but I may say to the gentleman that there is not a single one of these scientific men in the department who is paid at this time more than $4,000.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. The gentleman defined a scientific employee in his answer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and got me mixed up a little. On what ground is a man at the head of this bureau a scientific employee? He is a man who has to gather and correlate the figures merely. He may be a mathematician, and you might call him a statistician, but in what branch of science does he have to be proficient in order to be the head of this bureau?

Mr. LEVER. He is both an administrative officer and a person of exceptional ability and training in the special line of work in which he is engaged.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. And therefore a scientist?

Mr. LEVER. And therefore a scientist. Until he was made chief of this work he did a great deal of field work. He wrote a number of bulletins, some of which I have read, and he has made a study of the various problems connected with the matters which come directly under his supervision. He is not a scientist in the sense that he is a surgeon or a doctor or a lawyer, but he is a scientist as we understand it in the nomenclature of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Now, one other question. We have not reached the item yet, but I will anticipate it. In lines 12 and 13, page 4, a lump sum is carried of $230,000. The gentleman has said that the head of the division is paid from a lump sum. Has the gentleman any information as to how many other people are employed from this lump-sum appropriation?

Mr. LEVER. The estimates which I hold in my hand set out in several pages, as you will see, employees whose salaries are paid out of a lump sum.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Who designates the salary that is paid?

Mr. LEVER. The salary of the chief of the division would be designated by the Secretary of Agriculture, and I presume other salaries will be fixed either by the chief of this office or the Secretary of Agriculture, and probably a board appointed by the Secretary may fix them. I am not certain as to this.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. The gentleman says "will be fixed." Are we to understand it is a new organization?

Mr. LEVER. I should have said "are fixed."

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Does the gentleman know how the salaries paid these people from a lump sum compare with the salaries of those on the statutory roll who do similar work?

Mr. LEVER. I do not think it would be possible for a man paid out of a lump sum to do work similar to that which is done by those on the statutory roll, because one is composed of scientific persons and the other merely of clerical persons, and they are not comparable.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Does not the gentleman conceive that some plan might be devised by which some men in the field might be paid out of the statutory roll, so that we could know exactly how much they receive?

Mr. LEVER. That has been debated a great many times in the Committee on Agriculture, and that question was investigated, not this year, because the bill was drawn with a view to adjourning on March 4, and the hearings were not as full as usual.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. That ought not to be the only thing in view in the drafting of an appropriation bill.

Mr. LEVER. The testimony before the committee and the judgment of the committee was that in salaries for scientific men, men highly trained along special lines, experts in their own lines of work, there should be a reasonable discretionary power lodged in the supervisory officer, who would know the relative worth and work of those under his supervision, and therefore what should be their relative salaries. That discretionary power, of course, is lodged in the Secretary of Agriculture and the various chiefs of these bureaus.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. HAUGEN. I would say, in reply to the gentleman's question, this, that the committee has never exercised the power to fix the salaries, as stated by the chairman of the committee. It is left with the discretion of the department to fix the salaries of the scientific men. First the lump-sum appropriations are made and the department fixes the salary and recommends the transfer, and the committee accepts the recommendation made by the department.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. The salaries were fixed for a great many of these employees during the last year, but no recommendation of transfer was made.

Mr. HAUGEN. The salaries have been fixed for nearly all of the employees by the department, and the committee has been accepting the recommendation of the department.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from North Carolina yield until I can ask the gentleman from South Carolina a question?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. How much of this $230,000 is expended in Washington?

Mr. LEVER. I think I can give the gentleman that information, although I have not it at hand at this moment.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it more than half of the $230,000?

Mr. LEVER. I would think not.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, $146,000 are expended for salaries in and out of the city of Washington, and a good deal more than half of that sum is expended in Washington, probably $80,000.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, since my time is running, while the gentleman from South Carolina is looking up the answer to that question I would like to say that the general observation that I rose first to make was that the practice and custom of making appropriations in lump sums for the payment of salaries is, to my mind, the most vicious species of making appropriations. It is susceptible of having applied to it every kind of mismanagement and covering up. I am not now charging anybody with covering up, and I do not want the term to be taken in that way, but it absolutely is placing an arbitrary power in the hands of some head of a bureau to fix salaries without any regard to consultation with anyone else, and it is keeping obscure from the average Member of Congress any possibility of finding out just how much of this money is expended for salaries or what the salaries are. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] has just observed that more than $150,000 of this $240,000 is expended for salaries in the city of Washington.

Mr. ANDERSON. Oh, no; the gentleman's figures are wrong. One hundred and forty-six thousand dollars of the $240,000 are expended for salaries, and more than half of that is expended in the city of Washington.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Then, $80,000, in round numbers?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. The principle is the same. Certainly $70,000 from this lump sum is expended in the payment of salaries in the District of Columbia, and they might easily be classified and placed upon a roll; and then when we come to the consideration of this bill we would at least know what we were paying these men for their services.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Heartily agreeing with every word the gentleman says, I rise to ask the gentleman to repeat that speech in the Committee on Appropriations when it comes to making the lump-sum appropriation for the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is the most extravagant body working under the Government.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I will say to the gentleman that I have made that speech in the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will make it effectively.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. And I will make it anywhere else where lump-sum appropriations appear that are expended for the payment of salaries, particularly to men who are employed in the District of Columbia, and I think it ought to apply even outside of the District.

Mr. MANN. That is, the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. And I want to say that just as long as this policy of making appropriations in lump sums is continued there will be a misappropriation of funds, or, rather, an overappropriation of funds for the purpose for which the appropriation is made.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I yield for a question.

Mr. McKENZIE. I want to ask a question for information. Can the gentleman tell the committee how these men get on the pay roll? Are they legislated on to the pay roll or are they put on by appointment of some one in this department?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. They are evidently put on by appointment of somebody in the Agricultural Department, I presume, after some sort of a civil-service examination.

Mr. McKENZIE. And then an appropriation is asked for the salary of these men?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. They already have the appropriation in a lump sum from which they fix the amount of the salary.

Mr. McKENZIE. They appoint them after.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. They appoint them after they have gotten a lump-sum appropriation.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and most of the items set forth in this bill carry specific appropriations. His objection goes to the fact that here is a lump-sum appropriation of $230,000 and in other places there are lump sums appropriated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. What disclosures are made by publication or otherwise as to the salaries these experts receive out of this lump-sum appropriation?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I assume that the chairman of the committee can tell you that some reports are made to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. LEVER. A full statement of the amount paid in salaries each year is furnished the committee and the House in the annual estimates of the Secretary of Agriculture.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes, to answer the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COOPER. Well, the Book of Estimates shows the amount of salaries now paid, but the lump-sum appropriation leaves it to the superior in fixing salaries. There is no necessity for their employing the people mentioned in the Book of Estimates. If you make a lump-sum appropriation, they can put in a man at a great deal larger salary and drop out another; so the Book of Estimates does not show anything to Congress at all but the number employed.

Mr. LEVER. That is very true about this appropriation and a great many others; but the point I desire to make is this, that men who have given a careful study to this proposition of how to handle salaries of scientific men in this department have come to the conclusion that to make their salaries unyielding, unbending, and unvarying by enacting them into law from year to year which can not be changed except by act of Congress would be a handicap to the work of that class of men. These men are highly trained experts, and are very sensitive to anything that might appear as a reflection upon their work. They are as hard to handle as a thoroughbred race horse, and you have to treat them a little differently from the man doing ordinary routine work. There is much in the proposition that there should be a reasonable leeway in fixing these salaries.

Mr. COOPER. Does not the gentleman think that the man who made up this Book of Estimates knew approximately what he could hire these men for?

Mr. LEVER. Oh, undoubtedly.

Mr. COOPER. Does the gentleman think it would overcome their sensitiveness somewhat to say, "Here, you take this money for which we have estimated to Congress; if you do not like it, you can go without it."

Mr. LEVER. It is possible to handle this proposition on the statutory roll, and probably it will be wise to do it, but heretofore we have not thought so.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand the committee is so guardful of the sensitiveness of these employees that they do not scrutinize the recommendations from the heads of the bureau, but merely vote the lump sum recommended by the department?

Mr. LEVER. No; I did not make any statement to bear out that impression, and if I did I did not intend to do it. I said that the men who had given careful study to this subject, the great scientific men of the Department of Agriculture and elsewhere, had come to the conclusion that the salaries of these scientific men ought to be carried in lump-sum appropriations, and should be fixed by those most capable of judging of relative merit.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield further? Is there any instance since the chairman has been connected with the committee where, by action of the committee, the salary of any of these sensitive experts has been reduced?

Mr. LEVER. I do not know that there has, but while the committee does not know anything about it, it seems from newspaper reports some salaries have been reduced.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the committee itself has never taken any action whereby salaries have been reduced.

Mr. LEVER. On the contrary, the committee raised the maximum amount that may be paid this class of employees in last year's bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. That was the maximum salary?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. So an underofficial who was receiving beneath $4,500 could receive the maximum amount without control, at least by Congress.

Mr. LEVER. That is true, as this bill is fixed. But I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] that this method of fixing salaries in this bill has prevailed ever since I have been a member of this committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman remember that for six or eight years there have been Members on this floor protesting against this method, because the Congress surrenders the control over salaries by it to the heads of the department?

Mr. LEVER. It seems that the protest of the Members have not availed with the House.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman said a moment ago in reply to a question, that certain experts or men of prominence in the department thought they ought to be given a lump-sum appropriation to handle these men who are in the employ of the department. Who are these experts that gave that opinion?

Mr. LEVER. I meant by that statement men who have been chiefs of these various bureaus, like Dr. Melvin, Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, whose salary is carried on the statutory roll.

Mr. COOPER. And he is a very excellent man.

Mr. LEVER. He is a very excellent man. And then Dr. Marvin, Chief of the Weather Bureau, whose salary is carried on the statutory roll; and Dr. Taylor, and other men. The Secretary of Agriculture and the Assistant Secretary, and men expert in this line of work have always concluded that this is the best method.

Mr. COOPER. They are the men who are to disburse these funds?

Mr. LEVER. That is true.

Mr. COOPER. And they all think it would be better for the public service to give them a lump-sum appropriation to expend in their discretion, to put it in a nutshell?

Mr. LEVER. That is true.

Mr. COOPER. And the men who have rendered this opinion are men not outside the service, but the men who are to expend the funds, and who ask that the funds be voted to them to expend.

Mr. LEVER. They are men who, on account of their expert knowledge, know best how this fund ought to be expended. But I want to make this observation before I close. If the Committee of the Whole will indicate to the Committee on Agriculture that it desires that we place all of these scientific men on the statutory roll in the next bill, if I am fortunate or unfortunate enough to be chairman of the committee in the next Congress, I will say that the committee will make a very earnest effort to carry out their wishes.

Mr. COOPER. Did the gentleman in the committee fix the aggregate sum to be expended under these different items from the estimates set forth in this Book of Estimates?

Mr. LEVER. We did.

Mr. COOPER. Why do you not put those statements right in your bill?

Mr. LEVER. Probably we could have done it.

Mr. COOPER. Probably. You could have done it of course. What reason did the committee have for not doing it?

Mr. ANDERSON. The Book of Estimates is as available to the gentleman from Wisconsin as it is to us.

Mr. COOPER. It does not bind the man who spends the money. Not only it is the law to protect the Treasury, but to have the money spent as it ought to be spent. If this is to be a Government of law and not of men, as we frequently say, we can not put that into any more effective practice than by saying that the money taken from the Public Treasury shall not be expended within the discretion of bureau chiefs, but in the discretion of Congress that makes the appropriations.

Mr. LEVER. There are three reasons why the committee did not follow the suggestion that is made by the gentleman from Wisconsin. One is that the committee is of the opinion, after listening to the testimony—not this year, but from year to year—that the best way to handle the salaries of these scientific men is to do it in this way. The other is that the committee has followed other committees that have gone before them. The third reason is that the agricultural appropriation bill would probably cover 200 pages if we should follow his suggestion, and would not be intelligible to the Members of the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it is Saturday night, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. LEVER. Will not the gentleman let me get down to the Weather Bureau?

Mr. MANN. Some of us may want to discuss some other items in the Office of Farm Management.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. Then I withdraw the point of no quorum for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LEVER. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw the point of no quorum and I will move to rise.

Mr. MANN. I withdrew the point. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAMLIN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 20415) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and had come to no resolution thereon.

HOUR OF MEETING ON MONDAY.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-morrow it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday. I understand we have eulogies to-morrow, Sunday.

Mr. MANN. Does the House meet to-morrow?

Mr. LEVER. Yes; that is my understanding.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to meeting on Monday at 11 o'clock for the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill, in order to hasten the work on appropriations, but I would not consent to meet on Monday at 11 o'clock for the purpose of transacting District business, which is not very material.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman that it is my intention to move to take up the Agricultural bill on Monday.

Mr. HAWLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has any information as to whether that motion will be carried on Monday?

Mr. MANN. It will be carried if it is made.

Mr. LEVER. I think it will be carried when it is made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-morrow it adjourn to meet on Monday morning at 11 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Reserving the right to object, has the gentleman from South Carolina any understanding with the chairman of the District Committee?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has stated that he will make a motion to take up the Agricultural appropriation bill on Monday instead of District business.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from New York that the indications are that considerable time will be needed to put this bill through—indications that have appeared this afternoon—and I would like to expedite the passage of this bill as quickly as possible in order to prevent a jam of appropriation bills in conference.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If we meet at 11 o'clock on Monday, is it the gentleman's intention to press this bill for consideration?

Mr. LEVER. It is.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 19076. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, in pursuance of the order previously made, until to-morrow, Sunday, January 24, 1915, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Acting Secretary of Commerce, transmitting detailed statement of the number of documents received and distributed by the Department of Commerce, 1914 (H. Doc. No. 1515), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 6631) to regulate the practice of pharmacy and the sale of poison in the consular districts of the United States in China, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1311), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. OLDFIELD, from the Committee on Patents, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 16098) revising and amending the statutes relative to trade-marks, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1313), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 20246) to establish and maintain military training schools in the several States of the Union, in Alaska, and in the District of Columbia, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1312), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Claims was discharged from consideration of the bill (H. R. 20884) for the relief of Charles A. Cutler, and the same was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. OLDFIELD: A bill (H. R. 21137) to amend section 23 of the act entitled "An act to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyright," approved March 4, 1909; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. FLOOD of Virginia: A bill (H. R. 21138) to authorize the payment of an indemnity to the Norwegian Government for the detention of three subjects of Norway in Hudson County, N. J.; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Utah: A bill (H. R. 21139) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to patent certain lands to the State of Utah and to accept from said State certain other lands in lieu thereof; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. FLOOD of Virginia: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 409) authorizing the President to extend invitations to the Governments of Central and South America to appoint representatives to attend a conference with the Secretary of the Treasury in the city of Washington; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma: Concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 58) declaring for a special session of the Sixty-fourth Congress to consider rural-credit legislation; to the Committee on Way and Means.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BAILEY: A bill (H. R. 21140) granting a pension to Sophia Ake; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BOOHER: A bill (H. R. 21141) granting a pension to Adeline Adams (now Grimm); to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BORLAND: A bill (H. R. 21142) granting a pension to Ambrose A. Clarke; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. DOOLITTLE: A bill (H. R. 21143) granting an increase of pension to Margaret L. Wood; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois: A bill (H. R. 21144) for the relief of the heirs of John L. Himes; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HELVERING: A bill (H. R. 21145) granting an increase of pension to Alfred G. Cress; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. KETTNER: A bill (H. R. 21146) for the relief of Daniel McSwegan, alias Gallaghan; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 21147) granting a pension to Eva L. Woollacott; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McANDREWS: A bill (H. R. 21148) granting a pension to Elizabeth Looney; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MORRISON: A bill (H. R. 21149) granting an increase of pension to William E. Hopkins; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 21150) granting a pension to Flora B. Warren; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. NEELY of West Virginia: A bill (H. R. 21151) granting an increase of pension to George M. Warner; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. NORTON: A bill (H. R. 21152) granting a pension to Michael E. Urell; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 21153) granting an increase of pension to Thomas McCormick; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SELLS: A bill (H. R. 21154) for the relief of the legal representatives of Andrew R. Humes; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. WINSLOW: A bill (H. R. 21155) granting an increase of pension to Harriet W. Hildreth; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. ASHBROOK: Memorial of Ministerial Association of Mansfield, Ohio, favoring passage of H. R. 5139—Hamill bill; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

By Mr. BAILEY: Petitions of B. F. Ourandt, of Altoona, and D. M. Fouse, of Drab, Pa., protesting against amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill relative to freedom of the press; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, petition of Staatsverbund State League of Pennsylvania and German Roman Catholic Central Verein, favoring resolution prohibiting export of munitions of war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petitions of United Mine Workers of America, No. 145, Hopewell, and United Mine Workers of America, Local Union No. 2426, Gallitzin, Pa., favoring the passage of Kern-Foster bill relative to extension of the work of the Bureau of Mines; to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

By Mr. BELL of California: Petitions of H. P. Lewis and 410 citizens of Pasadena, Los Angeles, Watts, Hyde Park, Huntington Park, South Pasadena, Alhambra, Hollywood, Anaheim, Whittier, Montebello, Compton, Glendale, Inglewood, Monrovia, Bakersfield, San Francisco, all of California, favoring the passage of House joint resolution 377, prohibiting the export of arms, ammunition, and munitions of war from the territory or any seaport of the United States; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition of Western Forestry and Conservation Association, favoring congressional action in support of forest protection; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department.

Also, memorial of Board of Supervisors of San Diego County, Cal., favoring appropriation for the construction of a military road from Yuma, Ariz.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, resolution of Miriam H. Myrick, Stephen S. Myrick, John A. Merrill, of Los Angeles, Cal., and F. S. Hayden, of Azusa, Cal., favoring peace and protesting against the present war system; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, resolution of the German, Austrian, Hungarian, and Irish Alliance, of Los Angeles, Cal., and citizens of Mankato and vicinity, favoring the observance of strict neutrality by the United States; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, resolutions of Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, favoring reclamation of land in San Bernardino County, Cal.; also recommending adequate pension for widow of late Gen. Chaffee; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, protest of Alice W. Pitman, Elizabeth P. Evans, Lydia Pike, Ellen P. Garwood, Emily G. Hunt, M. D., Elizabeth W. Hunt, M. D., Ellen M. Hunt, and Friends' Society, all of Pasadena, Cal., protesting against the shipment of American horses to European battle fields; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. BORCHERS: Petition of citizens of the State of Illinois, favoring resolution to prohibit export of war material; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois: Petition of 147 citizens of Cook County, Ill., protesting against prohibition in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also, petition of 115 citizens and 19 societies of Chicago, Ill., having a membership of 4,957, favoring House joint resolution 377, to forbid export of arms; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition of 22 Polish societies of Chicago, Ill., against Smith-Burnett immigration bill; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. CARY: Petition of John Eckert, John Lisch, Herman Puhlmann, Hugo Heyse, G. H. Behnke, Frank Guise, William Spiegel, Fred Leypold, and 258 others, all residents of Milwaukee County, Wis., urging the passage of House joint resolution 377; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. COOPER: Petitions of Rev. S. A. Jedele and other residents of Wilmot; John Grape and other residents of Waukesha; Rev. Henry Ohde and other residents of Whitewater; Rev. A. Lossner and other residents of Waterford; Dr. John Schulze and other residents of Racine; E. Duerr and other residents of Lannon; Rev. T. F. Wolff and other residents of Slades Corners; Rev. G. A. Zimmer and other residents of Milton; A. F. Trapp and other residents of Hartland; G. H. Voss and other residents of Union Grove; Rev. F. Koch and other residents of Caledonia; Albert Starks and other residents of Richmond; S. B. Mills and other residents of Waukesha; Clarence Smith and other residents of Menomonee Falls; J. B. Christoph and other residents of Waukesha; German-American National Alliance, Janesville; German Lutheran Church of Kenosha, all in the State of Wisconsin, asking that legislation be enacted that will enable the President to levy an embargo on all goods contraband of war, save only foodstuffs; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. DALE: Petition of the Griscom Russell Co., of New York City, protesting against the passage of the ship-purchase bill; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Also, petition of American Federation of Labor, favoring bill restricting immigration; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Also, memorial of citizens of Mankato and vicinity, favoring resolution prohibiting export of munitions of war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. DILLON: Petitions of citizens of South Dakota, favoring passage of resolution prohibiting export of munitions of war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. DONOVAN: Petition of citizens of Danbury and Bridgeport, Conn., favoring House joint resolution 377, to prohibit export of arms; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition of Polish Women's Alliance of America, No. 67, of Bridgeport; the Polish Falcon's Society, of Stamford; and White Eagles National Alliance, No. 1791, of Bridgeport, all in the State of Connecticut, against the Smith-Burnett immigration bill; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. DOOLITTLE: Petition of 27 citizens of White City, Kans., favoring resolution prohibiting export of munitions of war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. FITZGERALD: Petition of steamship companies of Puget Sound and Alaska, relative to certain aids to navigation; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Also, petition of New York Board of Trade and Transportation, favoring Senate bill 3672, to improve Harlem River; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Also, petition of German-American League and United Irish Societies of San Francisco, Cal., favoring neutrality by the United States; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition of Western Forestry and Conservation Association, of Portland, Oreg., favoring an appropriation for forest protection; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department.

By Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania: Petition of Polish Roman Catholics in the Union of America, Philadelphia, Pa., protesting against the literacy test in the immigration bill; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. HILL: Petition of citizens of Conant, Ill., favoring resolution to prohibit export of war material; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. IGOE: Petitions by Martin S. Sommers; Edward A. Kamp, for Federation of Evangelical Brotherhoods; Michael J. Deck and Henry J. Jacobsmeyer, for the Catholic District League No. 1; George G. Ernst, for the German Roman Catholic Verein; George Willmering and Edward Jansen, for Branch 427, Catholic Knights of America; William Lapusan; F. J. William Weiger; Henry Vennemann, Frank Peters, Henry Ruesken, B. H. Ruesken, and others, for Our Lady of Perpetual Help Benevolent Society and Catholic Knights of America, Branch 552, protesting against the shipment of arms and munitions of war to belligerent nations and favoring legislation prohibiting such shipments; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of American citizens at the Coliseum in St. Louis, Mo., January 10, 1915, under the auspices of the American Neutrality League, protesting against the sale and exportation of arms and ammunition to any belligerent nation in the present or future wars, and favoring legislation prohibiting same; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island: Petition of Arthur I. Conaty, of Providence, R. I., urging protection for Catholics in Mexico; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition of A. Perregaux, of Lincoln, R. I., favoring passage of the Palmer-Owen child-labor bill; to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. LOBECK: Petition of 147 citizens of Nebraska and 86 members of Plattdeutsche Verein, of Papillion, Nebr., favoring resolution prohibiting export of war material; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. McANDREWS: Petition of citizens of Illinois, favoring House joint resolution 377, to forbid export of arms to Europe; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. MAGUIRE of Nebraska: Memorial of German Evangelical Lutheran St. Paul's Congregation, of Lincoln, Nebr., favoring resolution relative to export of war material; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. MAHAN: Petitions of citizens of Norwich, Conn., and vicinity, favoring passage of resolution relative to export of war material; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. MAPES: Petition of citizens of Grand Rapids, Mich., favoring House joint resolution 377, to prohibit export of war material; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. MOON: Papers to accompany H. R. 6664, for the relief of Joseph Clyde Shadden; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MORIN: Petition of citizens of the State of Pennsylvania, favoring the Hamill bill, H. R. 5139; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

By Mr. NEELY of West Virginia: Papers to accompany H. R. 21151, a bill for the relief of George M. Warner; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. O'SHAUNESSY: Petition of citizens of Warren, R. I., against Smith-Burnett immigration bill; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Also, petition of H. A. Thayer, Providence, R. I., favoring Stevens bill; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petition of citizens of Providence, R. I., protesting against ruling of the Postmaster General forbidding the use of colored paper inserted in window envelopes; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, petition of citizens of Newport, Providence, and Pawtuckett, R. I., favoring Owen-Palmer child-labor bill; to the Committee on Labor.

Also, petition of citizens of Providence, R. I., protesting against persecution of Catholic clergy and sisters in Mexico; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. RAKER: Petition of James West and others, favoring House joint resolution 168; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petitions of the Merchants' Exchange of Oakland, Cal., and Petaluma (Cal.) Central Labor Council, favoring the Hamill bill, H. R. 5139; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

Also, petition of Mrs. Alice F. Painter, of Eureka, Cal., favoring abolition by United States of the war system; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of William C. Snowdon, of Corning, Cal., against Fitzgerald amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, petition of priests of Scranton (Pa.) diocese, relative to transmission through mails of certain publications; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, petition of Elk Grove (Cal.) Grange, No. 86, against contract system in rural delivery service; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. SABATH: Petition of citizens of Chicago, Ill., against Smith-Burnett immigration bill; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. SCULLY: Memorial of priests of the Scranton (Pa.) diocese and Church of the Holy Savior, of Wilkes-Barre, Pa., protesting against carrying the publication called the Menace through the mails; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, petition of Tow Fostep, S. R. 1023, I. N. P., of Chrome, N. J., and Polish Falcons' Alliance of South River, N. J., protesting against the Smith-Burnett immigration bill; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Also, petition of German Presbyterian Church of Sayresville, Pa.; German-American Alliance of Los Angeles, Cal.; and German, Austrian, Hungarian, and Irish Alliance, relative to strict neutrality of the United States; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. SMITH of Idaho: Petition of Dr. John F. Schmershall and other citizens, favoring resolution relative to export of war material; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petitions of Mary Schaweller and other citizens of Post Falls and Joseph Schlaegel and other citizens of Jerome, Idaho, favoring resolution relative to export of war material; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. STEPHENS of California: Memorial of German, Austrian, Hungarian, and Irish Alliance, Los Angeles, Cal., and German Roman Staatsverbund State League of California, and German Roman Catholic Central Verein, favoring resolution to prohibit export of war material; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, memorial of Los Angeles (Cal.) Chamber of Commerce, favoring section 14, Wilson bill, be adopted in lieu of section 13, La Follette bill—seaman's bill; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Also, memorial of Orange Grove Monthly Meeting of Friends, of Pasadena, Cal., protesting against the sending of American horses to European battle fields; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota: Memorial of faculty of Macalester College, St. Paul, Minn., protesting against increasing of armament by United States; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WALLIN: Petition of Central New York District Council of Electrical Workers, favoring postalization of all telephone lines; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.